That was an utterly inconsistent and intolerable position for a Liberal statesman to take up. The right hon. and learned Gentleman endeavoured to put the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) on the horns of a dilemma, and, interpreting the clause his own way, he said the hon. Member wished to defeat the object of it. Now, the objection of the hon. and learned Attorney General to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Christchurch (Mr. Horace Davey) was that the Amendment attributed an intention to the clause which the clause had not; and if the clause had not the intention of interfering with exclusive dealing which was not for the purpose of intimidation and coercion, why not put in words to say that it had not that meaning? Why not give the Irish people such protection for their liberties as the Amendment of his hon. Friend would give them? Let the right hon. and learned Gentleman take the Amendment of his hon. Friend. Let him point out that the Amendment in any way defeated the intention and purpose of the clause. If it did not, then let him put it in the Bill. A superfluity in the defence of the liberties of the people was a superfluity that was good, and ought to be welcome to any Liberal statesman brought up under Constitutional principles. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) did not mean at all to enter into the argument which had been raised by his hon. Friend as to the general principle of "Boycotting." He said that that had nothing to do with the Amendment. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: Hear, hear!] The right hon. and learned Gentleman applauded that observation. Then, if the Amendment had nothing to do with "Boycotting," why object to put it in the clause, the purpose of the clause being to put down "Boycotting?" He invited an answer to that question. The clause was for the purpose of putting down "Boycotting." This Amendment was not for the purpose of interfering with that object. Then why not accept it, seeing that it would afford protection to a portion of the liberty of the subject, which was proposed to be taken away by the Bill?

MR. BIGGAR said, that, leaving entirely out of consideration the question whether "Boycotting" was an immoral practice or not, or whether it was desirable to put it down, he thought it was highly necessary that the clause should be safeguarded as much as possible, or otherwise great injustice might be done. His chief objection to the Bill was that it would create injustice and inconvenience to persons who might be perfectly innocent, while, at the same time, it would not affect those with whom it proposed to deal. He would give a case to illustrate what he meant. Suppose a shopkeeper in a country town was in the habit of giving credit. Suppose he were applied to by a farmer who had had a large amount of goods already, and the shopkeeper said—"I will supply you if you pay me ready money, but I do not intend to give you the credit I have been in the habit of doing heretofore." If the farmer were malicious, and possessed, as he probably might, the ear of the local magistrate and the police, he would say at once—"If you do not give me credit I will go to the police and tell them that you are trying to intimidate me by doing something which is injurious to my interests, and I will have you put into prison for six months." What guarantee would that shopkeeper have that he would not be sent to prison for six months, simply because, with no intention of intimidating a buyer, he wanted to protect himself against giving credit for an amount that would never be paid? A state of circumstances might arise in which direct injustice might be done to an individual by the provisions of this particular clause, and he thought the Amendment proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) was calculated to secure more or less of safety to the person against whom the charge of intimidation was made. The shopkeeper, if he knew what he had done was perfectly legal and legitimate, of course would not be in fear of punishment. The whole evil would be guarded against, and it could not be stated that in such a case as this any actual intimidation could be intended. In the absence of an Amendment of this kind, unless very substantial evidence could be brought forward, the magistrate who adjudicated upon the case would have power to decide simply upon an assumption in his own mind, without reference to any specific evidence as to the facts of the case. He trusted that the Government would not further object to the Amendment, and if they did, he hoped his hon. Friend would divide the Committee.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that it seemed to him that the present Amendment was merely a generalization of one put on the Paper on Friday by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). The object of this Amendment was to generalize instead of particularize the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). He would ask the Home Secretary whether he would accept the principle of the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell); not, perhaps, its precise words, but its principle, because the Attorney General might be able to bring up better words? If the right hon. and learned Gentleman would do that, he thought the Irish Representatives would have no objection to accept it, instead of the Amendment moved by his hon. Friend the Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy). He asked the Home Secretary to be good enough to inform the Committee whether the Government would consent to take that course; because it seemed to him that the matter was not one of very paramount importance, and it would greatly tend to make the Bill proceed smoothly, which was an object they all desired.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he could not support the Amendment on account of the words contained in it referring to the practice "of what was commonly known as exclusive dealing." These words appeared to him to be very objectionable. He rose, however, to put a question to the Home Secretary in regard to the Amendment in connection with the 4th clause. Would the 4th clause in any way affect the working of the Trades Union Acts of 1871 and 1876?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had already answered that question in the negative two or three times. It was intended to insert an Amendment at the end of the Bill to save the Act of 1875, but that was a totally different thing from introducing these matters into the clause. If they introduced limitations of this kind it would lead to all sorts of misapprehension. The Government were perfectly aware that this clause and other clauses of the Bill dealt with very difficult matters, and they had it under consideration to give the Resident Magistrate legal assistance. They had it in their mind to give him the assistance of a lawyer. He could not state definitely the precise form in which that could be done; but their desire was that the Resident Magistrates, in the administration of the law, should have legal assistance. All the Government had to do on this and other clauses was to make the statement of their intentions as clear as possible, and it was desirable not to complicate the matter by introducing unnecessary provisions. To give any sort of approbation to exclusive dealing in the clause would be very mischievous indeed; and for that reason the Government could not accept the Amendment, which was in the same position as another Amendment still on the Paper, and which was, on the face of it, suggested in the interests of the "no rent" agitation. He trusted that the discussion would now close, and that the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) would allow a decision to be taken upon his Amendment.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN said, he wished to put a question to the Home Secretary, because upon the answer he received to it his vote upon the Amendment would depend. He was informed by a gentleman who had recently come into an estate in Yorkshire, that the feeling in that part of the country against Irishmen was very strong indeed, and it was stated that a number of farmers there had combined to agree that under no circumstances whatever would they employ Irish labourers. He wished to know if that sort of action would be regarded as "Boycotting" under this Bill?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he could not understand what the action of the farmers in Yorkshire could have to do with this Bill at all. What might be done in the West Riding could have no bearing upon the operation of the Act in Ireland.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR wished to ask the Law Officers of the Government what the clause really meant?

THE CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. Member that the question is not the adoption of the clause, but the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy).

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he had not quite accurately expressed what he intended to say. He thought the hon.

[Ninth Night.]

Baronet who had just spoken (Sir David Wedderburn) had put the matter in a nutshell. This clause took away all right of combination in Ireland, while combination was safeguarded in every shape and form for every class of Englishmen. The hon. Baronet had mentioned the case of the Yorkshire farmers and the Irish labourers; but hon. Members would not be ignorant that in every class of life in this country, owing to the hostility maintained towards Irishmen, the same sort of prejudice was employed for the purpose of interfering with the calling, business, and livelihood of Irishmen. [Mr. JOHN BRIGHT: No, no!] The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster said "No, no!" Was the right hon. Gentleman acquainted with the affairs of every Irishman in this country? Was he acquainted with the details of the business of the Irish people in this country? He would tell the right hon. Gentleman that, much as the right hon. Gentleman did know, there were some things which were not fully brought to his knowledge; and he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) would reiterate the fact that, owing to the prevalent opinion against Irishmen in this country, Irishmen were interfered with even in the means of earning their bread in England by Englishmen. Consequently, this kind of combination was allowed in England, and the public opinion of the country sanctioned it; whereas the Government proposed to take it away from Irishmen in Ireland who were endeavouring to protect their lives, their property, and their homes. The Amendment had no connection with "Boycotting," and he would advise his hon. Friend the Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) to omit from it the words which applied to exclusive dealing. He did not think that they ought even indirectly to justify exclusive dealing by Act of Parliament; but the first words of the Amendment of his hon. Friend simply asked that the magistrates, in interpreting the clause, should not interpret it so widely as to interfere with all right of combination among the Irish tenants. He did not see why the Government should object to a proposal of that kind. It did not interfere with their clause; but it might interfere with the power of the landlords to pursue a course of relentless persecution against the tenant.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

MR. HEALY said, that, in using the words "exclusive dealing," he had humbly copied the phraseology of the Prime Minister. He did not claim any copyright in the phrase; but it belonged entirely to the Prime Minister. No one could take it from the right hon. Gentleman, and the phrase must have the sanction and approval of the Prime Minister, because he had invented it himself. He (Mr. Healy) had simply desired to recommend the Amendment to the Treasury Bench by employing a phrase which had been coined by their Head and Chief. He had noticed the vigour with which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright) shook his head a moment ago. Had the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster never heard of the famous catchword, "No Irish need apply?" It was a phrase which he (Mr. Healy) had heard in one or two places he had visited, and especially in Liverpool, Manchester, and some of the Northern towns, and he believed that it was frequently put in force. He did not complain of men who enforced their natural prejudices in a heated time; but he was only calling attention to the existence in England of a practice analogous to the one which they desired to carry out in Ireland. The Home Secretary objected that he (Mr. Healy) had gone into the question of "Boycotting" once more. The observation of the right hon. and learned Gentleman would have been legitimate, if, in the course of the four days' discussion, they had ever succeeded in extracting one word from him to assure them that the clause would not be used in the way they apprehended it would be. But not one word had fallen from the Government in reply to the attacks and charges of the Irish Representatives; and on the fourth day he was to be complained of, according to the Home Secretary, because he felt it his duty to return to the charge. The Government flattered themselves that they would not hear any more of this matter. He (Mr. Healy) believed they were likely to hear a great deal more of it. He charged the Government of Ireland with maintaining the "Boycotting" system themselves in some of the counties, and with having used their police to "Boycott" one class of the people in the interests of religious fanaticism. The Home Secretary said he (Mr. Healy) desired to introduce the caste system of India into Ireland. Now, he would not stoop even to deny that allegation; but he really thought that when a Gentleman of the high character and ability of the right hon. and learned Gentleman made a reckless charge of that kind, he ought to ascertain what foundation there was for it.

MR. BIGGAR wished to ask the Home Secretary one question. He understood the right hon. and learned Gentleman to say that he intended, at the end of the Bill, to introduce a clause to provide that the Acts of 1871 and 1875, with regard to the practice of combination, should be read as part of the present Bill. He asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether it would not be well to state specifically the general purpose of his Amendment—whether it would allow the Irish farmers to combine in certain matters for which combination was legal in England? Of course, it could not be expected that the farmers and labourers in Ireland would be permitted to combine for illegal purposes; but would the right hon. and learned Gentleman sanction their combination for objects which were in themselves perfectly legal?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, there were various objects in regard to which combination was not forbidden by the Bill; but if the act done was done in order to put another man in fear, then under this Bill it would not be allowed.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 34; Noes 258: Majority 224.—(Div. List, No. 126.)

The next Amendment on the Paper was the following, which stood in the name of the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon):—In page 3, line 29, after “living,” insert—“Provided always, That nothing in this Clause shall be taken to apply to—

(a.) The right of physicians to refuse to meet in consultation, and otherwise to cause injury to the business and means of living of any member of their profession who shall attend a patient for the sum of five shillings or less;

(b.) Or to the ancient and well-known system of Boycotting, by which the members of the Irish Bar have from time immemorial enforced an unwritten law, to the following effect:

- (1.) That no barrister shall enter a circuit town before his circuit, lest he might canvass solicitors for briefs;
- (2.) That no barrister shall use any public advertisement for the purpose of bringing his merits under the notice of the public, &c. &c.”

THE CHAIRMAN: This Amendment, in the name of the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon), is obviously intended as a joke upon the Committee, and cannot be seriously proposed. It would be impossible for me to put such an Amendment from the Chair.

MR. DILLON wished to say a word on the point of Order. The Amendment was not in the least degree intended as a joke, but had been placed on the Paper with the object of having the question seriously discussed by the Committee. He had not understood the Chairman to rule that it was out of Order.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have ruled that it is out of Order, and that it cannot be put.

MR. HEALY said, he had understood the Chairman to rule that it was out of Order, because he regarded it as a joke; but the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) asserted that he did not intend it to be a joke.

THE CHAIRMAN: Then if the hon. Member did not intend it as a joke, it is trifling with the Committee, and it is out of Order.

MR. HEALY, in proposing, in page 3, line 29, after “living,” to insert—said, the Government had declared, a few minutes ago, that they would object to any Amendment which interfered with the intention of the clause. They had also expressed their opinion that the word “intimidation” was made so clear, and so fully conveyed the meaning of the Government, that no stipendiary magistrate in Ireland would have any difficulty in construing it. His (Mr. Healy's) contention was that the clause did nothing of the kind; and he therefore proposed this proviso in order to enable a person to do any act he had a legal right to do, and to abstain from doing any act which he had a legal right to abstain from doing.

“Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be deemed to oblige any person to do any act which such person has a legal right to abstain from doing, or to abstain from doing any act which such person has a legal right to do,”

[Ninth Night.]

Her Majesty's Government could not say that this Amendment would import into the clause any novel or new doctrine. It did nothing of the sort; it simply recited a dry matter of fact for the purpose of laying down distinctly that a man was not to be the victim of a vindictive or malicious act on the part of the police. He might remind the Government that, notwithstanding their declaration, they had not accepted a single Amendment from an Irish Member except upon a mere point of detail. It was true that they had accepted a few Amendments, but they had generally come from the Front Opposition Bench; and, so far as he knew, the only Amendment they had accepted from an Irish Member was the insertion of the words "in order to," proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). No other Amendment proposed by an Irish Member had been adopted by the Government; and the arguments addressed from those Benches to the Government had been completely thrown away. The majority of hon. Members sitting behind the Government had remained altogether silent, probably on the reasonable ground that they thought the Government knew their own minds, and they were content to give the Government the full and complete powers they asked for. But, on the other hand, he thought the Government should recognize, in some way, the feelings of the Irish Representatives on that side of the House; and it was to be regretted that, as a matter of fact, the Irish Members had not succeeded in getting one word inserted into the clause. Not a single proposition would the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary accept from them, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman might go away from the House and boast that he had succeeded in sitting there a monument of Parliamentary stolidity, as far as his action in regard to the Bill was concerned. But he would point out to the Government that that was not the spirit in which Her Majesty's Ministers ought to deal with the Irish Members, nor was it the manner in which the Irish Members had been dealt with on previous occasions. He had no desire to draw a parallel between the Home Secretary and the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster); but, as a matter of fact, when the Coercion Bill of last year was introduced, the Irish Members did obtain some concessions from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster)—notably in regard to the treatment of prisoners. But this year, in dealing with the Home Secretary, they had not got a single syllable, and not even a word, put into the clause. The right hon. and learned Gentleman allowed himself to be guided solely by the views of the Opposition. He had no wish to disparage the arguments of the right hon. and learned Gentleman; but the Irish Members were certainly unconvinced by them, although, undoubtedly, the right hon. and learned Gentleman could go away from that House and boast to his Colleagues in the Cabinet, or to anybody else, that he had passed this most obnoxious Bill without making a single concession upon it.

Amendment proposed,

To add at the end of the Clause the words "Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be deemed to oblige any person to do any act which such person has a legal right to abstain from doing, or to abstain from doing any act which such person has a legal right to do."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not rise for the purpose of answering the personal attack which the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) had made upon him. He did not think the abuse of the hon. Member would make the House think any better of the hon. Member or any worse of himself, nor would it in any way affect the progress of the Bill. But he demurred to the statements of fact which had been made by the hon. Member. The hon. Member said that the Government had accepted no Amendments submitted by the Irish Members, but that they had been guided entirely by the views of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson). Now, first of all, the Government had been guided by their own views as expressed in the Bill. The words of the clause were not the words of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson). They simply expressed the result of the careful and deliberated determination of Her Majesty's Government. They had not, however, been obstinate about the clause. There had been two Amendments already inserted into the clause, neither of which had been introduced at the suggestion of any of his right hon. Friends who sat with him on the Treasury Bench. The first Amendment was introduced at the suggestion of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and so far the hon. Member was correct in the statement he had made; but the second Amendment, and the most material Amendment, with the object of making the clause more clear, was accepted from the hon. Member who sat behind him, the hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Cohen). Those were the facts of the case, and they were not consistent with the statement the hon. Gentleman had just made. He did not think that either of these alterations had met with the strong approval of hon. Members opposite, so that there was an additional inaccuracy in the statement of the hon. Member. He (Sir William Harcourt) would now deal with the Amendment itself. It was an Amendment by way of Proviso to repeal the clause, and the hon. Member could hardly suppose that the Government would be prepared to accept such an Amendment. The Amendment said—

Mr. Healy

“Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be deemed to oblige any person to do any act which such person has a legal right to abstain from doing, or to abstain from doing any act which such person has a legal right to do.”

Now, the whole object of the clause was to make it an offence for a man to do that which, before the passing of the clause, he had a legal right to do, if he did it with the intention stated in the clause, of ruining another man. He could scarcely see the use of treating as a serious proposition an Amendment in the shape of a Proviso which would have the effect of repealing all they had hitherto done in reference to the clause.

MR. PARNELL said, the Government had repeatedly stated that their object regarding this clause was to put down “Boycotting,” and that that was their object in inserting the clause in the Bill. Now, Irish Members had pointed out from time to time that, in addition to giving powers to put down “Boycotting,” the clause would give the Resident Magistrates in Ireland the power of putting down combination, which, under similar circumstances, legally existed in England. They had called the attention of the Government to the necessity of introducing such limitations or Provisoes in this clause as would deprive the Resident Magistrates of that power, giving them, at the same time, power to put down “Boycotting.” He could not think the course which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had followed in this matter was a fair one towards Irish Members. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had taken advantage of the prejudice which existed against “Boycotting” to endeavour to obtain a clause which would leave it in the power of the Executive Government—even in the power of those who were distrusted in Ireland, the stipendiary magistrates, over whom, according to law, the Executive Government had no control with regard to the administration of the law—to put down any kind of combination in Ireland, and to control the actions, words, and thoughts of the people in the most unheard of way. Now, during the four days on which this clause had been under discussion, the Government had had placed before them the wishes of the Irish Members, that some definition or limitation should be introduced into the clause in order to carry out what both Parties said was their object—namely, the maintenance of the right of combination, and to secure that this should not be left to the discretion of any magistrate. The right of workmen to combine to leave their employers for the purpose of carrying out any lawful object, and the right of farmers to combine for the purpose of obtaining a reduction of their rents—these were two objects which Irish Members could not give up, and upon them they must endeavour to turn the minds of the Government if possible. At present those rights were not left under this clause of the Bill, inasmuch as they could be taken away by the action of any stipendiary magistrate. For his own part, he was not disposed to allow the Government to walk off under cover of the prejudice created against “Boycotting,” and obtain the passage of the clause, which practically abolished the right of combination.

MR. T. C. THOMPSON said, that there was clearly a difficulty with regard to the wording of the clause, when taken in connection with the statement of the Home Secretary. The words were capable of being made much more extensive than the Legislature intended. He need not point out to the Committee that it was necessary, in framing an Act of Parliament, to be perfectly clear with regard to the language employed. These words, understood with reference to the context of the debate, might have a very different meaning applied to them in other circumstances. In criminal legislation the utmost care must be taken not to use words capable of any interpretation beyond the meaning strictly intended.

MR. LABOUCHERE wished to ask the Home Secretary a question which he had put to him previously, and which an hon. Member had also asked in the course of this discussion. Did the Bill deprive Irish labourers of the right of giving up employment, and did it deprive the tenants of the right to refuse to pay rent? Again, did the fact of the tenant refusing to pay his rent bring him under the provisions of the Bill? The Home Secretary said he would put in words taken from the Act of 1875 to meet this case, or, at any rate, he understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that he would do so. If the right hon. Gentleman intended to insert words of this sort, he thought the progress of the Bill would be facilitated if he would be good enough to say whether those words covered the cases he (Mr. Labouchere) had just referred to. Would the right hon. Gentleman say that after the words were inserted in the Bill a labourer might claim the right to leave his employment if he liked, and a farmer refuse to pay his rent without becoming liable under the Act?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, as he desired to make this clause as clear as possible, he replied once more, that a man leaving his employment, as he was perfectly free to do now, would also be free to do so under this Bill. A man not able to pay his rent was subject to civil action for breach of contract; but if a man refused to pay, or did any other act with an intent forbidden in the Bill, then he would have committed an offence under the Bill. Fears had been expressed that in some way or other the principles guaranteed under the Act of 1875 would be interfered with; but he had said, over and over again, that except in cases of the kind just referred to, the Act of 1875 would apply as before—that was to say, Her Majesty's Government proposed that it should not be interfered with by the present Bill. He had heard also expressions of doubt and apprehension lest the Bill should interfere with the legitimate political association of Irishmen for lawful purposes. Well, that was not the intention of the Bill, and Her Majesty's Government would be perfectly ready to declare also in a Saving Clause that it was not so intended, or to have that effect; and it would be believed by every man who was a lawyer, and by every man of common sense, he might add, that this was not the intention of the Bill. If it were necessary to declare that these associations for legitimate political purposes were not intended to be interfered with, he should have no objection to declare it; but he should not care to introduce any limitation of that kind into this clause, because any such limitation introduced might become a cause of great confusion and difficulty. He trusted hon. Members would accept the statement he had made in reply to the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), and the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell).

MR. PARNELL said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had answered the question of the hon. Member for Northampton, but in a very unsatisfactory way. He was sorry to see that he had practically answered that question in a way which showed that this Act was intended to prevent the combinations suggested by the hon. Member for Northampton. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that a tenant farmer could refuse to pay his rent, or a labourer might leave his employment, provided they did not do so with the forbidden intent in this Bill. Well, then, what was the forbidden intent in the Bill? It was that a person was to be charged with intending to put some other person in fear of injury, or loss to himself or his property, or means of living; but he would like to know how any labourer could leave his employment, either alone or in combination with others, or how any farmer could refuse to pay anything but a fair rent, either alone or in combination, except by putting his landlord in fear of loss to his property? If a landlord were told that he would not get his rent, it followed that he must be placed in fear of loss to his property; if a farmer was told by his workmen that they were about to leave him—perhaps at a critical time when he wanted their services—it would necessarily follow that the employer was placed in fear of injury to his business or property. In fact, every action of workmen in England in the case of strikes placed employers in fear of injury to their property and means of living; and, therefore, when any combination or strike was undertaken by bodies of men belonging to particular classes, it must be with fear that loss to property would result from the action of such combination. As a matter of fact, that was the only way, practically speaking, in which the workmen could enforce the strike. If an employer remained in precisely the same position after a strike, and found there would be no loss to his business or property, he would disregard the strike, and the workmen would not be able to hope that the result of the strike would be to obtain the increase of wages or whatever other object they might have struck for. So it was with regard to Ireland, and now the Home Secretary had admitted that what the Bill proposed to do was to take away from Irish workmen this very important right—a right which existed in England—and to allow the stipendiary magistrates to say that that which was perfectly lawful for English workmen might be intimidation for Irish workmen to do. He thought they had now a better understanding of the position, and were able to get a better view of the prospect of ameliorating the condition of the Irish people.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was afraid he could do no more than repeat what his right hon. and learned Friend had stated. As he understood, the hon. Member for the City of Cork desired that the labourer or workman who, for the purpose of obtaining an advance of wages, said to his employer that he wished to leave his service, should not come within this section. His right hon. and learned Friend had said, over and over again, that this would not be an offence within the clause, for the reason that before you could create an offence within this clause, the act must be done in order to effect a wrong. The workmen, in the case put by the hon. Member, proposed to leave the service of his employer not for the purpose of intimidating him, but to benefit himself, and that was not an offence contemplated by the Bill. With respect to the combination which the hon. Member suggested would become illegal under this Act, his right hon. and learned Friend had stated that he would strictly declare in the Bill that the protection created by the Act of 1875 should be preserved. His right hon. and learned Friend in this respect was willing to meet the views of the hon. Member for the City of Cork. What the Act of 1875 did was to declare that nothing in relation to the action between employers and employed should be an offence, in consequence of the mere act of combination; and the distinction between legal and illegal combinations, drawn in the Act of 1875, would be preserved, and with it the right of persons, individually or in combination, to strike or leave employment for the purpose of obtaining better wages, or otherwise benefiting themselves.

MR. PARNELL said, he must confess he was unable to follow the hon. and learned Gentleman. He was afraid that what he was doing, although very clever in itself, was really hair-splitting. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had drawn a distinction between the intent to strike in the one case, and the intent to strike in the other, and that distinction he (Mr. Parnell) was unable to see. The hon. and learned Gentleman had said that where the labourer, either alone or in combination, struck to obtain better wages for himself, it was not an illegal thing, because he struck to obtain an advantage for himself; it was only when he struck to effect a wrong that the action amounted to intimidation. He repeated that he was unable to see how the distinction between the results was to be preserved. When workmen struck with the intention of obtaining an advantage to themselves, such as the increase in the rate of wages or otherwise, how was this proposal to be effected? It was, in effect, by putting a wrong upon the employer, because such a strike would not be entered into at all were it not for the purpose of bringing pressure to bear upon an employer to show him that injury would result to him by his labourers leaving him if he did not give in to their fair and legitimate demands. What earthly effect could a strike of labourers have if an employer could turn round, without any loss to himself whatever, with equal advantage to himself, perhaps with greater advantage to himself, and obtain another set of workmen as cheaply as those who left his service? Under such circumstances, a strike would never be entered into at all, because it could never be effectual. Therefore, he submitted that the distinction of the hon. and learned Gentleman, as between the labourer obtaining an advantage for himself and effecting a wrong against his employer, had no existence. These were two separate and distinct actions which must go side by side, otherwise the strike could never have a successful issue. The words of this Bill absolutely precluded any strike of workmen from taking place which would inflict the slightest injury upon employers. Not only according to the wording of the clause, but according to the explanation put upon it by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, the magistrates, in deciding whether a strike would inflict injury on employers, must necessarily consider whether injury had been inflicted; and if they found that it had been, or that it was likely that it would result, then clearly the magistrates would feel themselves justified, according to the interpretation given by the Attorney General for England, in finding the men guilty of intimidation, and sentencing them to gaol for six months.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had listened to the speech of the hon. Member for the City of Cork with considerable attention, and he was compelled to ask himself by what hallucination the hon. Member had imported into the discussion on this clause such a mass of what appeared to be arbitrary and visionary interpretation? The proposition of the hon. Member was that he wished to take care that the Government should not, under the pretext of putting down "Boycotting," also put down that species of combination which workmen were permitted to use in England. Now, those combinations which workmen were permitted to use in England were usually directed to some object of benefit to themselves; but the combination of labourers in Ireland was generally attended with the opposite result—namely, of injury to the persons who used them. It was, in fact, a complete inversion of the strike as understood in England. It resulted, it was true, in loss to the employers; but it resulted also in loss to the labourers. In the case mentioned by the hon. Member for the City of Cork, the labourers did not strike for the purpose of obtaining an increase of their wages, and probably no inducement which the landlord might offer would be likely to satisfy them. The strike in this case was done for a purpose extraneous to that of obtaining a benefit such as had been described. He was surprised that the hon. Member for the City of Cork, who, it seemed to him, usually kept as close to his point in arguing upon the interpretation of other parts of the Bill as any Member of that House, legal or non-legal, should be arguing on that occasion that the insertion of the words adopted to meet the views of hon. Members on a former night would have no effect on the clause. The hon. Member said that the magistrate would look simply to the effect upon the employer, and not to the intent with which the act was done. But it was precisely because the words of the clause appeared to be colourably open to that interpretation that his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department proposed to bring in the words "in order to." It was true that the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) proposed to substitute for those words, at one time, "with intent to do;" but the hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. A. Cohen) declared that he had carefully compared the two phrases together, and that the words "in order to" constituted a more effective and stronger phrase—that this phrase meant something, and that it meant that the effect on the employer was not to be a test of the character of the act done, but that the intent must be looked back to; and if the act was done for the purpose of injuring the employer it would be intimidation, whereas, if it were done for the benefit of the workmen, then, as in England, it could not be intimidation, and could not be an offence under the law. With great respect for the hon. Member for the City of Cork, he was bound to say that his argument appeared to him to be an argument directly in the face of the wording of the clause. The hon. Member asserted that nothing but the effect on the employer was to be looked to; but it must be remembered that the Committee had unanimously—with the exception of the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), who had made a reservation—introduced into the clause words for the very purpose of preventing that evil. If the hon. Member were still able to say that the words of the clause were directed simply to the effect upon the employer, and that that was the only criterion to determine the character of an act of intimidation, no doubt that would constitute a strong criticism. But that was not the effect of the clause now, because words were introduced to carry back the Judge to the examination of the purpose and intent. He appealed to the hon. Member to take this view of the case, although he could not hope to produce an effect upon his mind if he still declined to accept the declarations of his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department and the hon. and learned Attorney General.

Mr. PARNELL said, the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had given a fairer definition and a much fairer interpretation of the effect of the clause than the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James). The right hon. Gentleman had explained that where labourers were withdrawn from their employment, not for the purpose of gaining a benefit for themselves, but for the purpose of punishing the landlord as regarded his conduct towards his tenants—that this would be held to be intimidation. He (Mr. Parnell) would be perfectly satisfied with that definition if it were added to the clause, and if it were not left to be constructed out of the clause by the stipendiary magistrates. He did not see any difficulty in accepting that position—namely, that persons should be at liberty in Ireland to take combined action for their own benefit; but not for the purpose of punishing their employers or their landlords in order to obtain benefits for some other people. He believed he had stated, however roughly, the idea of the Prime Minister with regard to intimidation. For instance, he understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that if a landlord had labourers in his employment, and these labourers were withdrawn from his employment in order to compel him to give a reduction of rent to his tenants, that that would be intimidation; but that it would not be intimidation if these labourers were withdrawn from their employment in order to obtain an increase of wages for themselves. Now, he thought that if they could get that put into the Bill, and also extended to breach of contract, which was also not a criminal offence in England, it would be fair enough—that was to say, that persons might take action of this kind for their own benefit, and not for any ulterior or other object outside it. It was not for him to suggest how these things should be done. The Government had a great deal of legal skill at their command, and he thought it would be fair for the Prime Minister, after the statement he had made, to consider in what way the view he had expressed could be carried out, which seemed to give to the Irish tenants and labourers the same right of legal and harmless combination which existed in England.

Mr. GIBSON said, he would not suppose that the Committee required to be told that the hon. Member for the City of Cork was a man of ingenuity and resource. The Prime Minister had just made a short speech, pointing out his view with regard to the clause before the Committee, and the hon. Member for the City of Cork suggested that the Prime Minister had in that speech made some concession. He ventured to say that the Prime Minister had done nothing of the kind. What was the statement put into plain English? The hon. Member for the City of Cork had endeavoured to discuss this question as if there were an analogy between the case of strikes in England, and that of the withdrawal of labourers from employment in Ireland. But he maintained that no such analogy existed. If workmen in England struck, it was avowedly in order to obtain an increase of wages or an improvement of their condition. But what was the condition of the Irish labourers? When undoubtedly they were coerced, as they had been during the last 12 months, they had withdrawn in some cases from their employment most unwillingly; they had withdrawn not only to the detriment of their employers, but in many cases to their own absolute ruin. Everyone knew that there was not a single case in Ireland of labourers having withdrawn for their own benefit; they had withdrawn because they were compelled and forced to do so for the benefit of others. It was a fact which could not be gainsaid that these labourers who had withdrawn had not done so with the object of getting more lucrative employment; on the contrary, they had been maintained by the Land League at the same wages, or at similar wages, or else they had been allowed to go into the workhouse and starve. It was now adroitly suggested by the hon. Member for the City of Cork, himself a master of adroitness—if he might be allowed to say so—that it would be satisfactory to put into this Bill a statement that labourers should be allowed to withdraw from their employment for the purpose of raising their wages. Now, anyone acquainted with the question knew that every labourer would avow that he had withdrawn from his employment for the purpose of obtaining an increase of wages, under the circumstances described. That would be the allegation in every case, and therefore he said that if the suggestion of the hon. Member for the City of Cork were adopted, that moment an opportunity would be afforded of evading the clause. Let hon. Members ask themselves this question. Did they think that the hon. Member for the City of Cork was seriously anxious by his suggestion to have the clause made efficient for putting down “Boycotting?” Would the hon. Member himself assent to that proposition? The hon. Member said “Yes,” and he (Mr. Gibson) never liked to dissent from an opinion which an hon. Member of that House expressed with regard to his own action; but he must confess that he should feel a considerable desire, at all events, to apply all his powers of criticism to a clause constructed by the hon. Member for the City of Cork for the purpose of putting down “Boycotting.” He was much disposed to think that the clause in its present form—for he assumed they had heard the last word with regard to it—would do a great deal of good to the labourers in Ireland. One of the great difficulties those unfortunate people had to contend with was that they had no excuse for not obeying the behests of those who told them to leave their employment; but under this clause they would now have some opportunity of reconsidering their position and trying to obey the law. The clause had been under discussion for several days; and he must say, with regard to the present Amendment, that it had been, in his opinion, sufficiently considered. There was one observation which fell from the hon. Member in relation to the Irish vote. The subject was alluded to several times; but he desired to point out that there was a vast section of popular opinion in Ireland, not confined to any particular class, that desired to be freed from the terrorism of “Boycotting.” He repudiated the suggestion that Irish opinion was in its favour; and he desired, in supporting that statement, to draw the attention of the Committee to this fact—namely, that in no division which had taken place upon the Amendments put forward with the intention of riddling this clause had more than one-third of the whole body of Irish Members gone in the Lobby to support them.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that the distinction to be drawn in the case of Irish labourers was this. When labourers in Ireland struck for the purpose of obtaining a benefit for themselves they did that which might not be very judicious, but which was perfectly lawful. But when they struck not with the object of benefiting themselves, but avowedly with the object of injuring their employers, they were doing that which the common sense of mankind declared ought to be put down. The Committee would not have been discussing the present question if the power of combination and striking had not been carried to an unlawful extent in Ireland. If it had been carried to such an extent in England, the Government would have been compelled long ago to put it down. In a liberty-loving country the combination of persons to effect a benefit for themselves was obliged to be tolerated, even if its effect were to cause some injury to other classes of persons, so long as it was not carried to an extreme extent. But the object preached to the labourer in Ireland was that he should strike, not for his own benefit, but for the purpose of inflicting injury on his employer. He trusted that the Government would not yield in the slightest degree on this clause, which, in his opinion, was more calculated to restore peace to Ireland than any other measure which had been proposed. To suppose that the ordinary strikes of labourers to obtain higher wages—at harvest time, for instance—would come within the scope of the Bill was absurd. But if hon. Members went about the country telling people to strike against their employers, and these people, having the fear of “Boycotting” before their eyes, did strike, to the injury of their employers—then, he said, it was a matter for the magistrate to judge; and it was only reasonable to give him credit for the possession of common sense in a matter the facts relating to which were before him. He was glad to hear from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary that the Government intended to give legal assistance to the magistrates in the interpretation of this Bill when it passed into law; and he believed that by so doing the liberties of the people of Ireland would be completely preserved, and that that practice which might be said absolutely to have ruined the country would be put a stop to. He asserted positively that the feeling in Ireland with regard to this clause was very strong in its favour. [“No!”] Hon. Members opposite said “No!” but this was not a time for chopping logic upon a matter of this importance. It was a time for the exercise of that common sense which everyone possessed, or was supposed to possess. What they wanted to do was to put down “Boycotting,” and unless that was done it was clear that the benefit of English law would be denied to persons in Ireland. The number of shopkeepers, labourers, and others, with their families, who had been ruined in consequence of this practice was almost incredible, and no one could deny that it ought to be put down.

Mr. Gibson

MR. LABOUCHERE said, there appeared to be very little difference in principle between the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister and the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) as to what should be retained in this clause. But it seemed to him that the Prime Minister had a somewhat higher opinion of the Resident Magistrates, aided by barristers in the discharge of their duties, than that entertained by the hon. Member. It seemed to him that the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. Broadhurst) had taken a very practical view of the situation, inasmuch as a very little alteration in the Amendment of that hon. Member might be made to meet the views of both the hon. Member for the City of Cork and the Prime Minister. If the right hon. Gentleman considered this proposal a fair one, he thought there was no necessity for any further discussion of the clause. He suggested that the words of the Acts of 1871 and 1876 with regard to trades unions should be adopted. This, he thought, would cover what was suggested by the hon. Member for the City of Cork; and he did not think it went beyond what the Prime Minister was prepared to regard as the intentions of the Act. He thought that the discussion would be brought to an end very speedily if they could obtain some assurance that the words he had indicated would be inserted in the Bill.

MR. SYNAN said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had, in his opinion, advanced a stronger argument in favour of the contention of the hon. Member for the City of Cork than any argument which he had listened to in the course of that discussion. The question they were considering was the intention with which any word or act was spoken or done. If the intent was to injure a person against whom an act was done, then no one would have any objection that this should come within the clause. But what did the right hon. and learned Gentleman say? He said that in Ireland the only intent with which workmen would withdraw from the service of their employers was for the sake of inflicting injury upon the landlords or upon the employers. He said that the labourers, when they withdrew from employment, would always avow that it was done for the purpose of raising their wages; but he did not believe one word of that. It would be done solely for the purpose of injuring the employer; and, therefore, the right hon. and learned Gentleman wanted that only one construction should be put upon this clause. They had arrived at the question—Was the act done with a double intent, or with an unmixed intent? The magistrate might either put it on the intent to raise wages, or he might put it on the intent of injuring the employer or landlord. It was not a single intent or motive—it was a double intent; and unless this could be made clear under the construction of the clause—that it was done for the purpose of raising wages or reducing rent—the magistrates in Ireland would follow the lead of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin, and would put it on the stronger intent of injuring the employer.

[Ninth Night.]

MR. STOREY said, he did not think the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gibson) knew as much about strikes as he did about the law, or he would not have said that strikes in England took place for the sole purpose of raising wages. They had recently had a strike in the North of England of a very extensive character, in which a very large number of persons took part. In this case some employers were willing to give way and concede an increase of wages to a portion of the men on strike; but these refused the terms offered. The remainder of the employers would not yield. He put it to the Government, how would such a state of things as that agree with the construction of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, who said that when men in Ireland struck in order to get an advance of wages, they would be striking for the purpose of improving their condition, and would not be liable, but if they struck for the purpose of injuring the landlord, that that would be an offence for which they could be punished? Now, in the case he had referred to, the men to whom the employer offered an increase of wages were no longer striking for any benefit to themselves, but they continued to strike for the benefit of their brethren, to whom their employers did not offer an increase of wages. Now, he asked, would those men, who struck when the employers offered to give them an increase of wages, and who continued the strike for the sake of those whose employers would not give an increase of wages, be held by the magistrates in Ireland to be striking for their own benefit, or for the purpose of injuring their employers?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) was understood to say that in this case the intention was not the injury of the employer, but the benefit of their fellow-workmen.

MR. STOREY said, that was just his point. Would the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General guarantee that that should be the construction of the Act? Look at the wording of the clause. The hon. and learned Attorney General said that the men who continued on strike did not do so with the intention of injuring their employers; but he (Mr. Storey) asked whether they did not do this within the meaning of the words at the beginning of the clause “wrongfully, and without legal authority, uses intimidation,” to cause their employers to pay more wages to somebody else than they wanted to pay? Did they not wrongfully, or might they not be held by the Resident Magistrate wrongfully, and without legal authority, to have used intimidation in order to put the landlord in fear of loss to his property, so that he might give them an increase of their wages? If the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would convince him on that point, he would waive his objection to that portion of the clause; but he must tell him frankly that they in the North of England were perfectly well acquainted with the nature of strikes, and it was upon that knowledge that his objection to the clause rested. He did not want to oppose the Government; but he could not disguise from himself that as the magistrates in Ireland, who constituted a not impartial Court, would have to construe this clause, it was much more necessary to have an accurate definition than it would be if the matter had to be decided by the magistrates in England. If this accurate definition were not given, the result would be that legitimate combination among workmen, as well as the offence of “Boycotting,” would be put down. He, therefore, impressed upon the Government that there should be some security for legitimate combination. In order to illustrate the difference between strikes in this country and in Ireland, he would mention that in the course of a strike which took place Sunderland among the shipwrights certain of the men were brought before the magistrates. Now, there were shipbuilders on the Bench, and these gentlemen did not take part in the proceedings, but left the Court, and the case was adjudicated upon and satisfaction given to the men. But he wished to point out that in Ireland the Government were not, so to speak, going to remove the shipbuilders from the Bench; they were going to leave the landlords on the Bench to deal with matters in which their interests were largely involved; and, therefore, he repeated that the Government ought to be doubly careful to have an extremely accurate and safe definition.

DR. COMMINS said, if the Act were to be interpreted by the Prime Minister he was sure there would not be the slightest chance of any injustice being done, because, according to the view stated by the right hon. Gentleman, the offence could only be committed when the act was done solely in order to prejudice the interests of a third party, or to injure his property. But, unfortunately, the word "solely" was not in the Bill, and, consequently, it would not be read in the Act by the magistrates; and those persons, when they found even a tendency to injure, would consider that quite enough for the purpose of conviction. He would like to remind the right hon. and learned Gentlemen the Home Secretary and the Attorney General of a legal principle which they appeared to have forgotten, and that was that in the interpretation of the Criminal Statutes every man was presumed to intend the natural and ordinary consequences of his acts. That principle had been laid down by every Judge upon the Bench, and the justice of it was obvious, because no one could dive into the recesses of the human mind. To say what was the intention of a man in any other sense was nothing else than the wildest speculation, and because this could not be ascertained the law established the canon of interpretation that everyone must be presumed to intend the natural consequences of his acts. Therefore, he said that the Judges and magistrates in Ireland were bound to interpret this Bill when it became law on the principle that whatever were the natural consequences of an act, these were to be taken as the intention of the person who did it; and, therefore, it would happen under this Act that whenever an injury might arise to a landlord, for instance, or a third party, by the act of a labourer or tenant, they would be held to have intended to produce that effect. He wished to refer to another remarkable oversight on the part of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), who told them that during the last year or two Irish labourers had left their employment against their will, and not for the purpose of benefiting themselves. [The right hon. and learned Gentleman said it was notorious that—

"In Ireland during the last two years the great majority of labourers had left their employment against their will, and were ruined in consequence."

It appeared to him that a sentence of six months' imprisonment with hard labour was a very extraordinary remedy to apply to the case of men who were so situated, because, according to the right hon. and learned Gentleman's own argument, the position of those labourers was already sufficiently unfortunate. Now, Irish Members were willing that when an act was done solely for the purpose of injuring another—an act of intimidation, as they had it described in the Bill—it should be punished by all means. But they contended that this Act should not be left so loosely worded as to allow a magistrate to inflict the penalties which it contained on a person who acted for his own benefit, and not for the purpose of injuring another.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the right hon. and learned Gentlemen the Home Secretary and the Attorney General knew perfectly well what they meant by this clause, if the Prime Minister did not; and he asserted, without fear of contradiction, that the Prime Minister wished to remove the larger interpretation which they desired to place upon it. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) had put the case of a strike which occurred in his district. The question of a strike was a very pertinent one. Would the strikers who remained out when the majority of their own body had returned to work come under the provisions of this clause? "No," said the Attorney General, "because they remained out for the benefit of the workmen, and not for the injury of their employers." Now, he wanted the Attorney General to stick by that principle as laid down by himself. He said that a combination of that kind did not come under the clause, because the persons who took part in it wished to benefit their fellow-workmen. Was that the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman? If it was, he wished to know whether the strikers, by remaining out, did not injure their employer? If they injured their employer they would be supposed, according to a legal maxim, to intend to injure their employer; and, therefore, they would injure him intentionally. If the Prime Minister would put into the clause words giving the interpretation he had himself attached to it, it would be perfectly satisfactory. The Irish Representatives would be quite willing to stop the discussion at once if the right hon. Gentleman would give them an undertaking that he would insert in the clause words to carry out the interpretation he himself had given. Would the right hon. Gentleman give them that undertaking or not; or would he allow himself to be dodged out of the concession he was supposed to have given? That was what the offer came to. The interpretation of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) and the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), and of everybody in the House except the Home Secretary, the Attorney General, and the Prime Minister, was that if words of that kind were not inserted in the clause the right of combination was taken away. The Prime Minister said it must be proved that the object of the combination was not the benefit of those who combined; but the injury of the employer for the purpose of benefiting a third person. Was that so? The Irish Members wished to deal with the Government, and especially with the Prime Minister, in a perfect spirit of candour in respect to this clause. If the clause had in its intentional, legal, and honest common-sense interpretation only the meaning which the Prime Minister gave to it, they were willing to stop the discussion at once and accept that assurance. He would put the matter in this way. Would the right hon. Gentleman tell the Committee that if a number of labourers combined together to form a strike—supposing the object of the strike was to obtain for themselves higher wages—then it would not come under this clause according to the interpretation which the Prime Minister had himself put upon it; and in order to enable it to come under the clause the labourers must combine together, not for the purpose of increasing their own wages, but for the purpose of decreasing the rent of the landlords. He gathered that such a combination would come under the operation of the clause. In that case, who was to be the judge of the real object in view? The labourers said they struck for the purpose of getting higher wages; but the landlords, who were of the same kidney as the magistrates who had to decide the case, said the object was a very different one; and the magistrate, siding with his friends, said—"I don't believe the story of these men. Although you are in rags, and evidently badly fed, you did not strike for the purpose of getting better houses or clothes, but for the purpose of reducing the landlord's rent." If people on strike in that way were brought before a magistrate, how could they help coming under the operation of the clause? Would they not have injured their employer by refusing to go back when the employer had offered concessions? Would they not have completely placed themselves under the operation of the Act? He would renew his offer of not opposing the clause if words were inserted giving effect to what the Prime Minister had stated to be the intention of the Government. Let the interpretation of the Prime Minister be given effect to in the clause so as to provide a safeguard, and at once the opposition to the clause would cease.

[Ninth Night.]

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I do not know what value is to be attributed to an offer made in such a tone, and couched in such terms, as that which has just been made by the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor). The hon. Member has charged other hon. Members with "dodges." He charged the Attorney General and myself with deliberately having a different object from that which we have avowed. He says that the Prime Minister does not understand the clause, and that he does not understand the "dodges" played off by his Colleagues upon him. I say that that is language which it is not worth my while to review. Further than that, I venture to say that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister fully understands the clause. He understands it as we understand it, and both he and we, whatever the opinion of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) may be—and for that opinion I care very little, because I believe that the House of Commons will give us credit for acting in good faith—both he and we honestly mean what we say. And let me tell the hon. Member that the Government is not to be distinguished as between my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government and my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General and myself, on each of whom has devolved some responsibility in regard to this Bill. Language of this kind will not profit the hon. Member, unworthy as it is of himself and of those whom he addresses. I have nothing more to say, except that the Bill, as it has been explained by my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, is perfectly clear and intelligible. We have said exactly what we mean, and it is utterly unnecessary to add anything to it.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

MR. LEAMY said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman stated a few nights ago, in answer to the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon), that it did not matter what statements might be made by any Minister in that House when the time came for judicially interpreting the words of an Act of Parliament. No matter what the statements might have been, the interpretation of the tribunals which had to administer the Act would be quite irrespective of any statement of a Minister. He did not for a moment question the assurance which had been given by the Prime Minister, or the interpretation which he had put upon the clause; but it was because the Irish Members felt and believed that when the Bill came to be administered by the magistrates an entirely different view of the offences which came within the Act would be taken from that which was taken by the Prime Minister, that they asked for words to be inserted in the clause which should convey to the mind of every magistrate that such words meant what they were asserted to mean by the Prime Minister. Of course, it was a matter of great importance that they should know whether or not a combination, the objects of which had been publicly avowed, such as a combination on the part of agricultural labourers to secure better wages, was legal or not. There was at the present moment in Ireland an Agricultural Labourers' League. He had seen the resolutions passed at a meeting of that League the other day, and one of those resolutions pointed out that the farmers of the country had not availed themselves of the power given to them by the Land Act of 1881 to erect decent cottages for their labourers. They contended that, owing to the wretched condition in which the labourers found themselves, they had a right to combine and a right to refuse to work for farmers who had not availed themselves of the provisions of the Act. He understood from the statement made by the Prime Minister that such a combination would be perfectly lawful; and he considered that such an admission from such a quarter was of the utmost value. No one could deny that labourers had a perfect right to combine to compel the tenants to comply with the provisions of the Land Act, in giving them better houses than they now had, and their half-acre of ground. What they wished to know was, that if there was a combination for that purpose, they and the Irish labourers should understand that, by the declaration of the Prime Minister, such a combination, carried on in a legal manner, would not come within the operation of the Act. He was glad that such a declaration had been made, and he hoped that it would have its full effect upon the Irish magistrates who were to administer the law. At the same time, he thought the right hon. Gentleman ought to give a promise that, on the Report stage of the Bill, he would put into the clause words which would convey, beyond all question, the intentions of the House.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, he was sorry that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had imparted so much warmth into his observations. They had been discussing this clause for four or five days, and they had arrived nearly at a settlement of it. What the Prime Minister had said was of the utmost value, and it was agreed to in spirit by the Irish Members. If they could have the spirit of it put into words, all opposition to the clause would terminate; if not, there would still be a prolonged fight, and the conclusion of this business, which they all desired to see terminated, would be delayed. The only matter between them was simply a difference of words; and, having got so near to an agreement, he thought they might easily go a step further and settle their differences. He hoped the Government would accept the suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for Waterford (Mr. Leamy); and if the Home Secretary would not, or could not, see his way to the adoption of specific words now, he hoped he would give an assurance that upon the Report stage of the Bill words would be brought up to convey the meaning. If such a course were taken, he believed the discussion would be very much shortened. As the matter stood, they had a general agreement as to the object to be obtained, and only a difference of opinion as to the way in which that object was to be gained. The fear and dread which hon. Members from Ireland had in their minds was that the Bill would be interpreted by the magistrates to the prejudice of the persons who were combining. That was a feeling which might be a false one; but, nevertheless, it existed, and there ought to be words inserted in the clause to prevent its being realized. As the object they all wished to gain was the same, he thought the Government would do well, in the general interests of the progress of Public Business, to give an assurance of this kind.

[Ninth Night.]

MR. BROADHURST said, he had no wish to waste the time of the Committee in discussing the matter; but he desired to join in the request made to the Government that they would adopt some such method as had been suggested. If that were done it would tend considerably to remove the opposition to the clause, and would make the matter perfectly clear. He had given Notice of an Amendment, which appeared on the last page of the Paper, to except trade associations from the operation of the Act, because he considered he was bound to do his best to secure to the trade associations of Ireland the same liberty of action in regard to their own interests, and to secure it beyond doubt, as that which was now enjoyed by the trade associations of Great Britain. He had been somewhat surprised to hear the statement which had been made by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey). He understood the hon. Member to say that a number of employers in the district with which he was connected had conceded all that was asked, and, because a number of other persons did not give way, many of the men who had agreed to give way refused to return to work. Now, that was the most extraordinary proceeding that had ever come under his notice with regard to strikes. In all similar cases with which he had been connected the custom had been, where concessions had been made and the men had agreed to return to work, that they should go to work and contribute a day's wages towards the support of those who were still holding out. There were many obvious advantages in that course; one of which was that contracts, which would otherwise go in other directions, would be enjoyed by the firm which had agreed to work. He only mentioned this because the hon. Member's authority upon these matters was undoubted in the North of England, and he wished to say that no such circumstance had ever come under his notice. He would only add that no language, however annoying or improper that language might be, should for a moment prevent the Government from considering the desirability of inserting words such as had been suggested, either at this stage of the Bill, or at a future stage. If the Government would agree to do it, it would afford much satisfaction to a very large number of Members, and would greatly facilitate the progress of the Bill, and would do away with a great deal of the opposition now made to it.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he understood the demand of the Irish Members to be, not for a definition of the offences which might come under the clause, but for a clear declaration as to the offences the clause was intended to meet, so as to exclude a certain class of acts from the operation of the Bill. The Irish Members had come down very much in their demands, and, instead of asking what were to be offences, all they asked of the Government now was that certain things should be guarded against being offences. What really gave strength to the opposition which the Irish Members had raised to the clause was the nature of the tribunal which was to administer the law. Of course, that was to be a matter for subsequent discussion; but it was their distrust of the tribunal which animated them now. It was a conflict between the classes the Act was brought in to put down, and those who were to put them down; because the Judges who would sit to decide these cases belonged to a class which was eminently one of the conflicting parties, and which had no sympathy, either by education or tradition, with the other classes they would have to deal with. Under these circumstances, it was not unreasonable to ask that the Government should take this question into their serious consideration, and give some assurance, or hold out some hope, that by the introduction of words into the clause, or otherwise, they would exclude a particular set of circumstances from the jurisdiction of the local magistrates who would have to administer the law.

Mr. Joseph Cowen

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought he had already stated more than once, and, if necessary, he was prepared to state it again, that the Government were perfectly willing, not only on the Report, but even before the Report upon the clause of the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst), or upon any other question, to do what ought to be done in this matter by providing a saving clause. He thought that was the proper way of dealing with the matter, and he had already stated so on Friday night, and again that afternoon.

MR. MARUM said, that in the first place, in order to constitute an offence under the Act, there were certain things which must have been done. Secondly, they must have been done wilfully, and without legal authority; and, thirdly, they must have been of an intimidating character; and, fourthly, they must have been done with one of the intents mentioned in the clause. These four elements were necessary to constitute a crime. Hon. Members in that House all knew that; but the unfortunate people of Ireland would not know it. If any one of these elements was absent, the three other elements would not constitute an offence. In this state of circumstances, what had been asked by the Irish Representatives? They proposed to insert a qualification, that any one particular element standing alone—such as a refusal to work—should not constitute an offence. That had been the great question agitating the minds of hon. Members on that side of the House, and all they desired was that the Government should incorporate in the Act something that would satisfy the public mind that all the four elements were necessary, and that the absence of one solitary element of the four would be sufficient to vitiate the whole proceeding. He hoped the Government would see their way to put some expression in the Bill that would make that perfectly clear. It would have a reassuring effect, and would accomplish what he understood the Prime Minister intended to convey.

MR. CALLAN said, the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had stated, in the course of the few observations he had made, that there was a strong feeling in Ireland in favour of this clause. He (Mr. Callan) was not aware, although he was a regular reader of the Irish newspapers, that such a statement had ever appeared in any of them. Nor could the hon. Member have heard it from any of his constituents, and, in all likelihood, the opinion had been evolved from the hon. Member's own inner consciousness. The hon. Member had also taken occasion to state that he was not in favour of coercion; but, by the course he had taken that night, the hon. Member had shown that he was carrying out, in the year 1882, the principles which guided and directed him 10 years ago, when the first speech he made and the first vote he gave in that House was in favour of coercion for Ireland. It was said that the labourers might strike for their own benefit. He thanked the Government for that admission; but it was coupled with the statement that a strike would be an offence if it did an injury to the landlord. Therefore, although the labourers might strike for the legal object of benefiting themselves, it was contended that they would render themselves amenable to the penal provisions of this clause, if, by their strike, they committed an injury to their landlord. Now, he (Mr. Callan) had taken some interest in the Labour Question in Ireland, and he had lately been in communication with the leaders of that movement in the county he had the honour to represent. Although the Land Act had been some eight or 10 months in existence, he found that the Sub-Commissioners acting under it had not yet, in a single instance, in the county of Louth, made a rule that labourers' cottages should be erected, and that proper allotments of land should be set apart for them. Although there had been numerous agreements for the fixing of a fair judicial rent, yet in no single instance had provision been made for carrying out the clause of the Land Act in regard to the erection of labourers' dwellings. Under these circumstances, he had advised the labourers to take a course which was at present perfectly legal. It was the custom of the country for the labourers to bind themselves for a term of 12 months, and they were bound, during that term, except in the case of illness, to work for the farmer with whom they had en-tect such fair discussion and such fair political action, should be placed on the Paper as soon as possible. If that which was referred to in this Amendment came within that fair agitation and that fair discussion, the saving clause of the Government would cover it, and it would not be considered an offence. If what the Amendment contemplated amounted to that intimidation which would prevent a landlord acting as was suggested in Sub-section a, or cause him to abstain from a legal act mentioned in Sub-section b, it would be an offence. All this had been stated over and over again. This Amendment really seemed a serving up of previous Amendments, and he asked whether they were not now repeating old attacks and defences of the Bill?

[Ninth Night.]

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he and his hon. Friends renewed their attacks over and over again because the right hon. and learned Gentleman had given an answer which he knew was no answer. The Government were asked whether farmers would be allowed to combine for the purpose of obtaining a reduction of rents, and whether labourers would be allowed to combine for the purpose of obtaining an increase of wages? Right hon. Gentlemen came down to the House and said these men would be allowed to combine if their combination was legitimate. They, however, left the legality or the legitimacy entirely to the judgment of the magistrate. What was wanted was that the lines between legality and illegality should be strictly laid down in the clause. They had asked the Home Secretary over and over again to do that, and that was what the right hon. and learned Gentleman had over and over again refused to do. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had just said—"Yes, the farmers and the labourers will be allowed to combine if they don't come under Sub-sections a and b of this Act." What was Sub-section a? It was a sub-section rendering it illegal to cause a person to abstain from doing what he had a legal right to do, or to do what he had a legal right to abstain from doing. A landlord had a perfectly legal right to refuse to reduce his rents; therefore a combination to cause him to reduce them would come under this section. An employer of labour had a perfect right to refuse to raise the wages of his work-people; therefore a combination to cause him to raise them would come under the section. He wished the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary would acquire a little ingenuousness as well as acumen, and would learn to give a plain answer to a plain question.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) had referred to English trades unions with far greater accuracy than the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson). The organizations referred to by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Healy) were clearly organizations for social purposes. He would suggest that the Amendment should be withdrawn, believing that it would be better, before proceeding further with it, to see the clause the Government proposed to lay before the Committee.

MR. SYNAN said, he thought that, on the whole, the best course to take would be to withdraw the Amendment, and make it the subject of a clause, in case the suggestion of the Government was not satisfactory.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL said, that before the Chairman put the Question, "That Clause 4 stand part of the Bill," he wished to propose an Amendment which would not come within the censure pronounced against the last one or two Amendments that had been moved; and he trusted that in so doing they would be able to draw out of the right hon. and learned Gentleman more of his mind than he had hitherto, in his discretion, thought it desirable to part with. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had said that he could not agree to the Amendments of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) and the hon. Member for the County of Limerick (Mr. Synan), because they would interfere with the subject of some subsequent clauses he proposed to bring up for protecting the right of combination, association, and so forth. But the Irish Members felt that if the clause passed it would be difficult indeed to protect the right of combination by subsequent clauses, and to protect the individual who might belong to an association from punishment, not on account of in-Government before them. He maintained that, even if the concession was to be introduced in a future clause, they ought, before they left this clause, to know, at any rate, what would be the exact form of the concession. They would then know what they were to get by consenting to the despatch of this clause as the Government desired. It seemed to him that, however clear, generally speaking, the purport of a speech might be, when they tried to put that general purport into a set form of words, they found that the difficulty arose because the form of words might be such as to necessitate some action on the part of the magistrates who were to administer the clause, which would be very objectionable. The Committee ought to have the words of the proposed concession before them, so that they might satisfy themselves as to the manner in which the magistrates, who were distrusted by the Irish people, were to act. To say that a combination of a class in Ireland for its own interests should be lawful, but that a combination of a class to promote the interests of any other class should be unlawful, was, he confessed, a singularly unsatisfactory form of expression. When labourers struck in England there was no such nice examination of the pros. and cons. of the question. When the agricultural labourers struck some time ago—and strikes of these labourers were not always in consequence of local grievances, but sometimes in consequence of a desire of the labourers of one county to support those of another county—the right of English labourers to combine was so strictly guarded that, when a rumour arose that the War Office was lending the services of the soldiers to the embarrassed farmers for the purpose of doing the work of the labourers on strike, questions were asked in this House; and at once the then War Minister—he believed it was the Secretary for War in the late Government—replied that great care would be taken that the soldiers should not be employed by any farmers in the place of the labourers on strike. The case he had referred to illustrated the sanctity with which the right of English labourers to strike was surrounded. Let them test the Prime Minister's definition of what was legal and what was illegal by an example. The Prime Minister said—and he (Mr.

The Attorney General

O'Donnell) was happy to have the matter explained satisfactorily by any Member of the Government—the right hon. Gentleman said that the combination of a class in its own behalf would be a legal combination, even if this Bill was passed into law; but that a combination of a class on behalf of another class would be an illegal combination, and would be punishable under the summary powers of the Act by six months' imprisonment with hard labour. Let them take, for example, a combination of tenants upon an estate, or upon a number of estates, for the purpose of obtaining a reduction of rents. The Prime Minister admitted that, under this Bill, just as before the Bill, such a combination would be legal, because it was a combination of tenants for their own benefit. But let them go a step further. Suppose the landlords of the estates on which the tenants had combined in their own interests also combined to hold out against the tenants, converted all the tillage farms into pasture land, and then applied to a number of labourers or herdsmen to work on the pasture lands. All this was done, let the Committee suppose, for the purpose of effectually thwarting the determination of the tenants; and let them suppose, further, that the agricultural labourers or herdsmen refused to work upon the new pasture lands, which had been converted by the landlords into such lands from tillage farms, in order to defeat the combination of the tenants. Was he to understand that the refusal of the labourers to help the landlords to break down the combination of the farmers would be treated as a criminal offence on the part of the labourers? If so, human sympathy itself would be made penal, and the feeling of man for man would be made a crime. Let them suppose that this clause was passed without any amendment, which would prevent such a monstrous exercise of tyrannical power as that, and then let them test the working of this unamended clause in another way. Let them imagine that the magistrates empowered to carry out this law did, when labourers refusing in any way to co-operate with the landlords in breaking down the combination of the tenants, were brought before them, throw them into prison, was there any idea on the part of any sensible man in that House that such an exercise of the powers of this Act would produce anything but semi-insurrection in the district? Let them take the example of a large district in which the tenants had been on strike. The landlords used their powers to evict those tenants, and then, as he had before premised, applied to the agricultural labourers or herdsmen of the district to assist them, by turning the land into pasture land, in defeating all hope of the tenants coming back on the land; let them suppose that the labourers and herdsmen refused to ally themselves with the landlords, and that, in consequence of their refusal, a large number of them were seized by the magistrates, and thrown into prison for six months with hard labour. He defied any Government exercising the powers of this Act in that manner to hold Ireland with less than 200,000 men. If the magistrates were to throw into prison labourers who combined in refusing, in such a case, to assist the landowners who were the common oppressors of tenants and labourers alike, the people of the district would infallibly be driven to semi-insurrection. If the object of the Government was to introduce in Ireland law and order, instead of an extended area of illegality and disorder, it was absolutely necessary for them to clearly define what kinds of combination they would allow, to take care to define legal combination in such a manner as to allow of its use for every real and legitimate purpose. If the Government did not do this, the result of the operation of the Bill would be widespread illegality and crime; and the crime, in that case, would assume, in the eyes of nine-tenths of the population, the appearance of legitimate defence. If half the population was to be bullied and restricted in its actions in consequence of its sympathy with the other half, a state of things would be created which no ingenuity could distinguish from the legitimate resistance of the people to unlawful tyranny.

[Ninth Night.]

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 33; Noes 96: Majority 63.—(Div. List, No. 127.)

MR. HEALY moved, in page 3, line 29, after "living," insert—

"Provided, That membership of any association or organization for political or social purposes, the rules, objects and constitution of which are legal, shall not render any member of such association or organization liable to a charge of intimidation, or for any acts done by any other person to which such member has not been a consenting party."

The object of the Amendment must be clear to the Committee. It was that no organization of a political or social character should be rendered illegal by the clause. He and his hon. Friends feared that the Government would say there were certain organizations of this character the mere membership of which was illegal; they wished to have it distinctly stated by the Government that the system of constructive intimidation which was pursued by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) should not be carried out under the new régime. The late Chief Secretary held that if a man was a member of a local Land League, he was responsible for everything done by the organization. If a number of tenants on an estate agreed that they would refuse to pay rent except at a reduction of 25 per cent, the right hon. Gentleman held that the whole of them had been guilty of intimidation. This Amendment was to relieve a member of any particular association from the responsibility of any acts to which he had not been a consenting party. The Committee had heard a great deal from the Government as to what they were willing to do to conserve the rights of association. It was surprising to him that they did not put clearly on the Paper what they were going to do. Promises had been given by the Home Secretary and the Attorney General. Promises as to what was to be done had been repeated for the 20th time; and yet, for the 20th time, the Irish Members were to get up and ask what it was the Government were going to give them? It was high time an understanding was arrived at on the point. It seemed to him that when dealing with the Irish Members the Government did not think it necessary to adhere to the common usages of the House—that was, that where a promise was given, and where reasonable time had been allowed, the Government should put their views upon paper. It was all very well for the Home Secretary to say he would propose an Amendment to preserve the rights granted in the Act of 1875. Why did not the right hon. and learned Gentleman put his intentions into words, and let those words appear on the Paper? There were two Irish Law Officers who, as far as could be judged, had not very much to do with the Bill. Why did not the Government employ those Gentlemen to draw up the Amendment, so that the Committee could have the intentions of the Government in black and white? The Irish Members had proposed Amendment after Amendment; but they had been resisted by the very Gentlemen who admitted there was a vacuum, but who did not supply it. There seemed to be a wish to lure the Irish Representatives on, so that they might get to the end of the Bill before they knew exactly what the Government were going to do. Why should the Government treat himself and his hon. Friends in any different manner than they treated the Tories on the Land Bill? On that occasion the Tories had simply to ask that the Government Amendments should be put on the Paper, and the request was immediately complied with. His Amendment was a most moderate one, and he trusted the Government would see their way to accept it. It was most unsatisfactory to Irish Members to be met with the statement that the Government would consider their proposals, and see what could be done at a later stage of the Committee or on Report. In respect to this particular Amendment, he hoped they would hear a distinct statement as to the intentions of the Government.

Mr. O'Donnell

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 29, after "living," insert "Provided, That membership of any association or organization for political or social purposes, the rules, objects and constitution of which are legal, shall not render any member of such association or organization liable to a charge of intimidation, or for any acts done by any other person to which such member has not been a consenting party."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the Amendment was about as relevant to the clause as it would be if it related to sheep stealing. He had no objection whatever to there being a saving clause making the declaration that the Bill was not intended to interfere with organizations for mere political purposes. There was nothing in the clause which had the slightest tendency to make the membership of an association for purely political purposes unlawful. He presumed what the hon. Member wanted was a declaration that the Bill was not intended to interfere with a legitimate political organization. When they came to Clause 6, which had relation to unlawful associations, they would consider the advisability of such an Amendment as was now proposed; but, at this stage of the Bill, the Amendment was, undoubtedly, out of place.

MR. HEALY said, it was all very well for the right hon. and learned Gentleman to say this Amendment had no more relation to the clause than if it had dealt with sheep stealing. The Irish Members knew a great deal more about Ireland than the Home Secretary did, and they knew exactly how the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), who invented the intimidation business, had worked the business. The Home Secretary would excuse him for saying there was a great deal more relevancy in the Amendment than there would have been if it had referred to sheep stealing. The present argument of the Government was only a specimen of the sort of argument to which they had been treated all through by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary. The right hon. and learned Gentleman appeared to think it was quite sufficient to satisfy the Irish Members for him to get up and deliver a sacramental utterance from the Treasury Bench. Irish Members, however, refused to recognize the right hon. and learned Gentleman's high priestly oratory. He challenged any hon. Gentleman to find sense or logic in what the right hon. and learned Gentleman had said in reply to his Amendment. What could be done with a Government, when its Representative, in a particular instance, instead of meeting arguments by counter arguments, said—"We cannot accept this Amendment; it would be just as relevant if it related to sheep stealing?" Such was the way, indeed, in which the Committee had been treated all along by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He (Mr. Healy) ventured to say, that if anybody else had been in charge of the Bill it would have got through in three days. They were now, however, for the fourth day, on Clause 4; they proposed Amendment after Amendment; but they were told that the Government could not accept them, for some reasons or other which were wrapped up in such an interpretation of the Prime Minister and his own interpretation of this new law. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had said he did not wish to include breach of contract in the Bill, that being a civil offence which could be proceeded against by civil process. But the right hon. and learned Gentleman knew as well as he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) did that the clause in its present form, going before such a tribunal as it would go before, would have the effect of causing breaches of contract to be proceeded against criminally and criminally punished. The right hon. and learned Gentleman knew that as well as anyone, and it was no use his affecting innocence on the point. This clause, as it stood, going before the tribunal before which it would go and under the circumstances by which it was accompanied, would plainly mean that breach of contract by a farmer or labourer against the now dominant and vindictive landlord class in Ireland would be construed into a criminal offence by that tribunal and criminally punished. Everyone acquainted with the circumstances of Ireland knew that, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman knew it too. If he did not know it, it was because his ignorance with regard to the state of feeling amongst the different classes of Ireland incapacitated him from taking anything like a rational view of anything in connection with this Bill. Did any reasonable man mean to tell him (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) that, as the clause stood, combination as to reduction of rent would not be construed by the tribunal to whom this clause would be sent for adjudication into a criminal offence, for which six months' imprisonment would be given? The right hon. and learned Gentleman had appealed to the common sense of the Committee, and had appealed to common experience, to say whether a civil offence like breach of contract was likely to be treated as a criminal offence. But had not people been guilty of a criminal offence in breaches of contract in the view of the the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W.E. Forster)? Would anyone deny that, under the Coercion Act of last year, farmers had not been sent to prison for no greater offence than combination against the payment of unjust rents? If they were to be taught by experience, he would say their experience of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford was that he so used, or misused, or abused the exceptional powers placed in his hands for the repression of crime as to criminally punish what were only breaches of civil contract; and as that was their experience of the action of the late Chief Secretary for Ireland—an official who came before them in the House, and could be called upon to explain his conduct—were they to expect anything less from a tribunal of magistrates, which did not come before them in the House and could not be interrogated? Why did not the right hon. and learned Gentleman put something in the Bill protecting these breaches of contract from criminal prosecution, as in England they were protected by Statute? The right hon. and learned Gentleman was endeavouring to filch away from the Irish people those privileges which a plain interpretation of the words of the Prime Minister entitled them to expect; and he had the coolness, after having pressed this—as every other—clause of the Bill on them, to turn round and accuse the Irish Members of impeding the progress of the measure. It was very well known what the right hon. and learned Gentleman's attitude as to the whole Bill was. It was a matter of common notoriety—it was well known to every Member of the Committee—that it was a matter of boast with the right hon. and learned Gentleman that he was carrying the Bill through without making any real concession to the wishes of the Irish Party. He wished to make the Bill so wide that the discretion of the Government in Ireland would be large and autocratic enough to put down any movement that would displease the Executive for the time being. Under the Bill, every movement, legitimate or illegitimate, Constitutional or unconstitutional, was at the mercy of the Executive, and that was what suited the Ignatieff-like disposition of the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

MR. DILLON said, the difficulty they were in was this, that if the clause went through in its present shape, no saving clause would be able to save individuals from its consequences. The assurances of the Government had been extremely vague, and once this clause passed without a Proviso such as that proposed, nothing that could be subsequently done meet their wishes as they had always displayed to meet the wishes of the Tory Party. Whenever the Tory Party asked to have Amendments put on the Paper, the Government immediately consented to produce them. The Irish Members ought to be treated according to the relevancy and scope of their arguments, and not as though they were a handful of 20 men. He would ask leave to withdraw his Amendment; but he hoped that when they met to-morrow they would find the Government Amendments on the Paper.

MR. TREVELYAN said, the Government sincerely wished to carry out the general views of hon. Gentlemen opposite. The hon. Member (Mr. Healy) asked why the Government treated a small Party in a manner different from that in which they would treat the Conservative Opposition? It was because hon. Members below the Gangway opposite had shown a little less confidence in the willingness of the Government to carry out its promises than the Government thought ought to be shown. He assured hon. Members in that quarter of the House that the Government were sincerely anxious to put the clauses on the Paper as soon as possible. He would engage, that as soon as the matter had been matured to the satisfaction of the right hon. and learned Gentlemen in charge of the Bill, the clauses should be placed on the Paper.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SYNAN moved, in page 3, line 29, after "living," insert—

"Provided, That any agreement, or any lawful act in pursuance thereof, by or among tenants, to support each other in demanding a reduction of rents, or any act to persuade others by argument to do the same, or any agreement or lawful act of labourers to support each other in demanding an increase of wages or more convenient conditions of labour, or to persuade others by argument to do the same, or any combination for political or social purposes and legitimate objects by constitutional means, shall not be considered as illegal within the meaning of this Act."

He could not see what objection there could be to the first two branches of his Amendment, but he presumed the latter part would be open to the same objection as the Amendment which had just been withdrawn. After a long discussion they had come to the conclusion that the definition of intimidation could not be exhausted by illustration; and, therefore, in his opinion, the only way to define the offence was by a negative process—namely, by telling the people of Ireland what should not be within the meaning of the clause. The people ought to know whether combination for a legal purpose, with legal motives and legal intentions, would come within the meaning of the clause or not. They had a good illustration before the Committee a few moments ago, in which it was in the power of the magistrate either to say that an act was done with the intent of intimidating, or it was not done with the intent of intimidating. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) made the extraordinary statement that if a labourer in Ireland stated that he did a certain act for the purpose of increasing his wages no one would believe him, but the magistrate would believe he did it for the purpose of intimidating his employer. So they had it upon the authority of the right hon. and learned Gentleman that even if a labourer said he had done a certain act or spoken a certain word for the purpose of obtaining a rise of wages, the Court before whom he was brought would not believe it. If the Home Secretary objected to the latter part of his Amendment, he would gladly withdraw it and bring it up subsequently. The two first portions of the Amendment, he maintained, were absolutely necessary to protect innocent people from the punishment provided in the clause. Let them look at the clause, and see whether it was requisite for the protection of the tenants and labourers that this qualification or saving clause should be inserted. The clause said that—

"Any word spoken or act done calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living."

Suppose the tenants combined and applied to the landlord for a reduction of rent, it would be for the magistrate to decide whether they so combined with the intent to injure the landlord in his person, or property, or business, or means of living. In the same way, if any labourers combined for the purpose of obtaining an increase of wages, it would be, under the clause as it now stood, in the power of the magistrate to say whether or not they so acted to injure their employer. The tenants might say they had combined to get a reduction of rents, and the labourers might say they had combined to get an increase of wages; but, in the opinion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin, that would be all sham and pretence, and no man in Ireland would believe a word the men said. Because he believed the Amendment he had proposed would afford some protection to men who combined with a lawful intention, he commended it to the Committee.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 29, after "living," insert "Provided, That any agreement or any lawful act in pursuance thereof, by or among tenants, to support each other in demanding a reduction of rents, or any act to persuade others by argument to do the same, or any agreement or lawful act of labourers to support each other in demanding an increase of wages or more convenient conditions of labour, or to persuade others by argument to do the same, or any combination for political or social purposes and legitimate objects by constitutional means, shall not be considered as illegal within the meaning of this Act."—(Mr. Synan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. DILLON said, he rose to support the Amendment, and in doing so he would like to put a few questions to the right hon. and learned Gentleman in charge of the Bill. It had been stated from the Treasury Bench, to his intense surprise, that it was notorious that in England strikes only took place for the purpose of obtaining an increase of wages. He did not know very much about English strikes, and that was news to him. He wished to ask men who did know England better than he did whether it did not often happen, if an employer dismissed the ringleaders of the union, the men of the union did not strike work with the object of compelling the employer to take back their leaders? If that be true, and if this Act applied to England, would not the workmen be clearly and distinctly and undeniably guilty of intimidation? And if that were done in Ireland, would not the men be liable, under this clause, to six months' imprisonment with hard labour? The Attorney General said it was really the intent that made the crime. Did the men who in England struck work in order to compel their employers to take back certain other men do it for their own benefit? He had only mentioned one case, but it was a case so strongly in favour of the contention of the Irish Members that there was no necessity to go further in the way of illustration. If the Government were not able to declare that what he had stated now was not permissible under the law in England, he did not see how they could continue to assert that the rights of labourers in Ireland would be as safe as they were at present under the law of England. The Committee had been told that they might rest perfectly certain that in case labourers in Ireland struck work, or left their employment for their own benefit, this Act would not be put in force against them; but they had the declaration of a right hon. and learned Gentleman, who represented more accurately than any other hon. Member the magistrates who would have to interpret this Act—they had his declaration that it was notorious that, no matter whether a labourer in Ireland said he had left his employment for his own benefit or not, he was not to be believed.

MR. GIBSON said, what he had endeavoured to convey to the Committee was, that if one particular intent was alleged, the ingenuity of the race was such that he had very little doubt they would make out another intent.

MR. DILLON asked what was the conclusion they must arrive at even from the explanation of the right hon. and learned Gentleman? It was that because they might have the intent to coerce their masters, and the ingenuity of their race enabled them to prove another intent, they were not to be able to follow their employment at all. The statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was simply this. So great was the ingenuity of the Irish labourers and the Irish agitator that they would be able to prove they acted with some other intent than the one alleged, and, therefore, they must not be allowed to do the act at all. The right hon. and learned Gentleman liked to put the thing in an attractive form; but that was his opinion, it was the opinion of the class for whom he spoke, it was the opinion of the magistrates of Ireland. The magistrates would simply ask the landlord of the district whether he believed the act complained of was done with intent to coerce him, and his word would unquestionably stand before that of the labourer. There were in every district of Ireland men who were marked. They were the men—farmers and labourers—who had incurred the odium of all the landowners of their county or district, because they were the local leaders of the Land movement. He wished to ask whether, if these men were dismissed their employment, and if their fellow-labourers struck work in order to compel the landlords to take the dismissed men back, the men who had struck work would be liable to punishment under this clause? Clearly, in the words of the clause, they would strike in order to intimidate men to do “an act which they had a legal right to abstain from doing”—namely, to take back certain men whom they had dismissed because they had become obnoxious. Would the Government say that the right of labourers to strike, in the case he had cited, did not exist in every workshop in England? Did not the Government know that many leaders of unions in England would have been ruined if it had not been for the existence of the right of strike to compel their return? It was well known that in Ireland many men who had been loyal to the Land League would have been hunted from their employment had it not been for the protection afforded them by the sympathy of the district; it was well known that many men who had been starved out by the landlords of the district unless the League had come to their aid. It was the duty of the Government to answer this question. Might labourers strike with the object of compelling landlords to take back certain obnoxious men who had been driven from their employment on account of the political views they held? There was another branch of the question which deserved consideration. If the tenants in Ireland combined for the purpose of getting a reduction of rents, would that or would it not be treated as an offence under this Act? That was a question which would strike home immediately, and, so far, the Government had made no definite statement with regard to it. He knew of estates in the West of Ireland on which the tenants were in a state of complete destitution. He believed that the proper way for these tenants to avail themselves of the Arrears Act would be to meet together, and go to their landlords and say—“We can only give you a small portion of your year’s rent.” If they did meet and consult together, would they be held guilty of an offence under this Act? It might be said that the Act would not deal with every mere act of combination and with every word spoken and act done. With such a statement he and his hon. Friends could not be satisfied. What they wanted to know was, would it be held to be an offence under the Act if certain tenants came together and agreed to simultaneously ask for a reduction of rent? If the Government would say that under no circumstances would that be held to be an offence many objections to the Bill would be removed. He was entitled to a clear and distinct answer as to whether the right of combination and strike, which he had shown now existed in England, would, after the passing of this Act, exist in Ireland?

Mr. Synan

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) asked the Committee to recollect what was the particular Amendment before them. His hon. Friend (Mr. Synan) had kindly supplied him with a copy of the Amendment, but the handwriting was so like his own that he had great difficulty in understanding what the Amendment was. As the Amendment had been put by the Chairman, he gathered that it embraced three points. Two of those points had been disposed of already, and the third point had just been raised by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy). The Home Secretary and the Prime Minister promised that a saving clause should be inserted with respect to combinations for political and social purposes, and thereupon the hon. Member for Wexford withdrew his Amendment. The only difference between this and some previous Amendments was that it referred to combinations of labourers and tenants for the purpose of securing some object peculiar to themselves. The Home Secretary and the Prime Minister had repeated over and over again that a fair or political combination to obtain, by fair discussion and agitation, that which was a legal result would not be dealt with by this Act; and there had been a promise made by the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland that a general saving clause to protest such fair discussion and such fair political action, should be placed on the Paper as soon as possible. If that which was referred to in this Amendment came within that fair agitation and that fair discussion, the saving clause of the Government would cover it, and it would not be considered an offence. If what the Amendment contemplated amounted to that intimidation which would prevent a landlord acting as was suggested in Sub-section a, or cause him to abstain from a legal act mentioned in Sub-section b, it would be an offence. All this had been stated over and over again. This Amendment really seemed a serving up of previous Amendments, and he asked whether they were not now repeating old attacks and defences of the Bill?

[Ninth Night.]

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he and his hon. Friends renewed their attacks over and over again because the right hon. and learned Gentleman had given an answer which he knew was no answer. The Government were asked whether farmers would be allowed to combine for the purpose of obtaining a reduction of rents, and whether labourers would be allowed to combine for the purpose of obtaining an increase of wages? Right hon. Gentlemen came down to the House and said these men would be allowed to combine if their combination was legitimate. They, however, left the legality or the legitimacy entirely to the judgment of the magistrate. What was wanted was that the lines between legality and illegality should be strictly laid down in the clause. They had asked the Home Secretary over and over again to do that, and that was what the right hon. and learned Gentleman had over and over again refused to do. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had just said—"Yes, the farmers and the labourers will be allowed to combine if they don't come under Sub-sections a and b of this Act." What was Sub-section a? It was a sub-section rendering it illegal to cause a person to abstain from doing what he had a legal right to do, or to do what he had a legal right to abstain from doing. A landlord had a perfectly legal right to refuse to reduce his rents; therefore a combination to cause him to reduce them would come under this section. An employer of labour had a perfect right to refuse to raise the wages of his work-people; therefore a combination to cause him to raise them would come under the section. He wished the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary would acquire a little ingenuousness as well as acumen, and would learn to give a plain answer to a plain question.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) had referred to English trades unions with far greater accuracy than the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson). The organizations referred to by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Healy) were clearly organizations for social purposes. He would suggest that the Amendment should be withdrawn, believing that it would be better, before proceeding further with it, to see the clause the Government proposed to lay before the Committee.

MR. SYNAN said, he thought that, on the whole, the best course to take would be to withdraw the Amendment, and make it the subject of a clause, in case the suggestion of the Government was not satisfactory.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL said, that before the Chairman put the Question, "That Clause 4 stand part of the Bill," he wished to propose an Amendment which would not come within the censure pronounced against the last one or two Amendments that had been moved; and he trusted that in so doing they would be able to draw out of the right hon. and learned Gentleman more of his mind than he had hitherto, in his discretion, thought it desirable to part with. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had said that he could not agree to the Amendments of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) and the hon. Member for the County of Limerick (Mr. Synan), because they would interfere with the subject of some subsequent clauses he proposed to bring up for protecting the right of combination, association, and so forth. But the Irish Members felt that if the clause passed it would be difficult indeed to protect the right of combination by subsequent clauses, and to protect the individual who might belong to an association from punishment, not on account of individual action, or of combination or association, but on account of the act of some other single person, a member of the same association. They might be unable to bring this question of the definition of intimidation again before the Committee on subsequent clauses; in fact, the present clause, without some definition, left the whole matter in a most unsatisfactory position. They could not hope that any clauses dealing merely with the right of association, and leaving individuals open to the punishment of the present clause, would be satisfactory. The Amendment he wished to propose was contained in the following Proviso:—

“Provided, That a person leaving his employment, or breaking a contract, or refusing to buy of any other person or persons, shall not be held to be guilty of intimidation for such acts by themselves, unless it can be shown that such leaving of employment, breach of contract, or refusal to buy was not undertaken by such person for his own benefit, but for the purpose of inflicting injury upon some other person.”

That Proviso included the definition of intimidation given by the Prime Minister this evening—it carried out the construction the right hon. Gentleman had put upon the clause. He should have very much preferred the Government to move their own Proviso. No doubt they would have done it in much better language than that which he had adopted; but he and his Friends had felt that, from their point of view, it was absolutely necessary there should be some Proviso of this kind with regard to these three matters—breach of contract, refusal to buy—they had given up refusal to sell—and leaving employment. These were three things a person was entitled to do under the present Law of Intimidation without incurring any penalty under the Criminal Law. The Prime Minister had stated that, in his opinion, the present Law of Intimidation should be added to and in some way amended to make it penal for persons to do these things where they did them, not for their own benefit, but for the purpose of inflicting injury upon someone else. He (Mr. Parnell) had adopted the right hon. Gentleman's definition in his Amendment; and he should now test the bona fides of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary by asking him whether he would accept it?

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words “Provided, That a person leaving his employment, or breaking a contract, or refusing to buy of any other person or persons, shall not be held to be guilty of intimidation for such acts by themselves, unless it can be shown that such leaving of employment, breach of contract, or refusal to buy was not undertaken by such person for his own benefit, but for the purpose of inflicting injury upon some other person.”—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, this Amendment was really beginning over again the whole of the controversy, which had just occupied them five hours. The Amendment was really nothing more nor less than that they had discussed when the debate commenced this evening, and he had no answer to give to it beyond that which had been given by the Prime Minister—that was to say, that as far as it was a legitimate Amendment, it was contained in the words to the effect that an act should be an offence if it was done in order to produce injury by ruining some other person in his business. If the Amendment meant that, it was already in the Bill; and if it meant anything more than that, it was something the Government could not accept. Apart from that, he was not willing to put into the Bill anything, directly or indirectly, to render breach of contract criminal. It was a civil offence, and could be punished by civil process. What was the use of declaring that a breach of contract under ordinary circumstances should not be intimidation? Of course, a breach of contract was not intimidation. There was really no ground whatever for saying that this was to test the bona fides of the Government. He was at a loss to imagine how there could be a more distinct bona fides than to state exactly what they meant—to state what they meant in such a manner as to bring it home to the mind of every reasonable man.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he was very sorry the right hon. and learned Gentleman had made up his mind to obstruct the progress of this Bill as much as he possibly could. He had kept them for the past five hours discussing a point which was conceded by the Prime Minister, because he was not willing to put into the Act words to carry out the interpretation of the Prime Minister and his own interpretation of this new law. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had said he did not wish to include breach of contract in the Bill, that being a civil offence which could be proceeded against by civil process. But the right hon. and learned Gentleman knew as well as he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) did that the clause in its present form, going before such a tribunal as it would go before, would have the effect of causing breaches of contract to be proceeded against criminally and criminally punished. The right hon. and learned Gentleman knew that as well as anyone, and it was no use his affecting innocence on the point. This clause, as it stood, going before the tribunal before which it would go and under the circumstances by which it was accompanied, would plainly mean that breach of contract by a farmer or labourer against the now dominant and vindictive landlord class in Ireland would be construed into a criminal offence by that tribunal and criminally punished. Everyone acquainted with the circumstances of Ireland knew that, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman knew it too. If he did not know it, it was because his ignorance with regard to the state of feeling amongst the different classes of Ireland incapacitated him from taking anything like a rational view of anything in connection with this Bill. Did any reasonable man mean to tell him (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) that, as the clause stood, combination as to reduction of rent would not be construed by the tribunal to whom this clause would be sent for adjudication into a criminal offence, for which six months' imprisonment would be given? The right hon. and learned Gentleman had appealed to the common sense of the Committee, and had appealed to common experience, to say whether a civil offence like breach of contract was likely to be treated as a criminal offence. But had not people been guilty of a criminal offence in breaches of contract in the view of the the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W.E. Forster)? Would anyone deny that, under the Coercion Act of last year, farmers had not been sent to prison for no greater offence than combination against the payment of unjust rents? If they were to be taught by experience, he would say their experience of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford was that he so used, or misused, or abused the exceptional powers placed in his hands for the repression of crime as to criminally punish what were only breaches of civil contract; and as that was their experience of the action of the late Chief Secretary for Ireland—an official who came before them in the House, and could be called upon to explain his conduct—were they to expect anything less from a tribunal of magistrates, which did not come before them in the House and could not be interrogated? Why did not the right hon. and learned Gentleman put something in the Bill protecting these breaches of contract from criminal prosecution, as in England they were protected by Statute? The right hon. and learned Gentleman was endeavouring to filch away from the Irish people those privileges which a plain interpretation of the words of the Prime Minister entitled them to expect; and he had the coolness, after having pressed this—as every other—clause of the Bill on them, to turn round and accuse the Irish Members of impeding the progress of the measure. It was very well known what the right hon. and learned Gentleman's attitude as to the whole Bill was. It was a matter of common notoriety—it was well known to every Member of the Committee—that it was a matter of boast with the right hon. and learned Gentleman that he was carrying the Bill through without making any real concession to the wishes of the Irish Party. He wished to make the Bill so wide that the discretion of the Government in Ireland would be large and autocratic enough to put down any movement that would displease the Executive for the time being. Under the Bill, every movement, legitimate or illegitimate, Constitutional or unconstitutional, was at the mercy of the Executive, and that was what suited the Ignatieff-like disposition of the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. DILLON said, the difficulty they were in was this, that if the clause went through in its present shape, no saving clause would be able to save individuals from its consequences. The assurances of the Government had been extremely vague, and once this clause passed without a Proviso such as that proposed, nothing that could be subsequently done would be effectual to protect the individual. The clause, as had been pointed out by the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself, dealt not with associations and combinations, but the acts of individuals, so that a saving clause to protect the rights of associations would in no way save the rights of individuals. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary himself, in answer to a question this evening, had said that if a labourer left his employment, or a farmer refused to pay his rent with the forbidden intent, he was guilty of an offence under the Bill. Now, what was the forbidden intent? It was to cause any person to do any act which such person had a legal right to abstain from doing, or to abstain from doing any act which he had a legal right to do. Did not this bring under the clause the case of a farmer who refused to pay his rent in order to get his landlord to lower it? The thing appeared to him to be as clear as daylight; he did not care what saving words were introduced. And if that were the case with the farmer who appeared to pay his rent, what would be said of the farmer who refused to pay his rent with the idea of getting his neighbour's rent lowered?—for the Courts would hold in some cases that the farmers acted in this way. A number of farmers might agree to refuse to pay their rents until they obtained a reduction; then the Court would hold in the case of any one of them who might be proceeded against, that he was withholding his own rent in order to get his own rent and that of his neighbour lowered. If this man was let off by virtue of the saving clause referring to combinations, he could be immediately captured for acting in his individual capacity. Then they had the definition of the Attorney General (Sir Henry James), who said that if a man wished to obtain an advance of wages and agitated for it, he did not commit an offence; but that the whole question was as to the intent which, in order to bring a person under the provisions of the measure, must have been to intimidate. He (Mr. Dillon), however, contended that intimidation under this Bill was practically synonymous with putting pressure on a man. The Government had so drawn the measure that anything that put pressure on a man to induce him to do a certain thing, was an intimidation.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

The Prime Minister himself, when pressed on this point, said that in the case of a farmer who refused to pay his rent, or of the labourer who left his employment, the objects they had in view in so acting would be taken into consideration; but, that in the measure, the Government could not define what were and what were not evil purposes. The purposes, as they found them in the open definition of the Bill, would include everything that a man could legally do, or legally abstain from doing. Under the technical wording of the measure, the most innocent combinations might be visited by the magistrates with severe punishment. As had been already pointed out, these magistrates would, in the action they took, be, to a large extent, guided by social reasons. The magistrates of Ireland socially depended entirely on the gentry; therefore, it was evident they would be very much guided, as to what was legitimate and what was criminal, by the opinions of men at whose tables they dined, and whose company was the only company they ever went into. If the Bill passed in its present form, the law of Ireland would be different to that of England—different to that which applied to the Home Secretary's own constituents. A very strange thing had occurred in Derby—the town the right hon. and learned Gentleman represented—only last Sunday. One of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's own constituents had sent him (Mr. Dillon) an extract from a sermon preached in a Baptist chapel in Derby on Sunday. In this sermon the minister had said, in regard to the movement amongst shopkeepers for giving half-holidays on Saturdays to their assistants, that there were some employers so selfish that they would not join in the movement; and to such people he would have no hesitation in saying he would withhold his custom from them; they ought to be "Boycotted" and sent to Coventry. The general community, as far as they could, should have nothing to do with them. These words were spoken by one who, no doubt, was a leading supporter of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary in Derby. Would the right hon. and learned Gentleman, then, undertake to extend this Coercion Act to his own constituents, who seemed to have an inclination to follow in the

He did not blame the Attorney General (Sir Henry James), who had made that promise, for withdrawing it, as he had been compelled to do so; but it certainly had appeared to them as though it had been made in the light of reason and fairness. The clause would cover almost any word which could be spoken, or any act which could be performed—

“The expression ‘intimidation’ includes any word spoken or act done intended to and calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living.”

It was clear that, under a clause of this kind, a person could be punished without having belonged to an organization, without having said or written anything to put a man in peril. A shrug of the shoulders, a sullen look, would be an action “calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger.” To bite one’s thumb would be sufficient to bring a man before the magistrates. Under the Act of 1875, the two classes—employer and workman—were placed on an absolute equality before the law; and he wished to know whether this clause would place the two opposing classes—landlord and tenant—on an equality before the law? If the tenant joined an association and put pressure on a landowner to induce him to reduce his rents, he could be punished under the Bill. But suppose a farmer joined some association he believed to be legal, and which was perfectly legal, and suppose it became known that the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) or the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) was coming down to the neighbourhood to address a meeting, and suppose the landlord or the agent told him that if he belonged to that society, or attended that meeting, he would be evicted from his farm, surely that would be intimidation, putting this farmer in most serious fear of “injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living.” Would that be called intimidation when practised by a landlord or an agent against a poor man, if that poor man appealed to a stipendiary magistrate, and charged his landlord with intimidation under the terms of this clause? They knew it would not; therefore, the clause was one-sided. The Bill was intended to put down the tenants’ agitation, and to give the landlord and his agent a new hold on the people. If the clause had been one which was likely to attain the ends for which it was proposed, with all its clumsiness and with all its defects, one might have been inclined to pass it for the sake of the small amount of good it might effect; but its only result, he felt sure, would be to promote the establishment of secret societies. It would result in the creation of secret organizations which defied the public law, and which could not be reached by stipendiary magistrates or Judges, except through the medium of informers. He, therefore, held the clause to be most objectionable. It was objectionable in what it would do, and what it would fail to do; it was unequal, one-sided, unjust, monstrously harsh and cruel, and yet, as he had said before, clumsy in its very cruelty. He and his Friends had every reason to condemn it, and accordingly he opposed the Motion that it stand part of the Bill.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he had listened to the discussions—or the greater part of the discussions—which had taken place on the various Amendments to this clause, and he had heard the arguments adduced by the Government against those Amendments, and in support of the clause as it stood. But nothing that he had heard from that quarter had enabled him to believe for an instant that in this clause there was any promise of justice, or peace, or good government for Ireland. He saw nothing in it but a means of harassing poor and innocent people, and he did not for a moment believe that it would have the effect of causing the arrest and bringing to justice the perpetrators of serious crimes. He believed that this measure, when it became an Act of Parliament, would be a snare for the feet of the unwary. Criminals would be able to evade it. What sort of persecution was it that was not possible under this Bill—he had been going to say for any class of people to inflict upon any other class? As had been pointed out to the Committee, labourers who lived by the sweat of their brows would not be free to improve their position, to strike for a rise of wages, because, if they did, the landlords, under the terms of this measure, would be able to bring them to account before the magistrates—who were themselves landlords, or the brothers and sons of landlords—to bring them to account for saying or doing something calculated to injure the landlords. He wanted to know whether, under this Act, a master would be free to dismiss his servant; whether giving notice to a servant and telling him he would have to quit his employment, would not be saying words and doing acts calculated to interfere with his means of living? He wanted to know whether, under this Bill, it would not be possible, all through society, for any one class to persecute any other class? The sufferers would be the poor people against whom the Act would be worked. A clear definition had been asked for, to render abuse impossible; and, although some assurance had been given by hon. Gentlemen opposite, they had invariably declined to give guarantees in the Act itself that such abuses should not arise. He saw in this Bill the elements of strife and confusion, the suppression of legal and Constitutional action in Ireland, the encouragement of conspiracy, and the development of crime. Irish Members had told the Government before that similar results would follow their legislation of a like kind; and they told the Government the same thing now. Every expression of opinion on the platform and in the Press was about to be suppressed; and if there were in Ireland to-day any small knots of conspirators, in nooks and corners planning conspiracy, they had reason to pass a vote of thanks to the Government for suppressing their rivals in the field of public action, and leaving the field clear for themselves.

Mr. Justin M. Carthy

DR. COMMINS said, that, while he entirely went with the right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite in the desire to see crime suppressed, he felt this Act would not effect that object, and that this particular provision was more likely to lay the foundations of crime than to stop crime; and he could not avoid recording one final protest against this clause as amended. It might be properly described as a section to give the stipendiary magistrates in Ireland power to imprison any person for anything they thought fit, or anything else, at the direction of the Castle authorities. The first requisite in Criminal Law was that it should be known to the people. Did anybody know what was enacted in this section? He and his hon. Friends had attempted to put in the section itself some guide which would tell those who had to suffer the penalties what the law was, and what they must avoid, and would tell those who had to administer the section where they were to hold their hands, and where to strike. But they had utterly failed to get any clear or distinct definition of what this clause proposed to prevent; and, not only that, but they had heard from the promoters three or four different interpretations of what it meant and what it was intended to do. That given by the Prime Minister differed toto cælo from the interpretation of the Attorney General, and the Attorney General's interpretation differed entirely from that of the Home Secretary. How was anybody to find out what the law was, when the very authors of that law could not tell what it was? At one time they said its object was not to create a new offence, but to give additional powers for punishing all offences. And in the next breath they said it would create a new offence, and make that illegal to-day which was not illegal yesterday. Which way was it? They did not know, and the promoters of the Act did not know. How could the people or the magistrates in Ireland know? The only conclusion to be come to was either that the Ministry themselves did not know their own mind, and did not know what it was they would proscribe, or they did not wish other people to know. The Irish Members had tried to point out the defects in that respect, and there was one other slight defect still to be remedied. The section made intent an element of offence; but the Prime Minister said that unless the only intent with which the act was done was an intention to intimidate, that intent would not come under the Bill. Then the Home Secretary said that was not so; that they did not wish to restrict the act to cases where the intent was a sole intent to commit an offence. Which was it? Nobody knew. The attention of the Committee had been called to the state of things which existed when the Conspiracy Act of 1875 was passed; to the murders and rattening in Sheffield; to the trades unions' outrages in Yorkshire, and Lancashire, and Derbyshire. Some of those atrocities were quite as bad as anything that had occurred during the agrarian be quite so long as on the last clause, and with that view he moved an Amendment which he hoped would be accepted. His Amendment was to this effect—Subsection (a.) provided that any person who took part in any riot or unlawful assembly would be guilty of an offence under the Act. There was no definition of “unlawful assembly” in the Bill, and he was in despair as to what would be an “unlawful assembly,” unless it would be what was declared unlawful by a Resident Magistrate. Clause 7 provided—

[Ninth Night.]

“(1.) The Lord Lieutenant may from time to time, by order in writing to be published in the prescribed manner, prohibit any meeting which he has reason to believe to be dangerous to the public peace or to public safety.

“(2.) Any person who is present at a meeting prohibited in pursuance of this Act shall be guilty of an offence against this Act.”

Surely the illegal meetings in Clause 7 were not the unlawful assemblies dealt with by Clause 5. Otherwise, both clauses would not be necessary. His proposition was to make the clause read—“takes part in any riot” at “an” unlawful assembly, instead of riot “or” unlawful assembly. It was quite possible a person might see an assembly and join in it, and to some extent take part in it, without any evil intention; but such a person would be guilty of an offence under this clause. But if his Amendment was adopted, some sort of overt act would be required to bring that person under the provisions of the Act. If his Amendment was not sufficient, he should be quite ready to add words making it an offence under the Act for any person taking part in an unlawful assembly to refuse to withdraw from that assembly when called upon to do so by a Resident Magistrate, or a Justice of the Peace, or any other person in authority, not a sub-inspector or a policeman. He thought this was a fair and reasonable proposition, and that the clause, as it stood, went a great deal too far, and would tend to bring innocent persons within the penalties of the Act.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 31, leave out the first “or,” and insert “at an.”—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question proposed, “That the word “or” stand part of the Clause.”

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was of no use to leave the matter of

Mr. Labouchere

unlawful assemblies to juries, because, as was so well known, the juries would not agree. But when they came to the Summary Jurisdiction Clause the hon. Member would have an opportunity of again referring to this subject. Now, a riot and an illegal assembly were both offences known to the law under the Riot Act; but then, if they were to be left to be dealt with under the Common Law, they would have to be sent for trial to a jury, and everyone knew that punishment in that case would not be inflicted, inasmuch as the jury would not convict; and, therefore, the object of the clause was simply to make them offences under the Act, in order that they might be dealt with by summary jurisdiction. They were not creating new offences; they were making offences now punishable by the law amenable to summary jurisdiction. His hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) was mistaken in supposing that the unlawful assembly dealt with in this clause was the same as that illegal assembly which, by Clause 7, the Lord Lieutenant might, from time to time, by order in writing, to be put in a prescribed manner, prohibit, when he had reason to believe it would be dangerous to the public peace or the public safety. The two things were totally distinct; and he repeated that all the clause did was to say that offences now well known to the Common Law, and otherwise tried by jury, would be tried as summary offences under this Act.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: What is an unlawful assembly under the Common Law?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was where several persons assembled together to do an unlawful act, such as pulling down fences. According to Blackstone, it was also a disturbance of the peace by persons assembled together with the purpose of doing a thing which, if executed, would create a riot. These offences Her Majesty's Government, by the present clause, were bringing within the scope of summary jurisdiction.

MR. HEALY asked if the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department would have any objection to import Blackstone's definition into the clause? He had himself no objection to an unlawful assembly being prohibited; but it was very over and over again, that "intimidation" ought to be left as it was, and not defined in any way. That was what was said when an attempt was made to define, or draw, or fix some sort of limit to that word—that its simplicity was so much better, and that explanation would spoil it. "Intimidation," according to this clause, was not only inducing people to do what was illegal or wrong, but it was to do anything which put a person in fear of injury, and that was an extension of "intimidation." Anybody might say he was afraid of something said or done; and it appeared to him that any words, or actions, or looks could be brought under the Act. "Intimidation" not only meant intimidation, but something very much more. If the Committee withdrew the other expressions and left "intimidation" pure and simple, then it might be interpreted by the good feeling of those who had to administer it. It would not be so important a matter but for the fact that the tribunals which would administer the Act differed very much in different counties. In Dublin, for instance, for a particular offence a fine of 2s. 6d. and costs might be imposed; but in the very next county, for the same offence, the penalty was 20s. or 40s., or a month's imprisonment. In England the magistrates who administered the law not only administered it pure and simple as law, but went out of the way to administer it fairly; and, although the verdict might go against them, the people felt they had had justice and were satisfied. But, in this matter, it appeared to him that the Government not only wanted to put down "Boycotting," but to stop any movement of any description, and any meeting, for any purpose however lawful, which the tenants or other people might think proper to hold. The Irish people were like other people; and if they saw that, in England, the people had liberty and every facility for expressing their opinions by meetings and by newspapers, they would think they were entitled to the same amount of fair play. Therefore, if liberty of meeting to ventilate grievances was not extended to the people of Ireland, an injustice would be done. It seemed to him that the Government were wrong in principle in attempting to suppress legitimate legislation. The man who went on a public platform for any public purpose was not the man to go behind hedges and shoot people. He had no sympathy with people who committed crime, but he had sympathy with a man who stood up in public or in private to defend what he believed to be his rights. If the Government would re-consider this matter, they would be able to meet Irish Members upon it, instead of putting them off with vague and indefinite promises which they knew from past experience would not be carried out. Promises were, perhaps, given in good faith; but then Gentlemen in other sections of the House objected to the promises, and in the result they were not fulfilled. If the promise of the Government was put in black and white, there would be an opportunity of considering and digesting its meaning. In another respect, he thought, the Government ought fairly to consider what they were doing. For some time legislation had been going on; but there was a disposition not to legislate for Ireland any further. But how far had legislation yet settled the condition of Ireland? It appeared to him that the more Parliament tried to settle the Irish Question, the further they got from that result. Instead of giving what Irish Members demanded in January or February, the Government locked up their best men; and in July or August the people of Ireland, having ascertained that they had been badly treated, would demand more than they had previously asked for. This was illustrated by the Bill which was passed in this House, and thrown out in "another place."

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is speaking on the general policy, which is not the question before the Committee.

MR. BYRNE said, the portion of the Bill to which he most objected was the clause which enlarged "intimidation," and he could not refrain from censuring the Government for adding those words to "intimidation," if their object was to put down crime. Instead of putting down crime, he was afraid this section would, in many cases, punish the innocent; and he hoped the Government would see their way to withdraw this section, or to provide in some other clause what would meet the requirements of the Irish Members.

MR. REDMOND said, this clause was, perhaps, the most important clause in the Bill, and that, holding the opinions he did as to that clause, he should not be fulfilling his duty if he did not enter a protest against its forming any part of the Bill. The main object of this clause was to bolster up landlordism in Ireland; the object which ran through every word of the clause was to put down combinations by tenants for securing their just rights. None of the Irish Members would protest or work against this clause if they thought it was aimed solely at putting down intimidation; but they opposed it because they believed it would be used, and had been framed to be used, against what they considered legitimate combination by tenants for the achievement of their legitimate rights. A great deal had been heard during these discussions on the subject of "Boycotting." It was no part of his duty to enter into a defence of that practice, although, if he were called upon to give his opinion, he should have no hesitation in saying the circumstances in which Ireland was placed rendered it imperatively the duty of Irish people to make public feeling felt upon individuals who, for selfish ends took occasion to injure the entire community. "Boycotting" in very many cases had resulted in outrage and crime; but he contended that it only resulted in outrage and crime to any considerable extent after the suppression of the Land League. So long as the Land League was in existence, and its local branches were permitted to carry on their work, "Boycotting" did not result in any grave injustice or hardship to individuals. It was simply the expression of the public opinion of the whole community against individuals who were acting in a way to injure the community; and so strong was opinion before the suppression of the Land League in that direction that it was able to carry on its decrees without resorting to crime or to violence. After the suppression of the Land League, and after the ladies of the Land League were imprisoned, and their organization broken up, then, as a natural consequence, the people, left to their own devices, and without the guidance of their Leaders, did in many cases commit outrage and violence in carrying out their ideas. This clause was nominally directed against "Boycotting;" and if Irish Members thought that was the case, although they believed

[Ninth Night.]

"Boycotting" had been justified in the past, they would not now oppose this clause. But it was because they believed this clause was so wide that it would inevitably strike, not only at "Boycotting," but at combination of all kinds, that they protested against it. He did not believe the clause would be efficacious against every form of "Boycotting," or that by any Act of Parliament it would be possible to put down that form of "Boycotting" which existed in a lesser degree as surely in English society and England generally as in Ireland. If the powers of this Bill were ever brought into play in Ireland to protect an individual from "Boycotting," it would inevitably bring about the ruin of that man. The shortest way to bring about complete "Boycotting," in the worst sense of the word in regard to any man in Ireland, would be by bringing the Act into operation for his protection. He thought the Irish Members had the greatest reason to complain of the attitude which the Government had taken up. On a recent occasion the Attorney General, in dealing with one section of this Bill, had attempted to define "intimidation," and said, in effect, that if that definition was objected to, and Irish Members preferred no definition, the Government would be willing to omit the definition. He did not know how it came about, but the Attorney General afterwards changed his opinion, and the Government changed their mind. That offer, made by a responsible Member of the Government, and accepted by the Leader of the Irish Party, was suddenly withdrawn, and every effort on the part of the Irish Members to amend the Bill in the direction of definition became impossible. The mantle of the right hon. Gentleman for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) seemed to have fallen on the shoulders of the Home Secretary in this discussion. The right hon. Member for Bradford was, during his connection with the Government, its evil genius; and it seemed to him the Home Secretary was to-day the evil genius of the Government, and he believed the Home Secretary was thwarting the good intentions of the Prime Minister. He was inclined to believe that the Prime Minister did not intend to strike at open and legal combination; but he seemed to be thwarted in his desire by the attitude which the Home Secretary had adopted.

Mr. Redmond

He was not at all surprised by rumours which he had recently heard as to the attitude the Home Secretary had taken up towards the rest of his Colleagues upon this Bill. It had been said that the Government, represented by the Prime Minister and other Gentlemen in the Cabinet, were willing to make concessions to Irish feeling and to English feeling; but the Home Secretary was the man who objected in every case to concessions, and he said if he was to remain a Member of the Cabinet such concessions must not be made. He should very much like to see things turn out in such a way that the Home Secretary might be able to take his place alongside the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster); and then the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and the right hon. Member for Bradford, and the right hon. Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) might form the "Three Graces" of the Liberal Party. Nothing had struck him more forcibly with reference to this clause than the manner in which the Radical Members had been treated by the Government. Some of the most important Amendments to this clause came from Radical Members; but they were received with as little consideration by the Government and the Committee as the proposals made by the Irish Members. There was a useful lesson to be drawn from that fact. The Radical Members had adopted an attitude on the second reading of this Bill which was very disheartening to any man who desired to see something like conciliation towards Ireland, and to anyone who desired to convince the Irish people that there was a possibility of obtaining justice from the House of Commons. Men of eminence and respectability in this House made speeches on the second reading of the Bill, and with regard to this very point of intimidation expressed their utter abhorrence of the principle, and denounced the Bill root and branch, and in almost every instance they wound up by saying they would vote for the second reading. What had been the result? The result was that in a division only some dozen English Members supported the Irish protest against the Bill, and the Government, strengthened by that division, had since been able to take up an attitude of firmness, or rather of obstinacy, which they still maintained. If the Radical Members had had the courage of their opinions, and voted against the second reading, this would not have happened.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is going into very general remarks. The Question before the Committee is very simple; it is, "That this Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. REDMOND said, he was endeavouring to explain how it had happened that the Government were firm in refusing Amendments to this clause, and he was alluding to Amendments proposed by Radical Members, and he was trying to explain the reasons for the efforts of Radical Members to amend the Bill having proved as useless as those of the Irish Members. He regretted that the Government had not made any concession to Irish feeling in this matter, and that they had thrown away, as he believed they had, a great opportunity of conciliating the Irish people. When the Government came into Office they had a great opportunity of conciliating the Irish people. They came into Office to a great extent on the support they received from the Irish electors; and they were now neglecting one more opportunity of conciliating the Irish people by refusing the demands for concessions. And he regretted that on every occasion throughout the history of Ireland, when the people were willing to be conciliated, the Government abandoned all desire or efforts to conciliate the people; and now, again, the Government had resorted to the rusty, and stupid, and inefficient weapon of coercion. This clause would have but one effect; it would have the effect of making men who desired to carry on agitation within legal limits despair of the possibility of doing so. That would throw the whole power in Ireland into the hands of men who advocated more desperate courses. It would take away from Irish Members the power to lead the Irish people along the road of Constitutional agitation, and make assassination one of the institutions of the land.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 258; Noes 33: Majority 225.—(Div. List, No. 129.)

Clause 5 (Riots and other offences).

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he hoped the discussion on this clause would not be quite so long as on the last clause, and with that view he moved an Amendment which he hoped would be accepted. His Amendment was to this effect—Subsection (a.) provided that any person who took part in any riot or unlawful assembly would be guilty of an offence under the Act. There was no definition of “unlawful assembly” in the Bill, and he was in despair as to what would be an “unlawful assembly,” unless it would be what was declared unlawful by a Resident Magistrate. Clause 7 provided—

“(1.) The Lord Lieutenant may from time to time, by order in writing to be published in the prescribed manner, prohibit any meeting which he has reason to believe to be dangerous to the public peace or to public safety.

“(2.) Any person who is present at a meeting prohibited in pursuance of this Act shall be guilty of an offence against this Act.”

Surely the illegal meetings in Clause 7 were not the unlawful assemblies dealt with by Clause 5. Otherwise, both clauses would not be necessary. His proposition was to make the clause read—“takes part in any riot” at “an” unlawful assembly, instead of riot “or” unlawful assembly. It was quite possible a person might see an assembly and join in it, and to some extent take part in it, without any evil intention; but such a person would be guilty of an offence under this clause. But if his Amendment was adopted, some sort of overt act would be required to bring that person under the provisions of the Act. If his Amendment was not sufficient, he should be quite ready to add words making it an offence under the Act for any person taking part in an unlawful assembly to refuse to withdraw from that assembly when called upon to do so by a Resident Magistrate, or a Justice of the Peace, or any other person in authority, not a sub-inspector or a policeman. He thought this was a fair and reasonable proposition, and that the clause, as it stood, went a great deal too far, and would tend to bring innocent persons within the penalties of the Act.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 31, leave out the first “or,” and insert “at an.”—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question proposed, “That the word “or” stand part of the Clause.”

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was of no use to leave the matter of

Mr. Labouchere

unlawful assemblies to juries, because, as was so well known, the juries would not agree. But when they came to the Summary Jurisdiction Clause the hon. Member would have an opportunity of again referring to this subject. Now, a riot and an illegal assembly were both offences known to the law under the Riot Act; but then, if they were to be left to be dealt with under the Common Law, they would have to be sent for trial to a jury, and everyone knew that punishment in that case would not be inflicted, inasmuch as the jury would not convict; and, therefore, the object of the clause was simply to make them offences under the Act, in order that they might be dealt with by summary jurisdiction. They were not creating new offences; they were making offences now punishable by the law amenable to summary jurisdiction. His hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) was mistaken in supposing that the unlawful assembly dealt with in this clause was the same as that illegal assembly which, by Clause 7, the Lord Lieutenant might, from time to time, by order in writing, to be put in a prescribed manner, prohibit, when he had reason to believe it would be dangerous to the public peace or the public safety. The two things were totally distinct; and he repeated that all the clause did was to say that offences now well known to the Common Law, and otherwise tried by jury, would be tried as summary offences under this Act.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: What is an unlawful assembly under the Common Law?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was where several persons assembled together to do an unlawful act, such as pulling down fences. According to Blackstone, it was also a disturbance of the peace by persons assembled together with the purpose of doing a thing which, if executed, would create a riot. These offences Her Majesty's Government, by the present clause, were bringing within the scope of summary jurisdiction.

MR. HEALY asked if the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department would have any objection to import Blackstone's definition into the clause? He had himself no objection to an unlawful assembly being prohibited; but it was very desirable that they should know what an unlawful assembly was. For his own part, he did not know what an unlawful assembly meant. He was, however, acquainted with things which might have come under this definition in England, such as the acts of Mr. J. De Morgan at Plumstead; disturbances in Epping Forest; the pulling down of Hyde Park railings, and the like. These matters were quite intelligible so far as England was concerned; but he pointed out that "unlawful assembly" in Ireland was up to the present time undefined. He thought the Government had been somewhat indistinct in their utterances on this point. In this clause they legislated against unlawful assemblies; and, having done so, they next, in Clause 7, took powers to prevent illegal meetings. As far as he could see, it was difficult to understand the reason why these double powers were asked for. Now, he did not want these two things mixed up together. Since last October, he reminded the Committee, there had not been a single meeting allowed in Ireland, because anyone who attended them would have been shot down or bayoneted. If any Gentleman doubted that statement, he would advise him to go to a meeting which the Lord Lieutenant prohibited. As he understood the matter, "unlawful meeting" and "illegal meeting" were convertible terms. In Clause 7, the Government took these powers—

"That the Lord Lieutenant may from time to time, by order in writing, to be published in a prescribed manner, prohibit any meeting which he has reason to believe to be dangerous to the public peace or the public safety."

And now, in addition to that, they asked that every person who took part in any riot or unlawful assembly should be guilty of an offence against this Act. He wished to know if "illegal meeting" was the same as "unlawful assembly;" if not, why was special power taken to prohibit illegal meetings? Why did the Government wish for both powers? Why did they speak with two voices? He thought Irish Members were fairly entitled to some explanation of the difference between these two terms.

THE CHAIRMAN said, there were two Amendments to this line. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) did not propose to leave out "unlawful assembly;" but the Amendment of the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon), next upon the Paper, did propose to leave out the words "or unlawful assembly." He would point out that they must first proceed to deal with the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton.

MR. HEALY said, the hon. Member for Northampton proposed to leave out the word "or," and to make the clause read thus—"takes part in any riot at an unlawful assembly." Now, that necessarily imported into the discussion the question as to what an unlawful assembly was; and if there was any intention to discuss the matter intelligently, that question could not be excluded now. He had no objection to the Government taking power to put down riots; on the contrary, he thought that they were things which it was most desirable should be put down. But he wished to know why the Government took power to put down these riots apart from the provisions already existing in this Act? That was a plain question; and he submitted that he was entitled to a satisfactory reply.

MR. TREVELYAN said, when they arrived at the consideration of Clause 7, he should be able to prove to the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) that the difference between a meeting proclaimed by the Lord Lieutenant, when this Bill passed into law, and an unlawful assembly was as great a difference as there could possibly be between two different cases. An unlawful assembly was when three or four persons assembled to do an unlawful act, such as the destruction of a warren or the pulling down of buildings. The case he had put before the Committee the other day amounted to this—a number of people having assembled for the purpose of attacking a bailiff; that was a violent gathering for the purpose of riot, and was a kind of unlawful assembly not infrequent in Ireland. The Government desired to reach cases of this kind, and that was the reason why they objected to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). The hon. Member for Northampton objected to any riot being made penal unless it took place at an unlawful assembly, and, in so doing, he proposed to cut out the word "or" from the clause. The effect of this would be that no one at an unlawful assembly could be punished unless a riot took place there. Now, the Government wished, if possible, to punish by magisterial power that common form of unlawful assembly which took place in Ireland.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he was really astonished at the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. The right hon. Gentleman said "unlawful assembly" was a perfectly well understood law term; and, in the course of his arguments, he went on to say that an unlawful assembly was an assembly of three or more persons to do an unlawful act, such as the pulling down of enclosures, and because an unlawful assembly was understood to be a meeting of three or more persons to pull down railings, that, therefore, it was an unlawful act to take a bailiff from under his bed. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department also gave the Committee a definition as to what constituted an unlawful assembly, and he mentioned two or three things—the assembling of two or three persons together made an unlawful assembly. Then he said that an unlawful assembly, according to Blackstone, was a disturbance of the peace by two or more persons assembled together with the intention of doing an act which, if executed, would create a riot. He asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether it was the intention of the Government to put that definition of Blackstone into the clause? It was clear to his mind that if an unlawful assembly was a meeting of persons to pull down enclosures, it was not so to pull a bailiff out of his bed; but the fact was, the term "unlawful assembly" was intended to mean anything or nothing which the Government might wish to bring within the clause.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) would make the passage read thus—"takes part in any riot at an unlawful assembly." Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant contended that if those words were adopted, the Committee might as well cut out the words "unlawful assembly." He (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) was quite unable to see that anything of the kind followed upon the acceptance of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton. It appeared to him that the Amendment of the hon. Member distinguished between riots which took place at unlawful assemblies, and riots which took place at assemblies which were not unlawful. It happened in every country that assemblies which were not unlawful, and were not for any unlawful purpose, sometimes ended in riot; and, in such a case as that, he wished to know why an offence of such a venial character should come within the scope of this Bill? Now, the real purpose of the Amendment before the Committee was to make this point clear. He would suppose the case of a temperance meeting, a lecture, or a debating society, or a hundred other peaceful, legal, and Constitutional assemblies. It was quite within the range of possibility that some disturbance should arise at one of those meetings, however peaceful and harmless the intention of the assembly might have been. Now, if a riot arose, under such circumstances as these, it would immediately come within the scope of the Bill, and the participators in that riot would be liable to six months' imprisonment under the Act. He said this was monstrous. But there was a difference between a riot such as he had described, and a riot which took place at an unlawful assembly. In the latter case, the assembly, to begin with, was unlawful, and, that being so, it was not unlikely to give rise to riot; and this supplied a reason why the rioters should be made amenable to the law. But why should persons who might be mixed up in riots arising out of peaceful and harmless meetings be subjected to this severe and extreme penalty of six months' imprisonment with hard labour? He considered the Amendment to be a fair and reasonable one, and he hoped the Committee would see their way to accept it.

DR. COMMINS said, they had here another attempt on the part of the Government to revive a very old law. He did not believe there had been a case for centuries of a person being prosecuted on account of an unlawful assembly. Blackstone, referring to unlawful assemblies, said that the earliest definition was to be found in an Act passed in the 21st year of King Henry VII; and he added—

"That the law was enacted at the time when it was the practice of gentry who were at variance with each other to go to market at the head of a band of armed retainers."

That law was, no doubt, a good one when considered with reference to the circumstances of the time. But still he should be very much obliged to any hon. and learned Member, acquainted with the Criminal Law, who would tell him when there was an indictment on account of an unlawful assembly? When it was found necessary to interfere with such assemblies as were thought likely to cause terror, they were suppressed by the reading of the Riot Act, and dispersed under that Act; but the prosecution of an unlawful assembly, pure and simple, was a curiosity in the law, and he would be glad to be referred to a case of the kind. Under this Bill, whenever three or four persons assembled, magistrates of a not very brave disposition would conclude that it met under circumstances which might cause terror; but it was well known that a thing which would inspire terror in the mind of one man would not do so in the mind of another. He admitted that a man might be terrified if a very small meeting were held in his neighbourhood; but surely it was not necessary to resort to a Statute of Henry VII. for the purpose of bringing assemblies of this kind, not before juries, but within the summary jurisdiction of magistrates. Now, he thought the Amendment before the Committee, to a large extent, took away that objection. If the assembly was an unlawful one, and, instead of falling back on the Riot Act, persons taking part in the riot were proceeded against before the magistrate, he should have no objection to urge against that course; but he objected to the revival of this old and forgotten law, unsupported by a single indictment, for the purpose of meeting a case which could be otherwise dealt with, and which was most likely to be abused. He objected to cases of this kind being left to the decision of a frightened magistrate, who might have some reasons for considering unlawful a meeting which another person would not consider to be unlawful at all. Therefore, unless the clause was intended to be applied to the purpose of oppression without any protection for persons brought under the cognizance of the Act who had committed no offence whatever, he thought the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton should be adopted.

MR. HEALY said, he wished to know whether the word "riot" meant the assembling together of more than four persons?

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, it was clear that if the magistrates in Ireland were to be left to interpret this Act, they would be very apt to regard as unlawful every assembly that met for the purpose of advocating or securing any object which was distasteful to themselves. The Act provided that the Lord Lieutenant might, from time to time, by order in writing, to be published in a prescribed manner, prohibit any meeting which he had any reason to believe to be dangerous to the public peace or public safety, and the magistrates would very likely decide that those objects were unlawful which had a direct tendency to affect their interests in land or other property. With regard to the ruling of the Chairman, which had just been given, to the effect that hon. Members were not in Order in discussing the meaning of the words "unlawful assembly," he would ask whether it was possible to discuss the Amendment before the Committee without having any clear idea of the meaning of the word "riot" and the words "unlawful assembly?" But the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton required that the riot should take place at an assembly which was unlawful, and he pointed out that this Amendment, so far from distinguishing, only confused the terms. It was necessary, before the Committee could appreciate properly the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton, that they should understand what was the meaning of both these terms; and he, therefore, submitted they were in Order in discussing what was meant by the words "unlawful assembly."

THE CHAIRMAN said, his object, when the hon. Member for Wexford was speaking against the words "unlawful assembly," and contending that they should be left out of the Bill, was merely to point out that the next Amendment proposed to set aside those words, and that the present Amendment did not.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he understood, from the remarks of the Chairman, that it was in Order to discuss the meaning of the words "unlawful assembly;" and, therefore, he proposed to ask the Government what meaning they attached to them, and what was the definition of them beyond which the magistrates were not to go? For his own part, he should be perfectly satisfied with the clause as it stood at present, if it were exactly stated what it was the magistrates would be bound to consider an unlawful assembly in arriving at their decision. He thought that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton should be supported, because without it the people of Ireland would be practically at the mercy of magistrates, partizans as they knew them to be, who would, no doubt, arrogate to themselves, under this clause, the same powers which were vested by Clause 7 in the Lord Lieutenant.

[Ninth Night.]

MR. HEALY said, he could find no definition of the word "riot" in the Definition Clause of the Bill, and, consequently, the word, as it stood unexplained, might mean anything or nothing at all. It was very easy for the Government to put down the word "riot" in the clause without saying what was meant by it; but he contended that the Irish Law Officers of the Crown, who were well acquainted with the meaning of the term, should prepare a definition for insertion in the Definition Clause. He said that the Government should define this offence in the way they had defined other things in the Definition Clause.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, if hon. Members referred to the Law Text Books they would find all the definitions they wished. In this Bill it was not intended to give a new definition of a crime well known at Common Law. If they used the word libel in the Bill, it would surely not be considered necessary to define what libel was. If they were introducing a new offence, they might justly be required to give a definition; but, as a matter of fact, they were dealing with a well-known offence. As the Home Secretary had explained, it was simply a question of transferring the jurisdiction in such cases to the tribunal who were to try them. The matter was in the hands of the Committee, and he did not think he ought to be required to repeat what had already been said.

MR. METGE said, the arguments of the hon. and learned Gentleman did not seem to coincide with the arguments the Home Secretary used in refusing to give a definition of the word "intimidation." If it was impossible for the Government to define the words "riot" or "unlawful assembly," it seemed justifiable in the Irish Members to press the Government to give the people of Ireland some instruction in the matter, because they must know that this Act was not to be administered by men trained in the law. For the most part, the exercise of the powers conferred by the Act would be in the hands of the Resident Magistrates, whose law came with their practice. These men obtained their knowledge of the law by the cases which were brought before them, and those cases were mostly those in which their own prejudices were aroused. For these reasons, he considered the people should be distinctly instructed as to what their liability would be under the words of this clause.

MR. LEAMY said, he hoped the Government would furnish a fuller definition of "intimidation," and also of "unlawful assembly." The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General said it was not necessary to give a definition of "riot," because it was an offence well known at Common Law. It would be quite another thing, continued the Attorney General, if a new offence was being created. It must be remembered that, under the head of "riot," men found trespassing in pursuit of game could be brought before the magistrates and sent to gaol for six months with hard labour. Many of the fox-hunting Resident Magistrates would be glad of the power this Bill would confer upon them; but he feared they would make a mistake if they sought to put down poachers by means of this Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. DILLON moved, in page 3, line 31, to leave out "or unlawful assembly." He had several strong reasons for proposing that "unlawful assembly" should be omitted from the clause. His first reason was that a large number of people would be convicted who had no intention to commit any offence against the law under the words "unlawful assembly." Whatever the Home Secretary might say to the contrary, he (Mr. Dillon) could positively assert that nine out of every ten people in Ireland had not the least idea what an unlawful assembly

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

was. He himself did not know what it meant, although the Home Secretary and the Attorney General said it was a well-known offence tried at Common Law. When cases of unlawfully assembling were tried, it must be recollected that there was always the safeguard of the verdict of a common-sense jury. A jury in convicting or acquitting a person charged with unlawful assembly, would take into consideration all the circumstances of the case, and they would most certainly take into consideration whether the person charged had attended the assembly with an illegal intent. It was now proposed to place this very elastic expression—and it seemed to him that nearly everything in the Common Law was elastic—at the disposal of the magistrates, who would not give the prisoner the benefit of that common sense which a jury would bring to bear on a case; it would be at the sole discretion of the magistrates to decide what was an unlawful assembly. A very remarkable case had just come under his notice, and he would describe it to the Committee in order to show how this clause might work in Ireland. He had received a letter from a constituent of his in Roscrea, in which letter the writer complained that he and two or three friends were standing smoking outside his door when the police charged up the street and dispersed them. The gentlemen followed the police to the barrack with the intention of charging the police; but the police charged them with riot and with pursuing them down the street. The gentlemen summoned the police for assault, and the police summoned them for riot. When the case came before the magistrates the summonses of his constituents were dismissed, and the summonses of the police were sustained and the defendants sent for trial. Judge Barry, at the last Winter Assizes in the city of Kilkenny, refused to allow the case to go to the jury. These men had been committed by a bench of Irish magistrates for riot and unlawful assembly. The case was dismissed by Judge Barry, because it was brought upon the uncorroborated evidence of the police, his Lordship remarking that in this instance the police were the aggressors. Under this Act these men would have been required to serve out the term of six months' imprisonment, because they would have had no right of appeal over the heads of the magistrates. Under this Act the police would be able to say that any assembly of men was unlawful, and the word of the police would be taken by the magistrates, and that of the accused would be disregarded altogether. He might be wrong, but he understood the definition of an unlawful assembly to be an assembly of people for unlawful purposes. The police might arrest people who were collected together, and swear they were assembled for an unlawful purpose. What evidence could those charged with the offence bring to rebut the accusation but their own word? It was a notorious fact that magistrates always believed the testimony of the police against that of the people, and he held that the expression "unlawful assembly" would put it in the power of the police to arrest anybody at all who was talking to anybody else in a proscribed district, and swear they were assembled for an unlawful purpose. He did not know whether the police might not go so far as a friend told him they once went. They arrested certain individuals, and the charge against them was that they were found congregating about the street corners in a suspicious way. At all events, there was a very strong reason for the omission of this expression. It was no justification for the retention of the words to say that the offence was well known under the Common Law, because it was requisite in the case of offences which were to be tried by magistrates, and without the protection of a jury, that the definition should be more strict and not so elastic as the one contained in the Common Law.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 31, to leave out the words "or unlawful assembly."—(Mr. Dillon.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'unlawful assembly' stand part of the Clause."

DR. COMMINS said, that the term "unlawful assembly" was very antiquated. The Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Porter) had said it was a very common thing for a charge of "riot and unlawful assembly" to be preferred. Undoubtedly, an indictment for "riot" always contained a count for "unlawful assembly;" but he challenged his hon. and learned Friend to produce a single posed to ask the Government what meaning they attached to them, and what was the definition of them beyond which the magistrates were not to go? For his own part, he should be perfectly satisfied with the clause as it stood at present, if it were exactly stated what it was the magistrates would be bound to consider an unlawful assembly in arriving at their decision. He thought that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton should be supported, because without it the people of Ireland would be practically at the mercy of magistrates, partizans as they knew them to be, who would, no doubt, arrogate to themselves, under this clause, the same powers which were vested by Clause 7 in the Lord Lieutenant.

[Ninth Night.]

MR. HEALY said, he could find no definition of the word "riot" in the Definition Clause of the Bill, and, consequently, the word, as it stood unexplained, might mean anything or nothing at all. It was very easy for the Government to put down the word "riot" in the clause without saying what was meant by it; but he contended that the Irish Law Officers of the Crown, who were well acquainted with the meaning of the term, should prepare a definition for insertion in the Definition Clause. He said that the Government should define this offence in the way they had defined other things in the Definition Clause.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, if hon. Members referred to the Law Text Books they would find all the definitions they wished. In this Bill it was not intended to give a new definition of a crime well known at Common Law. If they used the word libel in the Bill, it would surely not be considered necessary to define what libel was. If they were introducing a new offence, they might justly be required to give a definition; but, as a matter of fact, they were dealing with a well-known offence. As the Home Secretary had explained, it was simply a question of transferring the jurisdiction in such cases to the tribunal who were to try them. The matter was in the hands of the Committee, and he did not think he ought to be required to repeat what had already been said.

MR. METGE said, the arguments of the hon. and learned Gentleman did not seem to coincide with the arguments the Home Secretary used in refusing to give a definition of the word "intimidation." If it was impossible for the Government to define the words "riot" or "unlawful assembly," it seemed justifiable in the Irish Members to press the Government to give the people of Ireland some instruction in the matter, because they must know that this Act was not to be administered by men trained in the law. For the most part, the exercise of the powers conferred by the Act would be in the hands of the Resident Magistrates, whose law came with their practice. These men obtained their knowledge of the law by the cases which were brought before them, and those cases were mostly those in which their own prejudices were aroused. For these reasons, he considered the people should be distinctly instructed as to what their liability would be under the words of this clause.

MR. LEAMY said, he hoped the Government would furnish a fuller definition of "intimidation," and also of "unlawful assembly." The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General said it was not necessary to give a definition of "riot," because it was an offence well known at Common Law. It would be quite another thing, continued the Attorney General, if a new offence was being created. It must be remembered that, under the head of "riot," men found trespassing in pursuit of game could be brought before the magistrates and sent to gaol for six months with hard labour. Many of the fox-hunting Resident Magistrates would be glad of the power this Bill would confer upon them; but he feared they would make a mistake if they sought to put down poachers by means of this Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. DILLON moved, in page 3, line 31, to leave out "or unlawful assembly." He had several strong reasons for proposing that "unlawful assembly" should be omitted from the clause. His first reason was that a large number of people would be convicted who had no intention to commit any offence against the law under the words "unlawful assembly." Whatever the Home Secretary might say to the contrary, he (Mr. Dillon) could positively assert that nine out of every ten people in Ireland had not the least idea what an unlawful assembly

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

was. He himself did not know what it meant, although the Home Secretary and the Attorney General said it was a well-known offence tried at Common Law. When cases of unlawfully assembling were tried, it must be recollected that there was always the safeguard of the verdict of a common-sense jury. A jury in convicting or acquitting a person charged with unlawful assembly, would take into consideration all the circumstances of the case, and they would most certainly take into consideration whether the person charged had attended the assembly with an illegal intent. It was now proposed to place this very elastic expression—and it seemed to him that nearly everything in the Common Law was elastic—at the disposal of the magistrates, who would not give the prisoner the benefit of that common sense which a jury would bring to bear on a case; it would be at the sole discretion of the magistrates to decide what was an unlawful assembly. A very remarkable case had just come under his notice, and he would describe it to the Committee in order to show how this clause might work in Ireland. He had received a letter from a constituent of his in Roscrea, in which letter the writer complained that he and two or three friends were standing smoking outside his door when the police charged up the street and dispersed them. The gentlemen followed the police to the barrack with the intention of charging the police; but the police charged them with riot and with pursuing them down the street. The gentlemen summoned the police for assault, and the police summoned them for riot. When the case came before the magistrates the summonses of his constituents were dismissed, and the summonses of the police were sustained and the defendants sent for trial. Judge Barry, at the last Winter Assizes in the city of Kilkenny, refused to allow the case to go to the jury. These men had been committed by a bench of Irish magistrates for riot and unlawful assembly. The case was dismissed by Judge Barry, because it was brought upon the uncorroborated evidence of the police, his Lordship remarking that in this instance the police were the aggressors. Under this Act these men would have been required to serve out the term of six months' imprisonment, because they would have had no right of appeal over the heads of the magistrates. Under this Act the police would be able to say that any assembly of men was unlawful, and the word of the police would be taken by the magistrates, and that of the accused would be disregarded altogether. He might be wrong, but he understood the definition of an unlawful assembly to be an assembly of people for unlawful purposes. The police might arrest people who were collected together, and swear they were assembled for an unlawful purpose. What evidence could those charged with the offence bring to rebut the accusation but their own word? It was a notorious fact that magistrates always believed the testimony of the police against that of the people, and he held that the expression "unlawful assembly" would put it in the power of the police to arrest anybody at all who was talking to anybody else in a proscribed district, and swear they were assembled for an unlawful purpose. He did not know whether the police might not go so far as a friend told him they once went. They arrested certain individuals, and the charge against them was that they were found congregating about the street corners in a suspicious way. At all events, there was a very strong reason for the omission of this expression. It was no justification for the retention of the words to say that the offence was well known under the Common Law, because it was requisite in the case of offences which were to be tried by magistrates, and without the protection of a jury, that the definition should be more strict and not so elastic as the one contained in the Common Law.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 31, to leave out the words "or unlawful assembly."—(Mr. Dillon.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'unlawful assembly' stand part of the Clause."

DR. COMMINS said, that the term "unlawful assembly" was very antiquated. The Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Porter) had said it was a very common thing for a charge of "riot and unlawful assembly" to be preferred. Undoubtedly, an indictment for "riot" always contained a count for "unlawful assembly;" but he challenged his hon. and learned Friend to produce a single case of "unlawful assembly" pure and simple.

[Ninth Night.]

MR. MARUM said, that in 1848 Judge Patteson said—

"Whether a particular meeting be lawful or unlawful must depend upon the circumstances under which it is held and the manner in which it is brought together. These being questions of fact must be submitted in all cases to the judgment and determination of a jury, first a grand jury and then a petty jury if the bill of indictment be found true."

These being the opinions of a learned Judge as to what was necessary in 1848, it certainly was very requisite that now there should be a full definition of unlawful assembly for the instruction of the magistrates who would preside at the Summary Jurisdiction Courts. An ample definition might not be necessary when a jury was empannelled to investigate a case of "riot and unlawful assembly;" but it certainly was absolutely necessary now, because no Judge could lay down the boundaries between a lawful and unlawful assembly.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Marum) made an unreasonable demand on the Committee, for he had said that no Judge could possibly define what was an unlawful assembly, and therefore the Committee should define it. Whether an assembly was lawful or unlawful was a mixed question of law and fact. The Government proposed to leave to the Court of Summary Jurisdiction the decision of this mixed question of law and fact, for the same reason that they had left the decision of questions of fact to the higher tribunal provided by the Bill. An unlawful assembly was a meeting of large numbers of people under circumstances calculated to raise fear amongst Her Majesty's subjects; and no man could decide whether a meeting was unlawful or not unless he was aware of all the circumstances. An unlawful assembly, in point of fact, was an inchoate riot—a meeting which was likely to eventuate in riot—a meeting called together with the intention and object of using force. That was a very simple question, which a magistrate was perfectly competent to decide.

MR. PARNELL said, he hoped the Government would now (12.45) agree to report Progress. The question under consideration was very important; and as the House had to meet again at 2 o'clock he supposed there would be no objection to reporting Progress.

MR. DILLON said, he had understood the Prime Minister to say, a few days ago, that he would not take any Morning Sitting on account of the hard work devolving on Irish Members. He was, therefore, surprised when he was told that the right hon. Gentleman had intimated his intention of taking a Morning Sitting to-day. He would move that Progress be reported; because, if they did not report Progress now, he did not know how they could possibly be down at the House again at 2 o'clock.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—
(Mr. Dillon.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was quite true that, at the request of the hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite, a Morning Sitting was not taken last Tuesday, but the result was not very encouraging; the Committee made no progress at all. The hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) had said the altered arrangement was made last Tuesday to suit the convenience of Irish Members. There were other persons to be considered—those who had to conduct the Business of the House. Really, the time had come when they must make progress. The hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) said on Friday night that they had passed the 4th clause. It was now 1 o'clock on Tuesday morning, and they had not yet passed the first words of the 5th clause. It must be obvious to everyone that the Committee must endeavour to get on with more haste; therefore, he hoped the Committee would not agree to report Progress at this comparatively early hour.

MR. BULWER said, he sincerely hoped the Government would stand firm. The hon. Member for Tipperary had made an appeal to the Committee on the ground that all the labour was thrown on the Irish Members. Why, to the Irish Members this was a labour of love; and it was they who made the labour. He had been in the House all night, and he had heard little but rubbish spoken; and he would give the Committee an instance. One hon. Member (Dr. Commins) just now, after talking a good quarter of an hour about unlawful assemblies, finished up by challenging the Law Officers of the Crown to give him an instance in which an indictment had ever been preferred for an unlawful assembly. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Marum), arguing on the same side, instantly produced a case tried by Judge Patteson—[Mr. MARUM: That was a case of riot.] It was an indictment for an unlawful assembly also—and that was the way the time of the Committee was taken up. Hon. Members from Ireland wanted a definition of crimes, in the hope that the definition might fail on some point or other; that a criminal might have the opportunity, as one hon. and learned Gentleman had pointed out, of relying on the argument, expressio unius exclusio alterius. He would remind hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway that there was no universally-accepted definition even of the crime of larceny. He trusted the Government would not give way to hon. Gentlemen who, night after night, were wasting the time of Parliament.

MR. H. SAMUELSON said, he hoped the Government would either let the Committee report Progress or they would not. He had sat through many of these debates, and he had noticed, on an infinite number of occasions, the waste of hours at a time, owing to the Government strenuously resisting, for a long time, Motions to report Progress, and then, after all, giving way. He trusted the Government would consent to report Progress at once, or really insist effectually upon going on with the Bill.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL wished the Government would tell the Committee how far they were to go.

MR. DILLON said, the Prime Minister told them, at the commencement of the present Sitting, that he had no complaint to make of any unreasonable opposition to the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that the opposition was prolonged further than he liked; but he could not say that it was unreasonable. He (Mr. Dillon) did not think any unreasonable opposition had occurred that night. They had now arrived at an exceedingly important point, and it was not possible to carry on the discussion of the measure in a proper manner if they were only to get five hours' sleep out of 24. If the Home Secretary would consent to do what the Prime Minister consented to do last week—that was, not to take a Morning Sitting—the Irish Members would be reasonable, and meet him half way, by continuing the consideration of the Bill until a later hour.

MR. TREVELYAN said, if hon. Members opposite would allow the Committee to take this sub-section, the Government would be willing to report Progress. The question had been thoroughly discussed, and the definition of "unlawful assembly" had been given by every legal Member on the Treasury Bench; and the point was a very narrow one. When they considered the state in which Ireland was at the present moment—a state of which the public knew a great deal, but of which the public certainly did not know all—it was a very serious matter indeed that this extremely important Bill, with a matter of eight clauses now coming on, which would form a complete network to thoroughly strangle the murder and outrage which now prevailed in Ireland, should be resisted at the rate of two hours for every line of the Bill. The Government would be perfectly willing to report Progress when this sub-section was passed.

MR. PARNELL said, he wished he could share the right hon. Gentleman's confidence that the remaining eight clauses of the Bill would be effective for their work. He must remind the right hon. Gentleman that the time of the Committee up to this had not been spent over these eight clauses; but it had been spent over clauses which had no reference to the murder and outrage which now prevailed in Ireland. On the contrary, the clauses which the Committee had as yet discussed at any length were clauses for putting down private and public action—action which was legal in England. Even to the proposal to suspend trial by jury he and his hon. Friends offered no lengthened opposition, and by far the most of the debate on that question was carried on by English and not Irish Members. With regard to what the hon. and learned Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Bulwer) said about the Irish Members talking rubbish, he (Mr. Parnell) must say that he had not spoken any rubbish, and he had not heard any of his hon. Friends do so. He had, however, heard some very rubbishy expressions from English Members—Members who did not understand the question, and who would not take the trouble to inform themselves upon the points at issue. He would remind the Committee that an overwhelming majority of the Irish Members were opposing the Bill. In all the divisions there had been a majority of five to one of the Irish Members against the Bill; and in no division had the Government had more than 12 Irish Members supporting them. It came to this—that, comparatively speaking, the number of Irish Members opposing the Bill was larger than the number of Members of the House of Commons in support of it.

[Ninth Night.]

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 196; Noes 25: Majority 171.—(Div. List, No. 130.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.”—(Mr. Trevelyan.)

MR. HEALY said, that before that Motion was put he wished to make an appeal to the Government not to take a Morning Sitting to-day. Hon. Gentlemen opposite had very little to do in Committee, but the Irish Members had a great deal. They did not finish until a quarter past 1, and they would have to be here at 2. [“Hear, hear!”] It was all very well to cry “Hear, hear;” but they ought to be “There, there.” He would ask the Government not to put an undue strain on Members of the House. The two hours’ interval between 7 and 9 were of no value to hon. Members—they only idled them away. Last year they were happy to agree to Morning Sittings, because the Prime Minister was conducting his own Bill, and he required the interval between 7 and 9 for repose. But the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary was both young and strong, and he (Mr. Healy) did not see why he should require repose any more than anyone else. He would ask the Government not to impose upon Members, who did not get home until 2 or 3 o’clock in the morning, the duty of coming here at 2 in the afternoon.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he could not understand why Irish Members could not be satisfied with 12 hours’ sleep. For his part, he only required seven hours; and he reminded the House of the saying of George III.—“Six hours for a man, seven for a woman, and eight for a fool.”

MR. TREVELYAN said, that, unfortunately, the arrangement could not be altered. A considerable number of Members had gone away under the impression that the House was to meet at 2 o’clock; and, at the same time, he was bound to say that, if only on the score of variety, it would be more convenient to meet at 2. They were likely to have a hard week.

MR. CALLAN said, that the real reason why a large section of the House desired to have the interval between 7 and 9 was in order that they might dine out. Hon. Members who came down to the House at 4 o’clock in the afternoon, and remained there until 1 or 2 in the morning, discussing the questions before the Committee, required more time than such Gentlemen as the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell). The hon. Member said he required seven hours’ sleep. Probably he did; but it was a well-known fact that six hours were enough for a man, and that seven were what a woman required.

MR. HEALY said, that he would take a division on the question of a Morning Sitting, with the Speaker in the Chair. In reply to the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, he would remark that the Irish Members had something else to do besides sleep during the hours they were not in the House. They had to work.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that a great deal of work had to be done out of the House. For instance, to-day the Law Officers of the Crown and the Home Secretary, and those who were engaged in the conduct of this Bill, had arranged to hold a meeting—which would, undoubtedly, be a meeting of considerable length—to settle the clause or clauses which were to be proposed. If these were not proposed at the Sitting to-day, it would be because the Government were anxious to make the new provisions as perfect as possible.

MR. GIBSON said, that probably the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) would not divide the Committee, when he reminded him of a circumstance which occurred just now. The hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) had said that if there was to be no Morning Sitting he would be willing to go on with the consideration of the Bill—that the question as to whether Progress was to be reported rested on the question as to whether there was to be a Morning Sitting. As there was to be a Morning Sitting, then Progress would be at once reported.

Mr. Parnell

MR. HEALY said, he would not divide, but would wait until next Thursday, and see what would be done then.

MR. PARNELL said, it was upon no such question at all as that mentioned by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson) that the Irish Members had offered to give up their right of moving to report Progress. There had been an understanding that if a certain Amendment was withdrawn Progress would be reported when the sub-section under discussion was disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS (SCOTLAND)

TEACHERS BILL.—[BILL 153.]

(Mr. Mundella, The Lord Advocate, Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Definition).

MR. A. GRANT said, he had proposed to leave out, in page 1, line 6, the word "certificated," and insert "principal." The object of the Amendment was to limit the scope of the Bill to cases of principal teachers. As the Bill stood, it would be seen that it applied to all certificated teachers, and would include those who were in the position of assistants in the public schools. As to those teachers, the Bill went beyond that of the hon. Member for Wigtonshire (Sir Herbert Maxwell), and dealt with a class who, as far as he was aware, had not made any demand for a change in the mode in which they were dealt with at present. However, since he gave Notice of his Amendment he had ascertained the views of several of the more influential school boards in Scotland, and found that they expressed themselves as satisfied with the Bill; and, under these circumstances, he did not feel himself called upon to question their judgment in the matter. He had come to the conclusion not to press his Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member move his second Amendment?

MR. A. GRANT said, he did not intend to move any of his Amendments.

Clause agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 3 (Three weeks' notice to be given to members of school boards and teachers of motion for dismissal. Adoption of resolution for dismissal).

MR. BIGGAR said, he wished to move to omit the word "full." The clause required that the resolution of a school board for the dismissal of a certificated teacher should have the assent of a majority of the "full" number of the Members of the Board. Under such a provision it would be necessary that there should be a large attendance upon the board before such a thing as a dismissal could take place. He did not think such a thing was necessary. A dismissal could only take place by formal motion, of which due notice had to be given; and under the clause it might be impossible to get a full number of members present. Suppose it were a rule that no Motion in this House should be valid unless more than half the Members voted, it would be found that very rarely during the Session could a decision be come to. For the reasons he had given he would move his Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 3, leave out the word "full."—(Mr. Biggar.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'full' stand part of the Clause."

MR. MUNDELLA said, he could not accept the Amendment of the hon. Member. Not a single Scotch Member had expressed any wish in this matter, and he had presented Petitions in favour of the Bill as it stood from a number of school boards in Scotland. He was sure the hon. Member would not seek to stand against the unanimous wish of the Scotch Members. That would be quite inconsistent with his attitude in that House.

MR. BIGGAR said, this was no argument at all—the opinion of Scotch Members. They continually saw Irish questions decided by Scotch and English votes. He supposed that during the past two or three days there had not been a single Scotch vote given in favour of the Amendments to the Prevention of Crime Bill brought forward by the Irish Members.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he could not see on what ground the hon. Member urged a change which the Scotch school boards did not desire.

MR. BIGGAR said, the argument the right hon. Gentleman now advanced seemed to him much more substantial than his former argument, and for that reason he would not put the Committee to the trouble of dividing. Of course, seeing that he had asked leave to withdraw his first Amendment, he would not move the second.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he wished to make an observation. [Cries of "Divide!"] This was a Scotch Bill, and he maintained his right to express his views upon it. When he had requested the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) to withdraw his blocking Notice against the Bill—which the hon. Member very kindly did—he had thought that the measure was very little more than a continuation of the 3rd clause of another hon. Member's Bill. He had now, however, very grave doubts of the changes proposed. In the interests of the teachers themselves it might be desirable that the process of dispensing with their services should not be of a formal and grave nature.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman does not observe that this subject was passed in a former clause.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that if the Committee would look at the clause they would see that it contained the words "certificated teachers." In the interests of the junior teachers it might not be necessary to make the process of dispensing with their services of such a formal and grave nature; but they had been told that several of the most important school boards of Scotland had petitioned in favour of the Bill as it stood. He confessed he had not thought it was so; but as he saw sitting opposite several hon. Members who were interested in the subject, and knew that if the Bill required amendment in this respect they would move in the matter, he would not occupy the time of the Committee by going further into the matter.

Motion agreed to.

Clause agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 4 (Suspension).

MR. MUNDELLA said, he wished to add to the clause words to protect the rights of teachers appointed before the passing of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872.

Amendment proposed,

To add to Clause 4 "and nothing contained in this Act shall affect the rights of teachers appointed before the passing of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, in so far as the same are saved by that Act."—(Mr Mundella.)

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Bill reported, as amended, to be considered To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

(Sir Hardinge Giffard, Mr. Butt, Mr. M'Intyre, Mr. Charles Russell, Mr. Inderwick, Mr. Webster, Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Gregory.)

[BILL 154.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Order in Council or Rule of Court not to come into operation until expiration of forty days after it has been laid before Parliament).

MR. PUGH said, he proposed to leave out of the clause the words "or Rule of Court." He did not know how far the Committee would care to go on with the clause at this hour in the morning. It was a measure of an important character, and, so far as he was aware, it was altogether unprecedented. There was no Court in the country, and he was not sure that there ever had been, where the Judges had not the power to make rules for procedure. It was so in the Bankruptcy Court, in the Divorce Court, and in the County Courts. The Bill stated that no Rule of Court with regard to pleadings and practice should come into operation until it had been before Parliament for 40 days. What would be the effect of passing such a law? Why, the Judges would not be able to make and put into practice the most simple rules until they had been on the Table of the House 40 days; and if Rules were made and laid on the Table, and the full period had not expired before Parliament rose, those Rules, which might be wanted for a special purpose immediately, could not be put in force until the following March. The great bugbear with hon. Members opposite was that, as matters at present stood, the Judges might in their rules unduly interfere with juries. But if that was the intention of the supporters of the Bill the course they should have taken was obvious. They should have endeavoured to amend the 20th section of the Act, which at present provided a saving clause in the general law with regard to juries—which provided that juries should not be touched. If the existing law was not sufficient it would be possible to amend it. The proposal that was now made seemed to him to show a distrust of the Judges which had not been exhibited before, and surely some valid reason for it should be given before the Committee were asked to depart from the old custom in regard to these Rules of Court. A Committee was appointed to inquire into these matters last year, and they made a Report, in which suggestions were offered in regard to what were essentially points of practice. He had no hesitation in saying that, to a great extent, these suggestions were worthy of being carried into effect; but the effect of this Bill would be to delay the operation of any rules made in accordance with the suggestions of the Committee and to hamper the Judges. He did not wish to occupy the time of the Committee, and he would, therefore, now confine himself to moving that the words “or Rule of Court” be struck out. He would not deal with the question as to whether a Bill should be passed to apply this new rule to “Orders in Council;” but certainly one was not necessary in regard to the rules made by the Judges.

Mr. Biggar

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 5, to leave out the words “or Rule of Court.”—(Mr. Pugh.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause.”

MR. INDERWICK said, this was really a serious and substantial matter, and he did not complain of the view his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Pugh) took of it. The question was simply this. According to the Acts passed for regulating procedure in civil cases in this country, a great deal of respect was paid by the House to the Rules framed by the Judges. New Rules, according to the Act of 1875, must be laid on the Table of the House, and it was not proposed to alter the disposition of that Act. But what the supporters of the Bill said was—“Let the Rules be laid on the Table of the House for a reasonable time before they came into operation, and do not make a farce of the whole proceeding by laying them on the Table after they have come into operation, and when the House has no proper opportunity of dealing with them.” This was a short statement of what he and his hon. and learned Friends who had their names on the back of the Bill wished to see carried out. It was said that to require the Rules of the Judges to be laid on the Table of the House before they came into operation was unprecedented; but that was not so. Only recently Parliament had considered the Statutes of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. Rules were to be made, and they were to be laid on the Table of the House before they came into effect. A discussion had taken place on the subject. The Rule for the regulation of Public Parks, and many other instances, might be mentioned. Well, it could not be said that these Rules affecting the practice of the Courts were of so very different a nature that they should not be laid on the Table of the House for a limited space before they came into operation. Rules had been made, and laid upon the Table of the House, abolishing the nominal titles of Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer. These Rules were laid on the Table in order that the House might discuss them and give its consent to them, or withhold its consent, if it thought proper. The proposal was not merely that of one side of the House, or of one section of Members; but it was the unanimous opinion of the solicitors, who knew more about the matter than many hon. Members, that the Bill before the Committee should pass. The Judges had under their consideration certain alterations of what was called procedure. No one could doubt that the Judges were the proper persons to regulate the procedure of their own Courts; but it might be that such a form of procedure might be established by them as to entirely alter the system of judicature in the country. There were two matters which had always been very much under the consideration of the House—one was that the pleadings should be put into such a condition that every person who went to trial might have a clear and intelligible statement of the case which he had to meet, and present a similar statement himself to the other side. One of the matters the Judges had to deal with was this question of pleading. He was not going to discuss it now, for this was not the moment to discuss such a thing; but there was a feeling in the House, and an immense number of people outside the House concurred in it, that any such alteration as that proposed would be damaging to the interests of suitors whose interests should be well considered. But there was another matter of a more serious kind. Up to this, the normal course of proceeding in Courts of Justice had been that issues of fact could be tried by juries, if either of the parties wished to have a jury. There was reason to believe that in the view of the Judges this was not a desirable thing to allow, and that it was proposed that the normal course in future should be the trial of fact by Judges, and not by juries. There were many in the House—certainly, he was one of them—who believed that trial by jury was not only a question of procedure, but of political importance; who thought that trial by jury had the effect of giving to every man some knowledge of the first principles of law—that it made everyone who served on a jury a party to the administration of justice—and who believed that it had had a very great effect in bringing about that profound respect for law which had long existed in this country. He did not wish to detain the Committee, and had only put shortly before them the points which appeared to him to be strongly in favour of the Bill of the hon. Gentleman. He hoped the Committee would give its consent to the principle of the Bill, which, after all, would not be a very great alteration in the existing law. It was an alteration—a somewhat novel practice—which, so far as he was aware, had only been introduced during the last three or four years; and he asked them to pass the clause as it stood, so that the consent of the House would be necessary to Rules of Court framed by the Judges, and that hon. Members might have an opportunity of discussing those Rules.

Mr. Inderwick

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, the Committee, in dealing with this matter, were unfortunately circumstanced, inasmuch as it had never had laid before it by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir Hardinge Giffard) the reason why the reform was required. The hon. and learned Member, on the occasion of the second reading, and on going into Committee, had never said a word.

MR. WARTON: Yes, yes; on the introduction of the Bill.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, that, at any rate, they had taken the second reading sub silentio. It was said that if the measure were passed in its present form it would produce very little change—that it would only alter what was done four or five years ago. But it would take away the power of Judges as to procedure, which had existed, not for four or five years, but for centuries. [Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD dissented.] The hon. and learned Member shook his head, but he (the Solicitor General) should be surprised to hear anything said to the contrary. It was now proposed that no such power should exist, and that no rule as to pleadings and practice which was framed by the Judges should come into operation before it had been 40 days before Parliament. [Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD again dissented.] The hon. and learned Gentleman again shook his head; but if he would refer to the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts 1873 and 1875, and read the clause regulating the pleading, practice, and procedure of the Courts of Justice, he might alter his opinion. For many years the Rules, after being framed and put into operation, had had to be laid before Parliament, and Parliament had had an opportunity of remedying them; but if this Bill passed within 40 days of the rising of Parliament the Rules could not come into operation, and there would be no opportunity of remedying them until the following Session. In this way the power that the Judges had always possessed would be taken away. Why was it proposed that it should be taken away? It was not suggested that it had been abused. It was said that, in particular instances, changes might be made which would be objectionable; and what were the points which had been put forward by the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken? He had said that changes might be made in the Rules as to pleading before the House had had an opportunity of discussing them. Was it seriously to be contended that this House ever could, or ever would, discuss such a question as what pleadings ought to be admitted, or what form they should take, or how they should be regulated? It would be idle to pass such a Bill, because such Rules never would be discussed; and the House would never deem itself qualified to consider them. It was said that the Judges might pass Rules to limit the right of trial by jury; and he admitted that if that matter were dealt with by the Bill, and it were limited to that, it would be well worthy of consideration. But that, so far as he could see, was the only matter of importance to which it would be reasonable to apply such a provision as this. The Act, which the Bill would amend, was not an Act passed by the present Government, but by right hon. Gentlemen and hon. Gentlemen sitting opposite. It was they who had made the distinction to which allusion had been made. They had considered that some Orders in Council and Rules of Court should come into operation at once, and that some should not; and the hon. and learned Member (Sir Hardinge Giffard) now came forward and asked for the whole of that to be upset. Great inconvenience would almost inevitably attend the passing of such a Bill as this, as it would prevent the Judges from acting in the future as they had acted in the past, and making Rules, at a moment's notice, to put a stop to an inconvenience or remedy a defect. The Rules might require to be made and put into operation at once, at a time when it would be impossible to bring them before Parliament. In the past, whenever there had existed an inconvenience or a defect to which a remedy could be applied at once, that remedy had been applied; and the system had worked to the satisfaction of both the Bar and the public. It was not reasonable to require that the old power, which had been possessed by the Judges, of regulating pleading, practice, and procedure should be given up; that the Judges should only be able to make rules when Parliament was sitting. He submitted, therefore, that his hon. and learned Friend's Bill was of so wide a scope that it was too much to ask the House to go back from the legislation of 1875 and to adopt it.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, he was particularly anxious that a misapprehension, which the statement of the Solicitor General had given rise to, should be disputed. This power of making Rules was not exercised by the Judges, but by a Committee of the Judges—a Committee of five. On the publication of the Rules by these five Judges they became law. The Judges would not, by the Bill before the Committee, be deprived of the power to make Rules to meet sudden emergencies; but what was interfered with was the right the Committee of Judges possessed of framing Rules which at once, on publication, had the force of an Act of Parliament, and were as though they had been included in the original Act of Parliament. He had reason to know that, if the Judges were polled, it would be found that the recommendations of the Select Committee were disapproved of by a large number; but whether by a majority or not he was unable to say. It was not correct to say that the present power had been possessed by the Judges for three centuries; but the result of the process, which the hon. and learned Solicitor General defended, was that this House was deprived of its power of superintending the legislation of the country, or whatever was included in the words "pleading, practice, and procedure;" and included, not by the Judges generally, but by the small Committee he had referred to. What they proposed to deal with as a part of practice and procedure the Committee had some means of judging, for they saw that they desired to sacrifice trial by jury, and leave it to the Judges whether or not they would have a jury to assist them. At present, in, for instance, a case of fraud, a man had a right to ask that there should be a jury; but, under new rules, it might be in the discretion of the Judge whether there should be a jury or not. The Select Committee had considered this question, and had made several recommendations; but he would undertake to say that any lawyer in Westminster Hall, when asked in what particular class of cases it was most likely that a jury would go wrong; would say that it was in that class in which the Committee had recommended trial by jury should be absolute. If the operation of the Bill had been limited to such a question as that, no doubt the Solicitor General would have been disposed to listen to it; but this appeared to him (Sir Hardinge Giffard) to be only a specimen of the manner in which the power might be exercised if the House permitted it to be used. All he asked in this Bill was that the Rules should not have the force of an Act of Parliament before the House had had an opportunity of pronouncing an opinion upon them. It was true, as the Solicitor General had said, that there might be some inconvenience, as months might elapse before the sanction of the House could be obtained; but it seemed to him that it was much more inconvenient for Rules to have the force of an Act of Parliament the moment they were published. It had been remarked that this Bill was an intended alteration of an Act of Parliament which was introduced under a former Administration of which he was a Member. When that Act was passed, he believed that the House had not the slightest notion of the purposes to which the powers contained in it would be applied. But anyone who now knew the mode in which they were used by the Committee appointed by the Judges—the small Committee—would, he thought, agree that it was high time for the House to interfere. His hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General said they were legislating in respect of rumour; but that rumour was tolerably clear and defined, inasmuch as it emanated from the Report of the Committee appointed by the Judges then before the House. He was not speaking of the Committee of Judges, but of the Committee of which he believed his hon. and learned Friend was a Member—a Committee of the Bar, selected, no doubt, upon some principle; but not, he thought, representing very widely those engaged in the practice of the Profession. This small Committee had made a Report, which was certainly not in the nature of a rumour, because nothing could be more definite and distinct than its recommendations. He held in his hand a Petition, which he was unable to present, from the Law Institution, recommending the adoption of the clause now under discussion. That Petition represented, as hon. Members were aware, in a great measure, the opinion of every branch of the Profession. He supposed the object of the discussion which had been raised was to strike the words “or Rule of Court” out of the Bill, in order to defeat the Bill in Committee under the form of amending it, as though they were on the question of second reading. He hoped the Committee would not allow that to be done; and he appealed to hon. Members to pass the clause as it stood.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, it appeared to him that the passing of this clause, in its present form, would amount to an insult on the Judges. That undoubtedly would be the effect of such legislation. The Committee of Judges who had to determine these matters consisted of the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, the Master of the Rolls, the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, and the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, together with four other Judges of the Supreme Court of Judicature. His hon. and learned Friend opposite was a party to the Bill which gave the powers in question to the Judges; and why he should now sneer at those powers he was quite unable to see.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD: My Bill refers to the Acts of 1873 and 1875. The Act of 1876 is not touched.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was referring to the argument of his hon. and learned Friend as to the smallness of the Committee. He contended that his hon. and learned Friend, instead of complaining of the smallness of the Committee, ought to have attacked the Act for which he was personally responsible. He repeated that it would be an insult to the Judges to pass this clause in its present form, inasmuch as it would take away from the Judges of the Supreme Court the powers which were given to the Judges in Bankruptcy, the County Court Judges, and the Judge of the Court of Probate and Divorce. The House, he thought, would understand that if the Judges were not allowed to remedy any defect in procedure without waiting for the time named in the Bill to lapse, and especially in view of the fact that Parliament might not be sitting at the time such alteration was needed, the interest of the public must inevitably suffer. He believed the Committee would see that the objection of his hon. and learned Friend was really towards the constitution of the Committee, not to the Judges. The Judges had nothing to do with the appointment of the Committee. It was the Lord Chancellor who requested certain persons—Judges, members of the Bar, and eminent solicitors—to meet, not for the purpose of drawing up any rules, but simply to lay their views before the Committee of the Judges. At the present moment his hon. and learned Friend had no knowledge whatever of what the rules of the Judges were to be, because they had made no Report. It was simply because the Committee had placed their recommendations before the public that his hon. and learned Friend assumed that they would be accepted by the Judges and brought forward in this Bill. Now, his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General had just pointed out that the Judges were, in matters of procedure, more competent than that House; and even if the Committee were disposed to think it right to criticize the conduct of the Judges, he trusted, for the reasons he had advanced, that they would not pass a clause which would undoubtedly result in prejudice to the public interest.

Sir Hardinge Giffard

MR. BUTT said, he was surprised that the hon. and learned Attorney General should have resorted to the argument that the passing of this Bill amounted to an insult to the Judges. He was certain that neither the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir Hardinge Giffard), nor any other Member who supported the Bill, had the slightest desire to offer any insult to the Judges. But where the point was one which involved great and important principles, it would be the duty of some hon. Members, even if the view suggested by the Attorney General were taken of their conduct, to insist upon the point before the Committee. What was the point in this case? He could not help thinking that the Solicitor General really admitted the whole principle of this measure when he said that there was one matter alluded to by the hon. and learned Member for Rye (Mr. Inderwick) which might be worthy of consideration, and it was the question of trial by jury.

Why, he ventured to say that this was what was now asked for—it was the whole principle of the Bill. The state of the case was that the Judicature Acts allowed certain Rules to be framed by the Judges and embodied in an Order of Council, and which would then become law. After they had become law they were to be laid on the Table of the House. Now, under these powers of framing Rules of procedure and practice, there was reason to believe that there was an intention to make an alteration with regard to trial by jury—that important right being dealt with as a matter of procedure or practice. That being so, the Committee were told by the Solicitor General that the point might be worthy of consideration. How, then, was Parliament to have an opportunity of considering that point? Why, by passing the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend, which asked no more than that, in matters of this description, which might involve principles of the most extreme importance, instead of the Rules being framed and made into law immediately, and afterwards being laid on the Table of the House within 40 days, as required by the Act, they should be laid on the Table of the House 40 days before they came into force. In the latter case, if the Rules related simply to a matter of procedure they would not be interfered with; they would lie on the Table for the prescribed time, and be passed as a matter of course. But if, as his hon. and learned Friend had admitted, they related to and were intended to affect the Constitutional right of trial by jury, he ventured to say that, in making that admission, the whole principle of the Bill was conceded.

MR. DILLWYN said, as far as he could see, the legal discussion in which they found themselves engaged at that very late hour (2.20), was likely to continue for some time. The principle involved in the Amendment seemed to be an important one, and in order to give time for its full consideration he moved to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he would appeal to the Committee not to agree to the Motion of the hon. Member for Swansea. The question could now be very shortly determined; but, if Progress were reported, the discussion would probably be continued at length on another occasion, and, therefore, he hoped the Committee would be allowed to proceed.

MR. DILLWYN said, on the condition that they were allowed at once to go to a division, he was willing to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 69; Noes 76: Majority 7. — (Div. List, No. 131.)

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Friday.

MOTION.

PARLIAMENTARY OATH (MR. BRADLAUGH)—"GURNEY v. BRADLAUGH."

RESOLUTION.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he rose to make the Motion of which he had given Notice, in connection with the case of "Gurney v. Bradlaugh." He understood that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) opposed this upon the idea that the action was not going on. But, of course, the House would see that as the Petition had been presented by solicitors, there was sufficient evidence to the contrary. As a matter of fact, a similar application was made by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), in the case of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire himself, and he (Mr. Labouchere) did not object to this, because it was only fair and reasonable in such matters that the parties concerned should have all the Papers which they required.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to the proper Officer to attend the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice with the said paper writing and copy of the New Testament."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

MR. NEWDEGATE asked, if the Motion could be proceeded with at that hour, seeing that he opposed it?

The Attorney General

MR. SPEAKER: The question being raised, and Notice of Motion by the hon. Member for Northampton having been given at the last Sitting, the Motion cannot be taken, consistently with the Standing Order.

COUNTY COURTS [SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF EXAMINERS OF ACCOUNTS].

Resolution [June 9] reported, and agreed to.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the County Courts (Advocates' Costs) Bill, That they have power to make provision therein, pursuant to the said Resolution.

House adjourned at half after
Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 13th June, 1882.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Election of Representative Peers (Ireland)* (137); Intermediate Education (Ireland)* (138).

Second Reading—Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Act (1874) Amendment (120).

Committee—Municipal Corporations (Unreformed)* (79-140); Places of Worship Sites Amendment* (77-141).

Committee—Report—Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment (104); Local Government Provisional Orders* (106); Local Government Provisional Orders (Poor Law)* (107).

Report—Pluralities Acts Amendment* (102-139); Boiler Explosions* (129).

Third Reading—Union of Benefices (London)* (118); Imprisonment for Contumacy (103), and passed.

EGYPT (LATEST TELEGRAMS).

OBSERVATIONS.

EARL GRANVILLE: I beg to communicate to your Lordships the latest news we have from Egypt, of this day's date. The Khedive left Cairo at 10 o'clock this morning with Dervish Pasha for Alexandria. All passed off quietly. Mr. Cookson's state is satisfactory, but he is ordered complete rest. Sir Edward Malet has been instructed to follow the Khedive to Alexandria. Alexandria is quiet, and the shops are being re-opened. The Egyptian garrison there has been reinforced.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Is there any fresh intelligence respecting the movements of Arabi Pasha?

EARL GRANVILLE: None whatever.

PLURALITIES ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Lord Bishop of Exeter.)

(NOS. 74-102.) REPORT.

Amendments reported (according to order).

On Motion of The Bishop of EXETER, the following Amendment was made:—

Clause 15 (Notices, &c. may be sent by post in prepaid letter).

In line 15, at the end of the clause add—

("And where a spiritual person is out of England without licence of non-residence, and without having made due provision for the performance of his ecclesiastical duties during his absence, every monition, instrument, or notice to be served on him pursuant to any of the provisions of the first-mentioned Act, may be served in the manner in section one hundred and twelve of the same Act provided in the case of a spiritual person who cannot be found; and the words 'place of residence' in that section shall mean 'place of residence in England.'")

Bill to be read 3^a on Monday next; and to be printed as amended. (No. 139.)

IMPRISONMENT FOR CONTUMACY

BILL.—(Nos. 91-103.)

(The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^a."
—(The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.)

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that he should not offer any opposition to the Bill. He could not, however, but regret that the Bill brought in by his noble Friend (Earl Beauchamp) had not been accepted in preference to the one before their Lordships.

EARL FORTESCUE said, that he also must protest against the passing of this Bill into law. They were all agreed that imprisonment was a most inappropriate punishment for a clergyman of exemplary life, who thought it his conscientious duty to resist the law under which he held the benefice to which he clung. A more appropriate remedy for a clergyman who persisted in his contumacy was incorporated in the Bill which passed their Lordships' House last Session. He regretted very much that the present measure had been substituted for one which was not only more appropriate, but was more likely to conduce to the interests of the parishioners still nominally under the clergyman's charge. The best clause in the Bill seemed to be that which limited its duration to three years; and he hoped that before the end of that time some measure for dealing more satisfactorily and on sounder principles with contumacious clergymen would be passed.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 3^a accordingly; an Amendment made; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

IRISH REPRODUCTIVE LOAN FUND ACT

(1874) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 120.)

(The Viscount Monck.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

VISCOUNT MONCK, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the nucleus of the fund was formed from the balance of a large subscription in the City of London in 1822, which had been raised to assist those then suffering from distress in the Western counties of Ireland. It amounted to over £50,000, and was vested in Trustees for the benefit of the counties of Sligo, Roscommon, Tipperary, &c. In 1844 the Trustees were incorporated into a Company, and the Company so formed was called the Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Institution, and its object was to lend money in various counties in Ireland, a certain sum being apportioned by the Trustees to each of these counties. By the Act 11 & 12 Vict. c. 115, which was passed in 1848, this institution was dissolved, and the fund was transferred by the Act to the Crown, with the same trusts. In 1874 the fund was transferred to the Board of Works in Ireland and that Board was empowered, in addition to the original objects, to lend to counties near the sea portions of the fund for the promotion of the fisheries of Ireland. By the 5th section of the Act, Sub-sections 2 and 3, the maximum amount in any one year to be given to any county was not to exceed one-fourth of the sum standing in the previous year to the credit of the county, and the fishery loans were not to exceed half the sum standing to the account. The operation of the provisions had been found extremely beneficial, and the object of the Bill he asked their Lordships to give a second reading to was to repeal these two subsections, limiting the amount which the Board of Works could advance for the purpose of fisheries, and to enable them to grant the entire of the amount to the maritime counties for fishery purposes. It also proposed to make these advances to fishermen in kind instead of in money by enabling the Commissioners of fisheries to purchase the nets, boats, and other things required, and supply them to the fishermen. The Commissioners had access to a much larger and better market, and would be able to procure these things at a cheaper rate and of better quality than the fishermen could do. Another provision was to increase the summary power of the Board with regard to recovering loans. That was the entire scope of the Bill. No objection had been made to it in the other House, and he trusted their Lordships would give it a second reading.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT AND BUILDING ACTS AMENDMENT

BILL.—(No. 104.)

(The Lord Thurlow.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order).

Clauses 1 to 5, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Preventing obstructions of streets).

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN complained that the Bill did not authorize the Board of Works to deal with the bars, gates, and other obstructions existing in certain parts of London, and especially in Pimlico and Bloomsbury, in which latter district they were peculiarly inconvenient. In Gordon Street, Euston Square, the notice affixed to the gate was to the effect that by permission of the Duke of Bedford, and during His Grace's pleasure, carriages and cabs might pass through within certain hours; but no wagons or other heavy vehicles were allowed without special permission. The date was July, 1835. Now, that, he submitted, was not a notice that ought to be put up in a London street in the last quarter of the 19th century. Its terms gave one the idea that there was nothing to prevent the Duke of Bedford from closing the street altogether if he chose to do so. The restriction might have been right and proper originally, when the Bedford estate was on the outskirts of London; but now that a large part of the Metropolis lay North of the New Road the bars and gates caused great inconvenience, and their maintenance was an extreme instance of the assertion of the rights of property. Both the noble Dukes (the Duke of Bedford and the Duke of Westminster) voted for the Land Act of 1881, under which those possessed of land in Ireland had had their rents reduced 25 per cent without a shadow of compensation. Under these circumstances, he felt convinced that these two noble Dukes would gladly embrace the opportunity of proving the sincerity of the opinion which they held last year by sacrificing their right to any compensation for the loss which they might sustain on the opening up of these squares and other places.

Amendment moved,

At end of clause add ("and in case of any such obstruction as aforesaid, erected by any person whatever, which is already in existence, the Board may, if they think fit, in like manner give such notice as aforesaid, and demolish or remove such obstruction as above provided.")—(The Earl of Milltown.)

LORD THURLOW said, he could not accept the Amendment, which would in its effect be retrospective.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN explained that as he had proposed to inflict no penalty it would not be retrospective.

LORD THURLOW said, that the view of the Metropolitan Board of Works was that it would be retrospective. At any rate, the Amendment would open the door to a large variety of questions affecting the properties of the Metropolis, which would involve questions of compensation. It was to be remembered that in the case of ordinary obstructions the Board had power to proceed by way of indictment. The object of the clause was to prevent anyone who had opened a street with the consent of the Board from closing it again without their sanction.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

Bill reported without amendment; and to be read 3^a on Thursday next.

Viscount Monck

FOOD SUPPLY—IMPORT OF FROZEN SHEEP.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD LAMINGTON asked, If the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the recent importations of frozen sheep from New Zealand; and, whether, in the interest of the British producer and consumer, it may not be desirable to introduce a Bill to compel the retail dealers to specify the description of meat they are selling, and imposing heavy penalties on any person who sells imported meat as home produce? The noble Lord observed that in bringing this question forward it was not his intention to enter into any argument in favour of protective duties, because his impression was, that, give the English farmers a fair season and fair play, they could compete with the foreigner; but not only should they, but the consumer also, have fair play. Their Lordships would see that within the last few days a vessel had arrived in England from New Zealand with a cargo of 5,000 frozen sheep. That meat could be sold at 6*d.* or 7*d.* per lb., with a profit on the sale, and it would do no harm whatever to the English producer; because, as their Lordships were well aware, there had been a great increase in the home supply, there being no less than 7,000,000 more sheep in the British Islands now than in 1874. Consequently, there was a supply of the best home produce for the wealthier classes who could afford to pay for it. The consumer ought, of course, to be able to buy the cheaper meat if he wished it; but it was not at all clear that he was allowed to do so. A correspondent of The Times wrote as follows:—

"Despairing householders are asking when they are to get the benefits of such consignments as recently arrived from New Zealand. Is there a single consumer who bought a joint of one of the 5,000 frozen sheep so successfully imported who was charged less than 100 per cent. on the transaction, and honestly told what he was buying? No London butcher sells American meat, and no London butcher sold one of the 5,000 frozen sheep brought from New Zealand. This fact the public will learn for themselves if they make the round of the shops and inquire. 'No, ma'am, we don't keep it; only the best English meat.' This is the universal story; but, somehow, people do not believe it."

That morning he had received an interesting letter from a correspondent, who said he had observed with great satisfaction that Notice had been given of this Question, and continued—

"The importance of your question to the middle and poor classes is but little realized by politicians and also by the majority of voters, who are too supine to make any demonstration that would impress the Government with the importance of this question. It is a great hardship to small purchasers that retail dealers can, in the most open manner, sell meat imported from America, Australia, &c. (for which they pay a very small price), as and at the same prices as are asked for prime English and Scotch meat, the beef being dressed in America to resemble Scotch meat, and who invariably reply, when asked the question, 'Are you sure this is not American meat?' 'No, I would not keep such a thing in my shop;' as well as being very insolent, and often refusing to serve one again. This makes it especially hard, as it often happens that there is not another shop near. My Lord, this is a matter that concerns very much the middle and working classes."

He hoped that this trade would be developed; at the same time, he trusted that fair play would be given to the English producer. On the principle that we prevented the sale of adulterated butter as genuine butter, so we might compel American meat to be sold as such, and thus save to the working classes an average of, perhaps, 2*d.* per lb., while doing an act of justice to the home producer.

LORD SUDELEY: I am sorry that I am unable to follow the noble Lord in his interesting statement with any information on the subject. The Board of Trade have no official knowledge of the recent importation of frozen meat from New Zealand, though their attention has been called to it by the announcement in the newspapers. The Government do not, as at present advised, think it necessary or advisable to introduce a Bill to compel retail dealers to specify the description of meat they are selling, and impose heavy penalties on any persons who sell imported meat as home produce.

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND thanked the noble Lord who had brought this subject forward, and who had received an unsatisfactory answer. English agriculture was in a depressed, not to say an alarming condition; and anything likely to benefit the agricultural classes, and to enable them to meet the competition to which they were exposed, ought to be worth the serious attention of Her Majesty's Government.

NAVY—H.M.S. "INCONSTANT."

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he will lay on the Table the official report relative to the late fire on board H.M.S. "Inconstant," [at the Cape of Good Hope?

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK, in reply, said, that no serious damage had been done to the Inconstant by the fire. He was glad to have the opportunity of stating that the conduct of the ship's company on the occasion was excellent. A Court of Inquiry as to the causes of the fire was held, under the presidency of the Admiral in command of the Fleet on the station, and the Report of it had been received. The Court was unable to come to any conclusion as to the cause of the fire. It was contrary to the invariable custom of the Admiralty to make public the Reports of Courts of Inquiry; but he would be most happy to let the noble Viscount see the Papers, if he desired to do so.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT — WILLES-DEN DISTRICT SCHOOL BOARD.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON rose to call attention to the Letter from the Education Department of the 23rd May 1882 ordering the establishment of a board school for the Willesden district. The noble Earl cited the provisions of the Act of 1870 as to the formation of school boards under ordinary and under extraordinary circumstances. In the former case there was to be notice, and, if objection were taken, public inquiry. In the latter case, if the discontinuance of a school or schools led to a deficiency of accommodation, the formation of a school board might be ordered. Willesden was just outside the area of the London School Board, and it had a large and increasing artizan population. By the co-operation of all classes, provision had been made voluntarily for elementary education. But the closing of a Wesleyan school for 136 children was followed by the receipt of a letter ordering the establishment of a school board to meet an alleged rapidly-increasing deficiency of school accommodation. It was denied that, having regard to the whole district, there was any such deficiency. There was in the district a total population of 27,360. The estimated accommodation required for the children was, in the opinion of Mr. Willis, the Inspector, 3,964 places. The present accommodation was 4,577 places. If to this number 432 were added in respect of new buildings, the total number of places would be 5,009, showing a clear surplus of 1,045 places. Possibly the answer of the Department might be that there was a deficiency in the parish of Willesden as respects school accommodation, and that condition might have been arrived at by omitting from the list of schools St. Augustin's and St. Luke's, because they were not strictly within the boundaries of the parish. One of these large schools was, however, on the boundary, while the other was only a few yards outside the limit. Moreover, they were erected for the express purpose of providing for the educational wants of Willesden—a fact which was recognized by the Education Department when they were originally built. The course taken by the Education Department was open to several grave objections. First, it was an offence against the general spirit and intention of the Education Act. That intention was clearly expressed by Mr. Forster in 1870, when that right hon. Gentleman said that the object aimed at was only to supplement existing voluntary efforts. In a populous district like Willesden, where there was a nice balance of supply and demand, the sudden closing of an existing school was a very dangerous act. The Department was only to proceed in a summary manner where application was made with respect to a school district, or where it was satisfied that the managers of an existing voluntary school were unable to carry it on. Neither of those conditions had existed in the case of Willesden. The feeling of the district was entirely against the change which had been made. Even if it were otherwise, the Department was not justified in the course taken. An inquiry ought previously to have been held. It was the more right that such an inquiry should have been held, because voluntary efforts in that parish had triumphed over great local difficulties. He understood that the step once taken could not be reversed; but a great hardship had been inflicted, he quite believed, unintentionally, and he thought that some means should be brought into existence whereby such a hardship should be remedied.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRIVY SEAL), in reply, said, he had no reason to complain of the noble Earl for bringing forward that question. The Department, however, had only followed the usual course. He wished to make no greater excuse for himself in the matter than if he were actually President of the Council, and, indeed, he was as responsible as if he had recently been appointed Lord President. He quite understood the way in which the facts had presented themselves to the noble Earl's mind. But the noble Earl had not been quite accurate in his reference to the Education Act. If he had read the second sub-section of Section 12 of that Act, he would have seen that the power given to the Education Department was intended to meet precisely the case which had happened at Willesden. When the Department was satisfied that an existing school had been discontinued, or that the school accommodation was insufficient, it was empowered, after an inquiry, public or private, to direct the erection of a school board. That was precisely the case at Willesden. A considerable boys' school was closed, and, there being no prospect of the deficiency being supplied, the Department ordered the erection of an additional school. The noble Earl said that the school accommodation in Willesden was not only sufficient, but more than sufficient. But this parish had so increasing a population that it was scarcely possible for an Inspector of Schools at any time to say whether the school accommodation was sufficient or not. The accommodation that was sufficient to-day was not sufficient to-morrow. But, irrespective of that, the opinion of the School Inspector was that in Harlesden, which was a portion of the parish of Willesden, a boys' school was urgently needed at this moment. Nothing was being done, and, as far as the Education Department knew, nothing was in contemplation, which would supply the place of the school that was stopped at Harlesden. The fact was that so long ago as January last the committee that managed the Harlesden Boys' School adopted a resolution to the effect that they were compelled to close the school in consequence of the gradual withdrawal of support from the school by the public, who preferred a board school. Ten days elapsed from the time when notice was given before the order was made by the Education Department. He believed that between the 9th and the 19th of May no communication of any kind was made to the Department. The action of the Department, to say the least of it, was thoroughly legal under the terms of the Act. But the Department did not confine their attention simply to the closing of this school; they took into view the whole condition and prospects of the parish of Willesden. He entirely agreed with the noble Earl that this power of the Department ought to be exercised with great caution; but he could not but think that under the circumstances he had described the establishment of a board school was necessary. He could assure the noble Earl that the order for the establishment of a board school was made in the interests of education in the parish of Willesden.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK objected strongly to the course which had been taken in this matter. Because one school holding 120 children was shut up in one part of the parish of Willesden, though its closure could affect only, at most, a limited part of the population, and there were other schools affording ample accommodation within no unreasonable distance, notice was at once peremptorily given by the Committee of Council that a board school must be established. The Committee of Council, he contended, had not originally fixed a definite period, and had not allowed sufficient time to elapse before issuing their final notice, and had acted in contravention of the Statute regulating such questions as that now before their Lordships. The Committee of Council had applied the Statute in a harsh and unjustifiable manner. The irrevocable step which had been taken was unjust to those who had made voluntary efforts in the parish, and the answer of the noble Lord opposite was most unsatisfactory.

ENTAILS (SCOTLAND).

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, I beg to move for a Return of

"I. Entails executed in Scotland prior to 1st August 1848;

- (a.) The number cut off since that date;
(b.) The number now in existence:

"II. Entails executed in Scotland on and subsequent to 1st August 1848;

- (a.) The number registered;
(b.) The number which have since been cut off;
(c.) The number now in existence."

I believe the Returns, if they are granted, will give very useful and instructive information in regard to existing Acts of Entail. There was an Act passed in 1847, called Lord Rutherford's Act; but I have never seen any Returns of the operation of that Act. Those who framed that Act expected that by it entails granted in future would be easier to cut off than heretofore. I should very much like to know what has resulted. I do not myself know how many entails there are at present in Scotland—whether there are 1,000 or 1,000,000—and I think it would be very instructive and very useful, especially in reference to the Bill which is now before your Lordships' House, if these Returns should be granted.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: I quite agree with my noble Friend that these Returns would be very useful and instructive if they could be obtained. All I can say is, that we will do our best to obtain them for him.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Seeing that the noble Earl's Bill—the Entail (Scotland) Bill—comes on on Thursday for second reading, I suppose we shall have these Returns long after the measure has gone to "another place."

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I hope, at all events, we shall get the Returns early, and before we get into Committee. I do not think there need be much delay; because I should think it would be only a question of copying of certain Returns in the Register House at Edinburgh.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: I am glad the noble Marquess takes an interest in the Bill, and that he expects it to pass so speedily through this House and go to "another place."

Motion agreed to.

Return of—

- I. Entails executed in Scotland prior to 1st August 1848;
(a.) The number cut off since that date;
(b.) The number now in existence:
II. Entails executed in Scotland on and subsequent to 1st August 1848;

The Earl of Camperdown

- (a.) The number registered;
(b.) The number which have since been cut off;
(c.) The number now in existence.—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

Ordered to be laid before the House.

ELECTION OF REPRESENTATIVE PEERS (IRELAND) BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Law relating to the Election of Lords Temporal to serve in Parliament for Ireland—Was presented by The Earl of BELMORE; read 1^a. (No. 137.)

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (IRELAND) BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Intermediate Education (Ireland) Act, 1878—Was presented by The Lord O'HAGAN; read 1^a. (No. 138.)

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 13th June, 1882.

The House met at Two of the clock.

MINUTES.] — PRIVATE BILLS (by Order) — Third Reading — Gateshead and District Tramways*; Lydd Railway (Extensions); Milford Docks; Plymouth and Dartmoor Railway*, and passed.

PUBLIC BILLS—Committee—Prevention of Crime (Ireland) [157]—R.P. [Tenth Night]; Corn Returns (No. 2)* [193]—R.P.

Committee—Report—Third Reading—Customs and Inland Revenue Buildings (Ireland)* [156], and passed.

Considered as amended—Third Reading—Public Schools (Scotland) Teachers* [163], and passed.

Third Reading—Local Government (Gas) Provisional Order* [144]; Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 7)* [167]; Local Government Provisional Order (No. 8)* [168]; Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 9)* [174]; Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders* [142]; Tramways Provisional Orders (No. 3)* [151], and passed.

QUESTIONS.

LICENSING ACTS (SCOTLAND) — THE JOINT LICENSING COMMITTEE, PETERHEAD.

DR. CAMERON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that three applications for confirmation of new certificates for grocers' and publicans' licences, set down for consideration at a meeting of the Joint Licensing Committee of Peterhead on May 15th, not being granted in consequence of there being no quorum of the Joint Committee, the magistrates present granted an illegal certificate authorising the applicants to sell liquor at their own risk, and on that certificate the Excise authorities have provisionally accepted the Licence Duty, and permitted the persons to sell liquor as if licensed according to Law; and, whether, when provisionally accepting the Duty, the Excise officials granted licences on unconfirmed "new certificates," in contravention of the provisions of the Publicans' Certificates (Scotland) Act; and, if not, under what authority the Excise officials have in these cases connived at the selling of exisiable liquors by unlicensed persons?

MR. COURTNEY: I am informed that the Confirmation Court at Peterhead, which did not consist of the full quorum, confirmed, so far as they had the power, the certificates in the three cases referred to, which certificates had been unanimously granted by the Licensing Court. This, however, was subject to the applicants accepting the risk of an objection, on the ground of the incompleteness of the Court. The Excise have not granted licences in any of the cases; but, in accordance with their usual practice, and not in contravention of any Act of Parliament, they informed the applicants that if they thought proper to deposit the Licence Duty and to sell on their own responsibility, pending the full confirmation, they would not be interfered with so far as the Revenue was concerned.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—SPELLING REFORM—THE PHONIC SYSTEM.

MR. HEALY asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether his attention has been called to a letter of the clerk to the Leeds School Board, of the 14th June 1881, addressed to the Spelling Reform Association, as follows:—

"The Inspector of the Board has repeatedly examined those schools in which the Phonic method is carried out, and Her Majesty's Inspector of Schools has on several occasions expressed his approval of the method and his satisfaction at the results. The method was lately adopted by an infants' school teacher with marked success, showing that the method is easy of acquirement and fruitful in its results;"

And, whether the Education Department can do anything to facilitate the teaching of children to read under the method therein recommended?

MR. MUNDELLA: I have seen the letter to which the hon. Member refers. Mr. Legard, Her Majesty's Inspector, expresses his satisfaction with the results of the Phonic method of teaching reading in certain infant schools at Leeds. He states that no change is introduced in the mode of spelling; but that the different vowel sounds are distinguished by a variety of marks, which greatly facilitate the teaching of reading to young children. Although the Department is willing that new educational experiments shall have a fair trial, we do not feel justified in prescribing the Phonic or any other method. We shall not, however, discourage it; and we believe that if the system is sound it will make its way, as there is no lack of enterprise on the part of school boards, managers, and teachers, all of whom are interested in arriving at the highest results by the best methods.

VACCINATION—THE OFFICIAL METHOD.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the verdict of a coroner's jury at Holloway, of "shock to the system following vaccination," the medical evidence being that the child in question might have survived two incisions, but was unable to withstand the shock caused by four; and, whether the British Medical Journal is correct in asserting that—

"It is imperative for public vaccinators to make four scarifications, in accordance with the directions of the Local Government Board?"

MR. DODSON: My attention has been called to the verdict in this case, but as yet I have only been able to obtain a brief report in a newspaper of the evidence, and I have directed a further inquiry into the circumstances of the case. It is true that the instructions issued several years ago by the Privy Council direct the public vaccinators to make such punctures as would produce four vesicles; but, according to the experience of the Department, no harm has resulted from this practice, which is

MR. MACARTNEY: I wish to ask if Arabi Pasha remains at Cairo while the whole of the Egyptian Army has gone to Alexandria, is not the position of the Europeans who remain at Cairo very dangerous?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: That, of course, is a matter of opinion; but I have no doubt that if the whole of the European Consuls follow the Khedive to Alexandria a large portion of the European inhabitants of Cairo will do the same.

MR. G. W. ELLIOT: Can the hon. Baronet now answer my Question—namely, whether, in the event of Arabi Pasha being reinstated in the Councils of the Khedive, the Ultimatum or Note, or whatever it might be called, of Her Majesty's Government and France having thus been absolutely disregarded, Her Majesty's Government propose to take any steps to enforce such Note or Ultimatum; and, if not, whether any orders had or would be given for the Fleet to leave Egyptian waters? If the hon. Baronet cannot answer now, I will give Notice for to-morrow.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I shall not be any better able to answer to-morrow than now. All I can tell the hon. Member is that the present condition of anarchy in Egypt will not be allowed to continue. I cannot go into any details of the measures which will be adopted.

MR. BOURKE: May I be permitted to ask whether Her Majesty's Government are taking any measures by applying to shipowners for the protection and safety of British subjects at Alexandria, because it is obvious that if there is a large number of persons anxious to go on board ship, the transports or men-of-war would not be sufficient.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: In answer to the right hon. Gentleman, I believe that Admiral Sir Beauchamp Seymour has made arrangements for sending people wishing to leave the shore on board the Tinjore, the Peninsular and Oriental boat at Alexandria, at the present time the accommodation on board the iron-clads not being very good?

EMIGRATION—THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA—PASSENGER ACTS—LEGISLATION.

MR. MOORE asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is a fact that the United States Government are at present engaged in revising their Passenger Acts; and, whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table a Copy of the proposed Bill, together with any Reports made by the Board of Trade thereon?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, that there were at present two Bills dealing with this subject before the House of Representatives in the United States, and if they were passed he would consider whether it was desirable to make a Report on the subject.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. J. HOULIHAN.

MR. DILLON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. John Houlihan, of Roscrea, was arrested on 4th November 1881, on a charge of inciting to Boycott; whether he is still detained in Kilkenny Gaol; whether, if convicted on said charge, his imprisonment would have been much shorter; and, whether he will be now released?

MR. TREVELYAN: Mr. John Houlihan was not arrested as a punishment for the crime which he was reasonably suspected of having committed, but because his being at large in the district was not considered consistent with its peace. That is the essence of the Protection Act as compared with the Prevention of Crime Bill. The Lord Lieutenant has recently considered his case, and decided that he cannot at present be released with safety.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PATRICK AND JOHN CURLEY.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Lord Lieutenant has reconsidered the case of Patrick Curley and his son John Curley, at present detained in Kilmainham Prison; and, whether he can now order their release?

MR. TREVELYAN: His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant has recently considered the cases of Patrick and John Curley, and decided that he cannot at present order their release.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. M. P. KENNY.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Iretals; but our own information is that about 50 people were killed.

MR. J. LOWTHER: The hon. Baronet spoke of Dervish Pasha as having increased the garrison of Alexandria. Do I understand that Dervish Pasha has assumed the responsibility of restoring order in Egypt?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: As I stated yesterday, the position is extremely anomalous. Orders are given both by Dervish Pasha and the Khedive; and they apparently are given through Arabi Pasha and the other Ministers; but Dervish Pasha states that the increase in the garrison of Alexandria has been by his orders.

MR. G. W. ELLIOT asked whether, in the event of Arabi Pasha being reinstated in the Councils of the Khedive, the Ultimatum or Note, or whatever it might be called, of Her Majesty's Government and France having thus been absolutely disregarded, Her Majesty's Government propose to take any steps to enforce such Note or Ultimatum; and, if not, whether any orders had or would be given for the Fleet to leave Egyptian waters?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I cannot answer the Question for two reasons. In the first place, it is not a Question growing out of the answer I have already given; and, in the second place, it is a Question of which Notice ought to be given. Notice ought to be given of all Questions not arising out of the immediate situation.

MR. RAIKES: Perhaps the hon. Baronet can say whether the Government are in the possession of any information as to whether the Khedive has left Cairo?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I was about to make a statement on that subject in answer to a Question on the Paper of my hon. Friend the Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood).

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to give Notice that I will repeat my Question to-morrow.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the hon. Baronet whether five of the iron-clads now in Egyptian waters drew too much water to enter the harbour of Alexandria?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: This Question does not at all arise out of the others; but in order to prevent it being put a second time I shall answer it now.

The Question, I suppose, refers to the four iron-clads (not five) that have last appeared off the coast. One of them draws too much water to enter the port. One can enter, and the other two can enter into a portion of the harbour, but not the whole.

MR. NORWOOD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether steps have been taken to secure prompt communication between Her Majesty's Representatives at Cairo and the commanders of Her Majesty's vessels at Suez and Port Said, in order that British merchant ships may be stopped from entering the Canal in the event of the disorders in Egypt assuming a more threatening aspect?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: In reply to my hon. Friend, I can inform him that there is at each end of the Canal one of Her Majesty's ships, whose commanders would at once know if anything were wrong, and warn vessels accordingly. Measures have been taken to restore at once telegraphic communication in the event of its being interrupted, and the Admiral is fully supplied with despatch vessels, should they be required. As the Question refers to communications between Port Said and Suez, I may take this opportunity of stating that the Khedive and Dervish Pasha have left Cairo together for Alexandria; but Sir Edward Malet and the other Consuls have not accompanied them, but remain at Cairo. The news arrived about two hours ago, and I do not know whether they had left late last night or early this morning; but Sir Edward Malet and the other Consuls seem to have remained at Cairo. We have informed Sir Edward Malet that we think his proper place is with the Khedive. I have no doubt, therefore, that he will have left for Alexandria.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN: I wish to ask, has the hon. Baronet received any information as to the formation of a new Ministry of which Arabi Pasha is the head?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No, Sir; we have no such information.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Can the hon. Baronet state where Arabi Pasha is—whether he is still at Cairo?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The telegram does not give us any information on the subject. I presume he remains in Cairo; but I do not know.

many times denied that any Treaty, compact, understanding, or whatever he may like to call it, exists, or ever has existed, between Her Majesty's Government and the hon. Member for the City of Cork. The hon. and gallant Baronet is quite welcome to retain his own private opinion on the matter; but it is not courteous, becoming, or Parliamentary on his part to put Questions to me in regard to the "Kilmainham Treaty." With regard to the subject itself, the ground taken by Her Majesty's Government has always been this—that the Act of Parliament committed exclusively to Her Majesty's Government the business of imprisoning and of releasing under the Protection of Person and Property Act, and that it was no part of our duty or business at all to produce to the House of Commons the evidence upon which we proceeded either in imprisoning or in releasing. Now, it is out of no want of courtesy to the hon. and gallant Baronet that I am obliged to adhere to that ground, because I feel that that was the sense and spirit of the Act of Parliament, which I am not at liberty to disregard. Any attempt on our part to have produced the evidence upon which we proceeded would have been, in my opinion—and in the opinion, I think, of my Colleagues—an attempt to carry over to Parliament a responsibility which was entirely and exclusively our own. For that reason, I am not disposed to enter at all upon the discussion of the subject which the hon. and gallant Baronet has opened; and if he desires the production of a document, which, I think, it is no part of our duty to produce, it is not for me in the least to say to whom he should address his application.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT: The right hon. Gentleman, I am sure, will feel that it was from no want of courtesy that I addressed the Question to him. I heard the rumour. I thought it an important Question, and I put it direct. The right hon. Gentleman has not denied that there was such a correspondence; but he referred me to somebody else, and I should like to know to whom I should apply to have the letter produced?

MR. SEXTON inquired how many persons were now in custody, how many were classified by the Government as associated with crime, and what was the cause of the delay in the release of those not so classified?

[No answer was given to these Questions.]

MR. G. W. ELLIOT said, the question of the "Kilmainham Treaty" had become so important that he begged to give Notice that he would ask the hon. Member for Clare (Mr. O'Shea) if on the occasion of his visit to Kilmainham he was not accompanied by another Gentleman?

ORDER OF THE DAY.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 167.]

(Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 12th June.]

[TENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART II.

OFFENCES AGAINST THIS ACT.

Clause 5 (Riots and other offences).

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, the Amendment he had to propose was to omit Sub-section (b) of this clause. The Sub-section provided that—

"Within six months after the execution of any writ of possession, or decree for possession, of any house or land, every person who takes or held possession of such house, or land, or any part thereof, without the consent of the owner, shall be guilty of an offence against this Act."

This provision would turn what might be a mere act of residence into an offence punishable by six months' imprisonment. Any member of a family, or anyone in attendance upon a family, who took possession of a house, or land, temporarily, for purposes of shelter, from which the tenant had been evicted, would come within the meaning of the clause. He did not imagine that the Government intended to make such an act of trespass a crime punishable by six months' imprisonment; and if they insisted upon the clause it ought to be qualified by being applied to cases of wrongful possession. There certainly should be some notice to a person who might have committed an act of trespass that if he unreasonably withheld possession he would be guilty of a crime. A case might arise of a person, who, quite innocently, took shelter in a part of premises from which a man had been evicted, and it would not be right to bring such a person within the power of the section.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, to leave out Sub-section (b).—(Mr. Charles Russell.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section (b) stand part of the Clause."

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON said, the question really at issue was whether the law of Ireland should be observed, because it was the law, or whether it should be disregarded with impunity, wherever it did not happen to fall in with the views of a part of the community. It had frequently occurred of late that a tenant, on whom a notice of ejectment had been executed, and whose equity of redemption had long expired, had resumed possession of the holding and made use of it in defiance of the law; and the proposal now was that such an offender, instead of being charged at Quarter Sessions for taking and holding forcible possession, should be summarily tried for what might be called a trespass in contempt of the law. The necessity for this depended upon whether the offence had been a common one, and whether the law, as it now existed, was found adequate to deal with it. He found, from the Returns submitted to the House, that up to the year 1880 the taking and holding forcible possession of property was almost an unknown thing in Ireland; but in 1880 and 1881 no less than 147 cases had occurred, and of these 113 had gone entirely unpunished. He believed, further, that in a considerable proportion of the 34 convictions, the tenants forcibly holding possession had incurred no penalty beyond having been required to come up for judgment when called upon, because the Crown Solicitor, knowing that there was very little chance of obtaining a verdict if the case went to a jury, was prepared to accept a compromise. If the case had gone to a jury, it was almost certain that a jury would have acquitted, in face of the evidence, or have disagreed. There was also a great difficulty in obtaining evidence that the taking possession had been accompanied by actual violence. It was obvious that unless a man was seen to take forcible possession, it was difficult to prove that he had broken down a door or a fence, although the door might have been securely made up before, and although there was no dispute that he had been acting in defiance of the law, which had given possession to someone else. The offence was the outcome of the lawlessness which at present existed in Ireland. He might instance what had happened in the Province of Ulster, as showing the danger of allowing it to be committed with impunity. In 1880 there was only one offence in Ulster of this kind; in 1881 there were 12 cases out of a total of 65 in the whole of Ireland; and in the five months of the present year there had been eight cases out of 19, notwithstanding that within a quarter of a century previous to 1880 there had been only 30 cases of holding forcible possession in the whole of the country. In point of fact, it came to this—that the law at present was not sufficient to deal with these cases; and the Government, who were well qualified to judge, were of opinion that this alteration was necessary, in order to give efficacy to the Act. It should be remembered that although the punishment of the offence was a sharp one, nobody would incur it who did not wilfully expose himself to it. He, therefore, hoped that the Government would not accept the Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, the reason why the Government could not accept this Amendment was this—The object of the clause was to strengthen the law. It was found that the ordinary law was defective, and was brought into contempt. What was it that occurred? He was able to speak from personal knowledge, and what occurred was this. A decree was obtained in the Civil Court for ejectment for the non-payment of rent, and it was executed. Possession was given up to the landlord, and, apparently, everything was perfectly regular. The place was fastened up and made secure, or some caretaker was put in. The caretaker who had been put in happened to go away for a time, and the next day all the family who had been displaced went back again to the holding; and there was no power of dealing with them, because the Civil Court which had issued the execution could not deal with the case as one of contempt of Court. In regard to the Superior Courts, a writ taken out there was executed in the same way, and possession was given up. The result of that was that the power of the writ was fully expended and the execution was exhausted; and the Superior Court had no means in the world of dealing with the person who had broken the law, unless an expensive process was resorted to of appealing again to the Court for the punishment of the person who had treated the order with contempt. These were obvious reasons why there should be a change in the law. He hoped that hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway would see that this was a matter which ought to be dealt with; and the Government proposed to deal with it by making it an offence punishable summarily. The maximum punishment was six months' imprisonment; but it was a maximum punishment, and need not necessarily be imposed in all cases.

MR. HEALY: It is to be accompanied by hard labour.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON) said, the hard labour was only optional, nor was it likely that the Court would inflict it in a case in which it was not well deserved. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (MR. C. RUSSELL) had put the case of a person who was acting innocently—that was, a man who took possession without knowing that he was committing any offence at all. That was the case which appeared to have been contemplated by an Amendment which had been placed upon the Paper by the hon. and learned Member for Hereford (MR. REID), who proposed to insert the word “knowingly.” He saw no objection to the insertion of this Amendment; but he certainly thought that the person who did that knowingly committed an offence.

MR. SEXTON said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman must imagine that the people of Ireland were extremely innocent in regard to the manner in which the law was administered in that country. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that the penalty of hard labour was an optional penalty; but they did not forget the fact that it was left to the discretion of two stipendiary magistrates who were landlords, and probably with a dash of militaryism added. It was absurd, therefore, to say that the penalty of hard labour would be optional, because anybody who knew anything of the tribunal would know that the stipendiary magistrates would inflict the heaviest penalties the law allowed them to inflict. It was very difficult to understand the clause as to the effect of taking and holding forcible possession. The clause, as proposed by the Government, was a very elastic and dangerous one. They spoke of taking and holding possession as an alternative, without any element of an offence in it at all. Now, he found that the offence as specified in the Act of Parliament was provided for in a different way—it was by taking and holding forcible possession.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON) said, there were two alternative offences known to the law—namely, taking and holding possession, and another taking and holding forcible possession.

MR. SEXTON regretted that the Government had not considered it desirable to tabulate any of these offences, except the graver one of taking and holding forcible possession. They were now inventing, for the purposes of this Coercion Act, a new offence, a kind of double-barrelled offence, of taking and holding without force. His own opinion was that they were adding to the existing offence something that was not called for by the necessities of the case. There was not shown a necessity for this provision. The offence had decreased under the ordinary law. In the year 1880, the number of cases of taking and holding forcible possession in the whole year was under 82, and the number of convictions in respect of these offences was 12—that was to say, that in the year 1880, out of 82 cases there was only one case out of seven in which a jury convicted. Last year did that class of offence increase? It certainly did not, because the number fell from 82 to 65, and the convictions were 22. He commended to the attention of the Committee this extraordinary fact—that offences of this class fell from 82 in the year before last to 65 in last year, whereas the convictions in 1880 were one out of seven, the convictions last year were one out of three. Would any Member of the Government get up and show cause why the clause should be retained in the Bill in the face of the fact that the offence had diminished, and that the efficiency of the jury in relation to the offence had been trebled? He was amazed that it should be considered necessary to deal with such an offence under such circumstances. The cases themselves were very peculiar. A poor person, driven out of his home, in despair of finding shelter, went back for a week or two until he could make other arrangements. He remembered a case of a poor woman who was met upon the high road and asked why she was crying. She said—"I am not crying, but my eyes are sore." Now, that poor woman used at night to put her children into the house from which she had been dispossessed, and to wait outside, watch for the night patrol, and when she heard it approach, she took the children out of the house and concealed them behind a hedge until the police disappeared. It was for an offence of this kind that the Government proposed to give the military magistrates the right of imprisoning a man for six months with hard labour. He defied the Government to show a shadow of justification for the course they proposed to take. Whereas in the month of April these offences were 13 in number, they had fallen, according to the Returns, in the month of May to six. They had, therefore, the fact that there was a lessening of the number of offences, and an increase in the efficiency of the military tribunal; and yet the Attorney General for Ireland, in the face of these facts, stood up and told the Committee that the ordinary law was insufficient to deal with them. He defied the Attorney General for Ireland or the Government to prove it. The ordinary law was increasing in efficiency, and he claimed for the jury system in Ireland that the ordinary law had been fully adequate to meet the necessities of the case. He, therefore, invited the Government to explain why they had invented a new phraseology in the matter, and why this sub-section was to include matters which had never been known to the law as offences before.

MR. RYLANDS said, the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Ebrington) had asserted that this legislation was the outcome of the offences which had arisen in Ireland in consequence of the disturbed state of that country. It appeared to him (Mr. Rylands) that it was the outcome of the fact that evictions took place in large numbers in Ireland. He was quite ready to concede to the Government everything they considered necessary for the maintenance of law and order in Ireland; but he could not shut his eyes to the fact that they had, from time to time, Returns from Ireland proving that whilst the House was on the threshold of beneficent legislation for that country, the landlords were putting into force extreme rights; and, whatever might be said about this Bill, it would certainly tend to strengthen their power of using their legal authority. What were evictions? It might be said that some of them were just evictions. It was impossible for him to say what the individual circumstances of the cases were; but this he did know, that for many years past excessive rack rents had been exacted in Ireland, and that the arrears they were about to deal with arose out of these rack rents. Eviction was the only mode by which the landlords were able to get rid of the tenants who had fallen into arrear; but the arrears had themselves accrued in consequence of the landlords themselves charging 25 per cent, and in some cases 40 or 50 per cent, more of rent than they were entitled to charge. Parliament was asked to strengthen the power of the landlords; and he agreed with hon. Members opposite that many hundreds of people were constantly being unjustly evicted, including men, women, and children, and very often children at the breast, or children of very tender years. He believed, from all the evidence he had been able to obtain, that out of every 100 persons who were driven out of their homesteads into the roadside and, perhaps, into the workhouse, there were probably 25 per cent who were in reality placed under the sentence of death. What he contended for was that something should be done to put a stop to this evil. He had the greatest confidence that the Government were sincerely anxious to do justice to the Irish people, and he believed the measures they had in contemplation would, if they were passed, do a great deal to relieve the country from the pressure which had its natural outcome in crime and in disturbance. But what would happen before these beneficent arrangements could be passed? They could tell what would happen from what was happening. They knew that thousands of people every month were being driven out of their homesteads by the landlords. They knew, further, that the landlords were endeavouring under the Act of last year to break the present tenancies in order that the future tenants should not have any rights under the Act of 1881. Of course, he did not justify the use of any violence in opposition to the law; but he contended that the Government ought to have some regard to the justice and equity of the case; and what he should like to see the Government do, if it were at all possible for them to do it, was this—that if in the measure they were bringing forward they strengthened the power of the landlords, there should be a truce, and that the Bill should include a provision to stop these unjust evictions until the House of Commons and the Government might have the means, by future legislation, of dealing with them. With regard to this sub-section, he was very much influenced by the opinion of his hon and learned Friend near him (Mr. C. Russell), on whose calm judgment he placed the greatest reliance. He had avoided voting in favour of many of the Amendments proposed to the Bill; but he should be glad, indeed, if, in connection with this Bill, there could be a message of peace to Ireland that the people there would appreciate. [A laugh.] It was no laughing matter. He should like to see a measure that would provide for a short period—perhaps for 12 months—to put a stop to these evictions, which were so greatly complained of by the Irish people, so that Parliament might have an opportunity, in that time of truce between the two parties to the present land war, of passing a substantial measure for Ireland. He believed that such a course would do much to prevent crime in Ireland, and would give them more hope for the future than they could expect from exceptional legislation.

MR. GIBSON said, the hon. Member who had just sat down intimated in the course of his speech that he desired this Bill to pass, and he (Mr. Gibson) understood him to suggest to the Committee that he desired it to pass speedily. All he (Mr. Gibson) could say, if that was the hon. Member's desire, and those were his wishes, that the speech he had just delivered was not calculated to advance them, and the suggestion he had made for the introduction of new clauses would lead to endless debate, and was certainly a suggestion which must have been made at a time when the hon. Member had not the wishes he professed very distinctly present to his mind. He regretted that the hon. Member should at this time, when appalling crimes were reported daily from Ireland, have used such an euphonism as "land war." The word "war," at the time when assassinations were being perpetrated, was not the word to employ; and he regretted that the hon. Member should have raked up these topics, which had been disposed of over and over again, and which, as often as they were stated, he should feel it his duty at once to object to, and that was that the crimes which were at present disgracing Ireland were directly traceable to the consequences of eviction. That was the statement which had no foundation whatever; and anyone acquainted with the true facts, and who desired to present the facts in their true significance to Parliament, knew perfectly well that the figures of crime and the figures of eviction demonstrated that crime was not in the slightest degree proportionate to evictions. ["Hear, hear!" from the Irish Members.] Yes; the crimes were found to be very numerous where evictions were very few, and, on the other hand, where evictions were very great crimes were found to be very scanty. It was worthy of note that people who disputed these facts, worked up their figures by dragging in counties like some of the counties in the North of Ireland, where there were sometimes a considerable number of evictions, and put them in an average with other counties in different parts of Ireland where there were more crimes and fewer evictions. That was a matter which had been disposed of several times, and by nobody more powerfully than by the Prime Minister in January last, when he dealt with the subject in short and vigorous sentences, which he (Mr. Gibson) would commend to the attention of anyone who had any doubt on the subject. The speech of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) dealt very ingeniously with the question —with that ingenuity which the hon. Member exhibited in every debate. The drift of his argument was, that inasmuch as they could count the offences by 80's, and 60's, and 70's in one year, and that there had been 12 convictions one year and 22 in another, the proportions of convictions showed no decrease.

MR. SEXTON: I mentioned those facts simply to show the efficiency of the ordinary tribunals.

MR. GIBSON said, that efficiency was to be measured by the circumstances under which the convictions were recorded. He was speaking in the presence of the Law Officers of the Crown; but he believed that anyone who had read the records would know that many of these convictions were in reality pleas of "guilty" entered into by a kind of arrangement by which the persons charged were released on entering into their recognizances to come up for judgment when called upon. That arrangement was consented to because there was a feeling that, if the case went to a jury, there would be either a disagreement or an acquittal. The circumstance did not prove that any great confidence was to be placed in the existing machinery for administering the Criminal Law. It might in some cases work very well, and he thought it was right and proper wherever a prosecutor could accept a plea of "guilty" that he should do so, and trust that the offender would become a good citizen in the future; but there were cases upon which they could not rely upon the present mode of administering justice being at all satisfactory. The real way to look at the point was that in which it had been presented in the clear and forcible speech of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Ebrington)—namely, that these offences, whether they numbered 80 or 65, were in reality of recent growth and development. A few years ago no such figures could have been stated. It was only within the last two or three years that anything like that development—that growth of figures had—occurred in regard to that offence of taking forcible possession, or insisting on resuming possession, or retaining possession contrary to the law. Everyone acquainted with Ireland or the Irish Press knew perfectly well that one of the most notable methods of the Land League, and one of its most potent agencies of terrorism, was the forcible replacing in possession of tenants after they had been dispossessed by process of law. Very often after a man had been evicted he was replaced against his will, and kept there and maintained by the strong power of the Land League, and in many cases a man was replaced more than once. It was by that means that this method of defying the law had grown into existence in Ireland, and it was highly desirable that some means should be taken for dealing with it. The power was one which, like all other powers, must be administered with prudence, caution, and justice; but, as had been explained by the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Ebrington), if the present law was found sufficient in that deplorable state of things in Ireland, they would not be there at this moment discussing this Bill. It was only because within the last two years there had been developed new methods of crime in Ireland, which had disorganized society, that they were compelled to have recourse to new methods for dealing with them. He hoped the law would be administered tempered with justice, and with due consideration for everything that was entitled to be considered, but with firmness and with a desire to secure whatever was right in the interests of peace and tranquillity. In regard to the tribunal which was to administer the law, he believed that no tribunal could be suggested which would not be criticized with severity. The tribunal selected here was that of two Resident Magistrates. If the Government had selected the ordinary unpaid magistracy of the county, they would have been open to criticism, in order to show that their tribunal was not entitled to the confidence of the people, and was not entitled to credit. It was said that in England the trades union disputes were administered by the English magistrates, who were not different from the ordinary magistracy of Ireland, and that it was administered by them without the intervention of a jury. But, surely, they must look at the question from a reasonable point of view. In England the magistrates were selected from a class fitted by education and training to perform the functions of magistrates. There must always be a difference between the social position, education, and training of the persons tion of title arose, and for a very good reason—namely, that it was incompetent to try an action for ejectment in a Petty Sessions Court, or to make use of a criminal course of procedure in order to effect a civil object. That would be an extremely objectionable course; and, therefore, a saving clause was inserted in the Petty Sessions Act, and in the General Consolidation Act of the 24 & 25 Vict., the 46th section of which contained a saving clause, which he had merely copied in this Proviso. The next part of the Proviso made provision in a case where—

“Irregularity of legal procedure in the eviction or execution arises, or any devolution of the occupancy or tenancy, or ownership interest in the premises, takes place within the said period.”

He thought that was a matter which ought not to be left to the jurisdiction of a Court of Petty Sessions or the stipendiary magistrates. A case of this kind arose only the other day. It was a case of an ordinary tenancy from year to year. On the death of the owner, the occupancy descended to the wife and children; but when the administration of the property was undertaken, it was found that there was no will, and it was doubtful who was the tenant. The landlord served a writ, got execution upon it, and sold up the tenancy in the name of the son. The mother, however, claimed it as her property. The son came to him (Mr. Marum) to know what he was to do; and, ultimately, the case was settled. He merely mentioned it to show that such a case could arise. It really was the case of the property of one person being sold for the debts of another. It was a most inconvenient matter that questions of title of any kind should be adjudicated upon, especially by a stipendiary magistrate. Therefore, his proposal was that questions of title should be removed from the jurisdiction provided by the clause, together with any devolution of the occupancy or tenancy, or ownership interest in the premises. They made it penal for the tenant to take forcible possession within six months of the execution of a writ of possession. But supposing a case of property devolving by the death of the owner upon the next-of-kin, and there were two heirs-at-law, there would be two parties claiming an interest in the property; and how would the tenant know with whose consent he was holding the premises? At the death of the landlord, the consent of the landlord would have ceased; but to which of the two heirs-at-law was he to be subjected? The tenant could not know whose consent he was to obtain. Therefore, when the question of the devolution of ownership arose in a case of this kind, involving a question of title, he thought it was too much to give the power of jurisdiction to a stipendiary magistrate, and enable him to determine who was the owner, so as to say whether the act of the tenant was with the owner's consent or not. The same thing would apply in regard to the tenancy. If a tenant got into possession and died within the six months, a question might arise as to the legal representative of the tenant, and it would be most inconvenient to have that question adjudicated upon in a summary way by a stipendiary magistrate. He therefore proposed that in all cases where complicated questions of title arose, the power of adjudicating at the Court of Petty Sessions should be removed. He thought the consent should be a continuous consent, and that it should determine with the death of either of the parties. He failed to see how a tenant could be dealt with by a criminal process of this kind in a case where a question of title was raised; and it was with a view to obviating that kind of inconvenience that he proposed the insertion of this Proviso. He did not know whether the Government would consent to accept it; but he hoped they would be willing to do something to remove the difficulty; and he would leave the Amendment to the consideration of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland.

Mr. Marum

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 35, before the word “or,” insert the words “Provided, That no question as to title to lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest therein, or accruing therefrom, or as to any irregularity of legal procedure in the eviction or execution arises, or any devolution of the occupancy or tenancy, or ownership interest in the premises, takes place within the said period.”—(Mr. Marum.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, the Government could not possibly accept the Amendment, and for this reason—because no question of title could arise under the clause. The Superior Court would have to determine every question of title; the Court would have given its judgment, and all that the Inferior Court, acting under the Act, had to do was to protect the person placed in possession by the writ or decree of the Superior Court.

MR. MARUM asked, what was to be done if either of the parties died?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, that if either of the parties died, new rights would arise and would be met in the same way. If after the execution of the decree of the Superior Court, possession was forcibly interfered with, the tribunal named by the Act could deal with the offence. If the parties died and new rights arose, they must, of course, be argued in the High Court of Justice, a decree obtained, and possession taken before this sub-section came into operation.

MR. HEALY said, he wished to know how a case similar to that of Mr. H. Blake would be met? Mr. Blake, at Stradbury, took forcible possession of some premises by presenting a revolver at the head of a bailiff; and when he was brought up at the Petty Sessions, he said he was the owner of the property. The question was one of disputed title; but Mr. Blake constituted himself judge in the matter. Now, would such a person as Mr. H. Blake, who might be a magistrate, and constituted a judge of facts, be a fit person to carry out the provisions of this sub-section? It was important to know exactly what the Government intended to do. He thought the case of Mr. H. Blake formed an excellent precedent, and there was much reason to fear that if a bad example were set by the magistrates, it was likely to be copied by the people.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) knew very well that the case of Mr. Blake had nothing to do with the matter. No decree had been made by any Court as to the possession of the property in Mr. Blake's case, and it was a question of disputed title. The object of the remarks of the hon. Member could only be to blacken the character of Mr. Blake; and he strongly objected to the hon. Member making statements, affecting the character of individuals, which were totally devoid of foundation.

What took place in the case of Mr. Blake was this. The testator died, and he (Mr. Blake) believing that this portion of the property belonged to him by right, took possession of it. If a decree had been made by any Court, and then Mr. H. Blake had taken possession of the property in defiance of that decree, he would have been punished.

MR. PARNELL said, he thought the Government ought to give way upon this Amendment. He could not imagine that any mischief would arise from doing so, as it was a matter of notoriety that Courts of Petty Sessions did not entertain questions of title. If, on hearing a case, they discovered any question of title was involved, they dismissed it at once. But, in this case, the Government proposed to constitute a Court which would be able to entertain questions of title. The clause ran in this way—

“Within six months after the execution of any writ of possession or decree for possession of any house or land, if any person takes or holds forcible possession of such house or land, or any part thereof, he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act.”

But, instead of presenting the case to the jury, it was proposed to submit it to a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. The jurisdiction thus conferred would practically constitute the Court the judges of what was the due execution of a writ of possession, and, practically, a very large variety of cases would be taken out of the hands of the Superior Courts. He submitted that in cases of this kind, which involved principles of law of great intricacy, they ought not to interfere too hastily or too rudely with old-established rights, and give the stipendiary magistrates this very extensive jurisdiction. It was very evident that Mr. Blake, to whom reference had been made, and who was a very fair example of the type from whom stipendiary magistrates would be made, for the purpose of enforcing this clause, if chosen, would not be a fit judge of questions of title, or whether a writ of possession had been properly executed or not. According to the admission of the hon. Member for the County of Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), on one occasion Mr. Blake considered that it was a proper method of taking possession of property in regard to which the ownership was disputed by presenting a revolver at the head of the person in charge of it.

in reply to the question of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), that he saw no reason why there should be any limitation of the clause to agricultural holdings; the object was simply to make an offence punishable summarily which was at present punishable by indictment. The Government were willing to strike out the words "without the consent of the holder." Those words were drafted in the clause with the intention of expressing what would probably be more correctly expressed by the word "forcible." The words which the Prime Minister proposed to introduce into the sub-section would make it still an ordinary and well-known offence of forcible entry or forcible retention. In regard to the six months, he differed from the views of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson), and he should not be disposed to alter that part of the clause at all. As the law at present stood, there was no limitation of six months for an application to a Criminal Court for redress where a man took forcible possession of a house or forcibly retained it. But they were now constituting a new tribunal, with a summary mode of proceeding, instead of proceeding by indictment, and he thought it would be better to retain the limitation, which was calculated to meet the exigencies of the case.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he could not see much force in the argument of the right hon. and learned Attorney General for retaining the power of inflicting six months' imprisonment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. O'Connor) had entirely misunderstood the point. It had nothing to do with six months' imprisonment, but simply to the limitation of the period within which the writ of possession should hold good.

MR. HEALY presumed that if a man made restitution and paid the rent, he would not come within the operation of the Act. As the clause now stood, it applied to a man who took or held a house or land without the consent of the owner; but the tenant might put himself right by paying the rent and costs.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, the proposition of the Prime Minister was to substitute the words "forcibly takes or holds possession," instead of the words "without the consent of the holder."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GIBSON said, he did not think his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland realized the importance of the Proviso relating to six months. When the Prime Minister, in his speech, pointed out that he desired merely to deal with the old, familiar, and existing system of taking forcible possession, he understood the right hon. Gentleman to propose to introduce those words without qualification, merely providing that it should be an offence which might be dealt with summarily. The statement of the Prime Minister was perfectly intelligible. He was merely taking up the old offence, which all of them were familiar with, of forcible entry, and that hitherto had been an offence triable at Quarter Sessions before a jury. But if these words were now taken out of the Bill, only a mutilated offence would be retained, and the law might be evaded in the readiest and most obvious way. A man would have nothing to do but to wait for the expiration of six months, and then he might go and take forcible possession with absolute impunity. As the Bill stood, after the expiration of six months, it would be impossible to take a man who committed this offence and get him punished summarily before a magistrate; but the case would have to be dealt with by the more expensive proceeding of a regular trial before a jury, who would be sure to disagree as to a conviction. Now, that was an obviously inconvenient method of dealing with the case. He had put an Amendment on the Paper to substitute 12 months instead of six; but he had no bigoted feeling in favour of this Amendment, and he was willing to give it up, and accept the proposal of the Prime Minister, provided the words "six months" were left out of the clause. But he certainly thought it would be desirable, when the clause was altered in accordance with the suggestion of the Prime Minister, that all reference to any period should be omitted. There was another reason why this Amendment should be pressed. Everybody acquainted with Ireland knew that the tenant evicted for non-payment of rent had a period of six months for redemption. Those six months held good from the date of the execution of the writ; but the landlord during that period could not deal with the possession of the farm, nor look upon it as his own. He could not make a new lease, nor a new letting, nor look about for a new tenant, and the farm, in the meantime, would be deteriorating. The possession by the landlord only amounted to a very uncertain kind of seizure, because at any moment within the six months the tenant could redeem the farm. [Mr. MARUM: Yes, by payment of the rent and costs.] The dispossession could only be for non-payment of rent. He was dealing with a class of cases where there was a power of redemption extended over a period of six months; and it was a very important period, because it was only at the end of the six months that the landlord would be able to look about for a new tenant, and it was that very important period—namely, when a landlord was about to make a new letting—that rendered him so unpopular in Ireland; and yet that was the very period which the clause took, by this limitation, for freeing the tenant from the terror of summary jurisdiction and for insisting upon the farm being left vacant. He was afraid it would only increase the evils against which the Bill was directed. He hoped that fact would be clearly realized; and he trusted that the Government would consider the matter before the Report, with a view to placing it on a fair and satisfactory footing. If they would give him a promise to that effect, he would be perfectly satisfied, and would at once resume his seat. He had no desire to insist upon the particular figure he had selected of 12 months. All he said was that six months would free the tenant who desired to resume possession from the terror of the summary jurisdiction provided by the clause; and, in the present state of Ireland, that was a most desirable thing. He thought it would be better either to take away all reference to periods, or to take some other period more extensive than six months—eight, nine, or ten months, if they liked; but it would be most unwise to free the tenant the very moment a new letting might be made. He begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice, to leave out “six,” and insert “twelve.”

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 32, to leave out the word “six,” and insert the word “twelve.”—(Mr. Gibson.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘six’ stand part of the Clause.”

Mr. LALOR said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had given no adequate reason why the penalty should be increased from six to 12 months’ imprisonment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, the hon. Member was falling into the same error as that which the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O’Connor) fell into a short time ago. The question had nothing to do with the penalty at all. In regard to the Amendment, he would consider the suggestion made by his right hon. and learned Friend between the present time and the Report; but he would assure his right hon. and learned Friend that “six months” had not been put in the clause without serious consideration.

Mr. GIBSON said, he was quite satisfied with the promise of the Attorney General for Ireland, and he would withdraw the Amendment.

Mr. LEAMY said, that since the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland had undertaken to consider this point, he would venture to make another suggestion—namely, that if the tenant who took forcible possession of a house or land within a period of six months after the execution of a writ of possession was to be punished with six months’ imprisonment with hard labour, the landlord should also be punished if he burnt down or otherwise damaged the tenant’s property. Within a period of six months, if the tenant paid the rent and costs, he was entitled to resume possession of the land which had been taken from him, because he had an equity of redemption. The right hon. and learned Gentleman admitted that during those six months the landlord could not deal with the farm as his own; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman must be aware that in frequent instances the landlord and his agents had burnt down the house of the tenant during that period of six months. They were now going to punish, by six months’ imprisonment, the unfortunate tenant who, tempted by want of shelter, poverty, and cold, went back to his own home; while they left the landlord at liberty to burn the house which was the tenant's home, consecrated by the memories, perhaps, of his childhood, and which might become his home again. He hoped the Government would consider the propriety of introducing some provision into the Bill to restrain the landlord and his agents during that period of six months either from burning the house or damaging the property.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, the law at the present moment was, that if during that period of six months the landlord did anything to injure the property, the tenant would be able to recover a good round sum of money in the shape of damages, which would enable him to build a new house.

MR. LEAMY said, the tenant might not have sufficient means to enable him to proceed against the landlord.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, that, at all events, the landlord had no legal right to take such an extraordinary step.

MR. O'KELLY wished to know if the right hon. and learned Attorney General could give an instance where a landlord had been punished for burning the house of an evicted tenant? Such a case had frequently occurred; but he had never heard of the landlord being punished. If he could be punished criminally, why was he not arrested by the police and proceeded against?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that under this Bill, if the tenant did any injury to the property of the landlord, he could be punished criminally; but if the landlord did anything to the property of the tenant, he must be proceeded against civilly. He did not look upon that as equal justice; and he wished to add that if the Government made any further concessions to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), he (Mr. O'Connor) and his Friends would give a most strenuous opposition.

MR. PARNELL said, he was glad that the Government were coming round to the Common Law definition of forcible entry which prevailed in England. He trusted that between the present time and the Report, or on a subsequent clause of the Bill, they would consider the propriety of limiting the punishment to be inflicted by the magistrates to imprisonment without hard labour. It was a well-known fact that the law with regard to forcible entry differed very much in severity in Ireland from what it was in England. In England they had to depend upon the Common Law for the power of punishing the offence of forcible entry; whereas, in Ireland, it was treated under one of the Whiteboy Acts.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, the hon. Member was quite mistaken.

MR. PARNELL understood that the offence was dealt with by one of the Whiteboy Acts passed in the Reign of George III.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) remarked, that the offence came under a Statute of Richard II.

MR. PARNELL said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman was able to go further back upon the law of the question than he was; but he had always understood that it was one of the Whiteboy Acts.

MR. MARUM: It is the 26th of George III.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) dissented.

MR. PARNELL said, that when lawyers differed, he felt himself obliged to retire from the scene. The Attorney General for Ireland maintained that the offence was punishable under an Act of Richard II.; whereas, his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Marum), whose knowledge of law was very extensive, maintained that it was punishable under an Act of George III., which was one of the Whiteboy Acts. Personally, he was willing to leave the matter there. It was not dealt with by the Statute of Edward III., of which they had heard so much recently in regard to the refusal to supply provisions. What he wanted to get at was this. That this offence, when it was committed in England, was punished by imprisonment without hard labour; and he trusted that by the time they came to the clause dealing with punishments under this Act, the Government would be able to announce that they had decided, in reference to the offence of forcible entry, having regard to the fact that the cases would be disposed of under the summary jurisdiction of the magistrates, to dispense, at any rate, with hard labour.

THE CHAIRMAN wished to point out that the only question before the Committee was the withdrawal of the Amendment. The discussion was becoming too general.

MR. BIGGAR remarked, that before the Amendment was withdrawn he wished to submit one or two observations in reference to the conduct of the landlords.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had already pointed out that the only question was the withdrawal of an Amendment to substitute 12 months for six. General remarks of this kind would be more regular afterwards.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MOLLOY said, the next Amendment stood in his name; but it would not be necessary to move it until the exact words of the proposal of the Prime Minister were placed before the Committee. His proposal was to substitute "due execution of the writ" instead of "the execution."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON) said, the word "due" would not be required now. The sub-section would now run—

"Within six months after the execution of any writ of possession or decree for possession of any house or land, forcibly takes or holds possession of such house or land, or any part thereof."

The clause would stop there, omitting the words "without the consent of the owner."

MR. MOLLOY said, those words would cover everything he wished to meet, and, therefore, he would not move his Amendment.

MR. P. MARTIN said, it struck him, that although the Government Amendment covered the word "takes," they ought to have the word "forcibly" also before "holds," or to insert the word "forcible," as in the old Act, before "possession."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON) said, it would not be necessary to repeat the word "forcibly," because he intended to insert the word "forcible" before the word "possession."

MR. P. MARTIN said, the word "forcible," in that case, would cover both "takes and holds."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON) said, the clause would run—"takes or holds forcible possession." He moved an Amendment to that effect.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 34, before the word "possession," insert the word "forcible."—(The Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question, "That the word 'forcible' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he now proposed, at the end of the same line, to omit the words "without the consent of the owner."

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 34, to leave out the words "without the consent of the owner."—(The Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there omitted."

MR. PARNELL asked, what was the absolute necessity for leaving the words out?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON) said, they were mere surplusage now, as the word "forcible" fixed the character of the offence.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. MARUM said, the first Amendment which stood in his name—namely, after "takes," to leave out "or holds," and insert "forcible," had been disposed of by the insertion of the word "forcible" before "possession." His second Amendment, which was to substitute for "without the consent of the owner" "against the consent of the owner," was also disposed of. He had, therefore, to move now—

In line 35, before the word "or" to insert the words "Provided, That no question as to title to lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest therein, or accruing therefrom, or as to any irregularity of legal procedure in the eviction or execution arises, or any devolution of the occupancy or tenancy, or ownership interest in the premises, takes place within the said period."

He had copied the first portion of this Proviso from the Petty Sessions Acts. By those Acts, the jurisdiction of the magistrates was ousted whenever a question of title arose, and for a very good reason—namely, that it was incompetent to try an action for ejectment in a Petty Sessions Court, or to make use of a criminal course of procedure in order to effect a civil object. That would be an extremely objectionable course; and, therefore, a saving clause was inserted in the Petty Sessions Act, and in the General Consolidation Act of the 24 & 25 Vict., the 46th section of which contained a saving clause, which he had merely copied in this Proviso. The next part of the Proviso made provision in a case where—

[Tenth Night.]

“Irregularity of legal procedure in the eviction or execution arises, or any devolution of the occupancy or tenancy, or ownership interest in the premises, takes place within the said period.”

He thought that was a matter which ought not to be left to the jurisdiction of a Court of Petty Sessions or the stipendiary magistrates. A case of this kind arose only the other day. It was a case of an ordinary tenancy from year to year. On the death of the owner, the occupancy descended to the wife and children; but when the administration of the property was undertaken, it was found that there was no will, and it was doubtful who was the tenant. The landlord served a writ, got execution upon it, and sold up the tenancy in the name of the son. The mother, however, claimed it as her property. The son came to him (Mr. Marum) to know what he was to do; and, ultimately, the case was settled. He merely mentioned it to show that such a case could arise. It really was the case of the property of one person being sold for the debts of another. It was a most inconvenient matter that questions of title of any kind should be adjudicated upon, especially by a stipendiary magistrate. Therefore, his proposal was that questions of title should be removed from the jurisdiction provided by the clause, together with any devolution of the occupancy or tenancy, or ownership interest in the premises. They made it penal for the tenant to take forcible possession within six months of the execution of a writ of possession. But supposing a case of property devolving by the death of the owner upon the next-of-kin, and there were two heirs-at-law, there would be two parties claiming an interest in the property; and how would the tenant know with whose consent he was holding the premises? At the death of the landlord, the consent of the landlord would have ceased; but to which of the two heirs-at-law was he to be subjected? The tenant could not know whose consent he was to obtain. Therefore, when the question of the devolution of ownership arose in a case of this kind, involving a question of title, he thought it was too much to give the power of jurisdiction to a stipendiary magistrate, and enable him to determine who was the owner, so as to say whether the act of the tenant was with the owner's consent or not. The same thing would apply in regard to the tenancy. If a tenant got into possession and died within the six months, a question might arise as to the legal representative of the tenant, and it would be most inconvenient to have that question adjudicated upon in a summary way by a stipendiary magistrate. He therefore proposed that in all cases where complicated questions of title arose, the power of adjudicating at the Court of Petty Sessions should be removed. He thought the consent should be a continuous consent, and that it should determine with the death of either of the parties. He failed to see how a tenant could be dealt with by a criminal process of this kind in a case where a question of title was raised; and it was with a view to obviating that kind of inconvenience that he proposed the insertion of this Proviso. He did not know whether the Government would consent to accept it; but he hoped they would be willing to do something to remove the difficulty; and he would leave the Amendment to the consideration of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 35, before the word “or,” insert the words “Provided, That no question as to title to lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest therein, or accruing therefrom, or as to any irregularity of legal procedure in the eviction or execution arises, or any devolution of the occupancy or tenancy, or ownership interest in the premises, takes place within the said period.”—(Mr. Marum.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, the Government could not possibly accept the Amendment, and for this reason—because no question of title could arise under the clause. The Superior Court would have to determine every question of title; the Court would have given its judgment, and all that the Inferior Court, acting under the Act, had to do was to protect the person placed in possession by the writ or decree of the Superior Court.

MR. MARUM asked, what was to be done if either of the parties died?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON) said, that if either of the parties died, new rights would arise and would be met in the same way. If after the execution of the decree of the Superior Court, possession was forcibly interfered with, the tribunal named by the Act could deal with the offence. If the parties died and new rights arose, they must, of course, be argued in the High Court of Justice, a decree obtained, and possession taken before this sub-section came into operation.

MR. HEALY said, he wished to know how a case similar to that of Mr. H. Blake would be met? Mr. Blake, at Stradbury, took forcible possession of some premises by presenting a revolver at the head of a bailiff; and when he was brought up at the Petty Sessions, he said he was the owner of the property. The question was one of disputed title; but Mr. Blake constituted himself judge in the matter. Now, would such a person as Mr. H. Blake, who might be a magistrate, and constituted a judge of facts, be a fit person to carry out the provisions of this sub-section? It was important to know exactly what the Government intended to do. He thought the case of Mr. H. Blake formed an excellent precedent, and there was much reason to fear that if a bad example were set by the magistrates, it was likely to be copied by the people.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) knew very well that the case of Mr. Blake had nothing to do with the matter. No decree had been made by any Court as to the possession of the property in Mr. Blake's case, and it was a question of disputed title. The object of the remarks of the hon. Member could only be to blacken the character of Mr. Blake; and he strongly objected to the hon. Member making statements, affecting the character of individuals, which were totally devoid of foundation.

What took place in the case of Mr. Blake was this. The testator died, and he (Mr. Blake) believing that this portion of the property belonged to him by right, took possession of it. If a decree had been made by any Court, and then Mr. H. Blake had taken possession of the property in defiance of that decree, he would have been punished.

MR. PARNELL said, he thought the Government ought to give way upon this Amendment. He could not imagine that any mischief would arise from doing so, as it was a matter of notoriety that Courts of Petty Sessions did not entertain questions of title. If, on hearing a case, they discovered any question of title was involved, they dismissed it at once. But, in this case, the Government proposed to constitute a Court which would be able to entertain questions of title. The clause ran in this way—

"Within six months after the execution of any writ of possession or decree for possession of any house or land, if any person takes or holds forcible possession of such house or land, or any part thereof, he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act."

But, instead of presenting the case to the jury, it was proposed to submit it to a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. The jurisdiction thus conferred would practically constitute the Court the judges of what was the due execution of a writ of possession, and, practically, a very large variety of cases would be taken out of the hands of the Superior Courts. He submitted that in cases of this kind, which involved principles of law of great intricacy, they ought not to interfere too hastily or too rudely with old-established rights, and give the stipendiary magistrates this very extensive jurisdiction. It was very evident that Mr. Blake, to whom reference had been made, and who was a very fair example of the type from whom stipendiary magistrates would be made, for the purpose of enforcing this clause, if chosen, would not be a fit judge of questions of title, or whether a writ of possession had been properly executed or not. According to the admission of the hon. Member for the County of Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), on one occasion Mr. Blake considered that it was a proper method of taking possession of property in regard to which the ownership was disputed by presenting a revolver at the head of the person in charge of it.

[Tenth Night.]

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: I never said anything of the kind, and I never mentioned anything as to the propriety of Mr. Blake's proceedings.

MR. PARNELL said, the hon. Member had certainly disputed the contention of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) that the method of Mr. Blake, in proceeding with a revolver to take forcible possession of the premises, was contrary to law. He (Mr. Parnell) understood Mr. Blake's defence to be that he found the key in the door and entered without force. But if Mr. Blake considered that this practice of threatening the person in charge with a revolver was the proper way to solve the question in regard to a disputed will, it was, to say the least of it, a very singular mode of proceeding. What guarantee had they that they might not have a stipendiary magistrate appointed of the same calibre? They might have a case like that of Mr. Keating, at Wood's Gift, who took possession of property without any process of law at all, and without any writ of possession. He (Mr. Parnell) thought it was of the utmost importance that Parliament should show the Irish Members that they desired to proceed in accordance with the process of law, and not with unnecessary haste of any kind. By putting this power of deciding a question of title in the hands of the stipendiary magistrates they would deprive the peaceable subjects of Her Majesty in Ireland of all the guarantees they now enjoyed.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), with all his ingenuity, would not succeed in fastening upon him (Mr. Mitchell Henry) a statement which he had not made. He had said nothing about the validity of Mr. Blake's act, and he had expressly stated that he did not excuse Mr. Blake. All he had said was, that that which was introduced as an analogous case was not an analogous case at all. There had been no decree of possession whatever; no steps had been taken by the Superior Court; and in such a case this section would not come into operation at all, seeing that it only applied to a case in which a decree had been made. If the hon. Member for the City of Cork had been attending to his duty a little earlier in the day, he would have heard the Prime Minister state that it was the intention of the Government to associate the local magistrates—whether Mr. Blake or anybody else—with a barrister, in order to carry out the provisions of the Act legally and properly.

MR. PARNELL remarked, that, as regarded his non-attention to his duty, he could only say that he entered the House before the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry); and at the time it was supposed that he was not attending to his duty, he was in the Library hunting up the Acts bearing on the question of forcible possession. If he might be permitted to form an estimate of the candour of the hon. Member for Galway, and of the hon. Member's love of truth—[Cries of "Question!" and "Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: These personal recriminations are certainly out of Order.

MR. PARNELL denied that he had made any personal recrimination against the hon. Member for Galway. He had not been permitted to proceed with his sentence, and he would respectfully claim the permission to do so before the Chairman proceeded to pass judgment upon him.

MR. WARTON: Oh!

MR. SEXTON rose to a point of Order. His hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had been openly attacked, and he wished to know if the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) was entitled, by continual interruption, to interfere with his hon. Friend when he was replying to a personal attack?

THE CHAIRMAN: The discussion has been going backwards and forwards to the case of Mr. Blake, which has no reference to the question before the Committee, and is merely wasting the time of the Committee. It is altogether out of Order.

MR. P. MARTIN said, that he did not intend to enter into the Blake controversy; but he wished to say a few words, in the hope that they might induce the Committee to give a favourable consideration to the Amendment. What was the purport of the Amendment? It was that if there was a bond fide question of title raised before the stipendiary magistrate, his jurisdiction should be ousted. That was really the sum and substance of the Amendment which had been put upon the Paper by his hon.

and learned Colleague in the representation of the County of Kilkenny (Mr. Marum). It might be contended the insertion of these words was unnecessary. In a Bill of this character, however, and having regard to the powers proposed to be vested in these tribunals, it was desirable the question should be freed from doubt, and made clear in the Bill. No doubt, as had been said by the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), a statement had been made by the Prime Minister that the stipendiary magistrate would have legal assistance. That statement was of a very vague character. It was in no way indicated what were to be the qualifications of those legal assessors, or in what manner or on what occasions they were to give their aid to the magistrates. It might be said that they were raising questions which were not often likely to arise; but he thought that questions of this kind might not unfrequently come before the magistrates. Hon. Members knew very well that in taking possession of land questions frequently arose as to the boundaries. Very often a writ went down directing the Sheriff to take possession of certain property, and the tenant claimed a right, under the Statute of Limitations, to certain portions of it, and contended that they were excluded from the operation of the writ. In such a case a bond fide question of title would arise. The tenant might say—"I am your tenant for 16 acres, but you have no right to an additional five acres, and, therefore, I shall continue holding the land." There, at once, a question of title arose. But if they passed this section as it stood, the tenant would, under such circumstances, be subjected to the summary jurisdiction of the stipendiary magistrates. He entertained no unfriendly feeling for the Irish magistrates as a body. Many of them had, he considered, been unreasonably assailed. At the same time he should be most unwilling to see matters left to the arbitrary decision of any magistrate. There was an old but a very true saying—"The discretion of the Judge is the law of tyrants." The local magistrates, who must be prejudiced to a great extent, in consequence of mixing with a particular class of persons in Ireland, would inevitably be biassed in favour of the landlords; and it was, therefore, important that Parliament should safeguard this Act in every possible way. He wanted to know from the Government if it was not their intention that the magistrates should be restrained from adjudicating in any case in which a bond fide question of title arose? If it was, why not accept the Amendment, and place the matter beyond all doubt.

MR. LALOR said, he wished to put this case. Suppose the tenant, who had been put out of possession for two or three months, went and offered the rent to the landlord, that the landlord refused to accept it, and that thereupon the tenant went back, broke down the door, and took possession of the house and land. Would they have that man sent by the magistrate to gaol for six months for taking possession of the farm, after having offered the full rent and costs? He was acquainted with a case in his own neighbourhood in which this actually occurred last October. The tenant had been out of possession for five months, but his period of redemption amounted to six months. Just before the period of redemption expired, the landlord deliberately left the place, and went out of the country, and the tenant, not being able to find him, was not able to pay the rent. When the landlord came back, a week after the time had expired, he claimed the right to keep possession, and the tenant was therefore deprived of his right of six months' redemption. He (Mr. Lalor) thought that, in this and in similar cases, it was most unjust to deprive a tenant of his power of redemption.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, it was a singular thing how a case of that kind could have occurred. It was utterly illegal from beginning to end. Where the tenant was prepared to pay the rent and costs to the landlord, there was an easy way of arriving at a solution of the difficulty. All he had to do was to lodge the money in Court, and if the landlord refused to give up possession the cost of re-instating the tenant in possession would fall upon him.

MR. LALOR said, the tenant might not have more money than was sufficient to pay the rent and costs. After doing that, he might have nothing left to pay the lawyer.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, that any lawyer would have readily taken up such a case for him.

[Tenth Night.]

MR. PARNELL asked if the Government would have any objection to simplify the proceedings, and, instead of compelling a tenant to go to Dublin under Dease's Act, which required him to lodge the money in Dublin, to enable him to lodge it in the Magistrates' Court, or the County Court where the ejectment had been obtained? It might simplify the proceedings if, under the Bill, the money were allowed to be lodged in the Magistrates' Court.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON) said, that would be, of course, entirely foreign to what they were dealing with in the present instance. At the same time, he thought the suggestion was not an unreasonable one to carry out in any Bill dealing with the relations between landlord and tenant. He would be the last person to wish to deprive the tenant of facilities for re-possessing himself of his holding.

DR. COMMINS said, he wished to point out that the case which had been put by his hon. Friend the Member for Kilkenny (MR. P. MARTIN) was not at all an imaginary one. Last week he had a letter from a constituent of his own from the county of Roscommon. In that case the landlord was resident in England, and was not accessible. The tenant held a small farm of five acres, and upon that small farm his residence was fixed. He had paid his rent up to the day, but he had another farm considerably larger, upon which he had allowed the rent to get into arrear. For the arrears on the second farm a writ of ejectment was obtained, and the Sheriff, acting under the writ, went down and evicted the man from both. The tenant put the case to the Sheriff, and told him he had no writ against the small holding, in regard to which the rent had been duly paid; but the Sheriff stated that he had no alternative but to carry out the writ in reference to both holdings. Accordingly, he evicted the man and locked the door upon him. Now, it would be a very hard case indeed if that man, going back to his own house for shelter, broke down the door and took possession, and then was sent to prison by a magistrate for six months under the provisions of this Bill. He hoped the Government would introduce some guarding words into the clause, in order to prevent the hardship complained of.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 37; Noes 244: Majority 207.—(Div. List, No. 132.)

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, before he moved the Amendment standing in his name, he wished to add the words "or for county cess." The subsection, if his Amendment were adopted, would run thus—"or rescues any cattle or goods seized under any decree or for county cess." The reasons in favour of this Amendment were obvious. The clause, as it stood, proposed to deal with certain offences, but there was an obvious omission in respect of the offences to which his Amendment referred. Anyone who studied the history of the disturbed districts in Ireland during the last two years would know that there was nothing more common than combinations for the rescue of cattle or goods seized under the decree of some competent Court. There was this great disadvantage connected with the rescue of cattle or goods seized under the decree of a Court, that the authorities, in order to prevent the success of such attempts, were obliged to move large bodies of police and soldiers about the country for preventive purposes; the men, under these circumstances, being brought away from their duties, and also being brought into contact with excited mobs, which frequently gave rise to riot. The tendency which existed in Ireland to refuse to pay rent applied also to the rates made at county cess. The Government had in certain instances advanced money to the occupiers of land—for instance, the money advanced under the Seeds Bill—and the moneys recoverable were placed in the hands of the person who collected the county cess, and who was met with the same objection to pay as existed in the case of rents. Therefore, he thought, as they were dealing in this clause with matters relating to the tenants, it was well that they should take special notice of these particular offences, and make it very clear that where any attempt occurred forcibly to rescue cattle or goods, or resist the county cess, they should be dealt with by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. Without detaining the Committee at greater length, he trusted, for the reasons he had advanced, the Government would agree to this obvious improvement of the clause.

Amendment proposed,

"In page 3, line 35, after the word "or," to insert the words "rescues any cattle or goods seized under any decree or order of the county cess."—(Lord George Hamilton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, Her Majesty's Government did not see their way to accept this Amendment, inasmuch as they had not found it necessary to take special powers for the purposes suggested. They found they could deal with the cases as they arose under the ordinary law without any need of special jurisdiction. The matter had not been overlooked by the Government. With regard to the county cess, as a general rule, when an order was made it rested with the Constabulary to carry it out, and he believed that the money had been generally recovered. The Government, however, did propose to make a slight alteration in the existing law; and in the last sub-section of this clause it would be seen it was made an offence, under this Act, to commit an assault upon any constable, bailiff, or process-server. It was the intention of the Government to extend that to other officers of the Court, and they believed that this alteration would meet the necessities of the case.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he would naturally hear with pleasure the statement of the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland, that he was able to deal with the evil complained of by his noble Friend (Lord George Hamilton). He should, however, have been more satisfied if he could share the confidence of the right hon. and learned Gentleman as to the capacity of the Government, under the existing law, to deal with the very serious evils to which his noble Friend had alluded. His noble Friend asked Her Majesty's Government to admit words which would distinctly lay down that the rescue of cattle or goods should be an illegal act. He could not understand how the right hon. and learned Gentleman could say that this evil did not exist. Although his sources of information were no longer official, he had constantly before him accounts and reports of these acts, and as long as those accounts continued to fill the columns of the Press, he thought it was a matter to be deprecated, that the Government should not avail themselves of every means suggested to them for the purpose of putting down the evil complained of.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): I said we were able to deal with them sufficiently by the ordinary law.

MR. SYNAN said, the argument of the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, was that summary jurisdiction should be applied to every act committed in Ireland. Nothing was to happen in Ireland that was not to be thrust into this Bill and subjected to summary jurisdiction. But, for his own part, he was unable to see why offences perfectly well triable by the ordinary law, should be sent to a summary tribunal. Besides, questions of law might be raised in case of seizure of goods or cattle which the Court of Summary Jurisdiction would be unfitted to deal with. For instance, there might be a dispute as to ownership, or, again, a seizure might take place of cattle grazing on the land of a person who was not the owner, and it appeared to him most improper that such a case as this should go for decision before a summary tribunal. For these reasons, he hoped the noble Lord would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. SEXTON said, he was glad the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland had met this Amendment by reference to the actual facts of the case. There had been seizures of cattle some years ago in Ireland; but in the summer of last year the Irish Executive had adopted the course of warning the people against attending Sheriffs' sales, and the consequence had been that those sales were now conducted in the most peaceable manner—no breach of the law of any kind now occurred in connection with them. So far, then, as the offence which the noble Lord hoped to include in the Bill was concerned, he claimed that it had entirely disappeared from Ireland, and he thought it most objectionable that hon. Members upon the Front Opposition Bench should join together in inaccurate representations with regard to the offences in question.

Question put, and negatived.

[Tenth Night.]

MR. SEXTON said, he rose for the purpose of moving the omission of Sub-section (c). The crime of aggravated assault against the person was, by the Bill, triable by a special tribunal of three Judges. This sub-section also provided that the crime of aggravated violence against the person should be triable by summary jurisdiction. The result of this double provision would be that a person might be brought up and tried either by two magistrates or by three Judges constituting the Special Commission Court. Now, he was quite willing that they should be tried either by one or the other of these tribunals, but certainly not by both. Again, he contended that there was no reason whatever for removing the crime from the ordinary tribunals in Ireland, and in support of that statement he should again trouble the Committee with a reference to figures. He thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) would do well to examine the Returns relating to these offences, because it was his contention that this sub-section was only based on false pretence and false assumption. In the year 1880, there were 87 cases of assaults endangering life; of these 46 were brought to trial, and out of those 46 cases 17 convictions resulted. Now, he said that these 17 convictions bore a very reasonable proportion to the number of trials. This proportion would bear a favourable comparison with the convictions of the same offences in England; and he hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin would not pretend in this case, as he had done in others, that the number of convictions was apparently large, because the actual number of offences was not stated. Again, in ordinary assaults the number was 131, and the convictions amounted to one in every three cases brought to trial. He did not expect the Home Secretary to give a satisfactory or an intelligible answer to these arguments in favour of the omission of the clause; but he would like to hear the Attorney General for Ireland, who might be supposed to be acquainted with the affairs of Ireland, offer some explanation as to why the Government resolved to have this double jurisdiction in the cases mentioned in the sub-section. In the year 1880, out of 87 cases of assaults, there were 17 convictions; in 1881 there were 127 cases and 34 convictions; the proportion in the latter case being as one to three, whereas, in the previous year, the proportion was only one to five. He should imagine that if the Government found it necessary to resort to exceptional jurisdiction, and took away trial by jury, they would have been able to show to the Committee that the proportion of convictions to the number of trials had decreased; but he had been able to show the Committee that a very large increase in the number of convictions had taken place, and that the crimes themselves had diminished in number. In the face of these figures, he regarded it as an unprovoked insult to Irish juries to take away from them the trial of these offences, and bring them before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. Again, the number of offences had also decreased. Last year there were 127 cases of assault; and up to the month of May in the present year, a period of five months, there were only 36, whereas, if the offences had kept upon the same level as in the previous year, there would have been 50 cases during the five months. There had, in fact, been a reduction of one-third in the number of offences during the period named. He had never listened to so shabby a case for withdrawing offences from the ordinary tribunals. The Government were constantly speaking of the preservation of law and order, and the supremacy of the Crown in Ireland; but was it not a fact that between 1870 and 1881 the number of convictions by juries for these offences had nearly doubled, and that the offences themselves had been reduced by one-third in number? He contended that there was a complete case made out for leaving these offences within the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals; and he trusted that in his reply the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary would restrain his natural eloquence, and, in a spirit of inquiry, address himself to the facts of the case.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 36, to leave out sub-section (c).—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'or commits' stand part of the Clause."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was unable to agree to the Amendment. The whole of this matter had been discussed at great length on the 1st clause of the Bill. What the hon. Member for Sligo requested was, that aggravated crimes of violence should be left to trial by jury; but that the Committee had already decided could not be the case, and to pursue the question farther would be simply to renew the general controversy which had taken place over Clause 1. It was plain that these offences might be of different degrees of magnitude, and if the Amendment of the hon. Member were adopted, it would be necessary to put into operation the Special Commission Court to try offences which might be adequately punished by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction with six months' imprisonment. But the object of the sub-section was that offences which could be sufficiently dealt with by a sentence of two or three months' imprisonment should be brought before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. This proposal was certainly not an unreasonable one; and he regarded it as being rather in favour of the accused person than otherwise. It was quite in accordance with our law that offences of the kind referred to in the sub-section, which were not of a very grave character, should be disposed of by summary jurisdiction, instead of at the Assizes.

MR. PARNELL said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had, as usual, raised a false issue in attempting to show that, if this sub-section were rejected, they must fall back on Clause 1 for the trial of these offences. He (Mr. Parnell) submitted that this was not the issue at all. It was evident to him that the Government, in framing the Bill, did not consider that trial by jury had failed in respect of these offences. He failed to see why the right hon. and learned Gentleman had placed these offences in two clauses of the Bill.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was for the same reason that some offences were now triable, either at the Assizes or by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction—that was to say, because it was convenient to all parties. It would only be cases of violence against the person, almost approaching to murder, that would be dealt with under the 1st clause; the minor cases would be taken before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction.

MR. PARNELL said, he could not see that the analogy was in any respect perfect, because in the one case there was a trial by jury, and in the other there was not. He was still unable to see why the Government included these offences in both clauses of the Bill. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had pointed out that they were so included; but the only reason given was that, in certain cases of offences in England, and, of course, in Ireland, the Crown had the right of deciding them by summary jurisdiction, or bringing them before a jury. But, in this case, the Crown claimed the right of bringing them before a tribunal without a jury. Now, he suggested that if the right hon. and learned Gentleman would say that, on Report, he would give up the power of bringing those offences before the three Judges, Irish Members would, on their part, be willing to waive their opposition to their being inserted in the present clause, it being left to the magistrate to try them in the ordinary way. He submitted that this arrangement would give sufficient power to meet the necessities of the case; and, in view of the statistics quoted by the hon. Member for Sligo, which showed that convictions for these offences by juries were at least equal, if not greater, than the convictions of last year, he thought that arrangement should be adopted.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) to consider that an aggravated crime of violence might be of so grave a character, that the punishment of six months imprisonment would be obviously inadequate. Take the case of mutilation. They might have cases of the most cruel mutilation of persons which would not be adequately dealt with by a punishment of six months' imprisonment. If, then, this crime, which came next to murder in point of heinousness, was to be dealt with adequately, it was necessary that the Crown should have the right of bringing it before a higher tribunal than one of summary jurisdiction. The various crimes enumerated in the Bill were arranged in regular order. It would not be reasonable to leave arson and attacks on dwellings to be dealt with by the higher tribunal, and at the same time to leave the aggravated crime of violence against the person to be dealt with in all cases by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. He could not see that any harm or injustice would accrue by reserving the power to bring this crime before either tribunal.

COLONEL BARNE said, he thought the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had forgotten some of the rules of arithmetic when he said that the proportion of convictions to crimes in cases of assaults was as one to three. The proportion was nearer one to four.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he was strongly in favour of summary jurisdiction in cases of aggravated crimes of violence, and he wished that mode of dealing with them could have a greater application in Ireland than it had at present, because he was satisfied that as the magistrates were to have a legal element amongst them, justice would be done. Moreover there was sometimes great difficulty in getting a prosecution at the Assizes for aggravated assaults against the person. Cases of wounding on the way home from fairs were very common in Ireland, and it frequently happened that the clergymen and the friends of the accused in the neighbourhood endeavoured to prevent a prosecution. If the magistrates committed for trial the parties, their witnesses had, perhaps, to travel 50 miles, as was the case in Connemara, to the place where the Assizes were held, at great loss of time and at great expense. It therefore appeared to him that this offence would be put down with greater certainty by a speedy and moderate punishment of two or three months' imprisonment; and as he wished it to be dealt with effectively, he should support the clause, which appeared to offer the best means to that end.

MR. T. C. THOMPSON said, he thought the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) should withdraw his Amendment. He believed that prisoners, as a rule, preferred to be tried before an inferior tribunal; whereas, if this Amendment were adopted, they would be thrown upon the superior tribunal, where they would be tried at greater trouble and expense. In his view, it would be greatly in favour of the accused that he should be tried by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction.

MR. SEXTON pointed out that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had not answered the principal argument he had used in favour of leaving out this sub-section. He had shown that trial by jury had not failed in these cases, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman had made no attempt to meet that fact. He gave him great credit for that. The Home Secretary had said there might be aggravated cases of crime against the person too serious to be brought before magistrates. Would the Government agree to insert in the clause the offences of cutting, wounding, and maiming? He believed that an imprint would cover all the cases likely to arise.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he would consider whether that could be done when the Interpretation Clause was reached.

Amendment, by leave withdrawn.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the Government proposed to omit the word "crime," in line 36, and substitute for it the word "Act," in order to remedy an oversight of the draftsman, and make the sub-section accord with the wording of the 12th line of the Interpretation Clause.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 36, to leave out the word "crime," and insert the word "Act" instead thereof. —(Sir William Harcourt.)

MR. PARNELL asked what was the meaning of the offence in law?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, they defined it to be an assault which caused bodily harm, committed with the intent to do grievous bodily harm.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. M'COAN said, it would not be necessary, after the discussion which had taken place on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), for the omission of the last sub-section, to detain the Committee at any length in supporting the Amendment which he was about to move. It was only necessary to say that the arguments which the hon. Member for Sligo had advanced in favour of the omission of Sub-section (c) applied with still greater force to Sub-section (d). There might be reasons for retaining the former sub-section; but there were absolutely none, in his opinion, in favour of making the minor offences named in the latter sub-section punishable in the aggravated manner proposed in the Bill. It could not be contended that an assault upon a constable, bailiff, or process-server was one that it was necessary to deal with otherwise than by the ordinary law. It was an offence, from the consequences of which the person accused could not escape, owing to the absence of evidence, because the individual on whom the assault was committed would be the most competent of all witnesses, and on his evidence alone a conviction would be obtained. Therefore, the legal machinery for punishing an assault of this kind already existed in the Petty Sessions. He said that the effect of the sub-section was to invest policemen and others with something akin to the divinity which was supposed to hedge a king. It was monstrous that a minor offence, such as a knock-down blow, which, in the case of a farmer, would be met by a week's imprisonment, should, in the case of a policeman, bailiff, or process-server, be punished with six months' imprisonment with hard labour. It must be remembered that the police were always ready to interfere in any street row, or eviction, and to put a stop to the playing of street bands, and small matters of the kind; and it was only to be expected that they would meet with some disagreeable treatment under such circumstances. But if anyone should throw a handful of mud at a constable who so exposed himself, he would, under this Bill, be liable to six months' imprisonment with hard labour. Again, bailiffs were not the most conciliatory persons in the world, and were very often the cause of difficulties which were sometimes resented by the people in the neighbourhood; but under this sub-section, if a woman were even to throw an egg at a bailiff, she would be liable to the same punishment of six months' imprisonment. So, too, with process-servers; he supposed that nothing would be done in this way in future, where a process-server was concerned, that would not be construed as an assault, and dealt with by a punishment of six months' imprisonment. But this exaggerated application of the law was not only to apply to assaults on these persons when on duty; it would be applicable at all times and under all circumstances, and an ordinary bailiff coming from a public-house was, in the strict terms of the sub-section, invested with a personal sanctity. He contended that there was no reason why assaults upon persons of the classes referred to should be visited with this extreme punishment, and he believed that no sufficient case could be shown for retaining this sub-section in the Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, to leave out Sub-section (d). — (Mr. McCann.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'or commits' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, the Government were unable to accept this Amendment. The offence most rife in Ireland was that of attacking officers of the law. It was the intention of the Government to add to the sub-section words which the hon. and learned Member had pointed to as being absent—namely, "while in the execution of his duty." Now, the hon. and learned Member had based his case on the old story that a process-server should have a skull as hard as a stone, because they were more exposed to violent attacks than any other class. He was sure hon. Gentlemen opposite below the Gangway would agree with him in that matter. But the hon. and learned Member had forgotten that one of the most common offences which had existed from the earliest times was that of obstructing an officer of the law in the execution of his duty, and that the penalty attached to the offence was two years' imprisonment with or without hard labour. The Committee would see that the sub-section imposed a much more lenient penalty, and having regard to the necessity of protecting the officers of the law in the execution of their duty, he trusted the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Wicklow would not be pressed.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN supported the Amendment, on the ground that the offences named in the sub-section were covered by the sub-section just passed by the Committee. That sub-section provided that any person should be brought within the scope of this Bill who "committed an aggravated act of violence against the person." No one would say that policemen, bailiffs, and process-servers were not "persons;"

and, therefore, he contended that the Government had sufficient power under Sub-section (c) for their protection. He thought it most unreasonable that any constable, bailiff, or process-server should be specially protected by the Bill, and would ask whether the ordinary law was not sufficient to cover these assaults? If it were not, then he said they were fully covered by the extraordinary sub-section which the Committee had just passed. Were they to suppose that the persons this sub-section was specially designed to protect were more precious than any other members of the community, or were ordinary mortals, so to speak, to be regarded as common clay, and policemen, bailiffs, and process-servers as blue china? For his own part, he was inclined to make a slight alteration in the lines of the English poet quoted by the hon. and learned Member for Wicklow, and to read them thus—

“ There's a divinity doth hedge a bailiff, Rough-use him how you will.”

He could see no reason whatever for including in the Bill this special provision for the protection of these classes of persons, who ought, like the rest of the community, to take their chance under the ordinary law. It was simply absurd to make punishable in this exaggerated manner the assaults committed on constables, say, at the arrest of a drunken man, or in case of their interference with a street band, or anything of that kind. It was well known that in Ireland the police were constantly and needlessly interfering in the most irritating way, at times and places where their presence was not wanted at all. They were regarded in Ireland as an officious and meddling body of men; and it was notorious that their action in the case of quiet and peaceful assemblies was often the cause of riot and disturbance. It was only the other day that he asked a Question about the police having torn down a harmless and legal notice relating to the cutting of turf. That notice was torn down without the least justification; and, in reply to his Question whether there was any legal authority for the act, he was told there was not, and that the constable would be called to account. These were things of daily occurrence in Ireland; and he repeated that whenever the police interfered in their accustomed and irritating manner with little children, temperance bands, street quarrels, and such small matters, if the slightest assault were committed upon them the offender would now come within the scope of this Bill, and be liable to six months' imprisonment with hard labour. He was willing that these assaults should be dealt with, if necessary, under the preceding sub-section; but he protested against this special dignity, protection, and sacredness being conferred by the Bill upon constables, bailiffs, and process-servers.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, the hon. Member who had just sat down wanted to know why police constables were to be treated as if they were blue china? He reminded him that, in the opinion of some persons, blue china was only valuable when it was cracked and broken, and that seemed to be the view of the hon. Member for Westmeath.

MR. SEXTON said, he hoped the Government would give their serious attention to this Amendment, for he could assure the right hon. and learned Gentleman that no Amendment had been before the Committee during the discussions on this clause which deserved more consideration. He would point out to the Committee that this clause was founded upon agrarian offences, upon the hostility which existed between landlords, tenants, and labourers in Ireland; but it should be borne in mind that constables there had other duties to perform than those connected with agrarian matters and the collection of rents. His hon. Friend had pointed out that the Bill would revolutionize the law of the country. If an assault were made on a policeman in Dublin, this sub-section would deprive the person who committed it of the ordinary right of being brought before a jury, and render him liable to six months' imprisonment with hard labour on the decision of a magistrate—that was to say, the penalty for the offence would be very much increased. The Bill being based upon the prevalence of agrarian outrage, he was at a loss to see why ordinary assaults upon the police and other officers should come within the category of offences against the Act; and he would suggest to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary whether he could not insert these words—

Mr. T. D. Sullivan

"On every minister of the law, where such minister of the law is engaged in any legal service connected with the tenure of land."

He asked the Government, by the adoption of these words, to make it plain that constables, except when engaged in such duties, were not more liable to assault than they were before the land agitation commenced. He claimed that this special jurisdiction should not apply, except where the officers of the law were engaged in legal service relating to the occupation of land. The hon. and learned Member for Wicklow (Mr. M'Coan) had said, with perfect truth, that the objections raised to Sub-section (c) applied with greater force in the present case. Let the Chief Secretary for Ireland pile heaps of Returns upon the Table of the House, and, whenever he possibly could, let him justify the Bill by referring to statistics; but he (Mr. Sexton) maintained that the offences which this sub-section professed to guard against had entirely disappeared. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland said they were now rife in Ireland; but was that statement confirmed by the Returns? In 1880 there were 49 cases of assault and 11 convictions; in 1881 there were 61 assaults and 27 convictions, a proportion which he claimed that Irish juries did not give in ordinary criminal cases. But how many assaults on the police had been committed in the present year—at a time when the Attorney General for Ireland described them as being rife? According to the Parliamentary Papers, extending up to the end of May—not one. Then, why was this sub-section brought into the Bill? He claimed that the juries in Ireland had convicted a larger proportion in the case of these offences than the juries in England, and he said that it was unreasonable on the part of Her Majesty's Government to blame the juries in Ireland for non-conviction, when, practically, there were no offences to convict for. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland might be able to find a reply to this argument which would appear satisfactory to himself; but he (Mr. Sexton) was bound to say that the argument appeared perfectly unanswerable. What was the case, then, with regard to assaults on process-servers during the present year? Here, again, the Government Returns refuted their own case. There had been two assaults on bailiffs in January, two in February, three in March, one in April, and none at all in the month of May. Those figures spoke for themselves, and to add one word to such an argument would be absurd. He would conclude his remarks in support of the omission of this sub-section by the assertion that its presence in the Bill was the very perfection of imbecility and wantonness.

MR. LABOUCHERE pointed out that "assault" was a very general term. He believed it was held to be an assault for one person to lay his hand upon another, or to shake his fist in another person's face. He could very easily imagine a person, who was being evicted by some cruel or harsh landlord, shaking his fist in the face of the constable engaged in the execution of that order, without any intention to assault the individual; and, therefore, he thought some qualifying words should be introduced into the sub-section. If words were introduced which indicated that serious harm or injury were necessary to bring a person within the scope of the clause, he thought that the sub-section would be far better than it was at present, for he believed the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary would agree with him that, if the words in the sub-section were administered in the fullest manner by the stipendiary magistrates and others, a person innocent of the intention of assaulting an officer in the execution of his duty might, for simply shaking his fist in his face, be sent to prison for six months.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said, the hon. Member for Sligo had stated that the only acts which this Bill was intended to deal with were acts of agrarian outrage. Now, that was not the case, and every Member in the House must know that the 1st clause in the Bill embodied very different categories of crime. It was difficult to understand how the hon. Member opposite, with all his powers of fallacy, could argue as he had done. The hon. Member for Sligo asked why constables and process-servers did not come under the sub-section which was intended to protect ordinary persons from outrage? But there was a special reason for this. The persons in question were servants of the law, appointed for special duties, and that being so, they were entitled to special protection. That, he believed, was the whole argument in favour of the sub-section, and he recommended it to the consideration of the hon. Member opposite, who was always so ready to draw a coach and four through this Bill.

[Tenth Night.]

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he could not agree with the hon. Member opposite that the position of Ireland was one which did not require a security of the kind provided in this sub-section. To limit its application to agrarian crime only would be on the part of the Government to show that they had entirely failed to understand what the condition of Ireland was. It was true that agrarian crime was to be regarded as a thing by itself; but the fact was that this agrarian agitation created in Ireland a disregard of all law; and if there were one thing more than another which it was the duty of those who brought in the Bill for the Prevention of Crime in Ireland to introduce, it was a provision which should give security to those officers who carried out the determination of the law. The hon. Member had stated that when the 1st clause was under discussion, he (Sir William Harcourt) had declined to argue the question raised upon figures and statistics. He was bound to say that he did not feel it his duty to resort to an argument of that kind in the present instance. But the hon. Member for Sligo himself had supplied a good reason why this sub-section should not be omitted from the Bill, because if the hon. Member was satisfied that these offences would never occur, he might console himself with the knowledge that this clause would never come into operation. With regard to the term "assault," the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had stated with truth that it was a wide one; but it was also true that in their endeavours to meet cases of this kind the Government were obliged to use general words. Under the existing law it was provided that where people assaulted or wilfully obstructed any officer in the due execution of his duty, or any person acting in aid of such officer, they should be punishable with two years' imprisonment. That was the law of England, and the wording he had given was just as wide as that to which the hon. Member for Northampton had objected. There was no summary jurisdiction under the Act referred to; it was provided that assaults should be tried by indictment and punishable at the Assizes; but it was afterwards thought necessary to provide for summary jurisdiction as well, and in 25 & 26 Vict. it was enacted that assaults of the kind specified be punishable by summary jurisdiction as well as by indictment. That statement, he thought, would meet the objection of the hon. Member for Northampton. Referring to the observation of the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Sullivan), it appeared to him that if there was one thing more than another which deserved to be treated with the care usually bestowed upon blue china, it was an officer or process-server in the execution of his duty in Ireland; and he thought the Government would not be discharging its duty if they did not do everything in their power to protect those officers against the special dangers to which they were exposed.

MR. MACARTNEY suggested that the provision of the sub-section should be extended to Sheriff's officers in Ireland, because these were just as liable to assault as the other classes referred to. A case had occurred in the county of Tyrone in which the Sheriff's officer engaged in seizing the goods of a farmer for a debt due to a shopkeeper in Cookstown was shot dead. The man who committed the murder was brought before a Tyrone jury and convicted; but, owing to his great age, he was sentenced, he believed, to the mitigated penalty of two years' penal servitude. That, he contended, showed the necessity of extending the clause in the direction indicated.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he wished to point out what he believed to be a sufficient reason why this Amendment should not be agreed to. It was clear, since the Prime Minister had stated that a person of legal knowledge was to be associated with the Court to be constituted under this Bill, that they would have in Ireland the best Summary Jurisdiction Court that had ever existed there. The objection that had been urged, over and over again, to dealing with this question by means of summary jurisdiction was the want of confidence in the magistrates on the part of the people of Ireland. There had always been in Ireland a want of magistrates who knew the law; but the Prime Minister now told them that this want was to be supplied, and, on such terms as that, he considered the jurisdiction of the Petty Courts should be enlarged as much as possible. The penalties inflicted by these Courts would be much smaller than those that would be imposed by Courts of Quarter Session or at the Assizes. Again, it was most desirable that in the country districts the police should have complete immunity from assaults when engaged in the discharge of their duty. In his own county (Galway) there was a district of 70 square miles, in which formerly only five policemen were stationed, and in that vast area it must be remembered that these men were the representatives of the majesty of the law. But what had occurred since? In consequence of the number of assaults on constables having largely increased, a considerable addition had been made to the number of police in that district, for which the poor people had been compelled to pay, and it was thus another argument in favour of protecting the police from assaults that under this very Act the people in disturbed districts would have to pay for the additional police forces which the Lord Lieutenant might think it necessary to send there. Anyone would suppose, who listened to the objections of hon. Gentlemen opposite to this sub-section, that a penalty of six months' imprisonment with hard labour would always be inflicted by the magistrates for an assault upon the police and the other officers named. But that was not the case; the penalties inflicted might be very light. They might not amount to more than one or two days' imprisonment, or the charge might end in an acquittal. But the point upon which he relied most strongly in defending the sub-section was, that these offences would be dealt with speedily. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), in stating that the number of assaults upon process-servers had greatly decreased, had forgotten to tell the Committee what he very well knew, that the assaults had been so numerous and terrible that the Judges had been obliged to alter their rules with regard to personally serving writs by making them to be served by post. Nothing could be more desirable than that the protection accorded to single policemen and process-servers pursuing their duties in various parts of Ireland should be as complete as possible. The hon. Member for Sligo spoke of these assaults as being entirely of an agrarian character. But that was not so. Some of the worst assaults which had been committed upon bailiffs had been when they were serving processes for debts due to shopkeepers. The reason why so few assaults upon this class were recorded was simply because process-servers dared not execute their duty in serving processes. In view of the promise of the Prime Minister that the Court should be assisted by men of legal knowledge, he felt it his duty to vote for the sub-section.

MR. M'COAN said, he had no desire to prolong the discussion before the Committee, and if the Government would consent to the introduction of the words, "while engaged in the discharge of his duty," he was willing to withdraw his Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON) said, the Government proposed to add these words to the sub-section, "while in the execution of his duty or in consequence thereof."

MR. M'COAN said, the proposed wording was hardly clear enough. The object was to confine the sub-section to cases of assault while the officer was engaged in the execution of his duty.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON) pointed out that it was equally necessary to protect an officer from the consequences of having performed his duty.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he hoped the Attorney General for Ireland would adhere to the words he had proposed. It was not enough to say that a public officer should be protected while actually upon his duty; to say that would amount simply to the announcement that the moment an officer took his badge off his arm and assumed temporarily the position of a private individual he would be at the mercy of anyone who chose to attack him. The Government should take care to protect officers when off duty from the attacks of persons who cherished a grudge against them for duties which they had performed.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that when the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) was testing the necessity for this sub-section by reference to statistics, and when he proposed to show that there had been no assaults on the police and very few assaults on bailiffs and process-servers, he

General for Ireland had informed the Committee that the Government would add to this clause the words, "while in the execution of his duty." Such words would decidedly go to improve—

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that that proposition will be discussed presently. There are three Amendments to be considered before the proposal to insert these words can be entertained.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he was tempted to refer to the words by the fact that the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself had done so. He would, however, defer any remarks he had to make on the point until the proposal was formally made. He would now only offer a few observations in reference to a remark that fell from the Home Secretary. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said the clause would be harmless if the offences to which it related were not committed. He had heard statements of that sort before, and, as he said upon a former occasion, they were very easily answered. Would not the same argument go to show that this Act ought to be applied to England? The hon. and gallant Member for Cork County (Colonel Colthurst) said, a couple of nights ago, that this Act would not affect anyone who chose to observe the Ten Commandments. If that was so, why not introduce a like Bill for England? The Ten Commandments fared about as badly in England as in any other part of the world. He did not think it was fair to lay such arguments before the Committee; and he would ask those who used them to answer him, if they could, when he said that such arguments were just as good, just as cogent for the introduction of this measure, or a similar measure, into England as into Ireland. The time of the Committee ought not to be occupied with such nonsensical arguments, and therefore it was that he rose to protest against their repetition.

MR. PLUNKET said, he would add very little to what had already been said during the debate as to the present state of Ireland, and the necessity that existed for some sort of provision for the protection of the Constabulary and other officers of the law. One fact had been made abundantly clear, and that was that the public of this country were of opinion that the whole process of the law in Ireland, administered by the Constabulary and other servants of the law, had been brought into disrepute and into contempt; and if at the present moment there was, as pointed out by one hon. Member, some sort of decline in the amount of crime, he would make this observation—that there was scarcely any part of Ireland, save, perhaps, in the North, where it was not over and over again found necessary, by persons who desired to have the process of law enforced, to apply to those exceptional Associations—the Property Defence Association and the Emergency Association—for persons to do the business which they could not get the ordinary officers of the law to do. He understood the object of this temporary Act was to bring the country into that normal condition in which the ordinary processes of the law would be effected in the ordinary way, and there would be no longer any necessity for exceptional associations. He would just say a word in reference to the announcement made by the Home Secretary that the Government would be willing that this clause should only apply in proclaimed districts. He quite saw the force of what the right hon. and learned Gentleman said as to the premium that would be held out to a district to keep quiet. Of course, if the Irish Executive took that view, they must do it upon their own responsibility. He would point out to the Government that all the offences included in this section were crimes of a sudden character; they were such offences as taking part in riots, attacks upon houses, aggravated assaults on constables, bailiffs, and others. These crimes were pretty sure to occur—he was afraid they would be more likely to occur—in those districts where this temporary Act did not apply, so that it might become necessary to proclaim a greater number of districts for the application of these exceptional powers than would have been the case had the Government not made the concession just announced. He simply ventured to submit this view of the matter to the Government; but as to the other part of the case—the necessity of these clauses for the protection of the officers of the law and Constabulary, who had been so shamefully used, but who had behaved so admirably during these disturbed times—no one who knew Ireland at all could seriously contend that these clauses were not necessary.

Mr. T. D. Sullivan

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT wished to say one word in order that there should be no misapprehension. The Irish Government were very anxious not to assume these exceptional powers in cases where they did not deem their assumption necessary. These offences might occur anywhere—they might occur in the best ordered districts; but the Irish Government did not wish to assume special jurisdiction where they considered the ordinary jurisdiction would be sufficient to cope with and punish the offences. That was the view in respect of which the Executive Government desired to apply the limitation of proclaimed districts.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 282; Noes 31: Majority 251.—(Div. List, No. 133.)

MR. MOLLOY moved, in page 3, line 38, after "an," insert "aggravated." The Amendment was intended to provide that the assault on a constable, bailiff, process-server, or other minister of the law must be an aggravated one if the penalty provided by the Bill was imposed. He presumed the Government would have no objection to such a reasonable Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 38, after the word "an," to insert the word "aggravated."—(Mr. Molloy.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'aggravated' be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the acceptance of the Amendment would be equivalent to leaving out the section.

MR. MOLLOY said, his object was to guard against technical assaults upon constables and others being made excuses for bringing men before the magistrates and obtaining their imprisonment for six months with hard labour. Unless an Amendment of this kind were adopted, it would be in the power of an ill-tempered policeman to proceed against a man who only sneered at him or smiled crookedly at him. Only the other day a photographer was had up because he spoke rudely to a policeman and advised the officer not to go too near the apparatus lest it might contain dynamite. Such cases as these he wished to guard against, though he was not wedded to the form of the Amendment. If the Home Secretary could suggest any other means of covering the point, he should be glad to withdraw his own Amendment.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the objection of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Molloy) would apply equally to the English Act dealing with offences against the person. The words in the English Act were "any person who assaults a constable," and for such assault the offender was liable to imprisonment for 12 months. What was proposed in this Bill was that a man who assaulted a constable in the execution of his duty should, on summary conviction, be liable to imprisonment for six months.

MR. CALLAN said, the case to which his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Molloy) had referred occurred in Dundalk. It was a case in which a photographer declined to recognize a policeman, and who advised the constable not to go too near the photographic apparatus for fear it might contain some explosive material. The policeman made no complaint until 12 days afterwards. The photographer was arrested summarily, and brought before the Bench then sitting. Fortunately there were two paid magistrates present, and after hearing the case, took a very different view of it to the Resident Magistrate. The Resident Magistrate—one of a class who, it must be remembered, were to administer this Act—with a view, he (Mr. Callan) supposed, to uphold the law, said—

"I differ from my brother magistrates. I am overruled by them, or I would send you to gaol without the option of bail. You have committed a grievous offence. When the policeman spoke to you, why did you not reply civilly to him?"

Such was the spirit in which a Resident Magistrate, a brother of a notorious Judge, treated the photographer; and such was the spirit in which Resident Magistrates would treat all similar cases when they were brought before them under this Act. It was absolutely necessary that words, limiting or explaining what an assault upon a constable was to consist of, should be inserted in the clause. Unless some such word as "aggravated" were inserted, persons who treated a constable uncivilly or rudely would be simply placed at the mercy of the Resident Magistrates, whose previous arbitrary conduct prompted the Irish Representatives to show so much hostility to the summary powers of the Act.

[Tenth Night.]

MR. BIGGAR said, he did not conceal from himself the fact that the Government were now introducing a law which might possibly become one of great injustice without having any corresponding advantage. He agreed with the Home Secretary that there should be a very stringent law in regard to assaults upon policemen; but he could not agree that mere technical assaults should be dealt with in a Bill of this sort. Punishment ought to be provided for bond fide and substantial offences; but no notice ought to be taken of offences which were only of a nominal character. He could not understand on what ground the Government could insist upon a provision of this kind to meet such a case as that cited by his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Molloy) and his hon. Friend (Mr. Callan). If the Government did not assent to the Amendment, it would only be another piece of evidence of their unreasonableness.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. SEXTON moved, in page 3, line 38, to omit the word "constable." The Bill had been introduced, it was alleged, as a result of the agrarian condition of Ireland. An hon. Member sitting behind the Treasury Bench, however, had said that the general condition of Ireland, apart from agrarian, required coercion, and the Home Secretary grasped at the attenuated straw. If there be other facts connected with Ireland requiring a Bill like this, why did the Government only present a Return dealing with ordinary crimes? Let them show there was anything in the ordinary crimes of the country requiring coercion, and he would withdraw his opposition to the clause. He meant to adduce figures to show that the general condition of Ireland did not necessitate such a Bill, and did not require that constables should be specially protected by this clause. It was a notorious fact that in many cases when constables had been tolled off on agrarian duty they had been blind drunk; it was well-known that during the recent disturbances in Dublin the police had committed assaults on the people when in a state of beastly intoxication—

Mr. Callan

It being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, Committee report Progress; to sit again this day.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

MR. SEXTON said, the Committee would recollect that at 10 minutes to 7 o'clock he had not concluded his remarks in moving to omit the word "constable" from Sub-section (d) of the 5th clause. He had no objection to the presence of the words "bailiff, process-server, or other minister of the law," because those words had some relation to that peculiar phase of the condition of Ireland which was alleged to demand coercion. If the word "constable" was allowed to remain in the clause, the principles of the Bill would be extended to the whole life of the country, and to every possible contingency in which a policeman came into hostile contact with the people. It would be an outrage to apply to every possible hostile occurrence that might arise between policemen and civilians a stringent measure of this kind, giving, as it did, to a scratch tribunal the powers of long imprisonment with hard labour. Outside the agrarian question, there was no case whatever for the application of coercion. He had previously shown that even with regard to the agrarian question there was no case made out for its application, and he had brought forward what he considered most conclusive arguments—namely, the figures contained in the Government Return on the subject. It would be very amusing, if the subject were not so serious and painful to the persons he represented, were he to describe the manner in which statistics were regarded by the House. He always thought that statistics—official figures—presented facts in the most condensed and most authentic form; and last year, when the Coercion Bill was before the House, the late Chief Secretary (Mr. W. E. Forster) was constantly supplying arithmetical tables of crime, and when the right hon. Gentleman showed there was a continual increase of offences, and put the fact forward as a powerful argument in favour of coercion, he was cheered to the echo by hon. Gentlemen behind him. When the present Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant addressed the House for the first time in his capacity of Chief Secretary, his speech was replete with tables of crime, and their reading was received with considerable applause. He (Mr. Sexton) did not forget that last year the Prime Minister delivered what the House considered a sledge-hammer speech, based on a Return of the number of Land League meetings held in a given time, and the number of agrarian crimes. An arithmetical relation was established between the number of meetings and the number of crimes, and he well remembered with what defiant salvoes of cheering this arithmetical relation was received by the House. The right hon. Gentleman said—"These are the figures; the steps of the Land League are dogged by the steps of crime." If he took up the Government's own Return, and pointed out that assaults on process-servers were conspicuous by their absence, he was met by the reply—"Oh, this is not a question of statistics." The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), whose zeal in support of this coercive Government often overran his discretion, told the Committee that assaults on process-servers had decreased because of the rearrangement of procedure made by the Judges. He (Mr. Sexton) supposed the Judges acted on their wisdom, and if they had found their alteration of their rules sufficient for the prevention of these assaults, why resort now to coercion? If the present rules of procedure were sufficient to prevent crime, why suspend the ordinary law and resort to coercion? A still more extraordinary argument was used by the Chief Secretary. "Oh, yes," said he, "perhaps there may be no assaults on process-servers; but there may be some hereafter." Was there ever such an argument for a Coercion Bill? If the liberties of the people were to be taken away because the Home Secretary thought there might be assaults on process-servers at some future time, the House of Commons had better give up all pretence of being a deliberative Assembly. Argument ceased when such a point as that was reached, and when he must assent to the liberties of the Irish people being taken away because the people might hereafter indulge in crime from which they are now free. The right hon. Gentleman said, if there were no agrarian offences now, there were ordinary offences. He altogether denied it. The ordinary crime presented a more conclusive case against coercion than the agrarian crime. He maintained that of the total number of apprehensions the convictions by juries, whether for ordinary or agrarian offences of the class included in this clause, would bear a fair comparison with the convictions of English juries in any cases whatever. If the Government considered that ordinary offences in Ireland were sufficient to demand coercion, why had they never laid on the Table any Return on the subject? The Government were in this dilemma—If ordinary offences were a reason for coercion, they had kept Parliament in ignorance, and they had been guilty of grave neglect of duty in not presenting Returns for the information of Parliament. There was a special reason why the word "constable" should be omitted. The police in Ireland had had from the beginning of this emergency very fatiguing and troublesome duties to perform. They had been required to turn out in all sorts of weather; they had had to travel long distances on foot, and they had been allowed 2s. 6d. a-day for refreshment. On many occasions, before going on duty, they had been liberally primed with liquor, and while under its influence had committed excesses of which the country were only too painfully aware. What did Dublin Castle do with the policemen before sending them out during the excited times of last autumn? They primed them liberally with liquor in order the more effectually to do their work. He had gained his information from a constable who took part in the exploit, but who had since left the Force. When many of the policemen were in a state of extreme intoxication, it was no wonder that on the night of the arrest of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) they beat men, women, and even children, quite regardless of the consequences. The Committee, no doubt, would remember the case of Ellen M'Dermott, who was stabbed dead by the police in county Mayo. There was a public inquiry into the matter, and it was found that after having stabbed the unfortunate girl the police went to the house. There was the girl's mother, with the dead body on one side of her and an epileptic son raving on the other, and the policeman who had stabbed the girl served the mother with a summons for 7s. 6d. for poor's rate. It was well known that when services of this kind had to be performed by the police, and when the police had to go long distances, they were well supplied beforehand with what was euphemistically called "refreshment." He was entitled to say that if the police, when in an inebriated state, were brought into contact with the people at times when the popular mind was very much perturbed, the probability was that the kind of assaults referred to in this sub-section would be very often provoked by the police themselves. He was entitled to say that oftentimes the police would so conduct themselves as to compel civilians to be guilty of an assault in self-defence. In view of such facts, and under such circumstances, it was very necessary that the accused should have the protection of a jury. The Resident Magistrate was inseparable from the police. He conducted police investigations; he was prejudiced towards the police; and, therefore, to commit the people to the care of such men was simply to condemn and foredoom them. This was his case in favour of the omission of the word "constable."

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 38, to leave out the word "constable."—
(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'constable' stand part of the Clause."

MR. PARNELL said, that unless some answer were given to the speech of his hon. Friend he should move that the Chairman do now report Progress. He submitted that his hon. Friend was entitled to a statement from the Treasury Bench.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not answer the hon. Member, because he thought that the speech, and especially the closing words of the speech to which the Committee had just listened, was the strongest argument that could be advanced in favour of the clause. It was because men in the position of the hon. Member were constantly holding up the police in Ireland to the hatred and contempt of the people that this clause was necessary. It was because men in the position of the hon.

Member were inciting the people of Ireland to resist the police, and to hold sentiments towards the police such as the hon. Gentleman had expressed, that in his (Sir William Harcourt's) opinion the police of Ireland required protection. Speeches like that to which they had just listened made it highly improbable that juries in Ireland would do their duty. How was it likely that people who had sentiments addressed to them like those they had just heard would feel otherwise than disposed on all occasions to find verdicts against the police? That, indeed, was the purpose for which such language was held, and he regarded speeches like that of the hon. Member as the very best arguments in favour of the clause as it stood.

MR. HEALY said, the two hours' repose had not done the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary much good. Instead of the right hon. and learned Gentleman having availed himself of the two hours to clear his mind from the conflict of debate, he came down to the House and, without answering one single tittle of argument advanced by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), he delivered by insinuation charges of the most atrocious character. ["Order!"] Gentlemen who cried "Order" appeared to think that the Home Secretary was to have the monopoly of abuse in the House. The Home Secretary insinuated that the hon. Member for Sligo, by his speeches, had incited the people to commit crime; but what answer did the right hon. and learned Gentleman make when the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sexton) showed that, in spite of these alleged incitements to crime, there was not in the months of January, February, March, April, or May, a single assault upon a policeman in Ireland? That argument was unanswerable; and the Government had not pretended to answer it. Hon. Gentlemen had heard of a column erected before a certain bridge in this city, which column had been described by Pope as a column which,

"Like a tall bully, lifts its head and lies."

When he heard arguments addressed to the Committee by the Home Secretary which were no arguments at all, but which simply consisted of an attempt to put down, by defamation, arguments of the most trenchant character, he could not help at times recalling the words of the poet. This was the spirit in which the Irish Members were being dealt with by the Home Secretary; but he could tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the challenge which he had thrown down would be taken up by the Irish people, and would be answered in a spirit which his Government and this House would yet learn to regret.

Mr. Sexton

MR. GIBSON said, he was not disposed to contribute to the discussion any observations of the elevated character of those to which the Committee had listened for the last two or three minutes. He proposed to approach the discussion, if he could, from a humbler and more prosaic point of view. He did not wish to criticize, in an offensive way, the speech of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), to whose speeches he sometimes listened with admiration, although he could not say that he agreed with many of his propositions, and he could not pretend to say he agreed for a moment with his standpoint. Anyone who had listened, even in the most friendly critical spirit, to the hon. Gentleman's speech of this evening, must arrive at the conclusion that it was no eulogy of the police. That was a fair and moderate way of putting it. One could not find in the speech language of unmeasured praise of the Irish police, and it appeared to him that if such a speech were delivered before an appreciative and intelligent and rather excited audience like those which they were in the habit of meeting with in the land of the brilliant race, it might be possible that it would lead to some misconception as to the point of view from which the Constabulary were to be regarded. He was disposed to think that, looking at the question fairly and temperately, and from a common-sense point of view, the Constabulary were entitled to a reasonable amount of protection at the present time. He was disposed to think they were subjected just now to rather more than a reasonable amount of unkind criticism—he liked to put everything in a moderate way. Unquestionably, the discharge of their duty did not render the police liable to be inebriated by undue popularity—that was another consideration he was entitled to present to the Committee—and the discharge of their duties had, on more occasions than one, in fact very frequently, subjected them to very great danger, and occasionally to very substantial outrage. He did not believe any man should profess any very great standard of courage unless he was likely to be called upon to put it to proof. Of course, in that case a man was entitled to be as courageous as he pleased; but he (Mr. Gibson) was disposed to think there were very few sitting in the House who would care to be discharging the duties of the police in the disturbed districts of Ireland if, being in that position, they did not feel they were protected by firm laws, formed with a view to the special exigencies of their existing life. He put it to the Committee, making allowance for every conceivable standpoint, did not every rational man feel that the Constabulary in Ireland who, at this critical time, were discharging unpopular, disagreeable, and trying duties, were entitled to every possible protection? Surely, if the Irish Members below the Gangway were willing to protect "bailiffs, process-servers, and other ministers of the law," they would be prepared to go a step further and say they would give equal protection, at all events, to the men of their own country who were discharging the difficult duty of preserving the peace. He had no desire to run away from the question, and he could not imagine any solitary reason there could be suggested why the Constabulary should not be given the protection of this clause. It was generally admitted that the Bill was necessary. ["No!"] Well, they were now in Committee, and they were bound to view the Bill from that standpoint—they were discussing the clauses on the basis that Parliament was satisfied that some such Bill was necessary. If Parliament was satisfied that it was desirable to increase the power of summary jurisdiction, in the name of common sense how could it be argued that the ministers of the law who were most mixed up in the administration of the law should be excluded from the protection intended to be given by this clause? He did not dispute that, from the hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Sexton's) point of view, it might be reasonable to put forward this Amendment; but surely the matter had now been fully discussed. He (Mr. Gibson) claimed to have a mind tolerably open to conviction; but he must say he was unable to see a single ground which could be fairly suggested for the acceptance of this Amendment.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, that the Home Secretary had stated that one of the causes of the unpopularity of the police in Ireland was to be found in speeches such as that which had been made by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). He (Mr. Sullivan) entirely differed from the right hon. and learned Gentleman on this point. The cause of the unpopularity of the police in Ireland was the power and privilege which had been given to them by the English Government to tyrannize and dominate over, and to harass the Irish people. That was the real cause of their unpopularity; the police were petted and pampered, enabled, and even induced, to meddle with, annoy, and irritate the people. This Bill, when it became law, would make the Irish police still more unpopular than they had ever been before. It would elevate them—they were high enough now in power and privilege—but, when this Act passed, every policeman in the country—every policeman in every village and town in the whole Island—would be monarch of all he surveyed. There was not a young man in the whole country who could venture to hold up his head beneath the frown of the Irish policeman. He had said they were a pampered and a petted class; and, as he and his Friends had pointed out over and over again to the Committee, they were not really policemen, they were soldiers—they were warriors, and they conducted themselves as such; they were not detectives of crime, but lords over the people. The Irish Constabulary would, in his opinion, be an admirable force to send out at the present moment to Egypt, or to any other country where England wished to assert her supremacy—

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Gentleman that it is not the merits or the demerits of the Irish Constabulary that is under discussion, but simply whether the word "constable" should be omitted from the clause.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN: Precisely; and it was proposed to leave out the word "constable" because of the special character of the Irish Constabulary—because of their conduct, and because of the relations in which they stood to the Irish people. He would not dispute the Chairman's ruling; but he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would see that his remarks were pertinent to the subject under discussion. He contended that the Irish police were such a body of men as would make an admirable force to send out to Egypt, or any other part of the world where England had military service to be performed; but for the purposes for which police were required they were not only an inefficient organization in Ireland, as could be proved out of the mouth of the Government themselves—

THE CHAIRMAN: I have explained to the hon. Member that the Question before the Committee has no reference whatever to the merits or demerits of the Royal Irish Constabulary. The question is simply whether the police shall be protected from assault under this clause.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he quite agreed that the police should be protected from assault; but he would point out that they had protection from assault already under the ordinary law. That was quite sufficient; and to give them this additional and extra dignity, weight, importance, and protection would not answer any useful purpose in the country, but would have a contrary effect. As he had said, it would add to the unpopularity of the Force, and make the constables more and more distasteful and disagreeable to the people amongst whom they had to act; it would make them hold their heads higher, if that were possible, and make them more and more interfere and meddle with the people, and induce them to put the people to all kinds of inconvenience and trouble.

MR. PARNELL said, he certainly had expected that the Government would have made some attempt or other to justify the powers they sought to obtain under this provision of the clause. The Government were asking protection for the Irish police which they did not claim for policemen in the worst slums in London—in the worst slums of a city—from the river running through which, in the course of the last five years, no less than 599 dead bodies had been taken. There had been that large number of dead bodies taken from the Thames; but there had probably been double that number of undetected murders committed within that period, and yet the Government did not claim, on behalf of the Metropolitan police, the power which they claimed for the Irish stipendiary magistrates in regard to the infliction of sentences on persons who assaulted the police in Ireland. Such was the extraordinarily sanguine character of the Government that they expected everything they said—or they thought, for as yet they had said nothing upon this matter, except through the mouthpiece of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, and his few remarks were certainly not in the slightest degree pertinent to the arguments of his hon. Friend (Mr. Sexton)—but such was the wonderful constitution of this wonderful Ministry that they expected the Committee would give them a clause of this character without the slightest attempt having been made to present a case for its insertion in the Bill. Why, he asked, was it brought in for the protection of the police? Had the police been assaulted in Ireland? ["Yes."] Well, they had 12,000 constables in Ireland; and if hon. Members would look at the statistics of assaults on the police in England, and assaults on the police in Ireland, they would find that the number of cases in England was 10 times greater than the number in Ireland—he did not think he should be over the mark in saying 20 times greater. It had been shown there had been, comparatively speaking, no assaults on the police in Ireland. It had been shown that, owing to their organization and constitution, and the other steps taken by the Government in regard to them, they were not brought into contact or collision with the people; that, as a rule, the people did not assault the police; and that, of all the provisions in this Bill—of all the exclusively severe provisions in this Bill calculated to make the people of Ireland hate the English Government for all eternity, and to keep the gap between the two nations wide open—there was none more severe and detestable than this they were now discussing. Because the police had not been assaulted in Ireland, because no case had been made out—as no case could be made out—they (the Government) asked from this obedient and subservient House these extraordinary and oppressive powers. He submitted that they could not discuss this Amendment satisfactorily without considering the acts and the constitution of the Constabulary Force in Ireland. He had listened very carefully to the Chairman's ruling a while ago with regard to what was falling from the hon. Member for the County of Westmeath (Mr. Sullivan), and he felt it necessary to point out to the Chairman that one of their chief reasons for objecting to this power being conferred on the stipendiary magistrates under this Bill was that the Government, on their side, had not shown that the people had behaved themselves against the police, in the matter of assaults, in such a manner as to render the power necessary. On the contrary, the Irish Members believed that the Government had failed in their contention; and they maintained that they could prove, by the constitution of the Constabulary Force in Ireland, by the character of the Force, and by its action, that it was not entitled to the excessive protection that it was sought to give it under this sub-section. The Irish Constabulary had not shown themselves so judicious in their use of the very large powers and the protection already given them by the law of the land as to entitle them to, or to entitle the Government to, ask for them further protection. During the last six months, if anybody ventured to open his mouth in Ireland, and speak in a sense adverse to the existing Government, he did it at the risk of being picked up two minutes afterwards with about a ton of buckshot in him. If anybody whispered any notion or thought that was apparently intended to make out that anything the late Chief Secretary had done was not perfection and most righteous, he ran the risk of finding, if there was a constable near him, the bayonet of that constable in his body before the breath was out of his lips. He (Mr. Parnell) did not draw an exaggerated picture of the action of the police during the last six months in Ireland, or the way in which they had been encouraged to act by the Government; and although he believed that a change had come over the state of affairs in that country and the spirit of the Government, and that the present Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant did not encourage the police to butcher unoffending women and children in broad daylight in the public streets of the Irish towns, yet—

MR. GOSCHEN rose to Order.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must have heard my ruling—that this is not the time to discuss the services of the Force as a body; it is for the Committee to confine itself simply to the question as to whether special protection should be given to the police or not.

MR. PARNELL said, his argument was simply this—that the continued action of the police in Ireland, and the continued action of the Government, did not make out a case for giving these further powers. If that were not a legitimate argument, he did not know what was. He would not venture for a single moment to dispute the ruling of the Chair; and if the Chairman said he might not point to what had happened in Ireland—to the abuse of power by the authorities and the police in Ireland during the last six months—to show that the Government could not be trusted with further powers, of course he should not press the matter further. He thought, however, he was entitled to use this argument, or that he had legitimate grounds for complaining that part of the rights of the Irish Members had been taken away from them on the present occasion. He would fall back on his original contention, and call on the Government—and he thought they were entitled to call upon it—to make out their case. Why did they want this excessive power? Why did they want this power of sending everybody who looked cross at a policeman to gaol for six months with hard labour? That was practically the effect of this sub-section. Hon. Members knew very well how the Constabulary provoked the people. The police went in the public-houses and acted in a rough way to the people; but if the slightest retaliation was attempted—the retaliation that any man under the circumstances would be betrayed into—it would be construed into an offence under this clause and this Bill, and the man offending would be liable to the penalty of six months' imprisonment. There was not a single particle of foundation for the contention put forward by the Government with regard to this sub-section. They were not entitled, either in consideration of the number or the character of the assaults on the police, to claim this power, than which there had been no instance of so excessive and severe a power being asked for during the 80 years which had elapsed since the Union.

MR. TREVELYAN rose.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN: I wish to speak on the point of Order—

THE CHAIRMAN called upon Mr. Trevelyan.

MR. TREVELYAN said, the case before the Committee at the present moment was one of the very simplest kind. After all that had been said about the qualities of the police, he was sure no one would be found to deny to them—who were the one safeguard for the provision of law and order in Ireland, as elsewhere—that protection necessary to enable them to discharge their functions. If the police in Ireland were all that had been described in some of the speeches just delivered—some of which were, perhaps, too eloquent for the occasion—there could be no doubt that, in many parts of Ireland, the Constabulary stood between the great mass of the people and the domination of "Captain Moonlight." They were told by hon. Members opposite that they ought not to put the police in a privileged position, and give them this exceptional protection. Well, he denied that they were giving them any exceptional protection, or putting them in any privileged position, because they had a particular partiality for policemen. They gave it for the law—by giving it to the police they gave it to every quiet and law-abiding citizen. They were told that exceptional protection was not given to the police in the most dangerous slums of London; but the police in London were not in the position of ordinary individuals in that respect. If an ordinary citizen were assaulted, the punishment for the offence could not exceed one year's imprisonment; but for an assault on a policeman while in the execution of his duty a punishment of two years' imprisonment could be inflicted—

MR. PARNELL said, that protection was not given to policemen in England before Courts of Summary Jurisdiction.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he was going on to say that that severe penalty could only be inflicted upon indictment before a jury; but it had already been decided on principle by the Committee that, in certain parts of Ireland, they could not trust the juries. That point was, therefore, settled; and the question now was, whether they should give the policeman some sort of extra protection which they did not give to the private citizen? Surely, if there was any quarter of the United Kingdom in which the servants and emissaries of the law ought to have special security and protection, and ought to be looked upon with special sanctity, it was Ireland at this moment; and for that very simple reason the Government could not accept this Amendment.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he was glad to observe such a pleasant contrast between the calmness of the Chief Secretary and the somewhat despotism of the Home Secretary. There was no reason whatever why they should not discuss the proposal of his hon. Friend in a spirit of calmness and perfect good humour. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had introduced his proposal in language the moderation of which no one could think of denying, unless it were the Home Secretary, who was not, perhaps, altogether accountable for the temper in which he spoke. While he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) was ready to thank the Chief Secretary for the tone of his remarks, he wished to point out this to the right hon. Gentleman, and recommend it for serious discourse between himself and his conscience. When they were discussing a previous portion of the Bill, the object of which was to suspend trial by jury, the right hon. Gentleman came down with a long array of figures, and was ready to prove—no doubt to his own satisfaction, and to the satisfaction of hon. Members of the Committee—that trial by jury had broken down. But where were his statistics now? He was able to give them a statement as to murders, and the number of prisoners brought to trial; and he had been able to show them the number of cases in which, where trials had taken place, the proceedings had resulted in the acquittal of the persons accused. Where were those statistics now? The right hon. Gentleman's whole case was backed up and founded on the figures that he was able to lay before the Committee. Where were those figures now? The right hon. Gentleman had said, "It has been agreed that trial by jury has broken down." Well, suppose they admitted themselves convinced by the arguments and the figures of the right hon. Gentleman—supposing they admitted that trial by jury had broken down in the case of Ireland, had trial by jury broken down in one single case of assault upon a constable? How could it have broken down in the face of the facts stated by his hon. Friend, and not denied, because it was a fact founded on the official figures of the Government—how could it have broken down in face of the fact that no constable had been assaulted? That was a matter he recommended for serious, if not pious, discourse between the right hon. Gentleman and his conscience, which, he trusted, still remained to the right hon. Gentleman, and would ever remain to him untouched even by the duties of the Office of Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. It was said that the constables should be protected, and so they should when it was proved that they were in need of protection; but it could not be said that a body of men were in need of protection when it had been shown that not one of them had been assaulted.

MR. GIBSON: Within the past few months constables in Ireland have been stoned almost to death.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Within the past five months?

MR. GIBSON: Yes.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, if that was the case, why was it not stated in the official Returns? The police had given Returns of agrarian and other outrages; and if these attacks which were referred to were made upon the Constabulary, surely they were reported, and if they were reported, why were they not mentioned in the document laid on the Table of the House? He was really astonished that he should have to labour an argument upon a question like this before the House—to show that they should not suspend trial by jury in the case of offences which, as a matter of fact, had never taken place. What would be the effect of the clause? The words were "commits an assault on any constable," &c. It did not say what kind of an assault, as an hon. Friend of his had pointed out in an earlier part of the evening. According to the technical interpretation of the law, an assault might mean a man shaking his fist in another person's face. He saw an impatient gesture on the part of the Attorney General for Ireland, who was in the habit of indulging in an amount of facial expression that would do credit to Madame Sarah Bernhardt-Damala in one of her performances. But an assault might mean shaking your fist at a person, or "making a face" at a man, to use an expression adopted by the Attorney General for Ireland when he was defending the rights of the working men of this country. The Irish people were convinced that everyone who even put his finger to his nose to an officer of the law would be liable to six months' imprisonment for thus desecrating that royal person. The Government ought to be ashamed of this clause. If he thought there was any shame in them, he should think there was some virtue in them; but, as he failed to see the shame in the first place, he was afraid every hope of being able to find virtue in Her Majesty's Ministers had gone.

MR. DILLON said, he very well knew there was no need of any special protection for the Constabulary of Ireland; and the reason was that the police-constable in Ireland was armed, while the police-constable in England was not armed. Furthermore, in Ireland, the Constabulary went about in large numbers. Even in the smallest villages their numbers were so great that they were only too able and too ready to protect themselves. An interjection had been made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) to the effect that some policemen had been almost stoned to death within the past few months. If that were so, the offenders could be tried under the ordinary law dealing with grievous assaults. They were not going to hold that a police-constable was not a "person;" but the object of this sub-section was that an assault of a slight character, which could not be placed in the category of an "aggravated crime of violence against the person"—as would be the stoning to death referred to—should be punished with the full rigour of this clause if committed on a constable. The offence under this clause, for which the punishment of the Bill might be inflicted, might be a trifling assault committed in self-defence; and what the Irish Members said was, that it had been brought under their notice—it had been brought prominently under his own notice—that the police in the South and West of Ireland had, in numberless cases, given most frightful provocation to the people.

In one instance, at the beginning of the evictions, and just after his own arrest, he got numberless letters describing how provocation had been given; and in a particular case to which his attention had been called, the special correspondent of The Freeman's Journal of Dublin, a gentleman who was above suspicion in these matters, who was a friend of his own, and a man whose word he knew could be implicitly relied upon, had told him that whilst walking along the road in the performance of his duty as a journalist, he was, without the slightest warning, struck from behind and knocked down. If that man, who was there as a journalist describing the incidents of that famous campaign, had offered any resistance to the police—which, of course, it would have been impossible for him to do, as he was suddenly assailed from behind and knocked down before he had the least idea of what was going to be done—if he had even raised his arm to prevent himself from being struck, that would have been an action that could have been constituted into an offence under this section. The Committee had ample evidence, not only that the police were able to protect themselves, but that they were rather too quick in protecting themselves, and that very often they were the aggressors. If the Government wanted to give the police additional protection, he would say—"Very well, give them additional protection by all means, but deprive them of rifles and bayonets and their military gear, and send them out armed only as the police of any other country are armed; give them the arms that you give the police in this country." But it was absurd to say that policemen who went about with bayonets and carbines and revolvers were unable to protect themselves against trivial assaults. If they were seriously assaulted, then the case would come under the other sub-section; but if the assault was only of a trivial character, then the offence would come under this special sub-section; and he repeated, that in the case of men armed as they were, protection of this kind was absurd and unnecessary.

MR. HEALY said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant if he would state what class of weapons the Constabulary in Ireland were provided with? Was it not the fact that they had the revolver, the carbine, the bayonet, the sword, and the baton? Did they not carry their weapons both to Mass and to market? In no single instance had the arguments the Irish Members had used against this subsection been contradicted, although, in truth, he must say that their arguments in reference to this clause were no better and no worse than they were against any other clause of the Bill. ["Hear, hear."] He was glad to hear an approving cheer from the other side of the House. What was the fact? Why, that since last January there had not been a single assault against the police. The Home Secretary, who, when his Chief was not in the House, was only too glad to have an opportunity of swaggering and using language—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member has used a term which ought not to be used in debate.

Mr. HEALY said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman was only too glad—unlike his Leader the Prime Minister—to treat the Irish Members without the respect that was due to logical argument. They had shown the Home Secretary that in January, February, March, April, and May, there had not, in the whole of Ireland, been a single assault committed upon any constable; and they had asked the Government what answer they could possibly make to that argument? The reply was simply a statement that his hon. Friend had made speeches calculated to incite persons to acts of violence against the police. Not only had there not been any assaults upon the police of recent date, but in other respects this Proviso they were discussing was most unprovoked. It was unprovoked on this ground. It would be remembered that it had been said that one reason for this Act was because they could not get evidence against accused persons; but the evidence in a case where a person was charged with assaulting a policeman would be the evidence of the policeman himself. And it was well known that in Ireland a policeman would never hesitate to swear anything that was necessary to prove his case. He himself had witnessed a circumstance in the South of Ireland which fully substantiated, to his mind, the truth of this assertion. He had witnessed a case in which both policeman and Sub-Inspector went into the box and committed deliberate perjury; and if the Committee took Ireland through they would find that that was the kind of character that the police bore in every village and town in the country.

Mr. M'COAN: Nothing of the kind. I deny the accuracy of the assertion.

Mr. HEALY said, the hon. and learned Member for Wicklow (Mr. M'Coan) was not very well acquainted with Ireland. He believed his knowledge of it was entirely confined to the period of an election contest.

Mr. M'COAN: It is perfectly untrue that the police bear that character, and that that is the feeling that exists all over Ireland with regard to the Constabulary.

Mr. BORLASE rose to Order. He wished to ask the Chairman whether the observations of the hon. Member for Wexford were in Order, and whether the character of a whole body of men could be blackened in this manner?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member, if he makes use of these statements, must do it on his own responsibility; but I cannot say they are un-Parliamentary.

Mr. HEALY said, he had stated that which he knew to be the case on his own responsibility. ["No, no!"] Yes, at least what he had stated he had stated on his own responsibility—it could not be contradicted, and he adhered to what he had said. The Irish Constabulary had three functions. In the first place, if they found a donkey straying on the road they impounded it; secondly, if they found a man in charge of a cart with no name on it they arrested him; and, thirdly, when they found a man drunk in the streets, they took him to the police-barrack, locked him up, and afterwards brought him before a magistrate. These were their duties; but, so far as the detection of crime was concerned, the Force was perfectly useless.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is now discussing the merits of the police. That question has already been ruled out of Order, and I, therefore, must request him to confine himself to the Amendment before us.

Mr. HEALY said, he was showing the necessity for the Amendment; but if the Chairman ruled him out of Order, he must put those particular matters aside. He would stand on the general declaration that in the Return furnished to the House it was not shown that during the past five months there had been a single assault on the police. The Chief Secretary was famous for his statistics; yet he had not ventured to give one single instance in support of his demand for the inclusion of this word "constable" in the sub-section. That was only another specimen of the way in which the Government dealt with the arguments of Irish Members. To the arguments of the Irish Members, whether good, bad, or indifferent, the answer given to them was always the same—namely, "They had made up their minds." But for the purpose of exposing the character of the provisions of this Bill, and the pretensions and the conduct of the Government, his hon. Friends were determined to proceed, not only with this, but with all other Amendments.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he had risen to speak several times on a point of Order.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member cannot rise to speak on a point of Order that has been already settled.

MR. PLUNKET said, it was really impossible for those who did nothing to protract the debate, and who desired that it should not be protracted, to sit still and listen to such attacks upon the Irish Constabulary. An attack had been made upon the Constabulary, and reasons had been given why the Force should not receive the protection which it was proposed to give them by this Bill. The police were described by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton)—in language of unusual exaggeration for him—as cruel, dissolute, and drunken; and that charge had not been supported by a shadow of evidence or an iota of proof. Yet, everyone had sat still; even the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had sat still. Instantly, the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had risen in fine phrensy, and challenged the right hon. and learned Gentleman, asking why he did not reply and answer his hon. Friend? The reply of the Home Secretary was—"I do not wish to give prominence to these exaggerations—to these charges;" and the right hon. and learned Gentleman sat down. Then came this flood of abuse against the Constabulary. He was not going to press this matter further, as it would be out of Order to do so; but this he would say, speaking with a far greater knowledge of Ireland than was possessed by the hon. Member who had just sat down, that the members of the Irish Constabulary were the sons and brothers of the farmers of Ireland, and the most respectable men of the class to which they belonged—

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN: said, he rose to Order. He wished to ask the Chairman, if the adverse criticisms of some hon. Members were out of Order, were not the eulogies pronounced on the Irish police by the right hon. and learned Gentleman also out of Order?

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. and learned Gentleman was simply answering in a sentence the very strong censures passed on the police by the hon. Member for Wexford, which I, when challenged, ruled were not un-Parliamentary, but must rest on the hon. Member's own responsibility. I am sure the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Plunket) is not going to carry the discussion any further.

MR. PLUNKET said, it was not his intention to pursue this matter further; but this he would say, that, until three years ago, this clause would have been as unnecessary for the protection of the Constabulary of Ireland as for the protection of any class in Her Majesty's Dominions. There were no men better trusted or more respected in Ireland through all times of trouble and disorder. But it was said by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway on that side of the House that Parliament should not protect the Constabulary from common assault because they were armed and went about in large bodies. Why was it necessary that they should carry these arms now, if it had never been necessary before? The Constabulary had gone about the country armed like ordinary police until the last three years. [Cries of "Never, never; not for 20 years!"] If the advice of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway was followed, these outrages would go on; the Constabulary would be armed with carbines and bayonets; the Force would do its duty, as it had done during the last two or three years, and nothing might interfere for a time to disturb the normal condition of things; but at some unexpected moment, and under fearful provocation, a terrible fray would break out, when serious injury would be done to the people, and another great accusation would be made against the Irish Constabulary, whose duty it had been to maintain law and order in that country.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken had managed, like so many other speakers from the Front Bench, to altogether avoid the point put by the Mover of the Amendment. The argument of his hon. Friend was not founded on the misconduct of the Irish police, but upon the Reports sent in by the Government. For five months there had not been a single Report in which mention was made of an agrarian assault upon the police. That was the case; let the Government answer it if they could. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had said that it was only within the last three years that the Constabulary had gone about armed with carbines, bayonets, and revolvers; but a right hon. Member in the House had seen the Constabulary armed in that manner 14 years ago. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) visited Ireland 14 years ago, he found every Irish policeman with a bayonet by his side. Whenever the conduct of the police was challenged, the reply was always the same—"They are sons and brothers of the Irish farmers." But was it, he would ask, the sons and brothers of the Irish farmers who killed M'Cormick, who killed an old woman in County Mayo, and did all those acts which had made the Force stink in the nostrils of the people?

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he hoped there would be an increasing disposition manifested to discuss this matter without passion. He did not endorse the description that had been given of the Constabulary Force by his hon. Friends near him; but, at the same time, he was bound to confess that he was far from endorsing the sweeping eulogy of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket). He thought a distinction ought to be made between the rank-and-file of the Constabulary and those leaders of the Constabulary who, on some occasions, were placed in authority. The hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the Committee was quite right in recalling certain circumstances which had occurred in the county which he (Mr. O'Connor Power) represented, and in speaking of these circumstances as discreditable to the Force; but they were discreditable to the officers, and not to the men, and they had had, not solitary instances, but frequent instances, of the same thing. When the Chief Secretary said that in the present condition of Ireland the life of a policeman, without any distinction of grade, and without any qualification as to the person, was to be regarded with particular sanctity, he took leave to say that the lives of the people of Ireland ought also to be regarded with particular sanctity. He would venture to say that in the towns of Belmullet and Ballina, more harm had been done to the cause of law and order, and the lives of the people, and the peace and tranquillity of the country, by the mal-administration of the officers of the police, than by any other party in the county he represented.

DR. COMMINS said, he had known the Irish police for 40 years, and he never remembered them to go about unarmed; they had always worn sidearms. Surely it was within the knowledge of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary that one of the rules issued from the head-quarters of the Constabulary in Dublin was that no Irish policeman should go on duty without his sidearms. The men always went about in two's, and, unfortunately, they carried themselves with a swaggering air; and the result of their demeanour, and the fact that they were an armed soldiery rather than a police, made them to be regarded as a kind of standing menace to the people. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin had insinuated that whatever imputations were made on the character of the police were entirely the result of the action of a section of the Irish Members during the last two or three years. Would the right hon. and learned Gentleman take a description of the Irish Constabulary given by an impartial foreigner 20 years ago?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Member must remember that the question before the Committee is simply as to assaults on the police.

DR. COMMINS said, that was so; and he desired, as much as anyone, to adhere to the question under discussion.

He maintained that the ordinary law was sufficient to protect the constable, and that if they were not trained into the adoption of an offensive manner, there would be fewer assaults upon them than perhaps there were. He had been just about to call attention to the opinion of an impartial foreigner. It had been said that the charges against the Constabulary rested entirely upon the testimony of a few of the Irish Members who sat below the Gangway on the Opposition side of the House; but he appealed to the evidence of Dr. Olenberg, a gentleman celebrated in German literature, who had travelled, 20 years ago, in Ireland. He did not know whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman had ever read Dr. Olenberg's beautiful book; but if he had not, he would point out to him that that writer's description of the Irish policeman was simply "a cosmopolitan ruffian." Well, he (Dr. Commings) was afraid that the Irish policeman was a greater "cosmopolitan ruffian" to-day than he was 20 years ago; and he was afraid that it was that same cosmopolitan ruffianism which had led to those scenes which had recently been witnessed at Belmullet and Ballina. Certainly, the existing law was quite sufficient for the protection of the police without giving them these extra provisions. If this sub-section were adopted in its unamended form, he believed it would be largely to stimulate those qualities which had made the police so offensive to the people.

Mr. MARUM said, that, having had a good deal of experience of the Irish Constabulary, he should not be acting fairly towards them if he did not say that he had always found them to be respectable men. He had had a great deal to do with them, and felt bound to testify to their good conduct and exceptional character. He altogether concurred in the observations which had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for the County of Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) with regard to the character of the men; but, at the same time, he was bound to admit that the officers in command of them sometimes acted very imprudently. They did so at Ballyragget—the Attorney General for Ireland might smile.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): I did nothing of the kind.

Dr. Commings

Mr. MARUM said, that the Ballyragget case had been investigated, and no punishments had been inflicted; but he must say that the officers in command of the Constabulary had acted very imprudently, and one person had lost his life through a stab from behind. As to the rank-and-file, however, he could not allow imputations to be hurled indiscriminately at them without rising to say what he knew about them.

Mr. T. D. SULLIVAN said, that if the Committee really knew what an Irish policeman was, there might be some hope of winning hon. Members over to the views of himself and his Friends. Their argument was, that the Committee had not the faintest idea of what were the character and functions of the Irish police. He would not pursue this point further; but this much, in justice to himself and all present, he felt bound to say for the Irish police—in many respects they were a body of men of whom Irishmen should be proud. They were, as had been said, the sons and brothers of the Irish farmers; they were true specimens of the Irish race, and very different were they from the pictures of the Irish people, from the type of Irishmen put before the eyes of the English people day after day in the illustrated journals of this country. They were a fine, able, and courageous body of men, and their faults, such as they were, were made for them by the Government under which they lived. They were a spoilt body of men. In any other capacity they would do credit to the country; but as policemen, they were failures.

Mr. T. C. THOMPSON said, he wished to explain, in a very few words, why he could not vote with his hon. Friends opposite on this occasion. They were now considering what was to be done to a person who assaulted the police in the execution of their duty. In the case of a common assault the punishment was two months' imprisonment or fine, and that was imposed by magistrates in Petty Sessions. They could eliminate that point altogether, because the Government had undertaken to put in the words "in the execution of his duty," or something to that effect. Now, then, they had to consider what was to be done to a person who assaulted a policeman in the performance of his duty. Persons were ordinarily indicted before a jury for that offence; but under this Bill there might be no jury. As far as he was concerned, he had not joined in the attack on the Irish juries. He believed they had endeavoured to do their duty. No doubt, in time of great commotion and political excitement, they might have been betrayed into some mistakes; but the Committee must look forward to the time when juries would be without reproach. Now, if a person was brought before a jury charged with assaulting a constable whilst in the discharge of his duty, and found guilty, he was liable to two years' imprisonment. But, under this Bill, a person would be tried before one legal gentleman, with an assessor, and, when convicted, his punishment would be limited to six months. He, therefore, contended that a person assaulting a policeman in the execution of his duty under this Bill would be in a much better position than he was in before. In the first place, he would not have to wait to be tried, but would be tried at once; and, in the next place, he would receive a mitigated punishment. He (Mr. Thompson) hoped that on that occasion no unwise speeches would be made, but that hon. Gentlemen opposite would lay aside their angry passions, and that the Amendment would be withdrawn.

MR. GLADSTONE said, there were two points before the Committee—one of them related to the Amendment proposed, and the case of the Government in asking for special legislation in regard to Ireland; and the other related to the general character of the police. Some of the speeches he had heard, and others that had been described to him, seemed to have been delivered by hon. Gentlemen with a very inadequate sense of that responsibility which they had mentioned, but which they did not seem to be alive to. It was a very serious matter if Members of that House described those charged with the execution of the law, in the circumstances Ireland was now in, in language of vituperation—for that was not too strong a word, considering the epithets which had been applied to the police. He must say it appeared to him that if it were true that this body of police in Ireland deserved the application of such epithets, they deserved a great deal more than having them applied to their character in speeches delivered in that House to-day, and, so far as the House was concerned, perhaps forgotten to-morrow. They ought to be embodied in specific charges; they ought to be embodied in some distinct and definite issue. But, if it were true that the Government intrusted the execution of the law in Ireland to men who deserved such a description, then, indeed, the subject was one of the utmost gravity, and one that ought not to be lightly dealt with. But these irresponsible epithets in passing speeches, delivered, perhaps, in a moment of excitement, but, at any rate, speeches which carried with them no practical responsibility, which were not brought to account, and which invited no test, and admitted of no test, whether they were true or false, was not the mode in which a matter so grave ought to be treated. No one had a right to weaken the arm of the Executive Government for the enforcement of the law, unless it were true that the charges could be made good, and proof given of the unworthiness of the Force. He must confess he believed, for the most part, there was a character of great novelty in these accusations. In general the character of the Constabulary in Ireland had been criticized upon grounds entirely apart from the character and conduct of those who composed it. The question that used to be raised was, whether it was a Force with too much of a military and too little of a civil character. But here were totally different matters. As to the courage and conduct of these men, he believed that from one end of the country to the other there was but one opinion. When those condemnations against the Irish Constabulary—as vague as they were strong, and as vague as they were violent—had been uttered in that House, it was but fair to place upon record the fact that they proceeded from a very small minority of Irish Members. They were not sustained by the general sense of the Representatives of the people, and their character had been such, and the moral impression produced by them had been such, that his hon. Friend (Mr. Thompson), sitting on that (the Ministerial) side of the House, who had made himself conspicuous beyond almost any of the English or Scotch Members in giving sympathy and support to the opinions of hon. Gentlemen opposite, had been repelled from that co-operation—he had been repelled by the character of those attacks. As to the arguments against the proposal of the Government, it was said that this Government had no case, because, since a recent date, there had been no attack upon a member of the Constabulary Force in Ireland. But he must say that when they were engaged in an operation of this description, and when they were introducing an enlargement of summary jurisdiction, it was necessary to proceed upon a basis of a general character. It was not necessary to prove specific cases, and to make good imputations and accusations, when they were making changes of this character. If they were making a change that was cruel and severe on any class of the community, the case would be different; but they were doing no such thing. They were giving a great mitigation of the sentence that might be inflicted. Under these circumstances, he begged the Committee to recollect that it was not in the power of any Government to come down from week to week, and from month to month, and ask Parliament for fresh Amendments to and a fresh adjustment of work of this kind. They must take a general view of what had been happening in Ireland, and what offences had come into vogue, and what dangers might be considered to have arisen on the horizon of the future. It was by these things they must be guided in making their proposals; and it was no argument in support of the contention of the unreasonableness of the changes to say that some months had elapsed since there had been an attack on the police in Ireland.

[Tenth Night.]

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he had not the good fortune to live in Ireland; therefore, he could not speak with the force of hon. Friends around him as to the character of the Constabulary. He had observed, however, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket), who did live in Ireland, spoke in strong terms of the statement to the effect that the Constabulary had been long armed with bayonets. Well, he (Mr. M'CCarthy) could remember the Irish police much longer than the right hon. and learned Gentleman could. He could remember them 40 years ago, and he could say that in those days they used to wear the bayonet, the old-fashioned triangular sidearm. There had been no change in this respect, therefore, for at least 40 years. He wished to bring the Committee back to the real question before it—namely, was there to be a special protection for the police? Was there any special necessity for their protection? Had there been, recently, any increase in the number of attacks on the Police Force in Ireland? If the figures brought forward by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) were incorrect, surely their incorrectness could be shown in the easiest possible way, and the Home Secretary could tell what had rendered this special legislation necessary. He understood that there had been no assaults on the police in Ireland this year arising out of agrarian crime. The Home Secretary had got into an exalted mood over the figures, and said he was not going to concern himself in replying to mere statistics. But how could they judge of a question of this kind without consulting the figures which the Home Secretary despised? The action of the Home Secretary recalled to his mind a dispute between two German philosophers, one of whom contended that to have and not to have were exactly the same thing. When the other, in reply, asked whether to have 100 dollars and not to have 100 dollars were the same thing, the first-named philosopher grandly declared that he could not concern himself about dollars. That was the mood of the right hon. and learned Gentleman—he could not concern himself about figures; but he (Mr. M'CCarthy) being of a much humbler order of mind, and not knowing very much about the minutiae of this question, owing to his long residence in England, wanted to learn something about the occasion for this special protection of the police apart from the existing very efficient laws. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had stated that there had been no assaults of an agrarian character on the police this year. He was convinced by that fact that there was no occasion for special legislation. He urged the right hon. and learned Gentleman for one moment to come down from his Olympian heights of statesmanship and give some practical justification for the extraordinary proposal he made.

MR. CORRY said, he had abstained hitherto from taking part in these debates; but the attacks made on the Police Force on this occasion were such that he, as one who had lived for so long a time, and had seen and known, perhaps, more about the Irish police than some other Members from Ireland, wished to bear his testimony to their efficiency, and to the fact that they were a most respectable class of men, and performed their duties very satisfactorily. With reference to the assaults on the police, he was very glad to see this clause in the Bill, because he felt that the police were not so well protected as they ought to be, and he hoped the Government would stand firmly by the clause.

COLONEL O'BEIRNE wished to refute altogether the attacks made on the police by some hon. Members opposite. He had seen a great deal of the police, and had had occasion to compare their discipline and conduct with some of the best regiments in Her Majesty's Service. In regard to discipline and conduct, they compared very well with any regiment in the Service, and the attacks made upon them were quite unjustifiable.

MR. O'KELLY maintained that, notwithstanding the general good conduct of the police in Ireland, there were occasions when they were guilty of acts of gross violence towards the people, and when they conducted themselves in a most violent and disorderly manner. About a year ago there was some disturbance in the town of Roscommon, and the police very properly cleared the streets. But, while performing that duty, they broke into the houses of the residents and clubbed men who had nothing whatever to do with the disturbances; and in one case, while three or four of these policemen, were clubbing an old man in his own house, one of these very orderly policemen whom the Prime Minister loved to honour, was holding the old man's daughter at bay with a drawn bayonet when she was trying to protect her father. He himself had had an opportunity, on one occasion, of testing the tyrannical conduct of these police. Arriving in Roscommon about 11 o'clock one night, some of the boys of the town came down to meet him and formed a procession. There was perfect quiet and order in the town; but, suddenly, the County Inspector drove by on a car, and, seeing the procession, ordered four policemen to disperse it, although they were not interfering with anybody. The four policemen were drawn across the street in the dark with their loaded guns, which he found pointed in his face. That was an evidence of the good order of the policemen; but he was sure no soldier would be guilty of such an outrage, and no Government ought to permit such an act of ruffianism. It would, however, be useless to make any complaint of these occurrences, and no complaint was made of this instance.

THE CHAIRMAN: I hope any hon. Members who speak will speak to the Amendment, and not to the general conduct of the police.

MR. HEALY said, the Prime Minister had challenged hon. Members to bring forward specific charges against the police. The argument was that the conduct of these police led to assaults, and the Prime Minister said statements were made without being supported by particular cases. If anybody would turn to the Books of the House they would find that at least 1,000 Questions had been put to the late Chief Secretary in which allegations were made against the police, but which the right hon. Gentleman refused to inquire into. It was due to the present Chief Secretary to state that his conduct had been very different to that, for, in every instance of complaint, at least an inquiry had been made. The Prime Minister made two conflicting statements. First, with reference to the figures, he said it was not necessary to make good accusation and allegation; and then he said a general view must be taken of what had happened and was likely to happen in Ireland. That was exactly the position of the hon. Members; but they did not take up such an extreme position as to say that it was not necessary to make good allegation and accusation. But what right had the right hon. Gentleman to charge him with bringing vague charges against the police, when he himself made the statement that it was not necessary to make good allegation and accusation? The right hon. Gentleman had two voices—for Irish Members figures proved nothing; for him (Mr. Gladstone) they proved everything, and were incontestable. Irish Members had shown that this year there had been no assaults on the police arising out of agrarian cases, and the answer of the Prime Minister was that a general view must be taken. The arguments contradicted each other, and would not at all hang together.

Mr. REDMOND said, he did not share the view of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket), who eulogized the police in almost extravagant terms. At the same time, he did not entirely share the opinions of those who had, in an equally extravagant way, denounced the entire Police Force. No one felt more strongly than he that very many cases of cruelty, and almost barbarity, had occurred in regard to the conduct of the police. In particular cases there could be no question that very great cruelty had been perpetrated by members of the Police Force. And no one could read what happened at Ballina and other places, where even women had been stabbed to death by the police, without acknowledging that he was strongly of opinion that those cases did not afford justification for the general condemnation of the entire body. He would not enter more fully into this matter, as the Chairman had ruled that the conduct of the Constabulary could not be discussed now; but he thought he was justified in making that remark. But the case in favour of this Amendment did not rest upon a charge against the Constabulary Force. The case of Irish Members was simply that trial by jury had not failed in cases of assaults against constables, for the very simple reason that there had been no assaults at all; and only the Government could prove by figures that there had been cases of assaults by constables, and that juries had refused to convict. He submitted that they had absolutely no justification for the proposal in this Bill. The Prime Minister had said it was conceded that trial by jury must be abolished in certain parts of Ireland, and, therefore, the Committee could not go into each particular offence; but what he (Mr. Redmond) contended was that by Sub-section (c), which had already been passed, assaults upon constables were covered. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket), when he said there had been no assaults on constables, made the remark that a number of constables had been stoned to death; but surely a case of that kind came under other sections of the Bill, and Sub-section (c) provided that any person charged with an aggravated assault upon a policeman should be tried by magistrates without a jury. That provision covered all aggravated assaults against constables and trivial assaults, and for more important offences there was this special tribunal. But before the Government took this special tribunal, they were bound to produce evidence that trial by jury had failed in this respect. He did not think Sub-section (c) was at all required to cover aggravated assaults against constables, because previous sections, already passed, gave sufficient power for that purpose.

Mr. R. POWER desired to express his regret that so much heat had been thrown into this debate, and to say that he could not join in the wholesale denunciations which had been made of the Constabulary. He quite agreed that there had been cases in which they had acted very cruelly and unjustly, and he could give many such instances; but it was most unjust and unfair to describe a body of men like the Royal Constabulary—a class numbering 12,000 men—as a body of murderers, and he wished to enter his protest against such a charge. At the same time, he thought extra police protection was unnecessary and uncalled for, and that this clause would render the Constabulary Force more unpopular than it had hitherto been.

Mr. METGE said, he had had some connection with the police, and he also disagreed with the wholesale denunciations of that Force which some hon. Members had indulged in. At the same time, the argument that there had been not one iota of foundation for the charges against the police was manifestly false, because, over and over again, particular cases of misconduct by the Constabulary had been substantiated. The danger of this clause seemed to him to be, that while it protected the police, it afforded no protection to those cases in which the constables could use their authority to drive the people into the commission of those very assaults for which they would be prosecuted. He had in his mind a case where the police, acting on their own individual responsibility, had aggravated the people beyond the limits of human endurance; and in cases of that kind it was very hard that, while the police were to be afforded protection under this clause, the people would have no protection at all.

MR. LEAMY said, he was inclined to oppose this Amendment, because, at the present time, the magistrates had power to give two months' imprisonment for assaults upon the police, while, under this Bill, they would be able to impose six months. He should not have seen much objection to increasing the period of imprisonment for assaults on the police, if the Home Secretary had accepted any qualification of the word "assault;" but he must not be held by the views he expressed as endorsing the serious charges which had been made against the Constabulary. In some cases he had condemned the action of the Constabulary as strongly as anybody, and his chief objection to the Force was its military character. If it were a civil force, as the police were in England, there would be much less objection to it.

MR. CALLAN said, he had not risen before, because he found that he was only called upon to rise when there was no other Member to speak.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member has twice made that remark. He imputes partiality to the Chair, and I must ask him to withdraw the expression.

MR. CALLAN withdrew the remark, and expressed his regret that his hon. Friends behind him had selected the words "any constable" upon which to found an Amendment. He had known the Irish police officers; and he thought it only right, knowing the police as well as he did, to express his divergence from the opinion of those who had condemned the Irish Constabulary. He believed a great deal of the irritation complained of had been caused by the officers, and not by the men themselves. He considered the Irish Police Force a model Force for high character, and the conscientious discharge of their duties, subject to the unfair and undue influence of their superior officers.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must see that this Amendment is not on the merits of the police, but is only upon the question whether they are to be protected from assault.

MR. CALLAN thought he had a right to discuss the conduct of the officers of the Constabulary.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have told the hon. Member that he is out of Order in discussing the general character of the police. He must speak of the Amendment, and I must not warn him again.

MR. CALLAN said, he had a right to discuss what the Constabulary was. He had heard hon. Members behind him discuss that point without being called to Order.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have as much as possible tried to keep the Committee within the Amendment. I have constantly spoken of the irrelevancy of the remarks made. The hon. Member cannot speak on this subject, and this is the last time I shall warn him.

MR. CALLAN said, he was simply speaking with reference to aggravated assaults on the police. Assaults with violence upon constables ought to be punished more than assaults on any other person. Many of the remarks made on the police had been made without a proper appreciation of the way in which they had done their duty, and he had endeavoured to point out that much of the ill-feeling against the police had been raised, not by their conduct, but by the conduct of their officers. He had never heard of an Irish policeman saying to a civilian that he would take him by the throat and throw him into a mill-race, if he said a word of opprobrium; but he had heard a Sub-Inspector say that. If the Sub-Inspector was to be allowed to use such language to a civilian, that would be a constructive assault, and he did not know why there should be extra punishment imposed upon a civilian if he used similar language to the police. The whole of the opprobrium and obloquy attached to the Police Force in Ireland was due to the action of the superior officers, and, therefore, he could not support the Amendment, although it had been proposed by some of his own Friends, and he should be obliged to walk out of the House if a division took place.

MR. SEXTON said, he had not made any general charge whatever, and he was astonished to hear the Prime Minister dealing with general charges. He had simply asserted the proved competency of juries to deal with these cases, and referred to specific cases in Dublin and Mayo, and said that, in view of the agrarian nature of the services which the police had to perform, and the hardships which they had to undergo, it was desirable that the civilians should have the protection of the jury.

[Tenth Night.]

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 154; Noes 25: Majority 129.—(Div. List, No. 184.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he wished to add, at the end of Subsection (d), the words "whilst in the execution of his duty or in consequence thereof."

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 39, after the word "law," to add the words "whilst in the execution of his duty or in consequence thereof."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. PARNELL said, he would ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether he would not agree to leave the latter part of the Amendment out—namely, the words "or in consequence thereof?" The Amendment was vague, but it did not need very much alteration. He should be unwilling to divide the Committee on the matter; but, in order to put the thing in proper form, he would move to amend the proposed Amendment by leaving out the words he had mentioned.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to leave out the words "or in consequence thereof."—(Mr. Parnell.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, it would be impossible to accept the Amendment for the reason that, although a constable would be under protection in the immediate discharge of his duty, as soon as that duty was over—it might be whilst he was on his way to it or returning home from it—he would not be under protection, and that might be the most dangerous part of the business. The object of the words it was proposed to omit was to protect a policeman whilst he was going to or returning from his duty.

Dr. COMMINS said, in England the time to go on or off duty was fixed by the Police Rules, and assaults committed upon them during the time they were going on duty or going off were considered assaults committed while they were on duty. It would be so in the case of the Irish constables, and there was no necessity for the alteration. It would be quite unnecessary to add the words, and their addition might do a great deal of harm. Suppose, for instance, a policeman, after his duties had ceased, or before he went home, called at a public-house, and suppose he there got into a row and an attack was made upon him, he would be able, if this Amendment were passed in its present form, to say that the attack was made upon him whilst returning from his duty. Or he might say that the assault was committed upon him in consequence of a duty he had performed six months before. In that way it would cover all cases of assault upon a constable, even in a case where one of these men intruded himself where he was not welcome. The Constabulary would be furnished with excuses, when they drew assaults upon themselves, to say they were attacked in consequence of some active duty they had performed.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it could not be seriously contended that when a policeman had been on duty and was returning home that he was not to be protected. He might be going out on duty all night—could it be said that he was not to be protected on going to his duty in the evening or returning on the following day? What was the use of defending a man whilst on his beat if at the very instant he went off duty the protection was not to apply to him?

Mr. T. D. SULLIVAN said, that under this Amendment a policeman would be under protection for an assault which might be committed upon him in consequence of what he had done six weeks before.

Mr. SEXTON said, that policemen off duty were never assaulted in Ireland; whenever assaults did occur, it was when the policemen were in the act of discharging their duty, and, therefore, the cases cited by the right hon. and learned Gentleman of policemen being assaulted whilst returning from their duty were altogether imaginary. The Amendment he had on the Paper, proposing to limit the clause to agrarian offences, he should withdraw, as the matter had already been discussed, and he hoped the Home Secretary would reciprocate the spirit in which he did that by meeting arrangement by arrangement. He hoped the Home Secretary would follow the example of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket), who knew how to be impressive without being offensive, and who did not mistake invective for argument—who knew how to argue great political questions without indulging in abuse.

Amendment to Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (Mr. Attorney General for Ireland) agreed to.

Mr. P. MARTIN said, he wished to add two paragraphs to the end of the clause to the effect that—

"The expression 'unlawful assembly' shall mean an assembly of three or more persons, who, with intent to carry out any common purpose, assemble in such a manner, or so conduct themselves when assembled as to cause persons in the neighbourhood of such assembly to fear, on reasonable grounds, that the persons so assembled will disturb the peace tumultuously, or will, by such assembly, needlessly, and without any reasonable cause, provoke other persons to disturb the peace tumultuously;

"And the expression 'riot' shall mean an unlawful assembly which has begun to act in a tumultuous manner to the disturbance of the peace."

He did think it was desirable there should be some definition of these two expressions, "unlawful assembly" and "riot," because, although they could be said to be words well known to the Judges, yet there had been some difference of opinion, even amongst Judges, when, defining those offences and explaining to a jury what acts rendered the parties accused of their commission liable. And the Committee ought also to look to the fact that it was not exactly a tribunal of Judges who would have to decide questions arising under this section, but that they would go before an inferior tribunal. He proposed, then, to make the law certain on this question, so that there could be no diversity between different tribunals. The tribunals should have some clear definition on which they could decide in cases of "unlawful assembly" and "riot" under the Act. If the Committee would remember the discussion that took place the other evening, they would agree with him that a greater proof could not be given of the necessity of a tribunal of this kind having this definition before them. The definition which the Chief Secretary had given of "an unlawful assembly" was certainly not one that should be adopted in the present day by the Judges. What he (Mr. P. Martin) believed to be the essence of an "unlawful assembly" was an assembly which was calculated, in the minds of calm and rational people, to produce danger to the peace and turmoil in a neighbourhood. It was not a question whether a meeting had assembled for an unlawful purpose; but, having regard to the language made use of, having regard to the persons present, and having regard to the acts of the leaders of the movement, whether the meeting would be likely to endanger the public peace. The definition which he proposed had been sanctioned by authority, and was, as he submitted, exhaustive and comprehensive. As he had stated, the tribunal that would have to judge of these cases would not be a tribunal that would be likely to have books of reference and authorities to refer to to guide them upon all the circumstances which went to constitute an "unlawful assembly;" therefore, was it not better that there should be a definition embodied in the Act? Without something to guide them, the magistrates, where five, or seven, or nine, or a dozen people met together for some purpose they might consider unlawful—as poaching—though those persons did not intend to, or, in fact, excited terror or dread to others, and the circumstances of their meeting were not likely to endanger the peace, might say, "This is an unlawful assembly, and comes under the Act." He wished to render it impossible for them to say that; and he wished, therefore, to lay down a definition to enable the magistrates to come to a certain and just determination. As they had attempted to give a definition of intimidation, he thought it was still more desirable that they should give definitions of "unlawful assembly" and "riot." In that belief he brought forward this Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 40, after "Act," insert—
"In this Act, the expression 'unlawful assembly' shall mean an assembly of three or more persons, who, with intent to carry out any common purpose, assemble in such a manner, or so conduct themselves when assembled as to cause persons in the neighbourhood of such assembly to fear, on reasonable grounds, that the persons so assembled will disturb the peace tumultuously, or will, by such assembly, needlessly, and without any reasonable cause, provoke other persons to disturb the peace tumultuously;

"And the expression 'riot' shall mean an unlawful assembly which has begun to act in a tumultuous manner to the disturbance of the peace."—(Mr. Patrick Martin.)

[Tenth Night.]

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had to congratulate the hon. and learned Member for the County of Kilkenny (Mr. P. Martin) that he had produced a definition which, as far as he (the Attorney General) could judge, was very correct indeed; in fact, he could not take any exception to it as a definition. He congratulated the hon. and learned Member on his research, his power of thought, and his originality in producing a definition that would stand the test of investigation. He was satisfied that no member of the English Bar could have produced such a definition; and, seeing that a member of the Irish Bar had been able to do it, there was surely no reason why they should not intrust the Irish Judges with the duty of attempting the same thing, especially when they had such a valuable vade mecum as this definition before them. He failed to see why, when they had the assistance of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the County of Kilkenny, those whose duty it was to give the definition should not be able to arrive at a proper one. The question was, should they put any definition at all in the Statute? The Committee must bear in mind, if one person could produce a definition in that way, was it not dangerous that they, acting as a Legislative Body, should accept that one particular definition, to the exclusion of all other definitions? His hon. and learned Friend had said that, because they had the definition of intimidation in the Bill, they ought also to have definitions of "unlawful assembly" and "riot." But it was not correct that they had put the definition of intimidation in the Bill, and they had been found fault with by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite because they had not done so. If they had gone into a definition of that one offence, they would have had to define many other offences—such, for instance, as murder, treason, assault. He thought if they accepted this Amendment, the precedent would be a very dangerous one. Because his hon. and learned Friend had, with rare acumen, been able to discover a definition in one case—he did not know where else the definition could have come from but out of his own resources—it might be said that, therefore, they should define all other offences.

The moment they accepted that Amendment, it would be for hon. Gentlemen opposite to say, "Why don't you define such and such an offence?" He trusted, therefore, that the hon. and learned Gentleman would be satisfied with the sincere compliment he (the Attorney General) desired to pay him, and would not insist on inserting his Amendment in the Bill.

Question put, and negatived.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 176; Noes 34: Majority 142.—(Div. List, No. 135.)

Clause 6 (Unlawful associations).

MR. PARNELL proposed an Amendment, to insert, in Sub-section (a), after the word "is," the words "and persists in remaining." The sub-section seemed to him a very extraordinary one. It provided that—

"Every person who is a member of an unlawful association, as defined by this Act, shall be guilty of an offence against this Act;"

and, then, turning to Clause 27 of the Act, defining "unlawful association," he found that the words "unlawful association" meant—

"An association formed or carrying on operations (a) for the commission of crimes; or (b) for encouraging or aiding persons to commit crimes;"

and the term "crime" meant—

"Any offence against this Act, and also any crime punishable on indictment by imprisonment with hard labour, or by any greater punishment."

While, by this 6th clause, membership of an unlawful association, as defined by the Act, was made an offence against the Act, by Clause 27 an association formed for carrying on operations for the commission of crimes, or for encouraging persons to commit crimes, was an offence against the Act; and thus it would happen that, if two magistrates held that any local association for tenant right, or otherwise, was an association formed for purposes of intimidation or for encouraging or aiding persons to commit intimidation, every member of that association, no matter how guiltless he might be of any desire to participate in encouraging intimidation or in intimidation itself, and no matter how much opposed he might be to intimidation, would be liable to be found guilty by a judicial decision of two magistrates that the association to which he belonged was unlawful. Every member of that association would be liable to be found guilty as a matter of consequence under the Act, and would be liable to six months' imprisonment with hard labour. His Amendment had a limiting effect, and he submitted that that was a proper and necessary effect in connection with this portion of the clause. His object in moving the Amendment—it might be possible to carry out the object in better words, and he would leave that to the Government if they accepted the principle—was, that where a judicial decision had been given that an association was an unlawful association, any member of that association might be entitled to escape punishment by withdrawing from membership.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 2, after the word "is," to insert the words "and persists in remaining."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, nothing could be further from the desire of the Government than that any man should be punished under this section for any act which he did not participate in. The meaning of this section was, that it should be an offence under the Act to be a member of an association which was defined in Clause 27 as an association for the commission or encouragement of crimes. He gathered that the hon. Member for the City of Cork agreed to that extent to the proposition that membership of such an association should be an offence.

MR. PARNELL: I have not agreed to that proposition yet, because I have not come to it.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, any person who was a member of an association which was formed, as would be shown by what was done, for the commission or encouragement of crime, would be guilty of an offence under the Act. No doubt, if any member of such an association showed that he was not in any way cognizant of the objects of the association, or in any way a party to the contemplation by the association of the commission or encouraging of crimes, that man ought to be protected; and, so far, he agreed with the hon. Member for the City of Cork. But he did not think this Amendment would effect that, because "is, and persists in remaining" might mean a man who had known all the time the character of the association, and that it was an unlawful association; and such a person ought not to escape penalties. If the hon. Member would be satisfied with his assurance that he would consider whether it would be possible to introduce words hereafter which should protect a person who was not cognizant of the character or the acts of the association, then the hon. Member's demand would not be an unreasonable one. The Amendment, however, went further than that, and proposed that no man, being a member of such an association, should be punished until after an adjudication upon the character of the association.

MR. SEXTON said, he was glad to find that the Government were willing to consider this Amendment, for the importance of it would be seen when it was remembered that in Ireland there were now several associations which it would be impossible to bring under the Act by this clause. He differed from the Home Secretary in thinking that a member of an association must necessarily know whether the association was unlawful or not. On the contrary, he submitted that the definition of an "unlawful association" was so complicated that even to Members of the House it was not easy to know whether an association would come under the Act as an "unlawful association." If the right hon. and learned Gentleman would carry his memory back to statements made earlier in these debates, he would see that it was impossible to say whether an association was unlawful. It was necessary to have a clear definition from the Judicial Bench as to the lawfulness or unlawfulness of any association before a member could be held guilty. Among the associations in Ireland there was the Ladies' Land League. One of the crimes under this Bill was taking forcible possession. One purpose of the Land League was to help families of political prisoners, and another was to aid the evicted farmers. Now, suppose the Ladies' Land League aided an evicted farmer, and so enabled him and his family to remain in the locality, instead of drifting away, and suppose some member of that family took possession of that farm from which they had been evicted, would the Ladies' Land League, because it had given a grant of money to that family, be held to have encouraged the crime of taking forcible possession, and would membership of that association be an offence under the Act? Then there was the Political Prisoners' Aid Society. It was certain that several of the crimes under this Act would be held to be political crimes. There might be cases of what were called "unlawful assemblies" under the Act which, in the opinion of the Irish people, were held to be political offences, and not ordinary criminal offences. Now, the Prisoners' Aid Society helped the families of political prisoners. Suppose persons who were convicted of taking part in an unlawful assembly, and suppose the Prisoners' Aid Society helped the families of those people, would the Society be held to have encouraged an offence of an unlawful assembly because they aided the families of the prisoners? Then there was the Home Manufacturers' Association in Ireland, whose object was to induce Irishmen to deal, as far as possible, with Irish manufacturers. There were at present many English manufacturers who sold goods extensively in Ireland, and had their agents in the country. If that Association, by public arguments or other inducements, prevailed on the people to transfer their custom from English manufacturers to Irish manufacturers, would it be held that the Association was an unlawful Association, because it had encouraged people to do what, according to the Act, would put the English manufacturers in fear of loss of business? That Society was formed for the express purpose of inducing Irish people to deal in native manufactures; and he wanted to know whether that Association, for inducing people to cease to purchase English manufactures, would be held to have put English manufacturers in fear of loss of business?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was not easy to answer questions put on the subject in this way; but certainly the last case put by the hon. Member could not be held to constitute a crime. With regard to the second case—namely, the Society for aiding the families of prisoners, whether political or otherwise—he did not see how anybody could regard that Society as committing or encouraging crime. Then, with regard to the Ladies' Land League, the hon. Member was getting on more delicate ground; and he should like a little more time to consider that point. There was a clear distinction between a Society which merely had charitable objects in view and an Association intended to bring about a breach of the law. One object might sometimes cover both; and it would be the business of the Courts to see what was the substance of the case; what the Association aimed at; what it was doing; and whether, under cover of charitable objects, it might not, in point of fact, be actively engaged in promoting a breach of the law. Therefore, in regard to the question of the Ladies' Land League, he could not give an answer at this moment. But, with regard to the argument that there must be a decision that an Association was unlawful before a member of it could be held guilty, he thought that the hon. Member would see that that was not the case. There might be an Association which it was perfectly clear was formed for the purpose of committing crime, and there might be an Association whose object was avowedly to promote some breach of the law, which would be an offence under the Act. In such cases it would be idle to say that there must first be a judicial decision, because the facts of the case would prove that the Association had those objects in view, and that every person who was connected with it must have known its objects. Therefore, it did not appear to him that it was necessary to have a decision antecedent to the operation of this clause.

MR. PARNELL said, he was of opinion that the adjudication must take place before persons could be convicted as members of an unlawful Association, and the unlawful Association must first be declared to be unlawful.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT pointed out that the adjudication might be on the conduct of an individual who was proved at the same time to be a member of an Association. For instance, one, or two, or three men might be brought before a magistrate, charged with being members of an Association, which it was clear was for the purpose of promoting the commission of offences under the Act; and it might, at the same time, be shown that they were parties to the actions of that Association, and, therefore, perfectly cognizant of its objects. It seemed to him that such men ought not to escape punishment.

Mr. PARNELL said, his point was with reference to an Association which had not been adjudicated an unlawful Association. Persons might be charged with being members of an unlawful Association—that was their offence; they had committed no other offence. The utmost limit or gravity of their offence would have been a subscription to the Association. Magistrates would receive evidence which would induce them to believe that the Association was of an illegal character; and that unlawful character would have arisen from the acts of persons other than those charged, who would not have been, in that case, guilty of any offence, except the single offence of having subscribed and enrolled themselves in the ranks of the Association. It might be that persons, owing to whose acts the Association was unlawful, had not become amenable; and what he wished to guard against was that any members of an Association, as soon as it had been adjudicated unlawful, should not be held guilty of an offence against the Act, merely because they had become formal members, but had not taken any part in the Association other than by subscribing money to carry out its political objects.

Mr. SYNAN said, it appeared to him that the foundation of his hon. Friend's argument was this—If new offences were created by this Bill the public would not be aware of them until the Act came into operation, and until there was a judicial determination as to what were new offences; and, therefore, nobody ought to be bound by the character of those offences. If the Home Secretary would say whether new offences were created under the Bill, he apprehended it would be only fair that the public should have notice by judicial decision as to what those offences were; and until such decision was pronounced, a man ought not to be criminally liable for what he did not believe to be a crime. That was the plain distinction, which was the foundation of the hon. Member's argument; and it had not yet received an answer from the Treasury Bench.

Mr. STOREY said, the force of this clause could only be seen when it was looked at in conjunction with Clause 4, which had already been passed; and he would show the Committee what that force was. Under Clause 4, if there were any Associations such as those already existing in Ireland, which drew all the labourers in a district from their work in order to create a rise of wages, which was a legitimate proceeding in England, and was commonly adopted by trades unions, that Association would be liable under this Act. And immediately that was done every member of that Association, which was a perfectly legitimate institution in England, became a member of an illegal Association; and, according to the Home Secretary, because of that fact alone, and not because of any act of his own, he became liable to punishment under this Act. If the Home Secretary could only convince a few Members of the Committee that that was not the case, he would have a great deal less work than he had now; but he (Mr. Storey), having had a great deal of experience of trades unions in the North, could assure the right hon. and learned Gentleman that if Clause 4 meant anything, it introduced a different state of the law in Ireland from that in England. It prevented in Ireland what was perfectly legal in England; and those members of an Association which did what was legal in England might be punished for simply being members of a similar Association in Ireland. In Sunderland it was a common thing in the shipyards for one body of men to draw other men out. That process was easily explained; there were certain superior workmen in the yards, and if they were drawn out the whole of the other workmen in the yard, who might, perhaps, number 10 times as many as the men drawn out, would be stopped in their work, and the employers would not be able to complete their contracts. Suppose an Association did that in Ireland. The Attorney General said that if men simply struck to benefit themselves, that would not be an illegal action; but if they struck in order to make their employer do something which he did not wish to do, then it became an illegal act. Upon that showing, members of an Association who struck for the purpose of securing some advantage to a certain class of men could all be put into gaol for six months, simply because they were members. What did the hon. Member for the City of Cork ask? The hon. Member asked that there should, first of all, be a distinct definition of any act that was illegal, and that was so slight a thing that the Home Secretary might agree to accede to the demand and make the law in Ireland the same as that in England.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was sincerely desirous to meet any objections upon this clause. The adjudication of an unlawful Association by a magistrate could only take place on proceedings against some individual; but the hon. Member seemed to contemplate some abstract decision of the Court upon an Association apart from any individual member of it. That could not be so; there must be some proceedings against a person who was a member of an unlawful Association. A man must know that such an Association was unlawful in the way in which everybody knew what was unlawful—namely, by the declaration of the law under Act of Parliament. When an offence was created by this or any other Act, it was stated to be an offence under the Act of Parliament; and if a man committed an offence, and was tried for that offence, he could not say that he did not understand it to be an offence, and that he ought to have had an adjudication before he could be held amenable. That was contrary to the whole of our legal procedure, and the only point the hon. Member had made seemed to be that there was a person who was not aware of the object of the Association of which he was a member; and, therefore, he ought to be protected. If the insertion of any words such as "being knowingly a member" would meet the case, he should be happy to adopt that course. It was not intended that every man who was a member of an Association which might contemplate unlawful purposes should be amenable if he could say that he was ignorant of its purposes. Such a man, he thought, ought to be protected.

DR. COMMINS explained that what was wanted was that people might know beforehand what was to be or what was not to be the law, and should not be punished for what they did not know to be an offence. Here the difficulty arose as to what was an Association which would bring people within this clause.

Mr. Storey

There was not a single decision or Act of Parliament in force, at present, which contained a provision of what was to be understood, from the point of view of a criminal lawyer; therefore, there was no warning to individuals, who might be punished, of what an Association was which would render them liable to punishment. The term "association" was the widest term in the English language. Walking, or dining, or talking to a man might be called an association, and there was nothing to limit the term in any way. He was not sure whether the hon. Member's Amendment would carry out all that was wanted. The mischief of the section would be seen if this 1st clause or sub-section was compared with the 2nd clause, which defined an illegal meeting. The Home Secretary had not given any answer whatever to the hon. Member for Sligo's question, because every one of the cases the hon. Member put could be held an offence without any straining of the law under this sub-section. A person collecting money for the relief of political prisoners; members of the Ladies' Land League, which sought to relieve evicted families; and persons subscribing to the Prisoners' Aid Fund might be held liable to punishment without straining the law. By considering Clause 7, the Committee would see how iniquitous this provision was. It was provided by Clause 7 that—and then the 27th clause dealt with unlawful associations for encouraging offences against the Act. Suppose that half-a-dozen or more people formed a committee in any town and held a public meeting, the Lord Lieutenant might consider that dangerous to the public peace and prohibit it.

"The Lord Lieutenant may from time to time, by order in writing to be published, in the prescribed manner, prohibit any meeting which he has reason to believe to be dangerous to the public peace or the public safety. Any person who is present at a meeting prohibited in pursuance of this Act shall be guilty of an offence against this Act;"

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Member is discussing a clause not before the Committee.

DR. COMMINS said, he was pointing out that, taking this unlimited definition in the clause now under consideration with what arose under Clause 27, the mischief of Sub-section (a) would be seen. Take the case of a person on a committee formed to call a public meeting, and the meeting was prohibited, some person knowing nothing about the purpose of the meeting would be guilty of an offence under the Act, and the people who formed the committee to call that meeting would be held liable to prosecution under this section for having called the meeting, and thereby encouraged an offence against the Act. That was the most sweeping provision for ex post facto punishment that could be conceived. There ought to be some limitation, and he did not see any way of limiting the clause, except by giving persons warning by judicial decision as the hon. Member proposed.

MR. PARNELL said, if the Home Secretary would accept the words "who is a member of an Association knowing it to be unlawful," he should be happy to withdraw his Amendment. All he wanted to provide was that if any person who was a member of any Association formed in Ireland without knowing that the tendency of the Association was unlawful, or if, when he learned that, he withdrew from the Association, he should not be punished for the mere fact of having been a member. That was all he wanted, and it seemed to him that that could be met by making the subsection run in this way—"Is a member of an Association knowing the same to be unlawful." Then, after the first decision was given, and after the first person had been convicted for being a member of an unlawful Association, everybody would know that it was unlawful, and would have no excuse for remaining members of it. If they then retired they ought to be protected.

MR. T. O. THOMPSON said, he did not think the proposal of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Parnell) quite met the case. Suppose, for instance, that a club in Dublin appointed a committee to secure the election of a Member of Parliament, and suppose that committee was found guilty of corrupt practices, then, under this clause, each member of the club would be liable under the Corrupt Practices Act. The committee must take care that an innocent member of a club, who merely used the club for dining and reading the newspapers, should not come under this Act through the actions of the committee of the club. That was a possible case, and it would be very unfair that an ordinary member of the club should be brought before a magistrate and punished, under this Act, for acts of which he might be perfectly innocent. The words ought to be made so clear that guilty knowledge should be brought home to any such person before he could be indicted.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he was of the same opinion as the hon. Member who had just spoken. What was wanted was that the Act should make an Association illegal before membership was made illegal, and that an innocent person should not be drawn into the network of this Act without receiving fair warning. While he opposed every clause of the Bill, he was inclined to think this the worst clause of the whole lot. Every Association of every kind whatever would come under this section, and he took issue altogether with the statement of the Home Secretary, with regard to the Prisoners' Aid Society. That Society would come completely under the Bill. Suppose a man was put into gaol for taking possession of a farm within six months after ejection. This Society stepped in and gave assistance to that man's wife and family; therefore, they would be assisting in the commission of his crime. Taking possession of a farm was an offence under the Act, and by giving assistance to the family of a man imprisoned for such an offence, the Society would be encouraging the commission of crime. His hon. Friend asked that every Association should not be put down, and that fair warning should be given to members of the Association of proceedings against them for being members. He doubted whether the Amendment would effect that object. If a man was prosecuted for being a member of the Prisoners' Aid Society, the magistrate might say he knew when he entered the Society that it was giving assistance to the families of men who had committed an offence, and he must take it that the man was an intelligent person, and that ignorance of the law was no excuse. He thought his hon. Friend had better stick to the original proposal to insert the words "is, and persists in remaining a member of."

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he thought it was imprudent to use arguments which went far in excess of the proposal submitted to the Committee. The assent of the Committee was invited to the simple proposal to insert language which would prevent any guilty person escaping; and it was not necessary at all, as the hon. Member for the City of Cork seemed to think, that a decision should first be obtained upon the unlawfulness of an Association, because if a man was a member of an unlawful Association, and if it was shown that he was engaged in unlawful acts, his responsibility began before any decision was given. Therefore, he objected to using arguments which were absolutely unnecessary for the point in view. He agreed that the language proposed by the hon. Member for the City of Cork was necessary to protect innocent persons; and if that Amendment was accepted, the power to punish a person consciously a member of an Association would be as great as ever if the subsection read—

"Is a member of an association knowing the same to be unlawful as defined by this Act."

The Government could proceed against such a person at once, even if no decision had been given.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was difficult in such a case as this to make Amendments on the spot before there had been time to consider the question; and as far as he could see his way at present, he was prepared to add after the word "who," in the first line, the word "knowingly," which would then govern all that followed. In Subsection (d) there were the words, "knowingly takes part in the proceedings of an unlawful association." That was of the same character as knowingly being a member of an unlawful Association, and it seemed to him that the word "knowingly" could be safely inserted. He was prepared to do that; but at the present moment he could not go further.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he thought the hon. Member for the City of Cork was dealing with open Associations like the Land League, which might be or might not be legal, but whose objects were more or less well defined, while probably the Home Secretary was thinking of some secret Associations whose operations might be unlawful. It might be possible to reconcile the two views, and to carry out the object of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, by saying—

Mr. O'Connor Power

"Any member belonging to an open Association shall not be punished until that Association has been declared unlawful."

A member of an Association whose object was known to be unlawful was himself acting unlawfully; and he thought the Government might draw up an Amendment on Report which might meet the two cases. It would be very hard if a person belonging to a well-defined Association, such as the Land League, whose objects were supposed by a great majority of people to be perfectly lawful, should be punishable. He thought such an Association would be a fair case for a legal decision before a member could be held guilty. He did not say secret Associations existed in Ireland, but there might be some, and in those cases it might be unreasonable to ask for a decision first.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he thought the hon. Member for the City of Cork would do wisely to accept the proposal of the Home Secretary to introduce the word "knowingly," and then, on Report, a further Amendment might be moved. He said this because it was exceedingly difficult to discuss this clause thoroughly until the Committee knew what an unlawful Association was, and that they could not know until they arrived at Clause 27, where unlawful Associations were defined. That definition might be open to certain alterations, and it would depend on such alterations whether it was sufficient to accept the word "knowingly," or whether other words would be necessary.

DR. OOMMINS said, it was clear the object of this clause was to put down agitation and bring all Associations within the summary jurisdiction of magistrates, and not under the ordinary law. He assumed that there was no intention to make any offences punishable under this clause which could not be punishable upon indictment for conspiracy. The law defined conspiracy and prescribed the evidence which must be produced. He would suggest that these words should be added to the first line—

"Every person who is guilty of conspiracy by being a member of an unlawful Association," believing that that would completely meet the difficulty.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the intention of the Home Secretary could only be attained if the hon. Member withdrew his Amendment. If the Amendment were withdrawn they would go back to the beginning of Clause 6.

MR. R. POWER considered that the question which had been raised should be deferred to Report. There was a great difference between the words—

“Every person who knowingly is a member of an unlawful Association,” and—

“Every person who is a member of an unlawful Association;”

and he thought that in deciding which proposition they ought to adopt, they should leave it rather in the way which would be favourable to the person likely to be implicated, and which would give him an opportunity of escaping from penalties which he had incurred unconsciously. Under the circumstances, it would be much better to defer the matter to Report, and perhaps, in the meantime, the Home Secretary might see his way to adopt the words suggested.

MR. PARNELL said, he would have no objection to defer the matter to Report if the Committee considered that that would be the most desirable step to take. There appeared to be a radical difference between a clause which ran in this way—

“Every person who knowingly is a member of an unlawful Association as defined by this Act,”
and—

“Every person who is a member of an Association knowing the same to be unlawful.”

What he wished to ask the Home Secretary was, whether the insertion of the word “knowingly” made it necessary, before a conviction could be made, that the person belonging to the Association should possess the knowledge that the Association was unlawful, supposing there was an absence of any illegal acts upon the part of the person accused? That was the end for which he wished to provide, because it must be remembered that this clause made it a crime for a person to belong to an unlawful Association, although he might not have committed any illegal act himself. The crime consisted in belonging to the Association. A man might belong to an Association in the most formal way; he might be desirous of leaving it when he discovered its illegal character; but the fact of having belonged to it made him guilty of an offence against this Act. He admitted that it was right that the Home Secretary should have time to consider the effect of the introduction of the word “knowingly” in different parts of the clause; but what he wished to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman was this. Was it his opinion and desire that a person should not be convicted who had not committed any offence against this Act other than that of being a member of an unlawful Association, knowing the Association to be unlawful?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the effect of inserting the word “knowingly” would be that a man must know that the Association he belonged to was unlawful before he would be liable to the punishment provided by the Act; a man must know that he was a member of an Association which had for its object the doing something which was made an offence under the Act. It was not necessary that the man himself must do any illegal act to bring him within the punishment of the Act; the very fact of his being a member of an Association which he knew to be unlawful was sufficient.

MR. STOREY said, the point was not yet clear. Let them suppose that this Act was to apply to England, and that an Association in England ordered a strike in the North, which strike was declared by the magistrates of the district to be illegal, would it be fair that a man in London should be punished for being a member of an Association which, in the North of England, had done an illegal act?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR FARRER HERSCHELL) said, a man would not be liable under this clause if he was a member of an Association which did an illegal act, unless he knew that the Association was formed and existed for the purpose of doing an illegal act. If the word “knowingly” were inserted the clause could only be construed in that way.

MR. PARNELL said, he was very sorry to press the point, but it was one of great importance, and it was quite proper the Committee should understand what the Home Secretary meant in reference to it before they passed it by. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had said that a person could not be convicted unless he knew what the objects of the Association he belonged to were, and that if the objects of the Association were unlawful he could be convicted. But a person might know what the objects of his Association were, and yet not know they were unlawful. That was precisely the difficulty he (Mr. Parnell) felt in this matter. He was perfectly willing to leave it in the way just stated by the Solicitor General for England—namely, that a person should know that the objects of the Association were unlawful. It did not satisfy him, however, that a person should merely know that he was a member of an Association the objects of which were unlawful. The two things did not necessarily follow. A person might be, and very probably would be, before decisions were given under the Act, a member of an Association the objects of which were unlawful without his knowing they were unlawful. He did not wish to protect a person for one moment when that person knew that the objects of the Association to which he belonged were unlawful; and if the insertion of the word “knowingly” was only intended to strike at those who had really a guilty knowledge he would be perfectly satisfied.

MR. STOREY said, the Solicitor General had not understood the point. The objects of an Association might be legal, but its operations might be pronounced to be illegal. Under this Bill a man might be put in gaol for six months for being a member of an Association whose objects were perfectly legal, but one of whose operations in a certain part of the country had been pronounced by two magistrates to be illegal. That could not be what the Home Secretary intended, and he hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman would so modify the clause that no man should be punished for being a member of an Association unless the Association was known to him to be illegal. He would suggest that the clause should run—

“Every person who is a member of an Association, as defined by this Act, which has been declared to be unlawful; or solicits or receives or pays any money for the use of such an unlawful Association; or uses any badge, &c. of such an unlawful Association; or takes part in the proceedings of such an unlawful assembly shall be guilty of an offence against this Act.”

Such words would provide that the Association must first of all be decided and declared to be illegal before a member of it could be punished. In this matter the Government were going much further in Ireland than they dared venture in England.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was quite impossible to have the decision and declaration which the hon. Member wished. An Association could only be decided and declared to be unlawful by proceedings against some individual. He (Sir William Harcourt) was very anxious to meet the views of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) if he could. A man must know that the object or the action of the Association to which he belonged was unlawful, and he would have that knowledge if he knew that the acts or the objects of the Association were such as were forbidden in this Act. The mere passing of this Act would be notice to a man that the doing or the contemplation of such acts would be unlawful. It was impossible to arrive at the working of a man's mind, except by the character of the acts contemplated or done by the Association; and an Association would be held to be unlawful if the end which it sought, or the means which it employed, were unlawful within the meaning of the Act. He had consulted with his learned Friends near him, and, at all events for the present, he could not propose to the hon. Member (Mr. Parnell) to do more than he had already proposed to do—namely, to insert the word “knowingly.”

MR. SEXTON said, that a little while ago he instanced the case of the Ladies' Land League. Every member of that League knew very well that one of its objects was to assist evicted families with grants of money. It might be a question, until there was a judicial decision, whether that object was lawful; because, suppose that either before or after the receipt of a grant of money any member of the evicted family were to take forcible possession of the house from which he had been evicted, a judicial tribunal might hold that the grant of money was an encouragement to crime. Until the Home Secretary said such grants were lawful, it would be quite impossible for the Ladies' Land League to know whether they were lawful or unlawful.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought that most hon. Gentlemen were members of Associations having objects of that character. One of the most useful Associations in this country, and one which he, in his Office, did all in his power to encourage, was the Prisoners' Aid Society. Who had ever thought that because people aided a prisoner and his family they were encouraging crime? That was the very point the hon. Member had put. No one could form such an idea as that.

Mr. Parnell

MR. MOLLOY said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had just said that anyone convicted under this clause must know that the objects of the Association were unlawful within the meaning of this Act. What objection, therefore, could there be to the insertion of the words "knowing the same to be unlawful?"

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out that that is not the Amendment before the Committee. The Amendment under discussion is that the words "and persists in remaining" should be inserted.

MR. PARNELL said, probably the best thing he could do would be to accept the statement of the Home Secretary—namely, that he would insert "knowingly" now, and consider the matter further between this and Report. He begged to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT moved to insert, in page 4, line 1, after "who," the word "knowingly."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. REDMOND moved, in page 4, line 2, to leave out "as defined by this Act." His object in moving this Amendment was to raise the whole question of unlawful Associations as defined by this Act. Turning to Clause 27 of the Bill, "unlawful association" was defined to be any Association formed for the purpose of carrying on crime. Crime was defined to be any offence against this Act, and amongst the offences against this Act there were some the determination of which was to be left to the discretion of Resident Magistrates. Intimidation was a crime under the Act, and it had been held in some cases that the erection of huts for evicted tenants by the Ladies' Land League was intimidation. He presumed that the Ladies' Land League would be considered an unlawful Association. He did not know whether this was exactly the right time to raise a discussion on the words "unlawful Associations as defined by this Act," or whether he ought to wait until a later period of the Committee. His object was to raise the point of unlawful Associations on the first occasion that it appeared in the Bill, and for that purpose he would move the Amendment which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 2, to leave out the words "as defined by this Act."—(Mr. Redmond.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he hoped the hon. Member would postpone the Amendment until they came to the 27th clause. If the Amendment were carried the definition of unlawful Associations would be left quite open.

MR. LEAMY said, he hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman would remember what the hon. Member for New Ross (Mr. Redmond) had said with reference to the Ladies' Land League—namely, that in some cases it had been held that the action of the League amounted to intimidation. If, under this Act, the erection of huts for evicted families would be held to be illegal, the contention of the hon. Member that an Association for the erection of huts would be unlawful could not be disputed. The right hon. and learned Gentleman would therefore see the very great necessity there was for a clear and precise definition. He had no desire to prolong the discussion; but he would point out that it was the duty of the Committee to bear in mind what fell from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for England last night. The hon. and learned Gentleman said—

"In this Bill it was not intended to give a new definition of a crime well known at Common Law. . . . If they were introducing a new offence, they might be justly required to give a definition; but, as a matter of fact, they were dealing with a well-known offence."

The case had been put to the Committee; but his hon. Friend (Mr. Redmond) showed the necessity of giving a precise definition. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had very frequently referred to the ingenuity of

[Twink Night.]

Irishmen, and he had said—"If you give a definition of crime, the people will employ their ingenuity to find a form of crime not defined." The Committee and the Government ought to be well satisfied if the Irish ingenuity was so exercised as to keep the people within the law; and the Government ought, now that they were creating new offences, to tell the people precisely what the offence was, so that the people could avoid committing it.

MR. SEXTON asked if the Bill would be limited to unlawful Associations in actual existence at the time the Act passed into law?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was not intended that the clause should be retrospective.

MR. NEWDEGATE begged to ask the Home Secretary if permission would be given carte blanche, after the passing of the Act, for the formation of any Associations, however illegal?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not know why the hon. Gentleman should address such a question to him. There was nothing in the Bill to give the hon. Member any such impression as he seemed to possess.

MR. REDMOND said, that after what had fallen from the Home Secretary he would withdraw his Amendment, postponing the consideration of this very important question until they arrived at the clause which defined unlawful Associations. He presumed that as they had to meet again at 12 o'clock, there would be no objection to report Progress now.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he hoped hon. Members would allow the Committee to finish this clause. He was going to move the omission of the latter lines of Sub-section (d); and if hon. Members would look at the page of Amendments, they would find there were really no important questions raised in the clause.

MR. HEALY suggested they should go on until they reached some point of difficulty.

MR. GILL desired to move an Amendment to Sub-section (d), which he wished should read thus—

"Solicits or receives or pays any money for the use of an Association after it has been declared to be unlawful as defined by this Act."

Mr. Leamy

His reason for proposing this Amendment was that the membership of very many Associations was formed by paying a yearly subscription at the beginning of the year. If a person paid a yearly subscription in January, he would be a member of the Association until the end of the year. Perhaps in March the Association might be declared to be unlawful, and the man might resolve to have nothing more to do with it. As, however, he had paid his subscription in January, he would still be a member of the Association, and he would have no means of disassociating himself from it. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman would say he would consider, between this and Report, whether he could not propose an Amendment having for its object the protection of men who had no desire to belong to Associations after they had been declared unlawful, he (Mr. Gill) would not now press his Amendment.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought the insertion of the word "knowingly" would meet the case the hon. Gentleman had mentioned. If, on consideration, they found this would not be the case, they would take care the clause should be amended in the direction desired.

MR. HEALY moved, in page 4, line 6, after "ticket," leave out "indicating connection with," and insert "showing that the person using same is a member of." The Government had proposed this clause with the intention of using it against secret societies. He presumed that the Government imagined that members of secret societies used some badge, possibly in their hats, to denote they were members of such societies. He feared the Government had made some mistake in introducing this sub-section. What was the meaning of the words "using any badge or ticket?" A man might have a Land League ticket, the Land League was proclaimed, the ticket remained in his house. The police were to have large powers of search, and if they discovered such a ticket they might hold that the person to whom it belonged belonged to an unlawful society. To guard against such a contingency, he moved this Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 6, after the word "ticket," to leave out the words "indicating connection with," and insert the words "showing that the person using same is a member of."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not see any objection to the Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT proposed to leave out the word "knowingly" at the beginning of line 8, inasmuch as the word had been inserted at the commencement of the clause.

Amendment agreed to.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he proposed, in lines 10 and 11, to leave out all the words from the beginning of the line to the end, as those words seemed to be unnecessary, because taking part in the proceedings of any unlawful Association was defined by the Bill. The words proposed to be omitted were these—

"Or of any meeting for the purpose of promoting the purposes of any such unlawful Association, or any of those purposes."

The use of these words seemed to him to be superfluous, and he therefore proposed that they should be struck out of the clause.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, lines 10 and 11, to leave out all the words after "thereof" to "shall." — (Sir William Harcourt.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. SEXTON said, before the clause was agreed to he should like to put a question to Her Majesty's Government. If Sub-section (a) of the clause were carried out in its integrity, the consequence would be that the members of unlawful Associations would die out, and there would be no necessity for the other sub-sections which followed—such, for instance, as soliciting or paying money, using any badge or ticket, and so on. He was at a loss to understand why all this elaborate, complicated, and useless machinery could not be omitted. Would it not be better to omit these sub-sections?

MR. PARNELL said, he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman might give an undertaking to cut out the sub-sections mentioned by his (Mr. Parnell's) hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) on the Report. They certainly seemed to be absurd, and would be of no use under any circumstances.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought the suggestion was one that was very well worth attention.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN asked whether the proviso of which he had given Notice for insertion at the end of the clause could not be moved then?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the clause would come up afterwards.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he proposed to deal with the matter in the same clause as that which he had already mentioned.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 154; Noes 29: Majority 125.—(Div. List, No. 136.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT moved, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

Question put, and agreed to.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT moved, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

MR. HEALY wished to ask Her Majesty's Government whether the House might expect the Amendments to be brought forward by the Government to be proposed on the following day; and, if not, if the Government would inform the House when they would be brought up? He had understood from the Chief Secretary for Ireland that they would be brought up as soon as possible.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary is not in his place at the present moment; but I may inform the hon. Gentleman that no time will be lost in making progress with the Bill.

[Tenth Night.]

put into gaol for six months, simply because they were members. What did the hon. Member for the City of Cork ask? The hon. Member asked that there should, first of all, be a distinct definition of any act that was illegal, and that was so slight a thing that the Home Secretary might agree to accede to the demand and make the law in Ireland the same as that in England.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was sincerely desirous to meet any objections upon this clause. The adjudication of an unlawful Association by a magistrate could only take place on proceedings against some individual; but the hon. Member seemed to contemplate some abstract decision of the Court upon an Association apart from any individual member of it. That could not be so; there must be some proceedings against a person who was a member of an unlawful Association. A man must know that such an Association was unlawful in the way in which everybody knew what was unlawful—namely, by the declaration of the law under Act of Parliament. When an offence was created by this or any other Act, it was stated to be an offence under the Act of Parliament; and if a man committed an offence, and was tried for that offence, he could not say that he did not understand it to be an offence, and that he ought to have had an adjudication before he could be held amenable. That was contrary to the whole of our legal procedure, and the only point the hon. Member had made seemed to be that there was a person who was not aware of the object of the Association of which he was a member; and, therefore, he ought to be protected. If the insertion of any words such as "being knowingly a member" would meet the case, he should be happy to adopt that course. It was not intended that every man who was a member of an Association which might contemplate unlawful purposes should be amenable if he could say that he was ignorant of its purposes. Such a man, he thought, ought to be protected.

DR. COMMINS explained that what was wanted was that people might know beforehand what was to be or what was not to be the law, and should not be punished for what they did not know to be an offence. Here the difficulty arose as to what was an Association which would bring people within this clause.

Mr. Storey

There was not a single decision or Act of Parliament in force, at present, which contained a provision of what was to be understood, from the point of view of a criminal lawyer; therefore, there was no warning to individuals, who might be punished, of what an Association was which would render them liable to punishment. The term "association" was the widest term in the English language. Walking, or dining, or talking to a man might be called an association, and there was nothing to limit the term in any way. He was not sure whether the hon. Member's Amendment would carry out all that was wanted. The mischief of the section would be seen if this 1st clause or sub-section was compared with the 2nd clause, which defined an illegal meeting. The Home Secretary had not given any answer whatever to the hon. Member for Sligo's question, because every one of the cases the hon. Member put could be held an offence without any straining of the law under this sub-section. A person collecting money for the relief of political prisoners; members of the Ladies' Land League, which sought to relieve evicted families; and persons subscribing to the Prisoners' Aid Fund might be held liable to punishment without straining the law. By considering Clause 7, the Committee would see how iniquitous this provision was. It was provided by Clause 7 that—and then the 27th clause dealt with unlawful associations for encouraging offences against the Act. Suppose that half-a-dozen or more people formed a committee in any town and held a public meeting, the Lord Lieutenant might consider that dangerous to the public peace and prohibit it.

"The Lord Lieutenant may from time to time, by order in writing to be published, in the prescribed manner, prohibit any meeting which he has reason to believe to be dangerous to the public peace or the public safety. Any person who is present at a meeting prohibited in pursuance of this Act shall be guilty of an offence against this Act;"

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Member is discussing a clause not before the Committee.

DR. COMMINS said, he was pointing out that, taking this unlimited definition in the clause now under consideration with what arose under Clause 27, the mischief of Sub-section (a) would be seen. Take the case of a person on a committee formed to call a public meeting, and the meeting was prohibited, some person knowing nothing about the purpose of the meeting would be guilty of an offence under the Act, and the people who formed the committee to call that meeting would be held liable to prosecution under this section for having called the meeting, and thereby encouraged an offence against the Act. That was the most sweeping provision for ex post facto punishment that could be conceived. There ought to be some limitation, and he did not see any way of limiting the clause, except by giving persons warning by judicial decision as the hon. Member proposed.

MR. PARNELL said, if the Home Secretary would accept the words "who is a member of an Association knowing it to be unlawful," he should be happy to withdraw his Amendment. All he wanted to provide was that if any person who was a member of any Association formed in Ireland without knowing that the tendency of the Association was unlawful, or if, when he learned that, he withdrew from the Association, he should not be punished for the mere fact of having been a member. That was all he wanted, and it seemed to him that that could be met by making the subsection run in this way—"Is a member of an Association knowing the same to be unlawful." Then, after the first decision was given, and after the first person had been convicted for being a member of an unlawful Association, everybody would know that it was unlawful, and would have no excuse for remaining members of it. If they then retired they ought to be protected.

MR. T. O. THOMPSON said, he did not think the proposal of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Parnell) quite met the case. Suppose, for instance, that a club in Dublin appointed a committee to secure the election of a Member of Parliament, and suppose that committee was found guilty of corrupt practices, then, under this clause, each member of the club would be liable under the Corrupt Practices Act. The committee must take care that an innocent member of a club, who merely used the club for dining and reading the newspapers, should not come under this Act through the actions of the committee of the club. That was a possible case, and it would be very unfair that an ordinary member of the club should be brought before a magistrate and punished, under this Act, for acts of which he might be perfectly innocent. The words ought to be made so clear that guilty knowledge should be brought home to any such person before he could be indicted.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he was of the same opinion as the hon. Member who had just spoken. What was wanted was that the Act should make an Association illegal before membership was made illegal, and that an innocent person should not be drawn into the network of this Act without receiving fair warning. While he opposed every clause of the Bill, he was inclined to think this the worst clause of the whole lot. Every Association of every kind whatever would come under this section, and he took issue altogether with the statement of the Home Secretary, with regard to the Prisoners' Aid Society. That Society would come completely under the Bill. Suppose a man was put into gaol for taking possession of a farm within six months after ejection. This Society stepped in and gave assistance to that man's wife and family; therefore, they would be assisting in the commission of his crime. Taking possession of a farm was an offence under the Act, and by giving assistance to the family of a man imprisoned for such an offence, the Society would be encouraging the commission of crime. His hon. Friend asked that every Association should not be put down, and that fair warning should be given to members of the Association of proceedings against them for being members. He doubted whether the Amendment would effect that object. If a man was prosecuted for being a member of the Prisoners' Aid Society, the magistrate might say he knew when he entered the Society that it was giving assistance to the families of men who had committed an offence, and he must take it that the man was an intelligent person, and that ignorance of the law was no excuse. He thought his hon. Friend had better stick to the original proposal to insert the words "is, and persists in remaining a member of."

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he thought it was imprudent to use arguments which went far in excess of the proposal submitted to the Committee. The assent of the Committee was invited to the simple proposal to insert language which would prevent any guilty person escaping; and it was not necessary at all, as the hon. Member for the City of Cork seemed to think, that a decision should first be obtained upon the unlawfulness of an Association, because if a man was a member of an unlawful Association, and if it was shown that he was engaged in unlawful acts, his responsibility began before any decision was given. Therefore, he objected to using arguments which were absolutely unnecessary for the point in view. He agreed that the language proposed by the hon. Member for the City of Cork was necessary to protect innocent persons; and if that Amendment was accepted, the power to punish a person consciously a member of an Association would be as great as ever if the subsection read—

[Tenth Night.]

"Is a member of an association knowing the same to be unlawful as defined by this Act."

The Government could proceed against such a person at once, even if no decision had been given.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was difficult in such a case as this to make Amendments on the spot before there had been time to consider the question; and as far as he could see his way at present, he was prepared to add after the word "who," in the first line, the word "knowingly," which would then govern all that followed. In Subsection (d) there were the words, "knowingly takes part in the proceedings of an unlawful association." That was of the same character as knowingly being a member of an unlawful Association, and it seemed to him that the word "knowingly" could be safely inserted. He was prepared to do that; but at the present moment he could not go further.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he thought the hon. Member for the City of Cork was dealing with open Associations like the Land League, which might be or might not be legal, but whose objects were more or less well defined, while probably the Home Secretary was thinking of some secret Associations whose operations might be unlawful. It might be possible to reconcile the two views, and to carry out the object of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, by saying—

"Any member belonging to an open Association shall not be punished until that Association has been declared unlawful."

A member of an Association whose object was known to be unlawful was himself acting unlawfully; and he thought the Government might draw up an Amendment on Report which might meet the two cases. It would be very hard if a person belonging to a well-defined Association, such as the Land League, whose objects were supposed by a great majority of people to be perfectly lawful, should be punishable. He thought such an Association would be a fair case for a legal decision before a member could be held guilty. He did not say secret Associations existed in Ireland, but there might be some, and in those cases it might be unreasonable to ask for a decision first.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he thought the hon. Member for the City of Cork would do wisely to accept the proposal of the Home Secretary to introduce the word "knowingly," and then, on Report, a further Amendment might be moved. He said this because it was exceedingly difficult to discuss this clause thoroughly until the Committee knew what an unlawful Association was, and that they could not know until they arrived at Clause 27, where unlawful Associations were defined. That definition might be open to certain alterations, and it would depend on such alterations whether it was sufficient to accept the word "knowingly," or whether other words would be necessary.

DR. COMMINS said, it was clear the object of this clause was to put down agitation and bring all Associations within the summary jurisdiction of magistrates, and not under the ordinary law. He assumed that there was no intention to make any offences punishable under this clause which could not be punishable upon indictment for conspiracy. The law defined conspiracy and prescribed the evidence which must be produced. He would suggest that these words should be added to the first line—

"Every person who is guilty of conspiracy by being a member of an unlawful Association," believing that that would completely meet the difficulty.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the intention of the Home Secretary could only be attained if the hon. Member withdrew his Amendment. If the Amendment were withdrawn they would go back to the beginning of Clause 6.

MR. R. POWER considered that the question which had been raised should be deferred to Report. There was a great difference between the words—

“Every person who knowingly is a member of an unlawful Association,” and—

“Every person who is a member of an unlawful Association;”
and he thought that in deciding which proposition they ought to adopt, they should leave it rather in the way which would be favourable to the person likely to be implicated, and which would give him an opportunity of escaping from penalties which he had incurred unconsciously. Under the circumstances, it would be much better to defer the matter to Report, and perhaps, in the meantime, the Home Secretary might see his way to adopt the words suggested.

MR. PARNELL said, he would have no objection to defer the matter to Report if the Committee considered that that would be the most desirable step to take. There appeared to be a radical difference between a clause which ran in this way—

“Every person who knowingly is a member of an unlawful Association as defined by this Act,”
and—

“Every person who is a member of an Association knowing the same to be unlawful.”

What he wished to ask the Home Secretary was, whether the insertion of the word “knowingly” made it necessary, before a conviction could be made, that the person belonging to the Association should possess the knowledge that the Association was unlawful, supposing there was an absence of any illegal acts upon the part of the person accused? That was the end for which he wished to provide, because it must be remembered that this clause made it a crime for a person to belong to an unlawful Association, although he might not have committed any illegal act himself. The crime consisted in belonging to the Association. A man might belong to an Association in the most formal way; he might be desirous of leaving it when he discovered its illegal character; but the fact of having belonged to it made him guilty of an offence against this Act. He admitted that it was right that the Home Secretary should have time to consider the effect of the introduction of the word “knowingly” in different parts of the clause; but what he wished to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman was this. Was it his opinion and desire that a person should not be convicted who had not committed any offence against this Act other than that of being a member of an unlawful Association, knowing the Association to be unlawful?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the effect of inserting the word “knowingly” would be that a man must know that the Association he belonged to was unlawful before he would be liable to the punishment provided by the Act; a man must know that he was a member of an Association which had for its object the doing something which was made an offence under the Act. It was not necessary that the man himself must do any illegal act to bring him within the punishment of the Act; the very fact of his being a member of an Association which he knew to be unlawful was sufficient.

MR. STOREY said, the point was not yet clear. Let them suppose that this Act was to apply to England, and that an Association in England ordered a strike in the North, which strike was declared by the magistrates of the district to be illegal, would it be fair that a man in London should be punished for being a member of an Association which, in the North of England, had done an illegal act?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR FARBER HERSCHELL) said, a man would not be liable under this clause if he was a member of an Association which did an illegal act, unless he knew that the Association was formed and existed for the purpose of doing an illegal act. If the word “knowingly” were inserted the clause could only be construed in that way.

MR. PARNELL said, he was very sorry to press the point, but it was one of great importance, and it was quite proper the Committee should understand what the Home Secretary meant in reference to it before they passed it by. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had said that a person could not be convicted unless he knew what the objects of the Association he belonged to were, and that if the objects of the Association were unlawful he could be convicted. But a person might know what the objects of his Association were, and yet not know they were unlawful. That was precisely the difficulty he (Mr. Parnell) felt in this matter. He was perfectly willing to leave it in the way just stated by the Solicitor General for England—namely, that a person should know that the objects of the Association were unlawful. It did not satisfy him, however, that a person should merely know that he was a member of an Association the objects of which were unlawful. The two things did not necessarily follow. A person might be, and very probably would be, before decisions were given under the Act, a member of an Association the objects of which were unlawful without his knowing they were unlawful. He did not wish to protect a person for one moment when that person knew that the objects of the Association to which he belonged were unlawful; and if the insertion of the word “knowingly” was only intended to strike at those who had really a guilty knowledge he would be perfectly satisfied.

MR. STOREY said, the Solicitor General had not understood the point. The objects of an Association might be legal, but its operations might be pronounced to be illegal. Under this Bill a man might be put in gaol for six months for being a member of an Association whose objects were perfectly legal, but one of whose operations in a certain part of the country had been pronounced by two magistrates to be illegal. That could not be what the Home Secretary intended, and he hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman would so modify the clause that no man should be punished for being a member of an Association unless the Association was known to him to be illegal. He would suggest that the clause should run—

“Every person who is a member of an Association, as defined by this Act, which has been declared to be unlawful; or solicits or receives or pays any money for the use of such an unlawful Association; or uses any badge, &c. of such an unlawful Association; or takes part in the proceedings of such an unlawful assembly shall be guilty of an offence against this Act.”

Such words would provide that the Association must first of all be decided and declared to be illegal before a member of it could be punished. In this matter the Government were going much further in Ireland than they dared venture in England.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was quite impossible to have the decision and declaration which the hon. Member wished. An Association could only be decided and declared to be unlawful by proceedings against some individual. He (Sir William Harcourt) was very anxious to meet the views of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) if he could. A man must know that the object or the action of the Association to which he belonged was unlawful, and he would have that knowledge if he knew that the acts or the objects of the Association were such as were forbidden in this Act. The mere passing of this Act would be notice to a man that the doing or the contemplation of such acts would be unlawful. It was impossible to arrive at the working of a man's mind, except by the character of the acts contemplated or done by the Association; and an Association would be held to be unlawful if the end which it sought, or the means which it employed, were unlawful within the meaning of the Act. He had consulted with his learned Friends near him, and, at all events for the present, he could not propose to the hon. Member (Mr. Parnell) to do more than he had already proposed to do—namely, to insert the word “knowingly.”

MR. SEXTON said, that a little while ago he instanced the case of the Ladies' Land League. Every member of that League knew very well that one of its objects was to assist evicted families with grants of money. It might be a question, until there was a judicial decision, whether that object was lawful; because, suppose that either before or after the receipt of a grant of money any member of the evicted family were to take forcible possession of the house from which he had been evicted, a judicial tribunal might hold that the grant of money was an encouragement to crime. Until the Home Secretary said such grants were lawful, it would be quite impossible for the Ladies' Land League to know whether they were lawful or unlawful.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought that most hon. Gentlemen were members of Associations having objects of that character. One of the most useful Associations in this country, and one which he, in his Office, did all in his power to encourage, was the Prisoners' Aid Society. Who had ever thought that because people aided a prisoner and his family they were encouraging crime? That was the very point the hon. Member had put. No one could form such an idea as that.

Mr. Parnell

MR. MOLLOY said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had just said that anyone convicted under this clause must know that the objects of the Association were unlawful within the meaning of this Act. What objection, therefore, could there be to the insertion of the words "knowing the same to be unlawful?"

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out that that is not the Amendment before the Committee. The Amendment under discussion is that the words "and persists in remaining" should be inserted.

MR. PARNELL said, probably the best thing he could do would be to accept the statement of the Home Secretary—namely, that he would insert "knowingly" now, and consider the matter further between this and Report. He begged to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT moved to insert, in page 4, line 1, after "who," the word "knowingly."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. REDMOND moved, in page 4, line 2, to leave out "as defined by this Act." His object in moving this Amendment was to raise the whole question of unlawful Associations as defined by this Act. Turning to Clause 27 of the Bill, "unlawful association" was defined to be any Association formed for the purpose of carrying on crime. Crime was defined to be any offence against this Act, and amongst the offences against this Act there were some the determination of which was to be left to the discretion of Resident Magistrates. Intimidation was a crime under the Act, and it had been held in some cases that the erection of huts for evicted tenants by the Ladies' Land League was intimidation. He presumed that the Ladies' Land League would be considered an unlawful Association. He did not know whether this was exactly the right time to raise a discussion on the words "unlawful Associations as defined by this Act," or whether he ought to wait until a later period of the Committee. His object was to raise the point of unlawful Associations on the first occasion that it appeared in the Bill, and for that purpose he would move the Amendment which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 2, to leave out the words "as defined by this Act."—(Mr. Redmond.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he hoped the hon. Member would postpone the Amendment until they came to the 27th clause. If the Amendment were carried the definition of unlawful Associations would be left quite open.

MR. LEAMY said, he hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman would remember what the hon. Member for New Ross (Mr. Redmond) had said with reference to the Ladies' Land League—namely, that in some cases it had been held that the action of the League amounted to intimidation. If, under this Act, the erection of huts for evicted families would be held to be illegal, the contention of the hon. Member that an Association for the erection of huts would be unlawful could not be disputed. The right hon. and learned Gentleman would therefore see the very great necessity there was for a clear and precise definition. He had no desire to prolong the discussion; but he would point out that it was the duty of the Committee to bear in mind what fell from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for England last night. The hon. and learned Gentleman said—

"In this Bill it was not intended to give a new definition of a crime well known at Common Law. . . . If they were introducing a new offence, they might be justly required to give a definition; but, as a matter of fact, they were dealing with a well-known offence."

The case had been put to the Committee; but his hon. Friend (Mr. Redmond) showed the necessity of giving a precise definition. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had very frequently referred to the ingenuity of

[Tenth Night.]

Irishmen, and he had said—"If you give a definition of crime, the people will employ their ingenuity to find a form of crime not defined." The Committee and the Government ought to be well satisfied if the Irish ingenuity was so exercised as to keep the people within the law; and the Government ought, now that they were creating new offences, to tell the people precisely what the offence was, so that the people could avoid committing it.

MR. SEXTON asked if the Bill would be limited to unlawful Associations in actual existence at the time the Act passed into law?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was not intended that the clause should be retrospective.

MR. NEWDEGATE begged to ask the Home Secretary if permission would be given carte blanche, after the passing of the Act, for the formation of any Associations, however illegal?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not know why the hon. Gentleman should address such a question to him. There was nothing in the Bill to give the hon. Member any such impression as he seemed to possess.

MR. REDMOND said, that after what had fallen from the Home Secretary he would withdraw his Amendment, postponing the consideration of this very important question until they arrived at the clause which defined unlawful Associations. He presumed that as they had to meet again at 12 o'clock, there would be no objection to report Progress now.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he hoped hon. Members would allow the Committee to finish this clause. He was going to move the omission of the latter lines of Sub-section (d); and if hon. Members would look at the page of Amendments, they would find there were really no important questions raised in the clause.

MR. HEALY suggested they should go on until they reached some point of difficulty.

MR. GILL desired to move an Amendment to Sub-section (d), which he wished should read thus—

"Solicits or receives or pays any money for the use of an Association after it has been declared to be unlawful as defined by this Act."

Mr. Leamy

His reason for proposing this Amendment was that the membership of very many Associations was formed by paying a yearly subscription at the beginning of the year. If a person paid a yearly subscription in January, he would be a member of the Association until the end of the year. Perhaps in March the Association might be declared to be unlawful, and the man might resolve to have nothing more to do with it. As, however, he had paid his subscription in January, he would still be a member of the Association, and he would have no means of disassociating himself from it. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman would say he would consider, between this and Report, whether he could not propose an Amendment having for its object the protection of men who had no desire to belong to Associations after they had been declared unlawful, he (Mr. Gill) would not now press his Amendment.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought the insertion of the word "knowingly" would meet the case the hon. Gentleman had mentioned. If, on consideration, they found this would not be the case, they would take care the clause should be amended in the direction desired.

MR. HEALY moved, in page 4, line 6, after "ticket," leave out "indicating connection with," and insert "showing that the person using same is a member of." The Government had proposed this clause with the intention of using it against secret societies. He presumed that the Government imagined that members of secret societies used some badge, possibly in their hats, to denote they were members of such societies. He feared the Government had made some mistake in introducing this sub-section. What was the meaning of the words "using any badge or ticket?" A man might have a Land League ticket, the Land League was proclaimed, the ticket remained in his house. The police were to have large powers of search, and if they discovered such a ticket they might hold that the person to whom it belonged belonged to an unlawful society. To guard against such a contingency, he moved this Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 6, after the word "ticket," to leave out the words "indicating connection with," and insert the words "showing that the person using same is a member of."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not see any objection to the Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT proposed to leave out the word "knowingly" at the beginning of line 8, inasmuch as the word had been inserted at the commencement of the clause.

Amendment agreed to.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he proposed, in lines 10 and 11, to leave out all the words from the beginning of the line to the end, as those words seemed to be unnecessary, because taking part in the proceedings of any unlawful Association was defined by the Bill. The words proposed to be omitted were these—

"Or of any meeting for the purpose of promoting the purposes of any such unlawful Association, or any of those purposes."

The use of these words seemed to him to be superfluous, and he therefore proposed that they should be struck out of the clause.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, lines 10 and 11, to leave out all the words after "thereof" to "shall." — (Sir William Harcourt.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. SEXTON said, before the clause was agreed to he should like to put a question to Her Majesty's Government. If Sub-section (a) of the clause were carried out in its integrity, the consequence would be that the members of unlawful Associations would die out, and there would be no necessity for the other sub-sections which followed—such, for instance, as soliciting or paying money, using any badge or ticket, and so on. He was at a loss to understand why all this elaborate, complicated, and useless machinery could not be omitted. Would it not be better to omit these sub-sections?

MR. PARNELL said, he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman might give an undertaking to cut out the sub-sections mentioned by his (Mr. Parnell's) hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) on the Report. They certainly seemed to be absurd, and would be of no use under any circumstances.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought the suggestion was one that was very well worth attention.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN asked whether the Proviso of which he had given Notice for insertion at the end of the clause could not be moved then?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the clause would come up afterwards.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he proposed to deal with the matter in the same clause as that which he had already mentioned.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 154; Noes 29; Majority 125.—(Div. List, No. 136.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT moved, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

Question put, and agreed to.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT moved, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

MR. HEALY wished to ask Her Majesty's Government whether the House might expect the Amendments to be brought forward by the Government to be proposed on the following day; and, if not, if the Government would inform the House when they would be brought up? He had understood from the Chief Secretary for Ireland that they would be brought up as soon as possible.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary is not in his place at the present moment; but I may inform the hon. Gentleman that no time will be lost in making progress with the Bill.

[Tenth Night.]

EJECTMENTS SUSPENSION (IRELAND)
BILL.

COLONEL NOLAN: I have to ask leave to introduce a Bill for the suspension of Ejectments in Ireland.

MR. WARTON: I object.

MR. SPEAKER: The Motion cannot be taken now.

COLONEL NOLAN: I will put it on the Paper for to-morrow, and I will take the present opportunity of giving Notice that I will then ask the hon. and learned Member for Bridport if he will consent to take off his block?

MOTION.

PARLIAMENTARY OATH (MR. BRADLAUGH)—“GURNEY v. BRADLAUGH.”

RESOLUTION.

MR. LABOUCHERE begged to move the following Resolution:—

“That leave be given to the proper Officer of this House to attend the Queen’s Bench Division of the High Court of Justice with the paper writing subscribed by Mr. Charles Bradlaugh at the Table of the House on the 21st February last, and the copy of the New Testament named in the Journals of the House of the same date.”

He said, he had not anticipated that it would have been necessary for him to make any statement in submitting this Resolution, because he took it to be the usual practice in all these cases that the Papers asked for were given as a matter of course, more particularly when the authorities of the House did not interpose any objection; but, as the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had given Notice of his intention to oppose the Motion, it would be necessary for him (Mr. Labouchere) to explain to the House, in as few words as possible, what was his object in submitting it. It was obvious that Mr. Bradlaugh either did or did not take the Oath at the Table of the House. After either taking the Oath or not taking it, Mr. Bradlaugh sat in that House, and an action was brought against him by Mr. Gurney for penalties. On Friday last he (Mr. Labouchere) presented a Petition on the subject, and on Monday he put on the Paper the Resolution he had now risen to move. On that occasion the Motion was put down for hearing during the time devoted to Private Business; but the hon. Member for North Warwickshire objected to its being taken, and it was not proceeded with. It was then put down at the end of the Public Business, and again the hon. Member for North Warwickshire objected. He (Mr. Labouchere) had received a letter that day (Tuesday) from the solicitor to Mr. Bradlaugh, in which he was informed that it was absolutely necessary for Mr. Bradlaugh’s case that he should obtain the Papers now asked for, and that it was very possible that the case would come on within a fortnight. Therefore, it was desirable that Mr. Bradlaugh’s solicitor should obtain the Papers as soon as possible. He (Mr. Labouchere) believed that the objection of the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire was based on the idea that the Courts had decided that the present action was a collusive action. With the permission of the House, he would read what Mr. Bradlaugh’s solicitor said in reference to the matter, and he thought the hon. Member for North Warwickshire would then perceive that he was entirely under an error. Mr. Bradlaugh’s solicitor said—

“In reply to your note, the action was not dismissed as collusive. The Judges said they believed the pleadings were so drawn as not to raise the real facts, and there and then they declined to try the case on demurrer. They required the pleadings to be amended, so that the whole of the facts might be raised, and the action tried by a jury. The amendments have been made, and the case is down for trial, and it is with a view to that trial that the documents are required.”

He (Mr. Labouchere) had now explained the object of his Motion, which he now begged leave to submit for the acceptance of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That leave be given to the proper Officer of this House to attend the Queen’s Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, with the paper writing subscribed by Mr. Charles Bradlaugh at the Table of the House on the 21st February last, and the copy of the New Testament named in the Journals of the House of the same date.”
—(Mr. Labouchere.)

MR. NEWDEGATE: Mr. Speaker, I cannot concur in the very limited view of the scope of this Motion, which the hon. Member for Northampton has presented to the House. I may at once declare that I deny the assertion that the action promoted in the Court of Queen's Bench—"Gurney v. Bradlaugh," on the 15th of May—the renewal of which is contemplated by this Motion, is not collusive, and I do so upon the authority of Mr. Justice Manisty; I assert that the action to which the Motion refers is collusive. I will read the last words which were uttered by the learned Judge in dismissing this case. They are taken from the shorthand writer's notes, and I think that they dispose of this part of the subject.

"Mr. Justice Manisty: There is no controversy between you and the defendant?"

"Mr. Bradlaugh: No, my lord."

"Mr. Justice Manisty: Then there is an end to the case. Of itself, that would prevent our hearing it."

These were the concluding words of Mr. Justice Manisty when he dismissed the case; and he dismissed the case because Mr. Bradlaugh was obliged to acknowledge that there was no controversy between the plaintiff and Gurney, and himself, the defendant. I think, Sir, that no hon. Member will now dispute what was the opinion of Mr. Justice Manisty on the 15th of May, 1882, when he spoke as the mouthpiece of the Court of Queen's Bench. From the first, when this case of "Gurney v. Bradlaugh" was brought before them, both the learned Judges of that Court stated that the pleadings were suspiciously imperfect. It was this that led them—both Mr. Justice Manisty and Mr. Justice Watkin Williams—to the conclusion that the case was collusive; and I have read to the House the concluding words of the senior Judge, expressing their decision that the case was manifestly collusive, that conclusion being founded upon the defective nature of the pleadings, and at last upon the acknowledgment of Mr. Bradlaugh himself that there was no controversy between the plaintiff and the defendant, the Judges in consequence refused to hear the case. The suit rejected on the 15th of May and the suit contemplated by the Motion before the House are identical—the plaintiff and the defendant the same persons. Let me now call the attention of the House to the avowed purpose of Mr. Bradlaugh in attempting to bring under the cognizance and within the jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench the Resolution by which this House condemned his conduct, when, on the 21st of February, uncalled by you, Sir, he came to that Table, produced a paper and a volume of some kind, I suppose it was a Testament, from his pocket, read the paper, kissed the book, threw the paper and the book on the Table, and then declared that he had duly taken the Oath. After that he was ordered to withdraw from the House; but, notwithstanding that order, he voted, and his vote was reported at the Table by one of the Tellers, the hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. Rowland Winn). Now, the object of this action is to raise the question whether that vote was valid, and for the further purpose of bringing the Resolution adopted by this House on the 22nd of February under the cognizance and under the jurisdiction of the Courts of Law, in manifest derogation of the position and rights of this House, which, as part of the High Court of Parliament, is superior to, and exempt from, the jurisdiction of the Courts of Law, especially as to the regulation of its internal proceedings, except so far as the House may think fit voluntarily to submit any part of its proceedings to the Courts. This the House has not done in the case of its Resolution of the 22nd of February last, which stands as follows:—

"Resolved, that Charles Bradlaugh, Esquire, one of the Members for the Borough of Northampton, having disobeyed the Orders of the House, and having, in contempt of the authority of this House, irregularly and contumaciously pretended to take and subscribe the Oath required by Law, be expelled this House."

Immediately after this Resolution was adopted, the House adopted a Resolution ordering a new Writ to be issued for the election of a Member for the borough of Northampton. Mr. Bradlaugh has also avowed that he induced this fictitious complainant, Gurney, who, I believe, is a person resident in or near Northampton, to bring this pretended action, in order to give him the advantage of appearing as defendant. Is it not manifest, Sir, that this is a collusive action—a fictitious action? And, moreover, that it was brought for the purpose of bringing within the jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench a Resolution of this House regulating its own internal state and proceedings, with no permission from the House itself. I would recall to the memory of the House that the Resolution of July the 1st, 1880, under which Mr. Bradlaugh sat for some time in this House, concluded with the words "subject to any liability by Statute." The Resolution is to the following effect:—

"That every person returned as a Member of this House, who may claim to be a person for the time being by Law permitted to make a solemn Affirmation or Declaration instead of taking an Oath, shall henceforth (notwithstanding so much of the Resolution adopted by this House on the 22nd day of June last as relates to Affirmation) be permitted, without question, to make and subscribe a solemn Affirmation in the form prescribed by 'The Parliamentary Oaths Act, 1866,' as altered by 'The Promissory Oaths Act, 1868,' subject to any liability by statute."

The Courts have fully considered the matter, which was thus virtually referred to them by the House under the words, at the end of this Resolution, which I have quoted, and the Courts have hitherto, up to the Court of Appeal, decided that Mr. Bradlaugh had no right to sit in this House after taking the Affirmation appointed for Quakers, Moravians, and Separatists as the equivalent to the Oath; and it is a very curious fact that the Court of Appeal decided finally—thus far the Courts have decided—that Mr. Bradlaugh has no right to sit and vote in this House. This has been the course of the case of "Clarke v. Bradlaugh;" and yet Mr. Bradlaugh has carried that case to the House of Lords. It appears to me, Sir, that the certainty that he would be defeated in the House of Lords impressed itself on Mr. Bradlaugh's mind, and that he then adopted the violent alternative, which led the House to pass the Resolution of the 22nd of February, to the effect I have quoted, on the Motion of the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote). The House declared, by an enormous majority, that the conduct of Mr. Bradlaugh, in presenting himself at the Table of the House, uncalled by you, Sir, and unattended by the Clerk, when you were not sitting in the Chair, but standing in front of the Chair, and were reproving him for his conduct, was irregular and contumacious on the 22nd of February. Mr. Bradlaugh appears to have changed tactics. The decision of the Court of Appeal in "Clarke v. Bradlaugh" was given on the 23rd. At first Mr. Bradlaugh endeavoured, by this novel proceeding, to procure from you, Sir, some assent to the pleadings which the Court of Queen's Bench has declared to be defective and of a suspicious character, and I will read the reply to that attempt, which was written by your direction. That reply was addressed to Messrs. Lewis and Lewis, Attorneys, of Ely Place, and is dated the 28th of March, 1882, and in the following terms:—

"I am directed by the Speaker to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 27th instant, and of the copies inclosed therewith of the pleadings in an action, recently commenced, between Joseph Gurney, Plaintiff, and Charles Bradlaugh, Defendant. In reply, I have to inform you that the Speaker sees no reason for his interfering in any way with the proceedings now pending in connection with the suit in question."

I trust that the House will, on the present occasion, follow the example of your caution and of your wisdom, and not involve itself in any way in this suit. The request is, that an Officer of this House shall attend the Court of Queen's Bench with the book and the paper which, on the 22nd of February, Mr. Bradlaugh either threw or left upon the Table of the House. In the case of an individual, Sir, there is no choice but of compliance with a subpoena; but that is a totally different case from that of this House. This House cannot be compelled to send its Officers to any Court. This can only be done by an act of judgment and volition on the part of this House; and if the House were to consent to send any of its Officers to attend this fictitious suit, it would be held that the House had, to a certain extent, sanctioned that suit. I submit, then, that your caution was not at all over-strained in this case, and that by all its precedents in like (if there be any) matters the House is bound to inquire into the circumstances of the case coming on for trial, before it commits itself by an act of judgment to ordering its Officers to attend the Court. I am very reluctant to detain the House further; but I felt bound to have this case watched, as having taken an active part in support of Mr. Clarke in his suit against Mr. Bradlaugh, I wanted to know why Mr. Bradlaugh had shifted his ground. It is obvious enough, in my opinion, that he has little hope of defeating Mr. Clarke's action. He has shifted his ground, and is obliged to set up a fictitious plaintiff in order to get this novel action before the Courts. It is a collusive action, and condemned as such by the Court of Queen's Bench, which has refused to hear it on that ground. What does Mr. Bradlaugh propose to do now? With the permission of the House, I will read a paragraph from what appears in The National Reformer, which is acknowledged to be Mr. Bradlaugh's own paper. In the number of that paper of June 4 I find this paragraph under the head "Jottings"—

"Although there is no disputed facts to be ascertained in Gurney v. Bradlaugh, this record has, in consequence of the decision of Justices Manisty and Watkin Williams, now been amended, and the suit will be set down for trial. After the trial it will again be brought before the Divisional Court for decision on the points of law as to the validity of the Oath taken, and of the Resolution of the House forbidding the taking. If the Divisional Court should then again refuse to hear argument, I shall appeal to the Court of Appeal, and if necessary to the House of Lords."

I might have read Mr. Bradlaugh's own words before the Court of Queen's Bench in support of the first statement with respect to this case which I made; but I am loth to detain the House longer. I have given that which is, in truth, a summary of the facts. It does appear to me, Sir, that if this House intends to maintain its independence and sole authority over its internal proceedings it must not depart from its original Rule, that it will not submit its proceedings, Standing Orders, or Resolutions, especially those referring to its own organization, to any Court whatever, unless it has been proved that there is some justifiable necessity for taking that course. The object of Mr. Bradlaugh is to impugn the authority of this House in regulating its own proceedings, and the means he has adopted of doing this is a collusive action. I trust that the House will have too much regard for its own dignity to take any step until it is fully assured by the hon. and learned Attorney General, or by some competent authority, that he is cognizant of the circumstances of the case, that the case for trial is real, and that there is some necessity, some justifiable necessity, for the appearance of an Officer of this House in the Court of Law. I therefore oppose this Motion.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, the subject of the Resolution submitted by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton was, as a matter of course, one that was entirely in the hands of the House, and it was with the House that the decision must rest. He, therefore, assured the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) that he was not endeavouring to guide or influence that decision in any way beyond what might be the effect of his own personal opinion on the matter. The statement he had to make on the subject before the House would be brief. It would be sufficient for his purpose to state that there were certain documents in the possession of the Officers of that House, and that those documents were deemed to be material to the hearing of the case to which the Resolution referred. The House would see that the Petition for leave to produce these documents was somewhat in substitution for the ordinary subpoena, which would be served on a subject whose attendance was required at the hearing of a suit; but here it was asked that an Officer of that House should attend with the Papers required. Under ordinary circumstances, the prayer of the Petition would, without doubt, be granted, and the House would permit its Officer to appear; and, without in any way acknowledging the jurisdiction of the Court or sanctioning any of its proceedings, that Officer would produce the documents thought to be necessary. The House had, therefore, to ask itself whether anything had been brought under its notice to induce it to depart from what was the ordinary course? It was said by the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire that this action was a collusive action. These words, in the mind of a lawyer, meant a great deal; but he would ask the House to see whether this was really the case. It was well known that many suits which were brought before the Courts for the purpose of trying certain legal questions were commenced as friendly suits. This was frequently the case in the trial of questions affecting the settlement of wills, or the institution of suits for the purpose of determining matters of right in connection with real property, or the right to a water-course, or any other right on which legal questions such as these were constantly made the subject of friendly suits for the purpose of obtaining the decision of a Court of Law. But a collusive suit was a corrupt suit—a suit whereby the persons interested attempted to obtain some advantage against third persons. But, as far as he was able to gather from the statements that had been made in reference to the case under consideration, he assumed it to be the fact that the plaintiff in this action, being a friend of the defendant, had instituted a suit for the purpose of determining, as far as it could be determined, a question in which one of the parties had an interest; and this was a perfectly rightful course to take. But that such a proceeding could bind that House in any way was a very different thing. He was not suggesting that this could be the case; but only that the parties, who were friendly to each other, and who had one and the same object in view, had chosen to institute a suit, and so to shape the pleadings that the question at issue might be duly determined. It was an action for penalties—an action which one subject had a right to try, whether it was a hostile or a friendly suit. He would, however, again guard himself by saying that, in what he was saying, he had no wish to bind the House as to the decision to which it might come. If the House agreed to the prayer of the Petition, what was it it would do in allowing its Officer to appear with the Papers asked for when the suit was tried? It would be giving no countenance to the suit by taking such a step. If the suit had been wrongly instituted, and if it were held to be so wrongly instituted that the Judges thought they ought not to try the case, they would say so when the hearing took place. If the hearing were a wrong hearing, the Judges would so determine; if it were right that it should be heard, it would be heard; and the House, in directing its Officer to appear and produce the documents required in Court, would only be doing what it would do in any ordinary case. If the case were, as had been stated, a collusive case, the Judges, who would have the issue before them, would so determine; and it was for them to decide, and not for that House, whether the case was collusive. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire had stated that the Judges had decided that the case was collusive. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would excuse him for saying that he was afraid he had been mistaken as to a legal technicality, though he (the Attorney General) was not anxious to enter into the matter.

The Attorney General

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he had been assured that the Court of Queen's Bench had decided that the action was so collusive that they would not hear the case.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the case had come before the Judges on a demurrer, and the Judges had said that the parties had not raised the proper issue; and they had suggested that the issue should be raised in another way. The Judges having so determined, the matter was now coming on for trial. But that House could have no regard to these matters, and it had no proof of them before it; nor was it within the competence, nor suitable to the dignity of the House, to endeavour to try whether the action was a collusive action or not. He would give the House an instance. In the case of "Miller v. Salomons," the suit was brought as a friendly suit by a friend of Alderman Salomons, for the purpose of trying a somewhat similar question to that raised in the case under consideration. That was a trial to determine the right to sit in that House; but what was done in that case did not in any way control the conduct of the House. Supposing that in that case there had been an application for documents in the possession of the House, what would that House have said? Would it have said—"We decline to afford the person bringing the action the opportunity of having the documents asked for produced in Court?" If the House, in the present instance, refused on the grounds stated to agree to this Motion, it would have, in every other case that might arise, to determine whether, in its opinion, the action had been rightly brought, or was a friendly action. He would ask the House what evidence it had before it that this was a collusive action? The House was not the tribunal to determine these matters. If there was to be inquiry as to collusion between the parties, or as to the friendliness of the action, the tribunal to conduct, and the method by which to conduct it, was the Court, else the House ran the risk, which he was not willing it should run, of bringing itself into conflict with the Court when a subpoena was issued for the production of these documents. It was a conflict into which it was undesirable for the House to enter. He hoped hon. Members would believe that he was not desirous of entering into controversial topics; but he wished to regard the suit as one brought by A or B, and not against Mr. Bradlaugh, in which it would be no part of the duty of the House to decide how far there was collusion.

MR. NEWDEGATE was unwilling to interrupt the Attorney General; but it happened that he had been personally cognizant of the case of "Miller v. Salomons;" and he begged to remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that that case was heard by leave of the Court after Mr. (now Baron) Bramwell and Mr. Channel had corrected the pleadings.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, he would take that instance from the hon. Member. It was a friendly suit under similar circumstances, and if the House did not allow these documents to go, would it not be said that because the majority of the House had been in conflict with Mr. Bradlaugh they would not allow that to him which had been done in the case of an ordinary suitor? Was it not more consonant with the feeling of justice? Was it not well to avoid giving the occasion for a further grievance by refusing this to Mr. Bradlaugh because of the decision of a majority of the House, of which he was not now making any complaint? He was sure the House would not allow its feelings to enter into the consideration of the case, and he believed it would be for the dignity of the House to pass this Motion.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD confessed there was a great deal in what had been said by the Attorney General, and he thought what had been said might prevail with the House if he had satisfied the House that this was a real action at all. He (Sir Hardinge Giffard) observed in the letter which had been read by the hon. Member for Northampton at the commencement of these proceedings that it was suggested that the learned Judges dismissed the action because the pleadings were imperfectly framed. It was all very well to say that, and it was a legal technicality which he would not go into; but it raised the whole question whether, on the one hand, this action was a farce—a burlesque that should not be permitted to go on; or whether it was a real substantial action, in which latter case he would quite agree if that could be established. Mr. Bradlaugh should be allowed that which any other suitor would be allowed. He would point out to hon. Members, not of the Legal Profession, that anyone could issue a writ and sue anyone else; but if it afterwards turned out, as here, that Mr. Bradlaugh procured some friend to issue a writ against himself, that was not an action at all. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James) dissented]. He saw that the Attorney General made a gesture of dissent; but he knew a case not very long ago when the Court of Appeal decided this very point, that it was not a real action at all.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, he knew the case which his hon. and learned Friend had in his mind; but he was not quite correct. What the Court held was that a friendly action did not prevent a succeeding action.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, the Court decided that there was no action at all, and no formal judgment, though the parties called themselves plaintiff and defendant. If there was a bargain between them they were not really plaintiff and defendant, and the Court would not entertain such suits. He would not say that such was the case in the present suit; but he certainly thought that before the House was asked to come to a decision hon. Members should have before them a copy of the shorthand writer's notes of the statements upon which the Court of Queen's Bench determined. What the Court had determined, he understood—for he had not read the document quoted from by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire—was that they declined to hear the case upon the statement of facts the parties had thought proper to put before the Court, for the Court did not believe this was a real action, but a colourable performance in which parties were masking as plaintiff and defendant, whereas there were no real plaintiff and defendant; for this reason, the Court declined to sit in judgment. This was a mere demurrer, the Attorney General said; but if that was the case there was no traverse on the record as there would have been, and judgment would have been given under ordinary circumstances. Mr. Justice Manisty began by saying—"I decline to hear this case;" and Mr.

Watkin Williams said—"I prefer that it should be postponed until I am satisfied there is a real case of action." That was the language of the learned Judges; they considered it a sham action, and now the House was asked to make itself a party to this farce of trying a case in which there was no real plaintiff, and no real defendant. If this was the true condition of things, then the House should refuse to make itself a party to such a farce, and it was not consonant with the dignity of the House to allow its Officer to appear in support of such a collusion. If this was a true complaint the House should refuse the Motion. He did not know whether it had been established to the satisfaction of hon. Members, for probably few of them had seen the shorthand writer's notes; and he would suggest that the debate be adjourned, and that, in the meantime, the notes of the Judges' decisions should be presented to the House, for the House to form its judgment. If, in view of that decision, the House should come to the conclusion that this was no real suit, then he did not think the House would be consulting its own dignity in aiding a suit which, on that hypothesis, would be a solemn farce. He must say a word upon what the Attorney General had said as to the right of a suitor to bring any action. He entirely denied that any suitor had a right to bring a collusive suit, and learned Judges had more than once declined to entertain such actions brought for the purpose of ascertaining the opinion of the Court. As they had said, they appeared to try real actions and real causes of complaint; they did not sit for the purpose of giving an opinion in the form of deciding an action; and he must, therefore, protest against that which the Attorney General put forward as an absolute proposition, that anyone had a right to bring an action for the purpose of getting an opinion on a point of law. That view had been repudiated by Judges, and the House would do well to pause before it came to the conclusion that it should interfere, until it was found that this was a real action by a plaintiff to recover real penalties from a defendant, and that these terms were not masks assumed for another purpose. It would be much against the dignity of the House to aid and assist in any such performance.

Sir Hardinge Giffard

MR. WARTON said, he should like to know what the Attorney General meant when he said so modestly that he did not seek to guide the House? Were hon. Members free to vote as they would, or were hon. Members opposite to be influenced by the Government Whips? When the hon. and learned Gentleman sought to draw a parallel between this sham action and a friendly action, he somewhat misled the House. Friendly suits were well known in the Court of Chancery, when members of a family had conflicting ideas of the right to property; but these rights were real; and the parties might, if they chose, pursue their rights in a hostile manner; but, by arrangement, the suit was arranged—perhaps by the same solicitor—on either side, and the Judges could see at once that it was a real action, although the suit was called a friendly one. But in this case there was no real action, but an impudent defiance of the House on the part of Mr. Bradlaugh, in the same spirit with which he came to the Table and insulted the House. In the same spirit he carried on the insult now, and he would even prostitute the Judges, if he could, to be a party to his attack. As he had attempted to get into the House before, so he would make the attempt again.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, so far as he understood the argument of the Attorney General, it came to this—that the House had not before it any real facts upon which to proceed; and he said, in effect, when certain allegations were made—Why not assent to the motion of the hon. Member for Northampton? But the House had no proof as to the position of the question, and, indeed, was absolutely ignorant on the subject. Most hon. Members, perhaps, had read a report in the daily newspapers; but beyond that the House knew nothing. Lawyers had expressed opinions on both sides, and it seemed to him that the only proper way to arrive at a determination was to have the proper documents before them on which to form a judgment. He referred to the Judgments delivered by the high judicial authorities in the suit of "Gurney v. Bradlaugh." He would, therefore, move the adjournment of the debate, intending, should the House accept that Motion, to follow it up by moving for the production of copies of the Judgments delivered in the suit of "Gurney v. Bradlaugh."

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. E. Stanhope.)

The House divided:—Ayes 65; Noes 85: Majority 20.—(Div. List, No. 137.)

Original Question again proposed.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, this attempt on the part of the Prime Minister to institute a new treaty with the hon. Member for Northampton was so exceedingly inconvenient that it should not be agreed to by the House, and he therefore begged to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Lord Claud Hamilton.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he thought the House would be disposed to take a practical view of the question. The case stood for immediate trial; and if the House proceeded to an adjournment, the effect would be that by the operation of the Half-past 12 o'clock Rule the debate would be prevented from being resumed, and the result would be to precipitate that contest which he was anxious the House should avoid. It was only fair to the House that they should now be allowed to say whether the Motion should be accepted or not.

MR. NEWDEGATE observed, that the proposal of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) was, in his opinion, the very way to produce—an obvious means for producing—a conflict between the House and the Law Courts. The practice of the House had always hitherto been—especially with respect to causes touching its own proceedings—to refuse to allow an Officer of the House to attend a Court, unless the House was cognizant of the merits of the case; and if the House now consented to the Resolution, that, of itself, would constitute a departure from what had been the invariable rule and practice of the House. He was convinced that the proposal of the hon. Member for Northampton tended to embroil the House with the Courts of Law.

COLONEL NOLAN said, it was plain that the Conservative Party were resolved on a policy of Obstruction. They had taken the sense of the House, and immediately made another Adjournment Motion. It was on a piece with the proceeding which they had adopted early in the evening, when Notice was given of the unusual course of blocking the first reading of a Bill—the Ejectments Suspension (Ireland) Bill.

MR. GRANTHAM said, he thought it was desirable that the House should not take another division on adjournment. The Motion itself, no doubt, contained a difficult legal and technical point, and, so far as he was concerned, he could not support it; but as the House had agreed to the original Motion it was not wise to again divide on what would not be a fair test as to the real feeling of the House.

MR. CALLAN said, the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Nolan) had stated that in consequence of some individual Member of the Conservative Party blocking some Bill—the Ejectments Suspension Bill for Ireland—that, therefore, he would take every opportunity to oppose anything brought forward by Conservatives.

COLONEL NOLAN rose to explain.

MR. SPEAKER: I must call on the hon. Member for Louth to confine himself to the Question before the House.

MR. CALLAN said, then, as an Irish Home Rule Member, he should take every opportunity of voting against any Bill or Motion brought forward by a coercive Liberal Party.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he viewed with suspicion anything that emanated from the hon. Member for Northampton; but, at the same time, after the appeal of the Attorney General, he would not stand in the way of the House, but would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GRANTHAM said, it was the opinion of those who voted in the minority on the last division that they were not in a position to say what was the view which would be taken by the Judges as to this action, and that they ought not to support the Motion; but now that they had been beaten it was better for the minority to let the original Motion pass without voting upon it.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That leave be given to the proper Officer of this House to attend the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice with the paper writing subscribed by Mr. Charles Bradlaugh at the Table of the House on the 21st February last, and the copy of the New Testament named in the Journals of the House of the same date.

House adjourned at a quarter after Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 14th June, 1882.

MINUTES.] — PRIVATE BILLS (by Order) —
Considered as amended—London and South
Western Railway*; North London Suburban Tramway*; Swindon, Marlborough, and Andover Railway*.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Baths and Washhouses Acts Amendment* [201];
Ejectments Suspension (Ireland)* [202].

First Reading—Petty Sessions (Ireland)* [203].
Second Reading—Copyright (Musical Compositions)* [161].

Committee—Prevention of Crime (Ireland) [157]
—R.P. [Eleventh Night].

Third Reading—Local Government Provisional
Orders (No. 4)* [159], and passed.

QUESTIONS.

EJECTMENTS SUSPENSION (IRELAND) BILL.

COLONEL NOLAN asked the honourable and learned Member for Bridport,
If he will remove his block to the Motion for leave to bring in the Bill for a suspension of ejectments in Ireland pending the discussion on the Government Arrears Bill?

MR. WARTON, in reply, said, with every desire to be courteous to the hon.
and gallant Member, he must, on broad and general grounds, decline to answer the Question, as he observed that a practice was growing up of asking Questions of that kind which ought not to be put.

EGYPT—THE POLITICAL CRISIS.

MR. BOURKE, in rising to give Notice that to-morrow he would ask the Government, Whether they had made any demand for reparation for the losses and injuries sustained by British subjects in the late disturbances in Egypt; or, whether they intended to make such a demand? also said, that, having received a telegram from Alexandria, which led him to believe that apprehensions were entertained there regarding the interruption of the Mail Service, he wished now to ask the hon.

Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government had received any intelligence confirmatory of such a report. He would also ask another Question now, and if the hon. Baronet could not answer it at once, he would give Notice of it for tomorrow. It was, Whether, considering that the Papers which had been promised to be delivered to the House next week, or the week after, would give very little information respecting the existing state of things in Egypt, the Government would not be prepared, either to-day or to-morrow, to make a general statement with regard to the condition of affairs in Egypt upon which hon. Members would be able, with the permission of the House, of course, to make observations.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, with regard to the Question about the Mail Service, we have not heard anything ourselves; but, through the kindness of the manager of the Peninsular and Oriental Company, I have seen a copy of the telegram to which the right hon.
Gentleman refers. It is couched in very vague and general terms, and does not specially refer to the Mail Service, but speaks of probable danger to the Europeans in perfectly general terms, and there is no special reference to the Mail Service. [MR. BOURKE: Yes; the telegram does refer to the Mail Service.]
Then it is not the same telegram as that which has been sent to me; and, in that case, I should like to see it, and, if necessary, I will make further inquiries about it. With respect to the request of the right hon. Gentleman for a general statement on the part of the Government as to Egyptian affairs, I fear that any statement in the absence of the Papers would be one on which it would be impossible for hon. Members to comment, because the whole case depends on a very considerable number of Papers, which we are trying to get out as soon as possible.

MR. BOURKE: Are the Papers not ready? It is now some six or seven months since the Papers have been in progress. If the hon. Baronet had said that to produce the Papers would not be in the interest of the Public Service, I could understand that that might be a perfectly valid reason; but when the Government have promised that they would produce them, I can hardly understand why they are not more advanced, seeing that they have been in progress for the last six or seven months.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I do not know what the right hon. Gentleman means by talking about the Papers having been six or seven months in hand. It is not six or seven months. Those which were presented last week come up to the 5th of February. The Papers now being brought out are in three sections, the first section coming down to the 17th of April, the second to the 15th of May, and the third to the end of May. We are trying to get them all out together; but if there be any delay in that course, the sections down to the 15th of May will be brought out first. They are now in the stage of second revise; they have been to Paris and have been returned by Lord Lyons; and we have the observations of the French Government upon them. Sir Edward Malet's telegram with regard to them has not yet been received.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: We can understand, Sir, that, of course, there must be some delay in the production of Papers of this character; but what the public and the House are interested in is to know something more than we shall know, even when the promised Papers are presented. Therefore, we do not so very much care for the Papers at this moment. Of course, whenever the time comes for reviewing the whole conduct of the Government in regard to Egypt, it will be important that we should have the whole of the Papers; but what we really desire now earnestly to know is what the present state of affairs in Egypt is; and, as far as it can be done, to know also, or have some idea given us of the policy which the Government are pursuing. What we wish, and what my right hon. Friend wishes, to ask to-morrow is, Whether the Government will not be prepared to make some general statement that will give us some knowledge and some satisfaction on these points?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The Papers up to the 15th of May are absolutely essential to an understanding of the present situation, and no short statement that could possibly be laid before the House, without those Papers themselves, will be satisfactory. I can promise them in the course of next week; but the exact day cannot be named until we get a telegram from Sir Edward Malet as to what Papers he objects to and what he consents to appearing.

MR. CHAPLIN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention had been called to the alarming telegrams in that morning's papers as to the condition of the Army in Egypt. One of those telegrams, appearing in The Times, was dated Alexandria, June 13, 11.25 a.m., and it said—

"Quiet continues, but the situation is extremely grave, as all depends on the goodwill of the Army, which begins to show signs of insubordination and of disliking the task of protecting the Christians. If the Army refuses to perform this duty there will then be terrible danger to all."

Another, dated Alexandria, midnight, said that while the soldiery at Cairo appeared to be perfectly orderly, at Alexandria—

"On the contrary, it seems that the soldiers are insolent and triumphant. Europeans are jostled and treated with the greatest rudeness. . . . The general opinion here is that there are fears of disorder arising before any possible arrival of Turkish troops; and the Europeans would prefer all the risks of landing the allied Marines to the present insecurity. There is no doubt that the soldiers assisted largely in the scenes of disorder, and that the atrocities go far beyond all former ideas conveyed to you."

He wished to ask, Whether the Government were in possession of any information which led them to the belief that there was a good foundation for the statements in those telegrams; and, if so, he wanted to know whether the Government had taken any measures which, in their opinion, were adequate for the protection of British subjects?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the statement that the soldiers assisted largely in the late riot at Alexandria is, according to all the information we possess, the opposite of the truth. The soldiers were perfectly orderly, and, according to all accounts we have received, helped to put the riot down and restore order. As to the apprehensions of future disorder at Alexandria, Dervish Pasha is certainly of opinion that he can maintain order in Alexandria. The same thing has been stated by him to the Sultan at Constantinople. He has also stated to the Consuls that he is perfectly convinced he can maintain order. The whole of the European Consuls have seen Dervish Pasha on the subject of the safety of the European residents, and he has made a very strong statement on the subject. He stated, indeed, that in the urgent circumstances of the case, he assumes a joint responsibility with the Egyptian Government in the preservation of order.

MR. ONSLOW? What Egyptian Government? Who is the Government of Egypt?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir Edward Malet, who arrived at Alexandria to-day, is not going on board ship, but will stay at an hotel in the town. Therefore, from all these facts, with the report of Dervish Pasha, and from the report of the Consuls, and from the fact that Sir Edward Malet is to stay at an hotel in Alexandria, instead of going on board an iron-clad, I do not understand that there is reason to apprehend further disturbance.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I wish to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If his attention has been called to the following telegrams:—The correspondent of The Daily News at Alexandria says—

“All the merchant ships in the harbour are besieged with refugees, and the steamers sailing are crowded with ladies, the men gladly taking deck passages. The position is a terrible one. We are entirely at the mercy of a few thousand soldiers. The fleet is no protection. Its presence here in the first instance, without troops to follow up the ultimatum, was the cause of the present disastrous situation. Unable to receive one-fourth of the families aboard the ships of war, and unable to act, their coming has been a delusion and a snare.”

The very well informed correspondent of The Times says—

“Ten days ago I quoted an authority I thought worthy of confidence, who said the only blunder left for the Powers to make, and that, perhaps, the greatest, is sending a Commissioner without troops. The warning was disregarded, and the blunder, having been committed, has proved the worst. On the same authority, I say, unless an overwhelming Turkish force be at Alexandria and Ismailia before Sunday, worse has yet to come.”

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE rose to Order. He wished to know whether the hon. Member was in Order in reading a number of long telegrams from newspapers, and founding Questions upon them?

Sir Charles W. Dilke

MR. SPEAKER: Before the hon. Baronet rose, I was about to rise, in order to point out to the House and the hon. Member the extreme inconvenience of founding Questions on every telegram in every newspaper. I am bound to say that it does appear to me that, before Questions of such gravity are put, an hon. Member should take some measures to ascertain the truth of the telegrams.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, that the evident reluctance of Her Majesty's Government to give the House information of any kind as to what was going on in Egypt compelled him to take a course which he adopted with very great regret—namely, to move that the House do now adjourn. The hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir Charles W. Dilke) appeared to him to have abused the marvellous powers he possessed of compressing within the narrowest compass the least possible amount of information. He seemed also to have pushed to the extreme the theory that no Papers were to be laid upon the Table without the consent of another Government. No doubt, the difficulties they were now involved in were principally derived from their association with the French Government, which they allowed to seize Tunis without protest of any kind. At the time when the Control was established in Egypt, England and France were on good terms with the Caliph, the head of the Mussulman religion, and later on they received his assistance in deposing Ismail Pasha. Subsequently to that act of friendship on the part of the Caliph, Her Majesty's Government opened their career by what was now called the Naval Demonstration, which was to most Mussulmans taking territory from Turkey and handing it over to their enemies in Montenegro. They wound up that act by one which appeared to him (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) to partake of a filibustering character—namely, the proposal to seize the Custom House of Smyrna. Beyond that, they took no active steps to prevent the French Government from seizing hold of Tunis, and these two acts gave a colour to the Control of Egypt, which did not exist when the Sultan assisted them; and they were now debarred from commenting upon the conduct of their own Government, because the Government put everything upon the back of France—the action of that country being what had disturbed our relations with the Porte as regarded Egypt. On the 11th of May he asked the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, what steps the Government were taking to protect European life in Egypt, and he absolutely refused to answer; and from that time, down to the date when the House had been told that some ships were to be sent to Alexandria, the Government had refused to give them any information whatever. He had then asked for Papers, and the hon. Baronet said that the House could only have them with the consent of the French Government. But now that the French Government had given their consent, hon. Members were told that they could not have them without the consent of Sir Edward Malet. In other words, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, having no policy of his own, was bound to ask and to accept the advice of one of his own subordinates. The excuse was most preposterous, and he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had never heard of such a case. They were, at that moment, in a very dangerous position in Egypt—dangerous to their own interests in the East, and dangerous, he believed, to the safety of their Empire in India. They were told that there was a gunboat at each end of the Suez Canal. Why was not a gunboat sent up to Ismailia? Why were they not told what steps were being taken to secure life and property at Alexandria? Over and over again he had asked what steps were being taken, and over and over again he had been refused any information. He laid much stress upon an agreement with France; but he maintained that they ought not to subordinate their own interests to those of France. France had raised this question by her action in Tunis. She had excited the suspicions of the Mussulman races throughout the world, imperilling their interests in the East, and, he believed, the safety of their Empire in India. It was monstrous that the Government did not give them any more information. They knew nothing later than the 5th of February. They could not get the Papers. One day they were told that the French Government would not agree to their production; and another day they were told that Sir Edward Malet had not agreed. In consequence of the great reticence of the hon. Baronet, a reticence unprecedented, and which had never been known in that House before, for they had never been tied to the skirts of a Government which had damaged and disturbed their relations with every other Power in the world—in consequence of that reticence, concealment, and vacillation, he might say imbecility, of the Government—he felt bound to take the course he had done, and to move the adjournment of the House.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Sir H. Drummond Wolff.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had spoken of the evident reluctance of the Government to give information to the House. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) ventured to assert that more late information had been given to the House in regard to Egypt on recent occasions than had ever been given before on any question involving dangerous points of foreign affairs. ["Oh, oh!"] He would appeal to the pages of Hansard to confirm that statement. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), who spoke a little while previously, had read things which were deserving of notice, and which seemed to him (Sir Charles W. Dilke) to be almost the exact opposite of what had been read by the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett). That showed what confusion arose from reading telegrams from different newspapers, and immediately founding Questions upon them. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire had said that the Europeans at Alexandria would prefer a landing of troops from the Fleet, with all the risks that might attend it, to their present position of insecurity. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had only to inform the hon. Member that the Government had the most perfect confidence in the tact, discretion, and courage of Sir Beauchamp Seymour, and that Sir Beauchamp Seymour had power to land seamen and Marines, to any extent he pleased, from the Fleet under his command. There were four ships cruising off the coast, three of which were able to go into the harbour of Alexandria whenever they pleased. Sir Beauchamp Seymour was in possession now of a very large force. There was also a large French force, and a considerable force belonging to the other Powers, who would be sure to land troops and Marines, if we did so, for the protection of their subjects. The Government were content to leave the question whether a force should be landed or not to the discretion of Sir Beauchamp Seymour. The hon. Member for Portsmouth had spoken of our relations with the Porte as though we were in quarrel with the Porte at the present moment. All he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) could say was, that our relations with the Porte were friendly in the extreme; and the language which had been used by the Sultan himself personally to Lord Dufferin showed an absolute agreement with this country in regard to the steps to be taken in Egypt. The hon. Member for Portsmouth had given the House his views with regard to the French alliance. It was with great regret that he said so, because he had a high opinion of the judgment of the hon. Member; but he could not but think that his language on that occasion had been mischievous in the extreme. It was absolutely impossible that he should follow him through the speech he had made; a Motion for the adjournment of the House at that time was always irregular, and it was extremely dangerous when made for the purpose of introducing discussions on foreign affairs. The only way of limiting that danger was for the Government steadily to refuse to be parties to any such discussion. With regard to the publication of the Papers, the hon. Member said he had never known a case where Papers had been delayed in order to obtain the consent of a subordinate to their publication. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would venture to say that there never was a case where that was not done. It would be impossible to obtain agents of repute to serve the country abroad if their despatches and the conversations between themselves and foreign Ministers were to be published without their consent. They could not get any man of character to serve the country abroad if that were done; and he would venture to say that on no occasion had despatches been published without their previous consent. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) was going to give any countenance to the Motion; but, speaking with a full sense of his responsibility, he must repeat the statement he had made just now—namely, that the language by which this Motion had been supported on that occasion was language of the most mischievous character, and was calculated to do great injury.

Sir Charles W. Dilke

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, he trusted that he should not be accused of any wish to embarrass Her Majesty's Government.

MR. PUGH rose to Order. He wished to ask, whether the hon. Member for Greenwich (Baron Henry De Worms) was in Order in addressing the House now, having previously seconded the Motion for Adjournment?

MR. SPEAKER said, that several hon. Members rose at the same time; and he was not aware that the hon. Member for Greenwich seconded the Motion.

MR. WARTON: But as to the point of Order?

MR. SPEAKER could not say that the hon. Member was out of Order, because several hon. Members seconded the Motion, and he did not accept the hon. Member as having done so, therefore he was entitled to be heard.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS, resuming, said, that if any embarrassment had been caused to the Government in regard to Egypt by the present discussion, that embarrassment was more directly due to the Government themselves than to the Opposition. He thought the very peculiar relations which existed, or which had existed, between this country and France, with regard to the Egyptian Question, would gain rather than lose by being thoroughly ventilated in the House. The hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had pointed out that the policy of France and the policy of England were very distinct, or should, at all events, be kept quite distinct, in this Eastern crisis. France had adopted a line of policy of her own with regard to Tunis; and it would be dangerous in the extreme if this country were in any degree to follow the lead so given by France. He could well believe that Her Majesty's Government was peculiarly embarrassed at the present moment, inasmuch as it must be extremely difficult for the Prime Minister—if he might use the expression—to eat the words which he used some years since with regard to the policy of the "unspeakable Turk." He quite conceived that Her Majesty's Government was very much embarrassed in having to go hat in hand, and to ask the "unspeakable Turk" not only to protect the Khedive, but to extend his gracious protection to Her Majesty's subjects who were now in Egypt. Then, on the other hand, the Opposition would not be doing their duty if they did not elicit, by the best means at their disposal, some statement of policy—if policy there was—from Her Majesty's Government. He was ready to accept the assurance of the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs that it was very difficult indeed for the Government to give an outline of their policy, not, indeed, because it would be embarrassing to the relations of the Government with other countries, but because they had no policy at all. Some days ago he had inquired of the Prime Minister whether any steps would be taken to protect the Khedive, and the Prime Minister replied that the Khedive was in no danger whatever. If that was so, what was the reason of the sudden departure of the Khedive from the capital? They were told also by the Prime Minister that there was not the slightest apprehension of any danger to the Suez Canal, and that it could not be destroyed from the banks; but he was not aware of any scientific opinion corroborating that statement; and he ventured to think, from personal knowledge, that the Canal could thus be easily destroyed, and yet no steps were taken by Her Majesty's Government to prevent that catastrophe. But then he knew the Prime Minister held views peculiarly his own respecting the Suez Canal; he did not admit the paramount value of the Canal for our communication with India, and declared that the communication could be kept up with equal facility by way of the Cape. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Never.] He had been under the impression that such a statement had been made; but, of course, he accepted the denial of the right hon. Gentleman, and would withdraw the remark. Upon the occasion, however, of the purchase of the Suez Canal Shares, the right hon. Gentleman undoubtedly said that both financially and politically there never was a greater blunder made, notwithstanding the fact that 80 per cent of the total tonnage passing through the Canal was British. Politically, however, he (Baron Henry de Worms) considered that the late Government never took a more judicious step. For many years it had been considered that England was the arbiter of the Eastern Question, no country in the world having so great a stake in the East; but at present—to their shame be it said—that position, to which they were entitled, had passed entirely out of their hands. Germany was at the present moment the arbiter of the Eastern Question. In consequence of the policy of alternate conciliation and bullying adopted by the Government, they had alienated most of the Powers in Europe, without conciliating the remainder, and they now found themselves in the present extraordinary position they stood in with regard to Egypt. They had handed over to the Turk the power of interfering with their communication with their Indian Empire. At that very moment they were obliged to appeal to Turkey to support their influence in Egypt, and to take part in a Conference; and if the Conference was held, instead of British interests preponderating, they would be the last in the race. Their interests, instead of being paramount, would be set aside by other Powers whose interests were less than their own. They knew that Austria had considerable influence in the Eastern Question, but they had alienated Austria, and it was very likely that she would throw her influence in the scale against them. Again, no one could say that some day Russia might not once again hold out her hand to Turkey, and then the English people would be justified in throwing the whole blame upon Her Majesty's Government. Turkey was our old Ally, and if she had sinned against civilization, other Powers had sinned also. He did not wish to speak at any great length upon the subject now; but the present humiliating position of the country was due to the peace-at-any-price policy adopted by the Government, a policy which generally resulted in war, and against which he desired to enter his most earnest proter

That Government not only did not protect the lives and property of British subjects in Egypt, but imperilled the best interests of our great Indian Empire.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he certainly should not attempt to follow the hon. Member opposite (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) in the whole of the various questions which he had raised, and which were very much out of place at that moment; but he wished to express the very great regret with which he had heard the expressions of hon. Gentlemen opposite with regard to France. He was also specially surprised that they should raise the question of Tunis. We might think that France, for her own interest, and in the interest of Europe, was ill-advised in regard to Tunis; but this they knew—that it was an English Foreign Secretary—a Member of the late Cabinet—who invited France to go to Tunis. ["No, no!"] It was distinctly so. With reference to what fell from the hon. Member opposite (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) in connection with his repeated expression referring to the Sultan as head of the Mussulman religion, he should be very glad if he might be allowed, in Parliamentary language, to say that the hon. Member was talking nonsense. He would not go into the very debateable questions that had been raised; but he must express a strong hope and belief that if a peaceful French Government might see a reasonably peaceful solution of the question, we should not be dragged into war by the Liberal Government of this country. It must be admitted that the question had been greatly aggravated by the dreadful event at Alexandria. There was no minimizing that event. It had been a most serious disturbance, attended with great loss of life. But the Government were bound to take care that they did not listen to one side of the case merely. He had been about to ask the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir Charles W. Dilke) a Question with regard to a telegram—not a vague and unsupported telegram, but one of apparent authenticity—which appeared in The Times, regarding a statement made by no less a person than the Prime Minister of France, M. de Freycinet, who stated that he had received a detailed account of the origin of this disturbance. This was the statement attributed to him—

Baron Henry De Worms

"The origin of the unfortunate events was a quarrel between an Arab and a Maltese. The Arab's companions came to his aid, and Maltese and Greeks to the aid of the Maltese, and both Maltese and Greeks fired from the windows of the adjoining houses. Several Arabs were hit. The houses were then pillaged, and inoffensive Europeans were attacked."

If this statement was in any degree authentic, they must admit that the aggression was not wholly one-sided, and he had no doubt that the Government would take these things into consideration. The French Government had great interests in Egypt; and he must say as strongly as he could that if the French Government saw its way to a peaceful solution, he was confident that Her Majesty's Government would not drag us into violence and war.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, that, in his opinion, the country would view with approbation the step taken by the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff). There was, undoubtedly, a general feeling of alarm throughout the country, and that alarm was justified by the facts. The European residents were in the greatest danger, and many of them were flying for their lives. In view of these circumstances, the Government had been asked to give some reasons for the belief that they were taking steps to protect British subjects in Egypt; but the House had been unable to obtain the slightest assurance on that subject. They wished to know what was the policy of the Government; they wished to know what they were going to do to secure the great interests of England in Egypt, and what steps they would take to maintain order and the predominance of this country? He regretted that he had not been permitted to read some extracts; and, with regard to those he had read, he had always understood that it was perfectly in order to read short quotations from the newspapers to the House; in fact, the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) had just previously read longer extracts than he (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) had, and without interruption. He should like to read one short sentence from The Times in support of his argument. The correspondent of that newspaper was well informed, and he said in his letter—

"Unless an overwhelming Turkish Force be in Alexandria before Sunday next, worse has yet to come."

He had often asked the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs Questions on that subject, and he challenged him or anyone to say that those Questions were of a captious or Party character. His whole object had been to point to one fact—namely, that the Egyptian Question could only be settled by cordial co-operation between England and the Porte. It could only be settled now by a despatch of Turkish troops. He contended that in default of any guarantees from the Government they were entitled to press for some information. The assertion of the hon. Baronet that the Government had given the fullest information possible was most inaccurate. It was like many other statements of the hon. Baronet, which sounded very well, but which proved utterly groundless when closely examined. It was clear that the Government had no policy—that they were at the mercy of events. But the state of Egypt would not admit of delay; great alarm was being caused in this country; and they were, therefore, justified in demanding some statement as to the policy of the Government in the future. As to the joint intervention with France, he wished to refer to that in the most moderate terms. He did not blame France for acting in this matter as seemed best for her own interests. But he blamed Her Majesty's Government for not considering, first of all, the just interests of England. To say the least, that joint intervention was most unfortunate. Our interests were only coincident with those of France so far as the financial stability of Egypt was concerned. But if they went one step beyond that, the interests of the two countries were undeniably diverse. Considering that the security of our Indian Empire largely depended on Egypt, and that six-sevenths of the tonnage which passed through the Suez Canal were British, he thought it would not be incorrect to say that our interests in Egypt were to those of France as six or eight to one. Another grave reason against the joint intervention was the action of France lately in regard to Tunis. By that action she had drawn down upon herself the hatred and detestation of the whole Mussulman world, and justly so. [Ironical cheers from the Ministerial Benches.] If those cheers were intended to emphasize a statement made by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) that the French annexation of Tunis had been brought about by the action of a Member of the late Government, he (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) denied the accuracy of that allegation. A suggestion might have been made, but it was merely in conversation. It was made as part of a general scheme; and it was quite certain that the late Government would never have consented to so flagrant a violation of International right and British interests. That statement, therefore, could only be accepted in the most general terms. It was well known that one reason why the Porte had not intervened hitherto more actively to put down the Egyptian revolution was that the Sultan was unable to do so, in view of the strong feeling in the Mussulman world against France. The British Government had tied themselves on to the policy of France; and the Ottoman Government, however disposed to unite with England, could not do so, because it was not English influence pressed upon them, but really French dictation under the cloak of a joint action. That was the position in which the Government found themselves, and he was surprised that statesmen should have allowed themselves to be drawn on as they had been. As far as could be gathered from the meagre Papers supplied to the House, it appeared that the Government had acted at the dictation of France. The Joint Note, which was the beginning of the difficulty, was actually drawn up by M. Gambetta. The action of that statesman was perfectly justifiable from a French point of view; but the Government ought not to have allowed themselves to be led by him. Another strong reason against joint intervention with France was the absolute instability of any French Government. Since the Republic had been established in France, there had been some 20 different changes of Ministry in a decade. It was a mistake, therefore, for the Government to ally themselves with that Power, instead of maintaining the invaluable understanding which had been come to between Germany and Austria and the late Government. It was well known that, as long ago as October last, the Sultan offered to put an end to the difficulty, and that he sent a Mission to Egypt to deal with that ambitious adventurer, Arabi Bey. That Mission was actually chased from Egypt by the Government, acting under the dictation of M. Gambetta. He felt sure that the present difficulty would be put an end to by the despatch of Turkish troops to Egypt. No Power disputed the International right of the Porte to control the affairs of Egypt. If Egypt were the only question involved, the Government might be allowed to drift on; but they must remember that the question of our Empire in Central Asia went along with it. [Ironical cheers.] Hon. Members who cheered ironically, perhaps, thought that Arabi Pasha had not heard of the surrender of the Transvaal, of the retreat from Candahar, of the anarchy in Ireland, and of the Kilmainham Treaty. He begged the Prime Minister's pardon. He had forgotten the pain which it caused him to have that interesting transaction described as "the Treaty" of Kilmainham. He would gladly substitute the phrase used by Earl Cowper, the late Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and describe it as "the surrender of Kilmainham." If Her Majesty's Government did not very soon reverse their unfortunate policy with regard to Turkey, the effect would be most disastrous to the power of England in the East. The effect of the action of the Government would be to alienate the Mussulman population in India, and to deprive us of the only assistance on which we could rely in the great struggle impending in Asia. He hoped the result of the discussion might be that they would obtain a declaration of policy from the Government.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the time of the House is valuable, and I would observe that the discussion, which has now been carried on for nearly an hour, is one in which the more responsible portion of the Party opposite has not thought it prudent up to this time to take any part, although they have had ample opportunities. I take notice of that circumstance by no means in the way of criticism, or of objection, but in the way of acknowledgment of the self-restraint and justice which have been shown by hon. Members opposite. Of course, Gentlemen like those who were connected with the Foreign Office, and who were generally responsible for conducting the affairs of the late Government in this particular in the late Parliament, are aware how difficult it is to do good by Party intervention in a singularly complex question at a critical moment, and how easy it is, by unrestrained indulgence of the expression of crude and irresponsible opinion, to do mischief in such questions. But, however, the House is in a happy position, because, although we have learned from the mouth of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) that the present Government allows everything to drift, and has no competency whatever to enforce right views, and no disposition to escape from wrong ones, and although the present Government is thus incompetent, the Opposition Bench is silent; yet the House and the country may have this consolation—that while all responsible persons, both those in Office and those out of Office, fall short of their duty, yet there are other Gentlemen in this House—and young Gentlemen, too, in this House—who are perfectly prepared to announce to us, without a doubt and without a difficulty, all that ought to be done, and all that ought not to be done, in what way, and by the most simple and summary process to solve the most difficult problems. I need not say that prominent in that band of distinguished and promising statesmen—in that band, and, indeed, more than prominent, I should say confessedly at its head—is the hon. Member who has just sat down. The main characteristic of that hon. Member is that the amount of information which he possesses in relation to foreign affairs is such that not only no Gentleman out of Office, but no authorized and established Department of the Government can, for a moment, compete with him. Questions that are difficult to them are easy to him. What is a crisis for them is no crisis to him; but only requires the application of common sense such as his to cause every cloud to vanish, and to bring back to us a clear sky, instead of a storm. I hope, however, before I sit down, to convey some real information, some degree of consolation to the mind of the hon. Gentleman, because, undoubtedly, he never fails in telling us pretty plainly what he means, and to that I will address myself; but before I proceed further I must say one word with regard to the speech of the hon. Member for Greenwich (Baron Henry de Worms). I must own that in general his speeches, since he has entered this House, have been distinguished by moderation and forbearance, so far as I have had occasion to notice them; but I am sorry to have to say that the character of his speech of to-day was not quite conformable to that rule. I say so, not because I wish to assume the office of a censor, but because he made a multitude of assertions which I do not wish to detain the House by noticing one by one, but which, at the same time, unless I did refer to them, I might be supposed to have admitted. One assertion, however, I must notice, for of all the extraordinary accusations in the world which the hon. Member has thought fit to bring against me, the most extraordinary is the one in which he charges me with having depreciated the importance of the Suez Canal. Surely the hon. Member cannot be aware—though he might be legitimately unaware, if he had not chosen to refer to the subject gratuitously—that at the time when the Government of this country, formed by the Party opposite, was opposing the making of the Suez Canal, I, with many hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, took an active part in the debate in this House on the position of the Government, in urging that the resistance of this country to that most valuable work should be withdrawn, and that instead of opposing we should support it. He comes forth, under these circumstances, and accuses me individually, and, by implication, those with whom I have the honour to sit, of indifference to the importance of the Suez Canal. If the hon. Member does undertake to speak on those questions, he ought to improve his stock of historical information. Turning to the main question, Sir, I am bound to say that I cannot wonder—considering its extreme complexity, and the great interest of England in the East, and the strong and legitimate personal interest that many persons, both in and out of this House, feel in the fate of our fellow-countrymen, possibly their friends and relations, in Egypt—I cannot be surprised at some strong ebullition of feeling existing with regard to this subject. I am not surprised at the existence of such feelings, and I do not complain that they have found utterance in this House; and I will endeavour, as far as I can, in what I have to say, to avoid a controversial tone, observing, however, in the first place, that as we hope that next week the Papers on this subject will be in the hands of hon. Members, they will not take it as an unkind remark if I say that they will then be able to approach the consideration of this question with far greater advantage, after having had the opportunity of tracing the conduct of the Government in all the manifold stages of this subject, on authentic information, than if they approached it at present, when, with regard to these important and really critical matters, they have almost no authentic information in their hands. The information they have is incomplete and fragmentary, such as has been elicited in answer to Questions, and not by way of continuous exposition, by my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Now, the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down complained of us, in the first instance, because he says we have not answered a number of questions which have been put to us by himself and others. He asks—Is there to be an Anglo-French intervention in Egypt? Is there to be a Turkish military intervention in Egypt? and many other questions, to which he thinks we ought to have given categorical answers. My reply is, that to no one of these questions was it our duty to have given a categorical answer; on the contrary, we should have departed from our duty if we had given categorical answers to any of them; for, had we done so, we should have been merely limiting and curtailing liberty of action, not only on our own part, but on the part of all other Governments, and especially on the part of the Government of Turkey. Our business is to preserve that liberty of action; our business is to indicate the ends we have in view, and not the means by which those ends are to be attained. Those ends have been most distinctly and repeatedly stated by my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. They are well known to consist in the general maintenance of all established rights in Egypt, whether they be those of the Sultan, those of the Khedive, those of the people of Egypt, or those of the foreign bondholders, or whatever they may be—that, in fact, the single phrase, that we seek the maintenance of all established rights, and the provision of due guarantees for those rights, is the description of the policy by which the Government is directed. With regard to the means to be adopted for carrying out those ends, I say that the specific measures ought not to be indicated, and that it would be a gross error and dereliction of duty on our part either to affirm what they are, or to exclude any specific measures that may be adopted. But in one important point I may make an approximation to the hon. Gentleman. I greatly lament what has been said here as to the Government of France. The Government of France has been struggling in the Legislative Assembly of that country with free, and possibly—I know not—very censorious comment; but certainly with a rather unrestrained comment and accusation, put forward in a manner to which some Members might find a parallel in some of the speeches and suggestions which have been made in some of the discussions in this House. But the Government of France, while feeling and labouring under the difficulties of this subject, has declared, in strong and unequivocal terms, its intention to labour loyally and heartily with the Government of England; and in these circumstances it is not for us to be behind the Government of France in declaring, on our part, an intention to reciprocate that feeling. But when I say that, and while I deeply deprecate all attacks upon the Government of a friendly Power so peculiarly associated with us in many portions of this matter, I do not intend to draw any distinction to the prejudice of other friendly Powers, least of all to the prejudice of either Germany or Turkey; and in these matters I have the satisfaction of telling the hon. Member that it is impossible for anyone to be more completely mistaken than he is in the assertion that he has made on this subject. I must say that his view with respect to the Government of France was most peculiar. He has laid down distinctly a portion of the outline of the policy which he says we ought to pursue. What is that policy? It consists of a close co-operation with France in the East, as far as financial interests are concerned, and sharp opposition to France the moment we get beyond the limit of those financial interests.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Sir, the Prime Minister has, no doubt unintentionally, misrepresented me on two very serious and important points. In the first place, I made no violent attacks whatever on the Government of France. ["Oh, oh!"] I spoke with the best of motives; I simply said that French interests and our interests were divergent. In the second place, I did not advocate the joint intervention of France and England in financial matters. I merely said if we went one step beyond that our interests and those of France would become divergent.

MR. GLADSTONE: I never said that the hon. Member had made any violent attacks upon the Government of France. [Cries of "Oh!"] I beg your pardon, but let any hon. Gentleman who chooses to interrupt me in that way prove that I did so by repeating what I said to that effect. [The right hon. Gentleman, who had resumed his seat, after a pause, rose again, and continued his speech.] I said that such attacks had been made. I did not refer to the speech of the hon. Member; but, if anything I have said appears to go beyond that, I beg the House will consider it to be withdrawn. What I said the hon. Gentleman did lay down was that the consideration for the co-operation with us of France in Egypt is a financial consideration, and that we should engage with her to that extent, but should offer opposition to her in all matters outside of that.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT denied that he had made such a statement.

MR. GLADSTONE: That is my understanding of the hon. Member's speech. I never used the word intervention. I said the financial co-operation of France as to financial interests; and if he disputes it, and says that I have misunderstood his meaning upon the point, I am exceedingly glad, because I think that a representation more vicious and more absurd than the possibility of our maintaining co-operation with France with regard to financial interests in Egypt, and then, at the point beyond that, commencing a recognized and systematic counter-working against France with regard to political interests undoubtedly could not be conceived. I am very glad to think that that is not the view of the hon. Member. The view of the hon. Member is this. He makes a charge against us. He appears, I think, to ridicule the idea of our endeavouring to work with the rest of the European Powers, and at the same time he complains, as the hon. Member for Greenwich had complained before him, that we had alienated almost all those Powers. Now, we accept the charge that we have endeavoured to work with the European Powers. That we accept, that we admit, that we profess, and, if it were a matter for boasting, we should be inclined to do so in reference to that point. But with regard to the alienation of those Powers, I say that there is not a shadow of foundation for the assertion that either the generality of those Powers, or any one of them, is at this moment otherwise than in hearty co-operation with this country. But I will go even further than that, and I will meet the hon. Gentleman on the point that he is most anxious about. He says—and I think justly says—that there ought to be, at this moment, a thoroughly good understanding and a spirit of co-operation between England and the Sultan. That is quite true; we recognize the fact that in dealing with this Mahomedan population the instrumentality—if influence were thought to be required—the instrumentality of Turkey is the best medium through which that influence can be exercised. And when the hon. Member sees the Papers, which will shortly be laid upon the Table, he will find that we have all along acted upon that principle. [Mr. ASHMEAD - BARTLETT dissented.] The hon. Gentleman naturally shakes his head without having seen the Papers. It is quite fair in the position of the hon. Gentleman that he should a little prejudge the matter. That I do not for a moment complain of; but I think when he reads these Papers he will see that my assertion is made good; and what I wish to say is this—that if there ever was a moment when that understanding and that spirit of co-operation was strong, clear, and unequivocal between the Government of Turkey and the Government of this country it is the moment at which I speak. I will not undertake to prophesy what is to happen to Egypt. My hon. Friend behind me, the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), has referred to the deplorable occurrence on Sunday last, and asked whether we are in a position to affirm that which is understood to have been said by the French Minister. I do not think, Sir, that information of so specific and pointed a character has come directly into the hands of Her Majesty's Government; but, undoubtedly, so far as our information goes, we are agreed with the French Minister in that which perhaps may be considered the most important point of the whole question connected with these deplorable disturbances—namely, that their origin was an origin which is properly to be considered as accidental, and as extraneous to the great Egyptian crisis of the present moment, although there is no doubt that when the quarrel had once broken out it found materials in a highly inflammable state of affairs, and therefore assumed dimensions which were of a dangerous and formidable character. But, without pretending to predict, I will venture to give the House this assurance—that while the great influences that can be brought to bear upon this question are many and various, I believe that, at the present moment, they are all firmly united and combined in the prosecution of a common course. There is the Khedive, as the Governor of Egypt, the whole of whose conduct during the last few critical weeks has entitled him in a marked degree to the confidence of all. Then the Sultan is, I believe, at this moment, acting in entire harmony with the Khedive—unquestionably he is acting in entire harmony with the Government of this country, and I firmly believe, and can, I think, confidently state, acting in entire harmony with the Government of every Power in Europe. As to the doubts which have been excited in the hon. Gentleman's mind with regard to Germany, I must say that no less than twice within the last 10 or 12 days Germany has distinctly supported the representations made to the Porte that it would be for the interest of all parties, for the interests of the Sultan as concerning his Sovereignty, for the interests of the Khedive, and of the people of Egypt, that the Conference should assemble in reference to affairs in Egypt, and has urged that those representations should be attended to.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I entirely recognize the justice of the view of the Prime Minister, that the present is not the moment at which we can properly or advantageously discuss the conduct of the Government with respect to the affairs of Egypt. At the same time, the right hon. Gentleman will, I think, see that it is not unnatural that the subject should be raised, and opportunities be taken of putting Questions to the Government, and of expressing opinions upon a matter which has a direct personal interest for the people of this country. We must bear in mind that, if this is rather an irregular occasion for bringing forward this question, the House has surrendered the whole of its time to the Government, and, therefore, we must have a little latitude in the matter. I must also take the liberty of saying that I think the Government have, on one or two occasions, and especially in some of the answers given by the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir Charles W. Dilke) to-day, adopted a policy of undue reticence, and that they have pushed that policy rather too far. The hon. Baronet tells us that we have to wait until next week for the presentation of Papers which will only bring us down to the 17th of May, and that even those Papers cannot be produced until there has been an opportunity of obtaining Sir Edward Malet's opinion with regard to them. Nobody doubts that it is the right and duty, and the constant practice of a Government, to communicate with and consult their agents as to the Papers which ought to be produced; but the question is, as to Papers so long back as the 17th of May, has there not been ample opportunity of obtaining that opinion? I cannot, therefore, understand why there should be delay with regard to the presentation of those Papers. Then, nobody can help feeling this—you have, at the present moment, a very great state of uneasiness with regard to the safety of British life and property in Alexandria; you have had a very alarming riot on Sunday last, which may have been—I dare say it was—accidental in its immediate origin; but which certainly was characterized by circumstances which show that there is a great deal more behind than a mere accidental quarrel which we may expect not to occur again. Questions were put as to the position of affairs, and how far proper precautions were taken for the safety of British subjects and others in Alexandria; and what does the hon. Baronet tell us? He says that Dervish Pasha, in connection with the Egyptian Government, has guaranteed their safety, and when asked what he means by the Egyptian Government, he intimates that he really does not know.

Sir Stafford Northcote

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: If I may be allowed to make a correction, I said I was quoting from the words of Dervish Pasha, in which he says he was prepared to assume the joint responsibility.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Joint responsibility, with whom? [Sir CHARLES W. DILKE dissented.] The hon. Baronet speaks of a joint responsibility, and when I ask with whom, he can only shake his head.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: In order that there may be no mistake upon the subject, there is another telegram, I may state, from Sir Edward Malet on the same subject, in which he says that which is very obvious—namely, that Dervish Pasha, not as regards the objects of his mission, but as regards the one question of the security of life and property, was acting in concert with Arabi Pasha.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Oh! I am not now prepared to enter into any discussion upon what arises from that statement; but it is obviously a very important feature. Up to this moment we have no information as to what are the relations between Arabi Pasha and the Government of the Khedive, or the Turkish Commissioner, or anybody else. But it now appears that there are certain relations upon which I think it would be proper that this House and the country should have more detailed information. [Mr. Bourke: Can the Government give us any Papers?] I do not know whether it would be right to ask the Government whether they can give us any information on this subject? I wish to say, on the part of those who sit near me, that we are not anxious to precipitate this matter; but we do think the time has come when it would be very desirable that we should be told by the Government, in general terms, what the real state of Egypt is at this moment, and what is the position of these personages of whom we hear so much, and about whom so very different reports reach us from other sources. My right hon. Friend (Mr. Bourke) reminds me that a short time ago a demand was made for the exile of Arabi Pasha; but that is going into a question which, perhaps, would be more properly discussed when we know a little more. What I think the country ought to have is a further and more complete statement to give more relief to its anxiety than merely to be told that we have every confidence in Sir Beauchamp Seymour's readiness to land marines when necessary. Everyone knows that Sir Beauchamp Seymour is an officer of the greatest gallantry, and we can rely on his taking such measures as may be necessary; but have the Government nothing else to tell us on that subject but the reference to Sir Beauchamp Seymour? I hope that we shall be favoured, in the course of a day or two, with some further information from the Government with regard to the real state of affairs, and I hope also that measures will be taken to press forward the production of the Papers which are necessary to throw a light upon the subject, so as to enable us to form an opinion upon it. I do not know that there is any object in continuing this conversation; but I think it is not at all unnatural, nor at all undesirable, that this conversation should have arisen. I should be extremely sorry if anything that was said could cause any kind of difficulty or embarrassment between us and our Allies abroad, and especially the French Government. We have not the least doubt that there has been perfectly loyal action between the French Government and Her Majesty's Government; but we are not at present informed as to what that has been. But we can suspend our comments on the whole matter until we are informed what the real state of things is, and what is the present information Her Majesty's Government have to go upon.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, by the indulgence of the House, I may, perhaps, be permitted to make one word of reply to the speech of the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote), and his request for further information as to the employment of Arabi Pasha's influence by Dervish Pasha for the protection of European life and property. The whole of the Consuls in Cairo, including the English and French Consuls, met Dervish Pasha on the subject of the steps to be taken for the protection of European life and property, and at the meeting they made no request to Dervish Pasha to appeal to Arabi Pasha, but merely insisted on measures being taken to secure European life and property. Dervish Pasha stated that he and the Khedive himself would take the necessary measures in connection with Arabi Pasha, without raising any question bearing on the general position of Dervish Pasha's mission, or the position of Arabi Pasha—but merely using an influence which de facto existed, and which Arabi Pasha possessed, for the immediate protection of European life and property. In reply to that, the Consuls expressed no opinion as to the position of Arabi Pasha, but stated that the measures which Dervish Pasha proposed to take were measures which they thought in themselves satisfactory as well as necessary.

MR. BOURKE asked the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whether the document which had been referred to, and which he (Mr. Bourke) called an Ultimatum, but which the hon. Baronet said was not an Ultimatum, was withdrawn at the time Dervish Pasha proposed that Arabi Pasha should assume the government of the country?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: We are not concerned, Sir, with the relations between Dervish Pasha and Arabi Pasha. We have nothing to do with those relations. We have merely stated what we thought it was necessary to do for the pacification of Egypt, and the protection of life and property, and we have withdrawn nothing at all.

MR. ONSLOW said, the Government seemed to have been utterly mistaken throughout all these proceedings. The hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and the Prime Minister told the House, in answer to certain Questions, that they had no fear with respect with the safety of the Europeans in Egypt. No sooner, however, were those words uttered than there occurred the breaking-out at Alexandria. They were also told that the Government did not think that the Khedive's life was in danger, and the hon. Baronet had said that Arabi Bey intended to be perfectly honest in his dealings with the Khedive, and that he had no intention of deposing him.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: When were those statements said to be made? Nothing of the kind has been said by me.

MR. ONSLOW maintained that it had been said by the hon. Baronet that, in his belief, no molestation would be offered to the Khedive.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: What I simply did, in connection with this matter, was to read a telegram from Dervish Pasha expressing that official's opinion to that effect.

MR. ONSLOW, continuing, explained that he wished to show how mistaken the Government had been throughout the whole of the proceedings. No sooner was the statement about the safety of the Khedive made than he had to bolt off to Alexandria. On a recent occasion he (Mr. Onslow) had put a Question with reference to the safety of the British subjects in Cairo. The hon. Baronet replied that Dervish Pasha had guaranteed their safety. Immediately afterwards, however, Dervish Pasha departed for Alexandria with the Khedive, so that now the lives of our fellow-subjects were at the mercy of the rebel and traitor, Arabi Bey. It was monstrous that that should be so. Considering the inflammable state of affairs in Alexandria, the Government ought at once to take strong steps to preserve the lives and property of the Queen's subjects. He would admit that there were difficulties in the way; but the Government ought to rise superior to them—in fact, they ought to have foreseen them. The Government had all along shown the greatest light-heartedness and indifference in this matter. They had rather pooh-poohed the difficulties of the case; and now they were in a horrid mess, relying upon Turkey to get them out of it. Notwithstanding what had been said, he (Mr. Onslow) had reason to know that the greatest apprehension was entertained, not only at Cairo, but at Alexandria and the Suez Canal. That day they had learnt that the passengers on board the Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamer and in other ships in the Canal feared that they might be attacked. Had the Government, he asked, done anything further to protect the lives of those who were passing through the Suez Canal? They had been warned two or three times how serious was the state of affairs, and on the heads of its Members would lie the responsibility if an attack should at any time be made upon the English in Cairo or at Alexandria. The Government, it appeared to him, had ignored what ought to be the primary consideration in connection with the great Eastern Question—namely, that the power of England should be paramount in Egypt. It was the duty of this country to remain allied with France; but, at the same time, it was equally her duty to put her foot down, and to show to the whole of Europe that England must have the master-hand over the affairs of Egypt. It seemed to him, however, as if France had bamboozled the Government of this country, for France appeared to be the paramount Power in Egypt, and all that we had done was to say "Ditto" to M. Gambetta. The Prime Minister had said that we were pledged to support the Khedive; but how were we going to support him should he be attacked—by moral force alone, or by physical force? Surely we ought to show him and the whole of Europe, by a physical demonstration, that we were prepared at all hazards to maintain his interests. He regretted that the Government should hitherto have treated the whole of this matter in an off-hand and somewhat shabby way. The hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had given the House evasive answers, and the House had but little knowledge of the intended policy of the Government. If the people of India should see us, in connection with Egyptian affairs, giving way to Austria, Germany, or any other Power, our reputation in that country would be greatly jeopardized.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, that, in common with other hon. Members, he had no wish to press the Government unduly. He realized the difficulties of the situation, and was willing to make every allowance for them. The position of affairs in Egypt was critical, and it was not in the interest of the Public Service to press any Minister to make a statement that, in his judgment, could not be safely made. Upon that point there was no difference of opinion. What they complained of was, that the Government, in giving the information they were asked for, gave it reluctantly, and that what was got from them was got in a fragmentary, diffuse, and imperfect way. Language, it had been said, was invented for the purpose of enabling a man to conceal his thoughts. The language of his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in agreement with the Government, effectually concealed the natural impatience of the public, and the anxiety of hon. Members, if Ministers would make a clear, definite, and, as far as they were able, full statement of the position of affairs. They could state what had been done, and what, under certain conditions, they meant to do. If such a statement was made, this incessant system of interrogation would cease. He did not think that, up to the present, the Government had any reason to complain of the attitude taken by their opponents. Both the Opposition and the hon. Members on that (the Government) side of the House who were doubtful as to the policy they were pursuing, had exercised a reasonable reticence; but matters had now become so serious that something more than questioning had to be resorted to. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had made a speech which had interested and amused the House. He had bantered the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) pleasantly enough; but he had said nothing. Nobody was one whit the wiser when he sat down. He told the House that the Government wanted to maintain the status quo; but they knew that before. He had expatiated upon that indefinite entity called the European Concert, the merits of which the Prime Minister appreciated much more highly than he (Mr. Joseph Cowen) did. But beyond these two statements—both of which they were familiar with—no information had been vouchsafed. What did the Government mean to do? A few weeks ago, according to the statement of his hon. Friend, they issued an Ultimatum demanding that Arabi Pasha should be exiled; he was not arguing as to the wisdom or unwisdom of such a course of procedure, that was not the point under consideration. It was whether the retention of office by, and the remaining in Egypt of, Arabi Pasha was contrary or not to English interests and to the welfare of Egypt. His exile might or might not be desirable; but it was clearly the opinion of the Ministry that he should be sent away. But Arabi had not been banished. According to the statement of his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the rebellious Arabi was really master of the situation. He was left in sole charge of Cairo, the capital of the country. The Khedive was not able to send him away; Dervish Pasha did not seem to be willing; and the man whom the French and English Governments had determined should be banished had, in effect, well-nigh banished them. Now, they found that it was to this same man the authority of the State was committed, and on his word that peace and security at Cairo depended. The country would regard that as a very dubious proceeding, and would, he thought, look upon the Government as guilty of some inconsistency. Arabi either threatened our interests or he did not do so. If he did not, the Government ought not to have acted as they had done; but, if he did, then decided steps ought to be taken against him. They had heard something before of the Government depending for the restoration of peace in a country upon men whom they had declared to be guilty of treasonable practices. If Arabi Bey was not to be trusted we ought not to depend upon him. If he was to be trusted, and maintained in his position, what right had the Allied Fleets at Alexandria? They should be withdrawn and reliance placed upon the man who claimed to have authority in Egypt, and we ought to recognize his claim to act as the Representative of national feeling in Egypt. The Prime Minister had spoken in very cordial and complimentary terms of the Turkish Government. According to his statement, England was now on very friendly relations with the Porte. He (Mr. Joseph Cowen) was glad to hear it. It indicated a change in the policy of the country. The statement of the Prime Minister on the subject that day, and the statement he had previously made in the hearing of the House, contrasted in a very marked manner. The right hon. Gentleman used to talk about driving the Turks, "bag and baggage," into the Bosphorus or into Asia. [Mr. GLADSTONE: I never said so.] Well, he would not squabble about words. He would accept the right hon. Gentleman's denial; but the right hon. Gentleman could not deny that he and the majority of the Liberal Party had for years past advocated a strongly anti-Turkish policy. They despised and derided the Turk, and now they had to go and ask his help. Their line of action in the past and their line of action now certainly did not harmonize; and he could not help thinking that if some of the harsh things that were said of the Turk had not been said, the course of the English Government in the East would have been a little smoother than it was at present. One other remark he wished to make. The Prime Minister objected to a statement made by the hon. Member for Greenwich (Baron Henry de Worms) about the Suez Canal. But the right hon. Gentleman had misapprehended what the hon. Gentleman had said. It was quite true that the right hon. Gentleman from the first had been a supporter of the Canal project. Those who were familiar with the history of that undertaking, knew that when Mr. Roebuck submitted his Motion in Parliament respecting it, one of the ablest speeches made in support of the scheme was that of the Prime Minister. It was quite true, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman was in favour of constructing the Canal, when many people were opposed to it. But what the hon. Member for Greenwich said was, that recently the Prime Minister had declared that even if the Canal was closed, our old way to India might be resumed without much disadvantage. During the Eastern discussions, he had repeatedly referred to the way round the Cape as an alternative passage to the East, which might be resorted to without much inconvenience. An occasion would soon arise when the whole policy of the Government in Egypt might be reviewed, and reviewed with more ample material at command than they now possessed; and in that event, what he (Mr. Joseph Cowen) and others wished the Ministers to do, was to permit full information about events as they proceeded, at least as far as the interests of the country would permit. There was no desire to be awkward with them, or to take advantage of them. So far as he was concerned, he had no wish to revive old discussions, or to twit them too hard with their inconsistencies. He was only too glad that they had come back to the national faith with respect to our foreign policy in the East. But still it was not reasonable to suppose that Parliament would be quiescent when such important events were transpiring, and there was such a paucity of intelligence concerning them from official sources.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he would not have risen again; but he thought the information supplied by the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs threw considerable light upon the alarming statements to which he (Mr. Chaplin) had drawn attention earlier in the day. The difficulty with which that information was extracted suggested to him (Mr. Chaplin) a resemblance between the present occasion and certain other transactions which occurred not long ago. He was, in fact, reminded of the suppressed paragraph about which so much had been said. There was a resemblance also between the policy now pursued by the Government in Egypt and their policy in connection with the circumstances to which that paragraph had reference. Were they to understand that it was to the agent of disorder in Egypt that they now looked for the suppression of disorder? That he understood to be the effect of the answer which was extracted with great difficulty from the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I most distinctly stated that the Consuls had nothing whatever to do with Arabi Pasha; but their dealings were entirely with Dervish Pasha, and stated their reasons why they accepted the proposal of Dervish Pasha.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he understood that to be the effect of the answer given by the hon. Baronet to his (Mr. Chaplin's) right hon. Friend the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote). The hon. Baronet said he had assurances from Dervish Pasha that order would be preserved; but that was to be done through the agency of Arabi, and it might, therefore, be fairly said that it was to the very agents of disorder in Egypt that the Government looked for the suppression of lawlessness in the future. Meanwhile, no other measures had been taken for the security of the lives of British subjects at Alexandria. That was nothing but the Kilmainham compact over again. He was not surprised at the intense alarm felt just now by British residents at Alexandria, though the hon. Baronet said that from all the information he had received there was no legitimate ground for the apprehensions that had been expressed. But could it be that there was no ground for apprehension in such circumstances as these, when there had been already 115 murders of Europeans, to say nothing of others that might have occurred, but of which nothing was known?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: That is not our information.

MR. CHAPLIN: No; you never give us any information.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: That may be an amusing Party retort; but I stated that I had given the whole of the information the Government possessed in regard to the murders.

MR. CHAPLIN said, their precise complaint was that the Government did not communicate their information, and that, though the hon. Baronet said that never had more information been given in similar circumstances, those who were not in the confidence of the Government knew nothing beyond what they could gather from newspapers and telegrams from abroad. A few minutes ago the House did not know what steps had been taken by the Government for the protection of the British residents in Alexandria; but it now appeared that they were to be protected through Arabi Pasha, and, that being the case, he should not rest or be satisfied until they had extracted from the Government distinct information as to what steps they had taken, and would take in the future, to protect European life and property.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I do not rise to prolong the debate, but only to make clear what has been stated by my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) charges the Government with having entered into relations with Arabi Pasha. [MR. CHAPLIN: No, no!] Then I do not know what he means by talking about the Kilmainham compact—

MR. CHAPLIN: I asked this question of the Government—Is it to the agent of disorder that they look for the suppression of the outrages in Egypt? And, by saying that, I am speaking of what I was told, that it was the action of Dervish Pasha acting through Arabi Pasha.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The answer to that is perfectly plain and distinct. We look to Dervish Pasha, who is the Representative of the Porte, to whom hon. Gentlemen opposite have hitherto been willing to refer everything, as the Representative of the Sovereign of Egypt. [MR. CHAPLIN: But what are his instructions?] What business have Her Majesty's Government to ask for a communication of the instructions of the Sultan to his own agent, except so far as the Porte chooses to communicate it to us? Can there be anything more extraordinarily inconsistent than the language of hon. Gentlemen opposite? They say, "You are not giving influence enough to the Porte;" and then they turn round and attack Dervish Pasha for his conduct. We look to him as the Representative of the Sovereign of Egypt, the Porte, in Egypt. That is why Her Majesty's Government look to Dervish Pasha. He gives us assurances with reference to the protection of life and property, and the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Chaplin) attaches to those assurances the epithet of a Kilmainham compact. That is no affair of the Porte and its Representative. ["Oh, oh!"] That is the hon. Gentleman's opinion of the conduct of Dervish Pasha, the Representative of the Porte. Her Majesty's Government are not responsible for what relations Dervish Pasha may establish with Arabi Pasha or anybody else. The relations he chooses to have with Arabi Bey is rather the affair of Dervish Pasha and the Government he represents. ["Oh, oh!"] I am stating a proposition which cannot be disputed. What Her Majesty's Government have done is, through the mouths of the Consuls, to ask Dervish Pasha to undertake the responsibility of protecting life and property in Egypt. What methods he has at his disposal, or chooses to take, he is responsible for to his own Government.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that as the Government had stated that they looked to Dervish Pasha for the protection of life and property in Egypt, it was important that Dervish's position should be understood. It appeared, from what the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had said, that he was the Commissioner and, therefore, Representative of the Porte, the Sovereign of Egypt; though, on the other hand, a suggestion had been made that his position somewhat resembled that lately occupied by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Clare (Mr. O'Shea) in other well-known proceedings. As, therefore, some doubt had been thrown upon this matter, he (Mr. J. Lowther) thought, having regard to the fact that the lives and property of Her Majesty's subjects in Egypt were, in the opinion of the Government, dependent on Dervish Pasha for their protection, that the Commissioner's precise position should be clearly stated to the House. The hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had made no reference whatever during the discussion to a person who had occupied a very prominent position throughout the whole of these troubles—namely, Arabi Pasha. The Government had stated that they had in no shape or form recognized him, but looked to Dervish Pasha for the maintenance of order. It transpired, however, at the last moment, that Dervish relied upon Arabi for the fulfilment of this duty. Thus, the Government relied upon Dervish, and Dervish relied upon Arabi; but he would not pursue any further the schoolboy's calculation of the consequent relations between the Government and Arabi. There was, however, one question he would like to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs—Was Arabi Pasha present at the conference held between Dervish Pasha and the Consuls?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: If the right hon. Gentleman will give Notice of that Question, I will answer it.

MR. J. LOWTHER presumed that, in that case, he might take it that the Government did not at present know whether Arabi was present or not. He would give Notice of the Question; and he would also give Notice of the further Question, Whether the Consul in Egypt had informed the Government of the details of the Conference with Dervish Pasha, but had omitted to mention the not unimportant fact whether Arabi had been present? Without wishing to prolong the discussion unduly, he would like to make one comment on the severe tone that had been adopted towards his hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff). The hon. Baronet opposite had charged his hon. Friend with being guilty of a considerable offence in his reference to the Government of France; but the hon. Baronet should have noticed the emphasis laid by his hon. Friend on the necessity of cordial co-operation with that Government. The general observations of the hon. Baronet as to the great danger and impropriety of speeches made by Members of this House, in or out of it, which endangered our relations with Foreign Powers, were most sound; and it was a matter for regret that during the hon.

Baronet's speech the Treasury Bench was not so well, or, at any rate, not so influentially, filled as it had since become, for his remarks upon that point were deserving of attention in that quarter, especially, of the House. The Prime Minister, who had since entered, had also justly deprecated unrestrained indulgence in the expression of crude and irresponsible opinion. The House was thoroughly with the right hon. Gentleman in deprecating observations which might eventually lead to a demand for inconvenient explanations from Powers at peace with Her Majesty. The right hon. Gentleman, while the hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Joseph Cowen) was speaking, had denied that he had said it would be an advantage to the human race if the Turks were driven, "bag and baggage," across the Bosphorus.

MR. GLADSTONE: I never said a word about it.

MR. J. LOWTHER: About what?

MR. GLADSTONE: About going over the Bosphorus.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he was under the impression that the Bosphorus separated Europe from Asia. Of course, he at once accepted the right hon. Gentleman's statement.

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not want the right hon. Gentleman's acceptance of anything. The thing is in print, and if the right hon. Gentleman takes the trouble, before he occupies the time of this House with such statements, to read the print it would be an advantage. I never said one word about the removal of the Turks from Europe to Asia.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that the right hon. Gentleman had kindly called his attention to a work in which this was printed. He (Mr. J. Lowther) regretted if his recollection was not accurate; but he thought he had not unfairly epitomized the statements therein expressed by the right hon. Gentleman when he indicated that Asia should henceforth become the exclusive residence of the official Turkish Power.

MR. GLADSTONE: Never.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he should have great satisfaction in renewing his acquaintance with the work to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred; but, in succeeding in eliciting a general disclaimer of sentiments of that kind, he thought he had done a good service in drawing attention to the matter. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the co-operation of the Turkish Government with Her Majesty's Government on the present occasion.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have not spoken of that at all.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he certainly must have greatly misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman. The hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs at least intimated that all the Powers, including Turkey, were thoroughly in harmony on this subject; and he (Mr. J. Lowther) understood that the Prime Minister offered this consolation to the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett), that Germany and Turkey were co-operating most cordially with England, which amounted precisely to what he (Mr. J. Lowther) had just stated, and which had elicited the direct contradiction of the right hon. Gentleman, though he now qualified that contradiction with the further interlocutory interjection of "Now you've got it." He would only add a hope that the discussion would not terminate without some reply to the Question—Who was, and who was not, responsible for the maintenance of order in Egypt?

MR. GOSCHEN said, there was only one observation which he wished most respectfully to submit to the House, and that was, whether some of the speeches to which they had been listening, more particularly those of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) and the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther), were calculated to promote the object they all said they had in view—that of protecting the lives and property of Europeans in Egypt. It seemed to him a most serious subject, and he confessed he was surprised that, on the occasion of discussing a matter so serious to this country, and touching so deeply the feelings of many who had relatives in Egypt, they should have heard allusions to "Kilmainham treaties," and other matters totally unconnected with the subject, and giving rise to roars of laughter from hon. Members opposite. He did not conceive that this was a laughing matter, and he was sure that the tone of the right hon. Baronet the Leader of the Opposition, being in such marked contrast to these speeches, represented the feeling of the great majority of hon. Members on the Conservative side of the House, and this would be apparent to the country. But the point he wished to submit most respectfully was, whether the Government could, consistently with its duty, reveal to the House what measures it was likely to take, and could take, for the protection of life and property in Egypt; whether a premature statement of the course which the Government thought it right to adopt might imperil the objects at which they were aiming, were questions of the deepest importance. Many questions had been put to the Government with regard to the protection of Tewfik Pasha and the Europeans at Cairo; but how could the Government answer such questions without revealing their policy to the disorderly and anarchical powers which now existed in Egypt? It was perfectly natural that this country should take the deepest interest in what was occurring, and desire to be made acquainted with the measures contemplated by the Government; but it appeared to him that if the Government were to say in advance what measures, military or naval, they were going to take, it might frustrate the particular designs which they entertained, and not only frustrate those designs, but in the interval imperil the lives of Europeans. He had himself no knowledge whatever of the particular course which the Government was likely to take; but suppose a military expedition had been resolved upon, could any course be more foolish than to press that a statement should be made revealing to the House the measures proposed to be taken? Whether the English or the Turkish Government intended to act, whatever might be the measures which would be adopted, he submitted that those measures should not be revealed to the House or to the public. The Government, it must be remembered, could not speak to that House without speaking at the same time to Egypt, and allowing all the intriguers who might wish evil to the Christian population to know precisely what they intended to do. Therefore, he submitted that, notwithstanding the natural desire of everyone in that House to be re-assured by having told to them the condition of affairs, it was scarcely fair to choose a moment like that when the hands of the Government were tied, and they could not state what they were going to do—it was not the best moment to choose for interrogating the Government with regard to the state of Egypt. He trusted that, notwithstanding the pressure that might be put upon the Government, they would feel that the great majority of the House felt the danger and risk there would be in any premature revelation of the measures it might be necessary to take for the advantage of Egypt, and the protection of the lives and property of Her Majesty's subjects, and the Christian population generally.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he wished, notwithstanding what had just fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), to know what naval preparations had been made for saving the lives and property of the English population at Alexandria? The hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had spoken of the squadron of iron-clads under the command of Sir Beauchamp Seymour, and had said that one of those vessels, the Invincible, was in the Harbour at Alexandria. He had also correctly informed the House that the draught of water in the entrance to Alexandria Harbour was 24 feet 8 inches. The Invincible was in the harbour, and drew 22 feet 1 inch. The other five ships all drew more than 24 feet 8 inches, and the reason why they were not in the harbour was because they could not go into it. He would give the draughts of the ships, both when loaded and when lightened. The Alexandra drew 26 feet 6 inches, and could be brought on an even keel to 26 feet 3 inches. The Inflexible drew 25 feet 5 inches, and could be lightened to 24 feet 5 inches; but there were then only three inches of bar to go over, and the ship would have to go up a very tortuous channel, which would be very dangerous to attempt, because a coal barge sunk in the channel could prevent the ship coming out. The Monarch drew 26 feet, and could be lightened to 24 feet 2 inches; the Superb drew 26 feet, and could be lightened to 25 feet; and the Temeraire drew 26 feet 6 inches, and could be lightened to 25 feet 9 inches. So that out of these six vessels only three could, when lightened, enter the harbour. He asked why they did not strengthen the squadron by vessels of lighter draught, from which they could readily land men? He did not believe 500 men could be landed from the ships now in harbour, and no admiral would be justified in keeping his ships outside the harbour under present circumstances if they could get in. He, therefore, thought the House was entitled to know what naval preparations were being made, what transports had been sent to take away the refugees, and what ships were being sent that could go into harbour, so as to be of use in the protection of life and property at Alexandria. As he had said, two only of the ships besides the Invincible now on the coast could enter the harbour, and that with risk, while three were wholly unavailable for the purpose. He did not think that sufficient preparations had been made for the protection of the lives and property of persons now in Alexandria.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT said, there was great fear for the security of life and property in Egypt at the present time, and he had a telegram from a Manchester merchant, Mr. Robert Dobson, informing him of the death of his son and another young man who was with his son. Of course, with regard to his son he knew the worst; but he was somewhat anxious to know about the property. There were goods amounting to £4,000 belonging to those two young men who were killed; and Mr. Dobson telegraphed to him (Mr. Jacob Bright), asking him to question the Government as to the responsibility of the Egyptian Government with regard to property left in that defenceless position.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: With regard to the first part of the Question, if I may be allowed to answer the appeal, having once spoken, I have telegraphed to Sir Edward Malet to ascertain the names, and have lists, as far as possible, prepared of the people killed in the recent riots. With regard to the second part, as to the property, I have referred the letter, which was sent to me by the gentleman who sent the telegram, to those who will give an opinion on the legal point raised.

MR. LABOUCHERE thought that his hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) would gain nothing by pressing the question any further. The Government had fairly stated that it would be contrary to the public interest to make any explanation whatever. He (Mr. Labouchere) did not commit himself to any opinion on the matter; but he would ask his hon.

Friend, having regard to the importance of the Prevention of Crime Bill, which was coming on, to withdraw his Motion, so that they might fall back upon that most interesting, if somewhat exhaustive, discussion.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he came into the House just as his right hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay) was finishing his observations, and he, therefore, could only understand their general tenor. He understood that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was making observations as to the draught of water required for the vessels of the Mediterranean Squadron entering Alexandria Harbour. His right hon. and gallant Friend had put on the Paper a Question to be addressed to him (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) to-morrow on that subject. He was not prepared to-day with the precise figures relative to each ship; but even if the Question had been given Notice of for to-day, he thought he should have been obliged to appeal to his right hon. and gallant Friend, whether it was really consistent with the public interest that these details should go forth to the world, thereby informing the people in Egypt as well as hon. Members in that House as to the precise vessels which could enter Alexandria Harbour, and the particulars connected with their draught.

SIR JOHN HAY said, that his figures were extracted from the excellent book of Sir Thomas Brassey, one of the Lords of the Admiralty.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have not the slightest doubt it is before the public in one form or another; but the question is, whether it should be publicly repeated in this House in regard to the existing state of affairs in Egypt. No one knows better than my right hon. and gallant Friend that a ship, though its draught of water may be a certain figure, may be considerably altered so as to enter a place where it could not otherwise enter. Besides, the depth of water at the entrance to the harbour varies according to the state of the weather, and according to other circumstances, so that while one day a vessel may be able to enter, it could not get in the next.

SIR JOHN HAY: Or get out again.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Certainly, or get out again. At any rate, I must appeal to the House, whether I or my right hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay) should state the precise draught of water of every ship there, and the precise requirements of the harbour. I really do not think that it is wise, or that any good purpose would be gained by it, and I appeal to my right hon. and gallant Friend not to address to me the Question he has on the Paper for to-morrow, for the reasons I have just stated.

SIR JOHN HAY: Allow me to explain that I think I am entitled to give the facts I have stated to the House, since the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has stated to the House what the ships are capable of doing.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Yes, in answer to a Question, but not voluntarily.

SIR JOHN HAY: Quite so.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: And if I may be allowed to say so, I maintain the perfect accuracy of the information which I then gave.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I may, perhaps, be allowed to add that the information which has been given in general terms by my hon. Friend (Sir Charles W. Dilke) is quite accurate; but what I object to is that a catalogue raisonné should be given of the ships, with the draught of each of them. That is quite another matter.

SIR JOHN HAY: With reference to the appeal of my hon. Friend (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) regarding the Question of which I have given Notice for to-morrow, as I have already given the information to the House, I am quite satisfied—without putting my Question—I am quite satisfied my information is accurate, because, as I have said, it is taken from the book published by my hon. Friend (Sir Thomas Brassey).

MR. ECROYD said, he wished, before the discussion closed, to make a strong appeal to the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The fate of the two young men who had been mentioned had naturally spread a thrill of intense horror throughout the community in which their relatives resided, and the business circles with which they had been connected; and he, therefore, appealed to the hon. Baronet to obtain all the information he could from Egypt, as promptly as possible, in regard to the position and circumstances of the English residents connected with commercial affairs in that country, and make it public in whatever way he might deem most suitable, with the least possible delay. The agony of suspense which had already been endured by many could not be described.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I have already stated that we have telegraphed for a list of the names of those Englishmen who have been killed, and that we shall be glad to make it public; but I do not think it would be desirable to make public our opinion as to what might be the danger at one place more than at another. I think that would only tend to increase the danger.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, that the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) had been good enough to describe something which he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had said as "nonsense." That was not a very courteous statement to make in that House in regard to what an hon. Member had said. He (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) would not argue with him as to what was nonsense or what was not; but the hon. Member had endeavoured to bring in the old story about Lord Salisbury and Tunis. He (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) did not say whether the taking of Tunis was right or not, and he had no responsibility in the matter. But he would observe that it was to be borne in mind that the taking of Tunis took place after the Control had been established, and, therefore, threw some doubt on the good faith of France in the matter. The hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and others had expressed themselves satisfied with the position of Admiral Seymour at Alexandria, and the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had complained of Questions being put on the subject, and had said that such Questions should not be answered. But there would be no danger in the Questions being answered if the Government would send serviceable ships. The danger existed in their sending ships which were not serviceable. It had been shown that, when lightened, only two of them could go into the harbour. The Government, therefore, had sent ships to Alexandria which could not assist the Europeans. [SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Oh, no!] The hon. Baronet said "Oh, no!" and they were asked to trust to the presence of Sir Beauchamp Seymour. On the 11th of May the hon. Baronet told the House that the Government had taken all the steps that were necessary; but the presence of Sir Beauchamp Seymour had not prevented the massacre that took place on Sunday last—and there had been a massacre, for it did not matter whether 50 or 150 had been massacred—although one of the ships was in the harbour and two outside. Therefore, if the Opposition had no confidence in the adequacy of the preparations of the Government, it must be acknowledged that they had some ground for that want of confidence. The Prime Minister had said that the Government had all along been acting in conjunction with Turkey and in harmony with the Turkish Government in this matter, and that we should see that when the Correspondence was published.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government had already contradicted that statement.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, that was not so. What the Prime Minister had positively stated was that all along we had looked upon Turkey as an instrument for acting upon Egypt.

MR. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: Was that the case, or was it not? If it were so, what was the meaning of the despatch dated 31st January 1882, and communicated to Lord Granville by Musurus Pasha? That despatch was to the effect that there was nothing to justify the Collective Note to Tewfik Pasha, that the opinion of the Sultan ought to have been obtained, and that the Government of the Porte felt bound to inquire what were the reasons for such a course. The Turkish Ambassador to this country had been requested to bring the subject before the Minister of Foreign Affairs. If the Government looked upon Turkey as the proper instrument to exercise pressure upon Egypt, it was remarkable that the Porte took so very different a view of the case. It was scarcely credible that Her Majesty's Government, after having offended Turkey as they had done, should go down on their knees to her, and ask her to get them out of the extraordinary hobble in which they were now placed. He was perfectly willing to withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the House.

EVICCTIONS (IRELAND).

OBSERVATIONS.

COLONEL NOLAN said, that as a Motion for the adjournment of the House had been made, he could not, in justice to part of his constituency, before it was withdrawn, refrain from taking advantage of that opportunity to bring before the House a matter of very serious importance. He received a letter from a parish priest in Connemara a few days ago, requesting him to call attention to several evictions which were likely to take place in the district upon a property which he could not name, and pointing out that with respect to those evictions, and one batch of them in particular, it would be a matter of enormous importance if the agent would wait until the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill was passed. The parish priest pointed out to him that it was of the utmost importance that the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill should be passed, as it would save those tenants from eviction who were liable to be turned out on the roadside. He (Colonel Nolan) was in some hopes he might be able to prevent that, and for that purpose he had brought in a Bill suspending evictions till 1st September, or it might be for a shorter time than that—it might be for only three or four weeks—until the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill came into operation. During that interval these unfortunate tenants might be evicted and made liable for heavy costs. The Bill he had brought in received the support of every section of Irish Members in the House, except the Irish Conservative Members. An hon. and learned Member (Mr. Warton), on the Conservative side of the House, took the responsibility upon himself of blocking the Bill and preventing its being read a first time, and printed and circulated. That was a great responsibility for an hon. and learned Gentleman who had no natural connection with the country to undertake, because it was tantamount to saying that evictions would continue for the next two months. He (Colonel Nolan), however, believed the hon. and learned Gentleman was only the instrument in this matter. This was the work of the Irish Conservative Members. He charged them with it; and, if he was mistaken, he challenged any of the occupants of the Front Opposition Bench to get up and deny it, and further to request the hon. and learned Member to take off the block and allow the Bill to be printed and circulated, as it was one which would bring relief to a great many suffering families in Ireland. No Irish Conservative Members dare take the responsibility on themselves of blocking the Bill.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Nolan) was not in Order in discussing a Bill not now before the House on a Motion for the adjournment of the House.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he would not discuss it further; but it was customary for the House to allow Bills to be read a first time, except for very strong reasons. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Lowther), or some other right hon. Member on the Front Opposition Bench, would get up and repudiate what had been done in reference to the Bill, and request the hon. and learned Member to remove the block.

MR. GREER: As the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) has spoken of the Irish Conservative Members of the House, I must say, for myself, that I knew nothing whatever of this Notice until I saw it on the Paper, and, as an Irish Conservative Member, I can state individually that I have had nothing whatever to say to it; and, so far as I am myself concerned, to show that I had nothing to do in the matter, I have given specific instructions to my agent in Ireland that no pressure whatever shall be put on my tenants until the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill has been passed, in order that they may have any advantage that may arise from the Bill when it passes into law.

MR. WARTON said, it was not the case that the Irish Conservative Members were in any way responsible for the blocking of the Bill. He himself took an interest in Ireland, and had been studying the question for some time; and he had blocked the Bill entirely on his own responsibility. So far from asking him to put it on, the Irish Conservative Members had asked him to take off the block; and now, in obedience to their wishes and postponing his own judgment, he took it off. He hoped the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan), on other occasions, would not indulge in haphazard charges.

MR. PARNELL: Sir, in reference to this question of evictions, which has been raised by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan), I wish, as I see the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Trevelyan) in his place, to point out to him that evictions in Ireland are increasing to an enormous extent; and I wish to ask him whether he will not consider the advisability of taking Saturday Sittings for the passage of the Arrears Bill? I am sure the Irish Members would give their support to such a course, and possibly a sufficient number of English Members could be got together for the discussion of the Bill on Saturdays, because the number of evictions in Ireland at present is very alarming. Owing to the fact that in a great number of the evictions now taking place, the tenants are not re-admitted as caretakers, they are, consequently, turned out of their homes, and their little store of food and money, that might be used for the purpose of redeeming their holdings, is consumed in supporting themselves, and in order to keep a roof over their heads and the heads of their families. I wish to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to this fact, that since the first quarter of this year evictions are increasing every month in a very alarming proportion. The evictions during the first quarter of this year amounted to over 7,000 persons—that was, at the rate of a little over 2,000 persons a-month. In the month of January I think there were over 1,000 persons, and evictions have been increasing since. During the month of May, the fifth month of the year, there were over 3,000 person evicted; and if that proportion is maintained, it will make a number of over 9,000 evictions for the next quarter; but as the number of evicted persons is increasing so largely, we must probably expect that during the next quarter, instead of 9,000 persons, there will be something like 12,000 persons evicted. Now, I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether, as the person responsible in this House for the maintenance of law and order in Ireland, he does not view with the greatest anxiety and alarm the enormous increase in the number of evictions in the West and South-West of that country; and, whether he does not fear that those evictions will make the task of maintaining law and order in Ireland very much more difficult by Her Majesty's Government in Ireland? Unfortunately, as regards decrees which were granted at the last Quarter Sessions, there is no way of preventing them from being executed. I understand that at least half the tenantry in some counties in Ireland, who were in arrears of rent, were decreed at last Quarter Sessions, and, as a consequence, it is in the power of the landlords to execute these decrees at any time, and the execution of these decrees can only be stopped by the passing of the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill. It is not possible, under the Act of 1881, to obtain from any Court in Ireland a stay of ejectment process once it is granted by the Court. It is possible, and I hope the tenants will exercise the right given them, under the Act of 1881, of applying at the next Quarter Sessions throughout Ireland to the Chairman to stay execution of the decrees which may be applied for by the landlords, in cases where they come under the operation of the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill, and in the terms provided by that Bill—namely, that there should be a year's rent paid within a reasonable time up to the 1st of last November. Even if a stay is put upon the proceedings in these cases, considerable costs will be incurred, which the tenants have to pay. But as regards the other class of cases, where ejectment decrees were already issued at last Quarter Sessions throughout Ireland, and which have not been yet executed, there is no possible way of putting a stop to the execution of the decrees except by passing this Bill. I would, therefore, put it to the right hon. Gentleman, in view of the fact that so many important questions still remain for discussion on the Prevention of Crime Bill, whether he himself is not impressed with the necessity of asking the House to give him facilities, by means of Saturday Sittings, for the purpose of making some progress with the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill?

MR. REDMOND said, he wished to read a telegram which he had received, and to call attention to a practice of a serious character which was becoming very prevalent in Ireland. A clergyman in the County Wexford sent him a telegram with reference to some evictions of tenants who were in arrears which took place yesterday on the property of Mr. Batt. He says—

"Two tenants on Batt's property evicted by Sheriff to-day. Emergency men took possession, and set fire to houses and offices. People indignant."

These tenants had six months as a period of redemption; and he conceived there could be nothing more cruel, unjust, and criminal than for the agents of the Emergency Association, or of the landlords, to step in and destroy those houses, and with them the hope that, within six months, the evicted tenants would be able to recover their homes after settling with their landlords. He asked the Government to give their serious attention to the matter, and hoped that in the Prevention of Crime Bill now before Parliament, offences of this kind should be included. He joined in the appeal of his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) with regard to Saturday Sittings to proceed with the Arrears Bill.

Mr. TREVELYAN said, that on a question of that description, he would speak with as few sentences as possible. He thought the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), though not quoting from papers, had described generally the state of evictions in Ireland, and he had described them, undoubtedly, with perfect correctness. The number of evictions in the first quarter of this year was serious. The number of evictions during the last month was most formidable. The number of evictions during the first week of this month was something very like appalling. He must say that he heard with great pleasure the generous and patriotic words that fell from the hon. Member for Carrickfergus (Mr. Greer). The Government of Ireland was extremely and deeply interested in the question; and in order to keep themselves fully informed on a matter in which, deep as their interest was, he was sorry to say their power was not very great, they ordered Returns of evictions, as well as Returns of outrages, to be sent in daily to Dublin Castle; and, at the same time, the opinions of the police on these evictions. The opinions of the police, and Resident and Special Magistrates, were sent in together with those Returns; and he was bound to say that while, in a great number of instances, these evictions occurred on account of the contumacious determination of tenants not to pay their rent, in a great many instances the police and the Special and Resident Magistrates described them as cases of great hardship. He deeply regretted that the landlords of Ireland generally would not take the attitude assumed by the hon. Member for Carrickfergus. He regretted exceedingly that the good example of the hon. Member for Carrickfergus was not more generally followed; that, at a time when the Government—he was not now speaking of the Liberal Government in particular, but the Executive Government of Ireland—were labouring in a position of extreme difficulty, and honestly endeavouring to do their duty, without fear or being influenced on either side, landlords should be found to use those rights of theirs as to evictions in such a cool and unpatriotic manner. This was most cruel to the country and the Executive Government. The practical suggestion which the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Parnell) had made was one which, he was sorry to say, the Government could not see any chance of entertaining. If they took Saturday Sittings, they would be bound to take them to pass the Prevention of Crime Bill, which the Government of Ireland regarded as essential. They regarded it, too, as primarily essential that it should pass in substantially the same form as it was now presented to the House; and if it did, they hoped that, in the course of six or nine months, it would bring about a very different state of things to what existed in Ireland then. His experience was that, in Parliamentary matters, it was necessary that the Government should deal with one thing at a time; and he could not help venturing saying, he thought that hon. Gentlemen opposite (Home Rulers) would quite as well serve their cause if they would make such protests only as were sufficient to get a clear understanding from the Government as to the points upon which they were willing to modify the Bill, which should be declared at once; but, after making those concessions, it should be known to hon. Members that not one iota more would be wrung from the Government, either by obstruction or by unfair discussion.

He did not appeal to hon. Members to curtail legitimate debate, because their views, and experience, and suggestions would very decidedly enter into the views which the Government would take of each clause; but the Government had their Bill fairly at their fingers' ends, and were very able to form an opinion as to whether proposed modifications were necessary or not. In order to get to the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill, which, after all, was a measure brought in for the purpose of preventing evictions, he could not help thinking that it was the duty of every patriotic Irishman to try and push the measure now before the Committee through as soon as possible, especially seeing that hon. Members could not hope, by further delay, to modify the clauses. That was the advice he ventured to give them. The present duty of the Government was to pass it as soon as possible; and when they got to the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill, they would press it forward with the same eagerness as they were doing this measure. He could answer for the Irish Government in this respect, that they considered the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill every way as valuable for the maintenance of peace and order, and, what they regarded with equal anxiety, as being necessary for restoring prosperity to Ireland as the Prevention of Crime Bill; and they would feel themselves bound to carry it essentially as it was presented to the House, or in such a shape that it would confer the same amount of benefit on the people. He did not for a moment believe that they should gain anything at present by taking a Saturday Sitting and devoting it to the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill.

MR. GIBSON: Sir, this debate has arisen very suddenly and unexpectedly upon some observations by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan), which, I think, were met with certainly great courtesy by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Trevelyan). I do not think I should have now risen to say anything at all, but to guard myself from being presumed to assent to the collocation of words and to the way in which the right hon. Gentleman has presented his ideas to the House. I do not desire to be at all hypercritical, or to use any words calculated to lengthen the debate or to provoke discussion; and I do not think it would be fair, having regard to the great difficulties with which he has to contend, that I should indulge in any personal criticism, bearing in mind that he was called on to speak with some suddenness and without a moment's notice. I desire, however, to guard myself against assenting to the position in which he appeared to place evictions as contrasted with other matters reported to the Government in Ireland; and, also, I desire to guard myself against being supposed, by any silence on my part, to tolerate the assertion that any appreciable number of landlords should be open to the deliberate charge of acting in an unpatriotic or unfair manner. [Ironical cheers.] Of course, I am well aware that in this House the landlords in Ireland have many enemies, who do not hesitate to make charges against them; but it is not unreasonable that those who take a standpoint of a somewhat wider character should guard themselves against appearing to support principles from which they dissent. There is one matter which must be borne in mind. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) says that the Judges of the Irish County Courts who administer the vast ejectment jurisdiction up to £100 of rental, and have as wide a power as any Act of Parliament should confer upon them, should have jurisdiction to stay execution of decrees for eviction when cases require it. I may inform him, as to civil bill ejectments, that it is within the power of the Judges administering that jurisdiction to put a stay on evictions. That power is quite as wide as could be given on any Act.

MR. PARNELL: Not after they have granted the decree.

MR. GIBSON: No; but at the moment of granting the decree, when the whole of the matters are present to their minds.

MR. PARNELL: No.

MR. GIBSON: Well, when a case is before the Judge, and the landlord has proved his claim as to the amount that is due, and the tenant has been heard, then the County Court Judge can say—"I have heard the case, and am satisfied that the two or three years' rent may be due. I am bound to give that to the landlord; but, having regard to all that has appeared before me, what the tenant has said in the way of substantiating his case, I put a stay upon that decree to the landlord, and I will put that decree over six months, nine months, or, as has been in some cases, twelve months." That is the existing law in Ireland, and can be, and has been, applied in many cases. It must be remembered that in Ireland the landlords, speaking generally—although there are exceptions, just as there are exceptions with all classes—have shown themselves not disposed to push their powers to excess, and desirous to meet matters fairly and reasonably. This is shown by the fact that the arrears of rent on the property of many men are very large, and for several years—partly owing to their consideration in years of distress, but also during years of prosperity. The Land League has prevented these payments, and the landlords who previously showed consideration have not got a penny of their rents. It must be remembered, also, that evictions are of two classes, as might be expected. Tenants who could have paid their rents have spent their money, and have not got the means now. As regarded this, it was not reasonable that a landlord who has a family and many charges to meet should be left to starve, and be held up to obloquy for seeking to maintain his rights. Then, there are others who are entitled to every commiseration and sympathy—men who are really poor, and who would pay their obligations if they could. I would venture to hope, in reference to the Returns of the Government, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland will take care that they are complete, and that they indicate clearly, not only what ejectments have been pronounced, but what evictions have been actually carried out, and the number of instances in which the tenants have been restored to possession, whether as tenants or caretakers. One of the Returns issued last month stopped short of that vital matter of information. It simply showed in some cases that possession was taken from the tenant and handed over to the landlord; but in regard to the more numerous class it only said that a decree was pronounced, and not whether it was carried out. It was very kind of the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) to speak as he had; but it should be understood that the Bill, having received that consideration, would get no further facilities.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, that, no doubt, it was very important in any measure of relief to make a clear and unmistakable distinction between those tenants who were, and those who were not, able to pay; and certainly the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Trevelyan), in making his observations, had in view the class of tenants unable to pay. There undoubtedly were evictions going on where, if the tenants had been granted two or three months' delay, they would have been able to pay some part, at least, of their rent.

MR. SEXTON said, he wished to express the deep satisfaction with which he and those who sat with him had listened to the patriotic statement of the hon. Member for Carrickfergus (Mr. Greer)—that his tenants should not be evicted until the House had time to come to a decision upon the Arrears Bill. He had shown a very commendable spirit; and he (Mr. Sexton) only wished—he could not expect—that his good example might be generally followed by other Irish landlords. The difficulties of the position were well illustrated by the promptitude with which the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson), who was the most competent and able Representative of the landlord class, had risen to reply to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland as to the tenants. He desired to point out that the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), in quoting to the House, had adduced facts for the Returns of the Resident Magistrates; and he might remind hon. Members that eviction at this time in Ireland must be attended with very great hardship, for they amounted to a confiscation of the crops of the tenants, which too often had cost those tenants their last penny. The point which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had raised as to evictions had nothing whatever to do with executed ejectments. He would find the whole of the information he asked for in the Returns. It was with very great regret that he (Mr. Sexton) heard the Chief Secretary for Ireland state that if Saturday Sittings were held they would be used for the Prevention of Crime Bill, and not for furthering the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill. The Prevention of Crime Bill attacked the primary and fundamental principles of liberty; and the Irish Members could not, even upon the consideration of the past position of the tenantry, and in order to expedite the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill, refrain from expressing their opinions as fully as they deemed necessary upon this attempt to take away the liberties of the people. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that the Government were prepared to announce, with a view to shortening the discussion on the Prevention of Crime Bill, that concessions would be granted. Did the right hon. Gentleman mean that the moment a Member of the Government rose after the proposal of an Amendment, and stated his opinions, that the discussion must practically come to an end? Surely that would amount to a neutralization of the whole process of debate.

MR. TREVELYAN: What I said was, that as soon as the Government thoroughly understood the opinion of the House in debate, then they would, at a comparatively early stage—and I am bound to say that does not mean a very early one—announce what line they would take up, and that there would be no alteration in the decision in consequence of the debate being prolonged beyond what the Government considered legitimate discussion.

MR. SEXTON said, he would admit that the explanation was less objectionable than the right hon. Gentleman's previous statement; but he would ask him to reconsider even his explanation, and to give the Irish Members some hope that if additional arguments and new evidence were brought forward, even after the Government had spoken, they would be prepared to consider them favourably. There was another inconsistency in the right hon. Gentleman's speech. If, as he said, the Crime Bill and the Arrears Bill were regarded by the Government as equally important, why were they not being taken stage by stage? Or why was the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill not being taken first, seeing that last Session the Government gave repression the first place, and that events ought to have shown them the fatality of that sequence of policy? He (Mr. Sexton) most positively asserted that the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill was not only equally valuable, but infinitely more valuable, than the Prevention of Crime Bill, and that the former Bill would operate quicker and more effectually for the prevention of crime and the restoration of order in Ireland than any Coercion Act which the most ingenious Government could devise. He would state why he thought that. A Coercion Bill could not be effective in turning away from the course of violence and revenge a man whose mind was convulsed with passion and a sense of wrong; and in the case of those people who were being evicted in thousands, with what the Resident Magistrates described as scenes of hardship, no Coercion Bill could take away their desire and intention to have revenge. On the other hand, if the House passed a good Arrears Bill first, see what a salutary influence it would bring to bear upon those tenants. Every tenant who was threatened with eviction would feel that the law was now on his side, and that Arrears Bill would be as a salve to his mind. He was hopeful even yet that, upon consideration of the Reports made by the Resident Magistrates, and of the urgency of this question of eviction, and on consideration, also, of the greater effectiveness of the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill over the Prevention of Crime Bill as an engine for the restoration of order, the Government would reconsider the matter, and cease to give repression the first place in their policy.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he would suggest that, as there was no use in carrying the discussion further, the Motion for the adjournment of the House should now be withdrawn in order that they might at once proceed with the Prevention of Crime Bill. If Irish Members wished to reach the discussion upon the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill, and to state their views upon that measure, surely the best way of attaining that object was to get on with the Business more immediately before them.

MR. MACFARLANE said, he had no doubt that if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Trevelyan) was left to his own kindly and benevolent disposition, means would be devised for putting a stop to evictions; but he understood from the right hon. Gentleman's remarks that the hands of the Government were tied by the Resolution of the House pledging them to proceed from day to day with the Prevention of Crime Bill, and that they were not going to touch the Arrears Question until the Prevention of Crime Bill had been discussed and disposed of. He appealed to the Government to take the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill day by day and stage by stage with the one they were at present dealing with. There were in the month of May no less than 1,189 evictions, and it was not too much to say that one-half of them would have been averted by the passage of that Bill. It was as if the Government had launched a lifeboat to rescue a drowning crew, and had then put back to settle some miserable quarrel upon the shore; while, one by one, the wretched sailors dropped from the rigging and were lost. They appealed to Her Majesty's Government to stop this wretched state of things, and thus bring back to Ireland that peace which would never be obtained by coercive measures. What caused increased bitterness in the minds of the Irish people was this—They had seen the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill introduced and read a second time, and notwithstanding that they were being dragged from their homes and turned on the road-sides and into the workhouses in thousands week after week.

Mr. Sexton

MR. METGE said, he was sorry the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland was not in his place, as he wished to extract from him a definite answer to the question put to him by the hon. Member for New Ross (Mr. Redmond) with respect to the action the Government intended to take in cases in which bailiffs and Emergency men deliberately set fire to the houses of tenants whom they had evicted. The case put before the House by his hon. Friend was very strong; but he (Mr. Metge) knew a case in his own county which was of a still more aggravated character. He brought the case before Parliament on two or three occasions, and he received no answer, which satisfied him that the Government intended to take any action in the matter. The case he referred to was that of a large series of evictions on the estate of Lord Gor-manston, in Meath. The execution having failed on two or three occasions, by reason of a technical error on the part of the process-server, the Emergency men at last determined to make good the process of the law by deliberately setting fire to the houses of the tenants, and burning them over their heads. The parish priest of the district, who informed him of the occurrence, was first made aware of it by seeing the flames rising from the roofs of the whole village a couple of miles distant, and, upon coming into the town, he found the bailiffs and process-servers busily engaged in burning down the houses of the tenants in presence of their wives and children, the men themselves being away. When such a state of things as that was permitted in Ireland, it was absolutely certain that the present contention would go on increasing. They had in three months of the present year no less than 3,400 evictions in a single month, which was more than double the number on which the Prime Minister based the Compensation for Disturbance Bill of last year. These evictions were supported by bodies of police and military, and the state of things which they produced he (Mr. Metge) called nothing less than civil war, which every person who wished well to Ireland desired to see ended. He thought when the Government asked for strong measures of repression against the people, the Irish Members were entitled to ask that some limitation and punishment should be put upon the crimes which were now committed day after day by the landlords of Ireland.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he rose merely to enforce the appeal made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross), that they should now be allowed to go into Committee upon the Prevention of Crime Bill. As his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland had already stated, the Government were anxious to pass the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill; but they could entertain no measure until the former Bill had been disposed of. It was quite time to cease that fruitless discussion, seeing that four hours had been spent upon a subject which any reasonable person would think might very well have been disposed of in one hour.

DR. COMMINS said, the attention of the Government had been called, over and over again, to the burning by agents of landlords of the dwellings of tenants who had been evicted; and, as such crimes were punishable under Statute or Common Law, he wished to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, whether such acts as those described by the hon. Member for New Ross (Mr. Redmond) did not amount to arson under the Common and Statute Law, and whether he had ordered any prosecution in the numerous cases which had been brought before him?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON), in reply, said, he must deny that the acts mentioned constituted the offence of arson, and he had, therefore, ordered no prosecution.

MR. LEA said, he believed the Arrears of Rent Bill would be a far better deterrent to crime than the Bill now before the House; but until the Prevention of Crime Bill was disposed of, no other Business could be taken, and it was their duty to get rid of it as soon as possible. If, therefore, the Irish Members curtailed their opposition to the latter Bill the House might more readily pass the former Bill. Evictions were undoubtedly taking place in Ireland to a very serious extent, notably the County Donegal, where for the past two months a great number of tenants had been evicted. He was also informed by a friend who had recently come from the North of Ireland that evictions would become more numerous. Under such circumstances, they were most anxious to get the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill through; and, with that object in view, he hoped hon. Members opposite would not continue their prolonged opposition to the Prevention of Crime Bill.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he perfectly agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Donegal (Mr. Lea), that it was highly desirable, in the interests of peace and tranquillity in Ireland, that the House should be allowed to approach the consideration of the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill as soon as possible; but he (Mr. O'Connor Power) thought his hon. Friend would see that in saying that he was asking for too much, for it was inviting them to accept a one-sided engagement. He was asking them to become parties to a contract in which all the obligation would rest on them, while no corresponding obligation would rest on the Government. Suppose they were now to desist from all further opposition to the Prevention of Crime Bill, could his hon. Friend guarantee that the Government would persist with their Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill, no matter what opposition might arise against it in this or the other House of Parliament? Would the Government act in reference to that Bill as they acted in reference to the Compensation for Disturbance Bill, the rejection of which, in his opinion, was the source and beginning of most of the trouble and annoyance which had since arisen in Ireland? That showed how impossible it was to carry out the proposal of his hon. Friend. They must take things as they came before them; and if the Government, having absolute discretion in their hands, had made the mistake of placing coercion before remedial legislation, on their head would rest the responsibility. To charge the Irish Members with any responsibility for the state of things which arose out of that choice would be to make them responsible for that over which they had absolutely no control. He wished to appeal to his hon. Friend the Member for Donegal, who was elected to support Her Majesty's Government, and who loyally supported Her Majesty's Government, and, therefore, might be supposed to have some influence over Her Majesty's Government—he asked him and other Members of the House to approach Her Majesty's Government on this subject. The Prime Minister stated, a few weeks ago, that he would avail himself of every lucid interval to push forward the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill. They had looked in vain for the appearance of that interval, and he wished to ask whether the time had not now come when something might be done with it? Why did not his hon. Friend appeal to the Conservative Party to abridge their long speeches on the Egyptian Question, allow Egyptian affairs to be managed by those who were responsible for the policy of the Government, and let them go on with their ordinary affairs? It would be scandalous and a disgrace to the Irish Representatives if they allowed the present Bill to go through without discussion, in that way consenting to see every principle of their liberties struck down, as was proposed by that Bill, on a bargain, as he said, in which all the obligations were on their side; while, on the other hand, the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill would still remain at the discretion of the Government, acting under the coercion of the Conservative Party. If the opposite course entailed the responsibility of retarding the remedial measure of the Government, let them not hesitate to take that course, seeing their end could be obtained by no other means.

Mr. BORLASE said, he wished the Government would accede to the request of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and have a Saturday's Sitting. ["Oh, oh!"] He said that as much in the interest of the Scottish and English legislation, which had been kept behind, as in the interest of Ireland. The present bad weather was beginning to make persons look to the harvest; and there appeared a prospect of another Session passing without anything being done for the agricultural interests of England and Scotland, which demanded attention. They ought to look at the mass of legislation behind the two Bills referred to in the discussion, and reflect how it was being hindered, solely by the waste of time now taking place.

Mr. O'DONNELL said, he believed that it would be a very small minority of the people of Donegal who would support the Liberal Member for Donegal (Mr. Lea) in his appeal to the Irish Party to give up their resistance to Coercion. He was glad, however, to hear from the hon. Member for Donegal that he was aware of the cruel evictions that were taking place in the country—evictions in which all the rights were on the side of the tenants, and all the wrongs on the side of the landlords. But he could not but think that these deplorable facts would have been more properly brought forward at the introduction of the Coercion Bill as a reason for delaying the Coercion Bill, and not as a reason why Irish Members should now decline to criticize, and, if possible, amend that Bill. The Secretary of State for the Home Department had deprecated conversations of this kind; but the observation would have more power if it had not been preceded by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. The Chief Secretary for Ireland informed Irish Members that, even with regard to the discussion of the Coercion Bill, their observations would be of no use, that Her Majesty's Government at the commencement of each clause would state what was their will, and would refuse all Amendments on the part of the Irish Members. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland stated that when arson was committed by Emergency men it was not a crime.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): I never made any such statement.

Mr. O'DONNELL: I am translating the right hon. and learned Gentleman's language into plain English, stripped of the technicalities of Dublin Castle law. If they wished to deal fairly with both sides, let them introduce a provision into the Coercion Act, making the burning of houses by Emergency men a crime.

Mr. P. A. TAYLOR said, he had contented himself hitherto with entering a silent protest against the Coercion Bill by voting against it, because he saw it was of no use opposing the Bill in the face of the overwhelming power brought into operation by the junction of the two great Parties. The sooner the Bill was passed the sooner they would get to remedial measures. He admitted the satisfaction he had felt at the frank and earnest statement of his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and regretted the unfavourable criticisms made upon it by the hon. Member for Dungarvan. At the same time, he could not but express his protest against the fatuity of Her Majesty's Government in bringing on coercive before remedial measures; coercive measures which all history proved would not paralyze the arm of the assassin nor insure detection; but would add weight to the disgust and hatred of the English Government in Ireland, out of which all such outrages sprung. He believed that the Government were causing deep regret and dissatisfaction among the Liberal Party by the course they were pursuing. They were dragging the Liberal Party, who felt no little disinclination to support measures which might have found a proper home on the Benches opposite, but which were a disgrace to the Liberal Party.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

—o:0:—

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND)

BILL.—[BILL 167.]

(Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 13th June.]

[ELEVENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART II.

OFFENCES AGAINST THIS ACT.

Clause 7 (Illegal meetings).

MR. P. MARTIN, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 4, line 14, to leave out the words "to be," in order to insert the words "of which public notice shall be given," said, the clause, as at present framed, might lead to gross injustice. It presented no public notification of the fact that this order had been made. Persons might attend, wholly unaware the meeting had been made illegal. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) had an Amendment lower down on the Paper, by which he also sought to obviate the infliction of the severe penalties, for offences against this section, on persons who might be ignorant that there was any prohibition. If this clause was left without amendment, it might cause the greatest injustice.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 14, to leave out the words "to be" and insert, "of which public notice shall be given."—(Mr. Patrick Martin.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'to be' stand part of the Clause."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he should be glad to accept the Amendment.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR thought it very desirable, before the Committee proceeded any further with the clause, that the necessity for such a clause should be shown. The Lord Lieutenant had already amply exercised his powers of prohibition. Had he not, within the last six months, prohibited every kind of meeting to which he had the slightest objection? What, then, was the necessity for this clause?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, the first part of the clause gave the necessary power to the Lord Lieutenant to prohibit illegal meetings, and the second part was necessary to give the means of effectuating that prohibition by action against individuals who declined to obey the law. At present, where a proclamation was issued against the holding of a public meeting, the only means by which effect could be given to it was to disperse the meeting by force. It was thought to be necessary that there should be a continual machinery, and by this clause that machinery would be provided, so as to bring those who took part in an illegal meeting within the summary jurisdiction of the Act. This was the reason why the clause was deemed to be necessary.

MR. SEXTON wished to know whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir William Harcourt) was aware that during last year the Lord Lieutenant had prohibited two classes of meetings, the sheriff's sales and ordinary public meetings? He also wished to know whether, in consequence of disobedience to these prohibitions, any public inconvenience had arisen? He desired to know likewise whether it was not the fact that the ordinary law was sufficient?

MR. PARNELL said, before that question was answered he would like to ask another. Had the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir William Harcourt) any information to give the Committee as to the number of public meetings that had been prohibited by the Lord Lieutenant during the last six or 12 months; and also as to the number of cases in which the proclamations of the Lord Lieutenant had been obeyed, or in which it had become necessary to disperse the meetings by force?

DR. COMMINS said, he also wished to ask whether, under the law, the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had been entitled to make the proclamations that had been issued during the last 12 months? So far as his (Dr. Commins') research was concerned, the action of the Lord Lieutenant in this respect was not only utterly unconstitutional, but was also utterly illegal.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, the questions that had just been put were entirely contradictory. One question assumed that the power was legal, and that of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Dr. Commins) assumed that the power was not legal. If the exercise of that power was not legal, it was the object of this clause to make it so; and if, on the other hand, it was legal, it was still desirable that the doubt expressed by the hon. and learned Gentleman should be removed, and that the people of Ireland should be made aware, by the declaration contained in that clause, that the power was legal. He need not say that Her Majesty's Government had introduced this clause with very great reluctance, and he might add that there was what he might term a national feeling among Englishmen of all parties and shades of opinion—a feeling of repugnance at the interference thus proposed with the rights of the people; and he believed that, in many parts of the House, he should be believed when he made this statement. But they ought never to allow themselves to be blinded to the fact that they could not overlook the actual state of the case. They were bound to consider what the condition of Ireland really was at the present time, and what were the peculiar circumstances which rendered the application of remedies of an extraordinary character absolutely indispensable. Public meetings might, no doubt, be considered as a source of light; but they ought to have some regard to the atmosphere into which the light was carried, and it would be the height of recklessness to carry a light in the form of a naked candle into a chamber filled with explosive material. It had been said that proposals of this character ought to be specially repugnant to the feelings of the Liberal Party. That was perfectly true; but he would call attention to the fact that, at one time, after the Liberal Party had been out of Office for half-a-century, during which they had had to fight the battle of freedom in Opposition, it became their unfortunate duty, but still their duty, and a duty which they did not shrink from performing, in the very first year after the passing of the Reform Bill, to introduce measures which they considered to be absolutely indispensable for the preservation of the peace in Ireland. That was the great Liberal Reform Administration, which was represented by Lord Grey in the House of Lords, and in the House of Commons by a Relative of the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. He supposed he might say, without fear of contradiction, that there was no man living who was more indisposed to recommend the adoption of measures of that description than the present Earl Spencer, unless it was that distinguished man, Lord Althorp, who was his Relative, and who was a Member of the Administration just referred to. And yet Lord Althorp, in the very infancy of the Reform Parliament, found it necessary, in the then disturbed condition of Ireland, to introduce a Bill, the very first clause of which contained these words:—

“That it shall and may be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant, or other Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland, at any time after the passing of this Act, and from time to time during the continuance thereof, as occasion may require, by his or their order in writing, of which public notice shall be given, to prohibit or suppress the meeting of any association, assembly, or body of persons which he or they shall deem to be dangerous to the public peace or safety, or inconsistent with the due administration of the law, and by the same, or any other order also to prohibit any or every adjourned, renewed, or otherwise continued meeting of the same or of any part thereof under any name, pretext, shift or device whatsoever, and that every meeting of any association, assembly or body of persons, the meeting whereof shall be so prohibited or suppressed as aforesaid, and every postponed, adjourned, renewed or otherwise continued meeting thereof under any name pretext, shift or device whatsoever, shall be and be deemed an unlawful assembly, and after notice has been given of such meeting having been prohibited or suppressed, as aforesaid, every person present at the same shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour, and every such offence, whether committed within any district proclaimed in pursuance of this Act, or elsewhere, in Ireland, shall be tried and punished according to the course of the common law.”

MR. PARNELL: May I ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman in what year that Act was passed?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, the Act was passed in the year 1833, the first year after the election of the Reform Parliament.

MR. PARNELL said, he would like also to be informed whether that Act abolished trial by jury in these cases?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, the Act did not abolish trial by jury. The hon. Member for the City of Cork had used the words "in these cases." His (Sir William Harcourt's) reply was, that it established martial law.

MR. PARNELL asked if the Act just referred to established martial law in these cases?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it did not; but it did establish martial law in Ireland. He had said there had always been a feeling of repugnance among the Liberal Party at interference with the rights of the people; but he would also say that it never had been a tradition of the Liberal Party to tolerate disorder or attacks on life and property, whether in Ireland or elsewhere; and if it were true that the measures Her Majesty's Government were now proposing were necessary for the purpose of preventing such attacks, then he had a right to say that they were fulfilling and acting up to the traditions of the Liberal Party; and the Liberal Party—at least as much as the Conservative Party—were bound, under the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government, to preserve the lives and protect the property of the subjects of the Queen. The only question they ought to ask themselves was this—was the situation in Ireland at the present moment such as justified and rendered necessary a resort to measures of this character? If they found that it was so, then he must say that the present Administration would no more shrink from the performance of their duty than did the Administration of Earl Grey. Well, upon that point, he could only say that the opinion of the Irish Government was clear and distinct, that the powers asked for by this clause were absolutely necessary. He would read to the Committee what had been said by Earl Spencer on this subject. Earl Spencer said—

"The danger of meetings at which inflammatory speeches are made is very great, when the country is in the excited condition in which it has lately been."

He (Sir William Harcourt) would ask the attention of the Committee to these words:—

"Outrages follow these meetings with remarkable certainty. The Executive have, at great risk, stopped them; but they only rely on sufficient force to prevent bloodshed, and a statutory power to stop meetings believed to be dangerous to the public peace and public safety, and making it an offence for anyone to attend these meetings after such a notice will strengthen enormously the hands of the Government, and one of the greatest dangers to the public peace will be checked."

Such were the views of the Irish Government on this question. Her Majesty's Government were satisfied that those views were well founded; and it was for the reasons he (Sir William Harcourt) had thus stated that Her Majesty's Government had introduced, with whatever reluctance, the clause now under discussion; and it was on these grounds that they felt bound to support the application for the powers it was intended to confer.

MR. SEXTON said, by what extraordinary selection the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had been charged with the conduct of a Bill which abrogated the liberties of the Irish people he (Mr. Sexton) was unable to understand. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, in endeavouring to strengthen the position of the Government in their attempt to abolish the right of public meeting in Ireland, had referred to a precedent, and had been obliged to go back 50 years for the purpose. He had been compelled to refer to the acts of statesmen who did not claim to be called Liberal, but who were satisfied with the designation of Whig. One would have thought the Government would have been ashamed to refer in that House to the period of 1833, when the tithe movement might be said to have resulted in wholesale slaughter amongst the community, 60 murders having been committed in one county, and 33 in another, in the course of a year. A period such as that, when the country was convulsed with a violent outburst of public feeling, was not comparable to the present time, because the outrages then committed were to the outrages of to-day as ten to one. But coercion had failed in those days as it would again, tranquillity having only been restored by the illusory settlement of the Tithe Question. Although the right hon. and learned Gentleman had thought fit to put forward the Act of 1833 in justification of the policy of the Government, he had, however, not cited the opinion of Lord Morpeth, a man who knew the situation of Ireland, and who testified that the conflict with the forces raging at that period had utterly failed, and that it was only when a milder policy, he would not say of conciliation, was begun, that a period of repose ensued. Did the Act of 1833 tell in favour of the peace of Ireland? On the contrary; for years after the passage of that Act, when other measures of coercion had been piled upon it, as the pile grew higher and higher over the heads of the people, higher and higher grew the amount of crime. It was not until the people had the idea, delusive as it was, that their interests were being attended to; when coercion had proved, after four years' experience of it, that it was useless for the purpose it was intended for, that the Government of the day learned by degrees that there was no cure for the condition of Ireland but to yield to the just wants and wishes of the people. It was then, and then only, that tranquillity was restored. Never was there a more miserable failure than the Act of 1833, and for that reason alone it ought not to have been cited by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. It was true that the Act of 1833 suspended the right of public meeting in Ireland; but did it suspend the right of trial by jury? Even under that Act, that right was untouched, and it was reserved for the Radicals of the 19th century to deprive the people of Ireland both of their right of public meeting and their right to Constitutional trial. Again, it was said that Lord Spencer had expressed the opinion that if he had power to prohibit public meetings, it would greatly strengthen the hands of the Executive Government. But he (Mr. Sexton) contended that the hands of the Executive in Ireland, in that respect, needed no strengthening whatever; and in saying that he stood upon the experience of last year. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had gone into matters of history, but had not touched either of the two questions he had put to him, notwithstanding that he admitted they were somewhat pertinent to the matter in hand. Was it statesmanlike or consistent on the part of the right hon. and learned Gentleman to make that admission, and then sit down with a triumphant air after evading those questions altogether? The Lord Lieutenant had undoubtedly prohibited meetings at Sheriffs' sales, where it was not to be wondered at that the people were exasperated into a state of excitement. But when the Lord Lieutenant exercised the power of prohibiting meetings for the discussion of the agrarian question, was the Executive in any case obliged to resort to force for the preservation of the peace? On the contrary, he said that the moment the proclamation appeared, the public stood aside, and there was no disturbance of the peace. Did it become necessary for the authorities to prosecute any individuals, or did the people in any way persevere in having meetings which were forbidden? Again the answer was in the negative. Then he (Mr. Sexton) said that the past year's experience abundantly proved that the existing powers of the Lord Lieutenant were ample, and that, so far as the clause before the Committee was concerned, the Preamble of the Bill contained a false and unfounded statement. The Preamble of the Bill said that the operation of the ordinary law had become insufficient for the repression and prevention of crime, and that it was expedient to make further provision for that purpose. He (Mr. Sexton) traversed, denied, and declared that statement to be false. The powers already in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant were ample for the preservation of peace and order, and he challenged any hon. or right hon. Gentleman to get up and deny the truth of the statement. Now, if the hands of the Lord Lieutenant were strong enough to combat the difficulties of the situation, as they were abundantly proved to be, it followed that the clause was unnecessary. He once more asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman if the Lord Lieutenant had, in any case, used force in connection with public meetings in Ireland; if public inconvenience had in any case ensued upon these meetings; had the powers of the Lord Lieutenant been found sufficient for the purpose of dealing with them; and, why, if they were, the Government were about to strengthen them?

MR. O'DONNELL said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had expressed great reluctance in supporting a clause for the further limitation of public liberty in Ireland. Irish Members must do him the justice to say that his reluctance was admirably dissembled. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had stated that, under the existing law, there was no means of dealing with a prohibited meeting except by dispersing it by force. That being so, would the right hon. and learned Gentleman say that when this clause was obtained the Government would allow public meetings to proceed without dispersing them by force? Would they judge by results whether any action was to be taken with regard to them? He failed to perceive the reason for the previous statement earlier in the evening of the right hon. and learned Gentleman as to the progress of the Bill. If he were so anxious about the time of the Committee, it was difficult to understand why he should delay the Committee so considerably by the introduction of utterly superfluous matter in his lengthy endeavour to prove that the clause was strictly in the ways of the Liberal Party. He (Mr. O'Donnell) would suggest that the right hon. and learned Gentleman should, in future, take all arguments of that kind as said; for it was well understood that the ways of the Liberal Party were always compatible with the most rigorous coercion in Ireland; and, although he stated that the majority of the House would bear him out in his opinion, he (Mr. O'Donnell) ventured to say that there was very little sympathy with the principles of the Liberal Party among those Members who now supported it anywhere outside the four corners of Great Britain. The only result of the clause would be to create as many punishable offences as it might suit the policy or fears of an incompetent Viceroy to call into existence. It had been said as a satire upon foreign tyrants that nothing was easier than to govern by a state of siege. Her Majesty's Government had set about governing Ireland by that means, and the application of that régime, discoverable in the present clause, was the most objectionable that could be imagined, because it amounted to this—that the Viceroy, upon some information from persons of whom nothing was known, and whose right to be listened to could not be tested, might prohibit any public meeting in Ireland. That meeting might be most orderly, the speeches at it most mild, and many things might be said there within the bounds of reasonable criticism and appropriate denunciation; yet because the meeting was for the purpose of considering things distasteful to the Government, and the speeches calculated to exhibit the fallacy of the Government policy, the Lord Lieutenant could come down upon it with the whole force of the Bill, bringing before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction in connection with it any persons he chose, and subjecting them to the degradation and pain of six months' imprisonment with hard labour. The clause gave power to the Lord Lieutenant to create a number of undefined offences, and to trust to the Resident Magistrates to punish them with undefined penalties. He (Mr. O'Donnell) had been accused by an hon. Member, a Friend of the Liberal Party in all their attempts upon the liberties of the Irish people, with having misrepresented the Government in saying that their method of procedure with regard to the Bill was simply to declare their policy and refuse to accept any Amendments. He should be glad to find that he had in that respect misrepresented the policy of the Government, and would be ready to apologize to the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor), if he could see the slightest disposition on the part of the Government to accept the smallest reasonable Amendments to the clause.

MR. H. SAMUELSON rose to Order. Was it permissible for any hon. Member to discuss the principle of the clause upon an Amendment?

THE CHAIRMAN said, as the Minister in charge of the Bill, in expressing the displeasure he felt at the manner the subject was being dealt with, had introduced a somewhat extended discussion upon the clause, it would hardly be becoming for him (the Chairman) to draw the line too strictly. It was entirely out of Order to discuss the merits of a clause upon a simple Amendment.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he could assure the Committee that he had no intention of following the eloquent second reading speech of the Secretary of State for the Home Department; because that would have the effect of leading the Committee too far from the subject before them. The hon. Member who had just intervened without reason (Mr. H. Samuelson) was, to a certain extent, justified by the action of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and it was doubtless owing to a truly Liberal tenderness for the conduct of his Chiefs that he had not risen to Order during the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. H. SAMUELSON again rose—
[Cries of "Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN indicated that the hon. Member for Dungarvan was not out of Order.

MR. O'DONNELL, resuming, said, the hon. Member for Frome, having intervened without reason, had now intervened without Order. But to continue. If this clause were passed, unamended as he presumed it would be, in conformity with the programme laid down by the Government, it would be impossible for public opinion in Ireland to find legitimate expression, and in that case it would not only seek, but find illegitimate expression. The conduct of the Government in refusing any Amendment to the clause was simply in keeping with their action upon other clauses of the Bill.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not think that a very fair charge, inasmuch as he had just signified his willingness to accept the first Amendment on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Patrick Martin).

MR. O'DONNELL said, the rapid acceptance of the proposal of the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Patrick Martin) showed how much the clause stood in need of amendment, and the intervention of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was therefore simply rhetorical. He (Mr. O'Donnell) had said if the public were prevented in the expression of their grievances, not only were the people of a country injured, but the Government was also injured, because it shut itself out from the knowledge of what was necessary to the good government of the country. Consequently, the refusal to grant the liberty of public meeting in Ireland was as much a blow against good government as against public liberty; and it confirmed the impression that good government and public liberty were, at the present time, equally apart from the designs of the Liberal Party.

MR. CALLAN said, he thought that the Secretary of State for the Home Department, when referring to the Act of 1833, might have given the Committee some information as to the state of Ireland at the time that Act was introduced. According to a very instructive book by Mr. Leader called Coercive Measures in Ireland, which gave some very interesting information as to the proceedings of the Liberal Party, it appeared that in the year preceding the passing of the Act, there were, amongst other crimes, 172 homicides, 1,465 robberies, 468 burglaries, and 425 illegal meetings—of which there had not been one last year—753 attacks on houses, 2,083 illegal notices, 280 arsons, and 3,156 serious assaults. Altogether the crimes connected with the disturbed state of the country at that time amounted to upwards of 9,000, and crime was then increasing. This Act when passed would apply to all Ireland. The happy and prosperous Province of Ulster would be just as much under the purview of this Act as would be the most disturbed parts of the county of Galway. The Act of 1833 did not extend to all Ireland, for the Lord Lieutenant was empowered to issue his proclamation, saying that a district was disturbed, and directing the application of the Act to that district. The Secretary of State for the Home Department, in showing his erudition in coercion, might have referred to the experiences of the Head of the Government, then a Member of a Cabinet, but not a Liberal Cabinet, for the Prime Minister, like many others, had seen the error of his ways. In 1833 the Clontarf meeting was put down by proclamation, and O'Connell was convicted by Judge and jury for having been one of the promoters of that meeting. In referring to the Act of 1833 the Secretary of State for the Home Department kept the Committee in ignorance of the real state of the country at that time. The right hon. and learned Gentleman also concealed from the Committee the fact that the Act of 1833 contained a safeguard that the present Act did not contain—namely, that it should only operate in districts which had been proclaimed by the Lord Lieutenant.

Question put, and negatived; words inserted accordingly.

MR. DILLON said, the next Amendment was one standing in the name of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), and in the temporary absence of his hon. Friend he (Mr. Dillon) would move it. It was, in page 4, line 15, to leave out from "which" to "safety," in line 16, inclusive, and insert "the

[Eleventh Night.]

from Egypt, as promptly as possible, in regard to the position and circumstances of the English residents connected with commercial affairs in that country, and make it public in whatever way he might deem most suitable, with the least possible delay. The agony of suspense which had already been endured by many could not be described.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I have already stated that we have telegraphed for a list of the names of those Englishmen who have been killed, and that we shall be glad to make it public; but I do not think it would be desirable to make public our opinion as to what might be the danger at one place more than at another. I think that would only tend to increase the danger.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, that the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) had been good enough to describe something which he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had said as "nonsense." That was not a very courteous statement to make in that House in regard to what an hon. Member had said. He (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) would not argue with him as to what was nonsense or what was not; but the hon. Member had endeavoured to bring in the old story about Lord Salisbury and Tunis. He (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) did not say whether the taking of Tunis was right or not, and he had no responsibility in the matter. But he would observe that it was to be borne in mind that the taking of Tunis took place after the Control had been established, and, therefore, threw some doubt on the good faith of France in the matter. The hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and others had expressed themselves satisfied with the position of Admiral Seymour at Alexandria, and the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had complained of Questions being put on the subject, and had said that such Questions should not be answered. But there would be no danger in the Questions being answered if the Government would send serviceable ships. The danger existed in their sending ships which were not serviceable. It had been shown that, when lightened, only two of them could go into the harbour. The Government, therefore, had sent ships to Alexandria which could not assist the Europeans. [SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Oh, no!] The hon. Baronet said "Oh, no!" and they were asked to trust to the presence of Sir Beauchamp Seymour. On the 11th of May the hon. Baronet told the House that the Government had taken all the steps that were necessary; but the presence of Sir Beauchamp Seymour had not prevented the massacre that took place on Sunday last—and there had been a massacre, for it did not matter whether 50 or 150 had been massacred—although one of the ships was in the harbour and two outside. Therefore, if the Opposition had no confidence in the adequacy of the preparations of the Government, it must be acknowledged that they had some ground for that want of confidence. The Prime Minister had said that the Government had all along been acting in conjunction with Turkey and in harmony with the Turkish Government in this matter, and that we should see that when the Correspondence was published.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government had already contradicted that statement.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, that was not so. What the Prime Minister had positively stated was that all along we had looked upon Turkey as an instrument for acting upon Egypt.

MR. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: Was that the case, or was it not? If it were so, what was the meaning of the despatch dated 31st January 1882, and communicated to Lord Granville by Musurus Pasha? That despatch was to the effect that there was nothing to justify the Collective Note to Tewfik Pasha, that the opinion of the Sultan ought to have been obtained, and that the Government of the Porte felt bound to inquire what were the reasons for such a course. The Turkish Ambassador to this country had been requested to bring the subject before the Minister of Foreign Affairs. If the Government looked upon Turkey as the proper instrument to exercise pressure upon Egypt, it was remarkable that the Porte took so very different a view of the case. It was scarcely credible that Her Majesty's Government, after having offended Turkey as they had done, should go down on their knees to her, and ask her to get them out of the extraordinary solutely necessary, in order to prevent bloodshed, that some of the popular leaders should attend and call upon the people to disperse. He challenged the Government to instance a single case in which popular leaders had attended meetings to advise the people to disperse, and in which they had not been successful. He asserted, without the possibility of contradiction, that at some meetings the magistrates had acted in a most unreasonable and provoking way, and it was only through the exercise of the influence of the popular leaders that bloodshed and frightful disorder had not occurred. The dispersion of a meeting was excessively dangerous. A meeting was, perhaps, announced a week in advance, the country was canvassed, numerous masses of people were called upon to attend, and perhaps on the Saturday night a proclamation was published in The Dublin Gazette—a paper almost unknown in Ireland—prohibiting the proposed meeting as illegal. How were the people of the country districts to be informed of the proclamation, unless it be through their own leaders? He could mention many cases in which people had started to meetings in thousands; but they had been met on the road by priests and leaders of the Land League, and requested to turn back, in consequence of the prohibition of the meeting. The Government could not point to a single instance in which the leaders of the Land League had refused to exercise their influence, and to exercise it with effect in preventing collisions between the police and the people. He supposed he did not overstate it when he said that close upon 100 meetings had been proclaimed during the last year, and that in not a single case had a life been lost and a collision taken place between the authorities and the people. Was it to be supposed that every one of the thousands of people who attended a meeting, innocent of the fact that it had been proclaimed, were to be subject to six months' imprisonment with hard labour? How could the Government expect popular leaders to attend on the spot, and exercise their influence in preventing a collision between the police and the people, if by that attendance they would place themselves in danger of six months' imprisonment with hard labour? He knew of an instance of a meeting in the streets of Dublin, which was dispersed at half-an-hour's notice. He used his influence with the people to cause them to disperse, and they did so; there was no collision with the authorities, although the provocation given by the police was positively frightful. If this clause had been law at that time, he would have been subject to six months' imprisonment for being on the spot. If he had not been there, the people would have been left without any advice, and without any information as to whether the meeting was illegal or legal, except such as they could obtain from the police proclamation. One of the chief objections to this clause was that it would place hundreds and thousands of people in the position of having committed an offence against this Act, when it was utterly impossible to know that their attendance at a meeting would be any offence at all. Another great objection to the clause was that it would enormously increase the danger of collisions between the police, and the military, and the people, because he took it that whenever a meeting was prohibited the military would be sent. If this clause was passed, it would be made a penal offence, punishable by a severe penalty, for any popular leader to attend the place of a proclaimed meeting, and use his influence to cause the people to turn back. He feared that this could only be regarded as a deliberate attempt on the part of the Government to cause collisions between the police and the people. This was a question fraught with very great danger, and, therefore, he earnestly advised the Committee to consider carefully what would be the effect of the clause before they proceeded any further with its consideration.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 15, leave out from "which" to "safety," in line 16, inclusive, and insert "the holding of which he has reason to believe would lead to a breach of the peace."—(Mr. Dillon.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'which he has reason to believe,' stand part of the Clause."

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR wished to ask the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) if he had not an Amendment to propose on this subject?

THE CHAIRMAN: If it is decided that these words stand part of the clause, the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) cannot move his Amendment.

[Eleventh Night.]

MR. HEALY said, he had not intended to move the Amendment, because he understood the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had a better Amendment to propose.

MR. DILLON asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. LABOUCHERE moved, as an Amendment, in page 4, line 15, to leave out from the word "which" to the word "safety," in line 16, both inclusive, and insert—

"Convened for an unlawful purpose, or with an intent to carry out a lawful object riotously and tumultuously."

Anyone who took the trouble to read the newspapers that morning would see a good deal about what legal and illegal meetings were, because in all the papers there was a report of an appeal from a conviction of the magistrates of Weston-super-Mare, in regard to a public meeting of the Salvation Army. The magistrates prohibited a public meeting of the Salvation Army, and they committed certain chieftains of this Army for insisting upon marching through the town. The matter was carried to the Superior Court at Westminster, and, from the proceedings in that Court, he (Mr. Labouchere) gathered that the only public meetings which were illegal, according to the English law, were meetings convened for unlawful purposes, or with intent to carry out a lawful object riotously and tumultuously; and that was the reason why he had embodied these words in his Amendment. As the clause now stood, it was left to the Lord Lieutenant to decide whether a meeting was dangerous to the public peace or public safety. The consequence would be that there would be no sort of appeal from the decision of the Lord Lieutenant, because he would say—"I have reason to believe it;" whereas, if they laid down some sort of limitation, it would be open at once for anyone to contest before the Irish tribunals whether the Lord Lieutenant was exceeding his power or not. The Lord Lieutenant would have to say whether a meeting he prohibited was a lawful one or an unlawful one; and if he were to prohibit a meeting that was lawful in itself, the tribunals would step in and stop him. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department would very probably say—"The Lord Lieutenant is a man actuated by the very best motives—he never will make a mistake." Well, he (Mr. Labouchere) was quite ready to admit that Earl Spencer was a man actuated by the very best motives; but, supposing he was, he (Mr. Labouchere) should be sorry to give anyone, either in this country or Ireland, absolute power for the suppression of public meetings, simply because he believed he would not abuse it. What the right hon. and learned Gentleman never seemed to remember was that this Bill was not to be in force only during such time as Earl Spencer was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. It was not "Earl Spencer" who was mentioned in the Bill, but "The Lord Lieutenant," and the measure was to last for three years. [SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Keep the Government in.] The right hon. and learned Gentleman said—"Keep the Government in," and he (Mr. Labouchere) should endeavour to do that; but, notwithstanding all their efforts, it might be that the Government could not be kept in; and he would put it to the Committee, at least to hon. Gentlemen on that (the Ministerial) side of the House, suppose there was a change of Government, would they like to intrust the power of deciding what was or what was not a public meeting to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther)? It was obvious to everyone on that side of the House that the right hon. Gentleman, if these powers were intrusted to him, would, as he himself would say, use them; but, as they would say, abuse them. He had more than once pointed out that if the right hon. and learned Gentleman had power to prohibit public meetings, and put persons in prison in Great Britain under the Bill, he would have to put down the meetings of the Prime Minister in Mid Lothian, supposing the Prime Minister enunciated such views as those he enunciated during his political campaign. Such a course as that would only be carrying out the views of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and he (Mr. Labouchere) therefore said, ought they not to put some limitation to the right to suppress public meetings of any noble Lord who might be Lord Lieutenant, or any right hon. Gentleman—and he said “or any right hon. Gentleman,” because he presumed the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire might be again the Adviser of a Conservative Lord Lieutenant, and the right hon. Gentleman’s stronger will would practically prevail. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department objected to definitions. He would say—“Good gracious, if you have a definition here you will want one everywhere—you will want a definition of murder.” But there were definitions in the Bill—there was a long clause full of definitions—and, as a matter of fact, the right hon. and learned Gentleman wanted to be allowed to define where he wished, to limit the power of the Bill, and not to be allowed to define where he wanted to extend it. He (Mr. Labouchere) would now move his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 15, to leave out from the word “which,” to the word “safety,” in line 16, both inclusive, in order to insert the words “convened for an unlawful purpose, or with an intent to carry out a lawful object riotously and tumultuously.”—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question proposed, “That the words ‘which he has reason to believe’ stand part of the Clause.”

Mr. TREVELYAN said, the words the Lord Lieutenant might, from time to time, by order in writing, to be published in the prescribed manner, prohibit any meeting “which he has reason to believe to be dangerous to the public peace or the public safety,” exactly expressed the object with which the power of stopping these meetings had hitherto been exercised, and the motive with which it would be exercised in the future. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), by his Amendment, begged them not to put themselves under the great disadvantage of having no opportunity of ascertaining what the feeling of the people of Ireland was. The hon. Gentleman’s argument was not tenable, because if the Government wished to get at what public feeling in Ireland was, they were not likely to prohibit meetings at which that public feeling would be expressed in a legal, orderly, and quiet manner. They would not prohibit them, however unfavourable that public feeling might be to them and to their existence as a Government. The way the Government interpreted the words of the clause was this—that it would apply to meetings which were calculated to lead to a breach of the public peace—meetings which were calculated—he did not for a moment say intended—it might be indirectly, but which were calculated to result ultimately in outrage and violence against individuals, or against a class, or which might intimidate individuals, or which might hinder people in the exercise of their just rights. It was meetings of this class that the Lord Lieutenant had prohibited in considerable numbers—no doubt, in the numbers named by the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon). On that point—and this was, in fact, the only argument he would endeavour to press before the House—he rested on the authority of hon. Gentlemen opposite below the Gangway. They admitted that this power had been very frequently used—they admitted that it was an existing and recognized power. He did not for a moment wish to represent those hon. Members as approving of the exercise of that power. The hon. Member for Northampton said in terms, or implied, that he trusted the present Viceroy. [Mr. LABOUCHERE: I said I would trust him comparatively.] That was hardly what His Excellency had a right to expect from the hon. Member. However, the hon. Member trusted the present Viceroy to a certain extent; but said that within the next three years another Government might come in. Well, he (Mr. Trevelyan) had no reason to think that another Lord Lieutenant would exercise these powers in a manner different to that in which Earl Spencer would exercise them. But suppose he did. Suppose they had an arbitrary Lord Lieutenant and an oppressive Chief Secretary for Ireland, if these powers were intrusted to them and they abused them, hon. Members could avail themselves of their right of protesting. Here they had a power which had been frequently put in force. It was a power which had been protested against by some hon. Members individually; but Parliament, as a whole, approved of it, and it had been put in force for 12 months past, and Parliament, as a body, had never objected to it. The question was—and he did not go farther in argument than that—whether this power had been exercised in a manner which would lead to the least possible public inconvenience, and the least public danger. At present the Lord Lieutenant, as the head of the Executive, and responsible for the public peace, prohibited a meeting where he thought it necessary, and supported that prohibition by collecting on the spot a large military force to overawe all opposition. But it was obvious that that, under certain circumstances, would be a most critical process. The hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) challenged him to give an instance where the popular leaders had not supported the law. The hon. Member had given a very interesting account of the manner in which, as he had said, under very disadvantageous circumstances, owing to not having had sufficient notice given, he and those acting with him—the priests and the leaders of the people—had turned people away from their settled purpose, in order that there might not be a collision with the authorities. But then there might be leaders—people who called themselves popular leaders, but who led only a very small part of the populace—who might take a very different action to the hon. Member and his friends, and, with them, the only method of enforcing the order of the Executive might be by dispersing the meeting by force, and, perhaps, killing and wounding those who resisted. The 7th clause gave that power. It did not create a power, but gave a statutory power, which, under the clause, in certain cases, would replace the power that existed, and which, under present conditions, might lead to a collision that all would deplore.

[Eleventh Night.]

MR. HEALY said, that, according to the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, the more wrong they did, the more wrong they ought to be able to do. Because the Government had exercised, in an arbitrary manner, a certain power without the smallest show of authority, during the whole of last year, they were to have a legal right to do it. Supposing they were dealing with a people less peaceful and more fully armed than the people of Ireland, what would happen? Suppose the Government issued a proclamation telling a meeting of these people to disperse, and suppose the people did not choose to do so, they might come out with scythes and pikes. There might be scenes such as were witnessed at the famous Peterloo affair. Who would be responsible for such things? Would it not be the Government, who chose to act arbitrarily and without legal authority? But because the Irish people were peaceful and disarmed, and they had acted arbitrarily against them recently, the Government made that a precedent for asking for legal power to do that which they had been doing without authority. That was the sum and substance of the right hon. Gentleman's case—because the people had acted, he (Mr. Healy) would not say tamely, but had, with calmness and with patience, submitted to the unauthorized, harsh measures of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) and Earl Cowper, therefore powers were to be taken to do in a legal way what had been done illegally. The Lord Lieutenant evidently could suppress meetings at present if he chose; and, that being the case, it was surely mere verbiage to put such powers as this in the Bill. To say—

"The Lord Lieutenant may from time to time, by order in writing to be published in the prescribed manner, prohibit any meeting which he has reason to believe to be dangerous to the public peace or the public safety"

was simply the gilding of the pill. They might just as well say "the Lord Lieutenant may prohibit any meeting in Ireland," because when he wanted to prohibit a meeting, he would at once imagine it to be "dangerous to the public peace or the public safety." The Government might be frank, and strike out all the words after the word "meeting;" but they would not do that. They wished to have, at least, the appearance of acting in a legal and Constitutional manner. Englishmen dealing harshly and arbitrarily with Ireland, whether by Act of Parliament or otherwise, must always soothe themselves with the belief that they were doing everything for the people's good in a regular and proper manner. They could never think they were acting as brigands, because they had an armed force behind them. The fact was, the Government were showing a disposition to throw dust into the eyes of the people of this country; and such an attempt, although it might succeed here, would never deceive the Irish people. Meetings were to be prescribed, and they had sought to be informed of the view of the Lord Lieutenant as to the particular gatherings which were to be put down, but, so far, without success. Was an indoor meeting liable to be proclaimed as well as an outdoor meeting? As far as his own knowledge of Irish meetings went—and he had the fortune to attend a great many, both indoor and outdoor meetings—he was ignorant of disturbance. If a meeting was announced to be held in the Rotunda in Dublin to denounce the policy of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, or the Secretary of State for the Home Department, would it be proclaimed, notwithstanding that there would be no fear that such a meeting would be conducted in a tumultuous manner? Were indoor meetings to be placed in the same category as outdoor meetings, for some of the former would be very similar in character to the latter? There was very poor accommodation for indoor public meetings in all Irish towns. Save, perhaps, Dublin, Belfast, Cork, and a few other cities, there were very few town halls or public buildings in the country which would hold over 200 people. It appeared to him that the Government were going to proceed on an altogether fallacious assumption. They were going to prohibit meetings; and why? Not only because they would be dangerous to the “public safety,” but because they would be dangerous to the “public peace;” and the subsection spoke of “meeting,” and not of “public meeting.” It would, therefore, be open to the Lord Lieutenant to put a stop to private as well as public meetings; and whose information were they going to act on? Why, on the information of the Clifford Lloyds of Ireland. It would not, in reality, be the Lord Lieutenant who would be exercising the power to prohibit meetings, but the Clifford Lloyds. He did not believe that the present Lord Lieutenant would be a bit more careful in his action than any other Lord Lieutenant; he did not believe the stuff and nonsense about the way in which the Liberal Government would carry out the Bill. He would as soon trust the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson); he would as soon trust the Duke of Marlborough, or whoever he was, with the power of carrying out the Bill as the present Chief Secretary and Earl Spencer. He did not attach the smallest importance to the Administration which would carry the Bill out, because it would not, in any case, be the Lord Lieutenant or the Chief Secretary who would act. The voice, indeed, might be the voice of Jacob, but the hands would be those of Mr. Clifford Lloyd and such like people. The Government would have to act on the information of the local authorities; and he therefore wished to know whether every meeting to be held henceforth in Ireland, whether in the open or indoors, was to be at the mercy of the local authorities? On what principle would the Government act? Would they, at the request of the local authorities, suppress meetings convened for the purpose of advocating fair rents and complaining of high ones, or to complain of the adjudications of a certain Sub-Commissioner? Under what circumstances would the Government act? That might depend on the temper of the Mr. Clifford Lloyds at the moment, and, from first to last, the Lord Lieutenant would have nothing to do. The power would be in the hands of the local authorities—the village tyrants, acting against law and order, and against such power Irish Members protested.

MR. DILLON said, he was obliged to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland for admitting that he (Mr. Dillon) had done nothing against the course of law and order. By the admission of the right hon. Gentleman he had successfully kept the people within the law, and made them obey the laws; and yet a clause was now to be passed which could only have been justified if he and his friends had not exercised their influence. The Chief Secretary for Ireland said that collisions might take place. Therefore, the people were to be punished, by these very stringent powers, for acts which they had not done, and he and his friends were not to get any credit for the influence they had exercised. Was that fair and reasonable? While there was no ground for arguments, there was nothing to support this clause, except that the right hon. Gentleman thought something might happen. He admitted that collisions had not happened during the

[Eleventh Night.]

of Cork had used the words "in these cases." His (Sir William Harcourt's) reply was, that it established martial law.

MR. PARNELL asked if the Act just referred to established martial law in these cases?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it did not; but it did establish martial law in Ireland. He had said there had always been a feeling of repugnance among the Liberal Party at interference with the rights of the people; but he would also say that it never had been a tradition of the Liberal Party to tolerate disorder or attacks on life and property, whether in Ireland or elsewhere; and if it were true that the measures Her Majesty's Government were now proposing were necessary for the purpose of preventing such attacks, then he had a right to say that they were fulfilling and acting up to the traditions of the Liberal Party; and the Liberal Party—at least as much as the Conservative Party—were bound, under the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government, to preserve the lives and protect the property of the subjects of the Queen. The only question they ought to ask themselves was this—was the situation in Ireland at the present moment such as justified and rendered necessary a resort to measures of this character? If they found that it was so, then he must say that the present Administration would no more shrink from the performance of their duty than did the Administration of Earl Grey. Well, upon that point, he could only say that the opinion of the Irish Government was clear and distinct, that the powers asked for by this clause were absolutely necessary. He would read to the Committee what had been said by Earl Spencer on this subject. Earl Spencer said—

"The danger of meetings at which inflammatory speeches are made is very great, when the country is in the excited condition in which it has lately been."

He (Sir William Harcourt) would ask the attention of the Committee to these words:—

"Outrages follow these meetings with remarkable certainty. The Executive have, at great risk, stopped them; but they only rely on sufficient force to prevent bloodshed, and a statutory power to stop meetings believed to be dangerous to the public peace and public safety, and making it an offence for anyone to attend these meetings after such a notice will strengthen enormously the hands of the Government, and one of the greatest dangers to the public peace will be checked."

Such were the views of the Irish Government on this question. Her Majesty's Government were satisfied that those views were well founded; and it was for the reasons he (Sir William Harcourt) had thus stated that Her Majesty's Government had introduced, with whatever reluctance, the clause now under discussion; and it was on these grounds that they felt bound to support the application for the powers it was intended to confer.

MR. SEXTON said, by what extraordinary selection the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had been charged with the conduct of a Bill which abrogated the liberties of the Irish people he (Mr. Sexton) was unable to understand. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, in endeavouring to strengthen the position of the Government in their attempt to abolish the right of public meeting in Ireland, had referred to a precedent, and had been obliged to go back 50 years for the purpose. He had been compelled to refer to the acts of statesmen who did not claim to be called Liberal, but who were satisfied with the designation of Whig. One would have thought the Government would have been ashamed to refer in that House to the period of 1833, when the tithe movement might be said to have resulted in wholesale slaughter amongst the community, 60 murders having been committed in one county, and 33 in another, in the course of a year. A period such as that, when the country was convulsed with a violent outburst of public feeling, was not comparable to the present time, because the outrages then committed were to the outrages of to-day as ten to one. But coercion had failed in those days as it would again, tranquillity having only been restored by the illusory settlement of the Tithe Question. Although the right hon. and learned Gentleman had thought fit to put forward the Act of 1833 in justification of the policy of the Government, he had, however, not cited the opinion of Lord Morpeth, a man who knew the situation of Ireland, and who testified that the conflict with the forces raging at that period had utterly failed, and that it was only when a milder policy, he would not say of conciliation, was begun, that a period of repose ensued. Did the Act of 1833 tell in favour of the peace of Ireland? On the contrary; for years after the passage of that Act, when other measures of coercion had been piled upon it, as the pile grew higher and higher over the heads of the people, higher and higher grew the amount of crime. It was not until the people had the idea, delusive as it was, that their interests were being attended to; when coercion had proved, after four years' experience of it, that it was useless for the purpose it was intended for, that the Government of the day learned by degrees that there was no cure for the condition of Ireland but to yield to the just wants and wishes of the people. It was then, and then only, that tranquillity was restored. Never was there a more miserable failure than the Act of 1833, and for that reason alone it ought not to have been cited by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. It was true that the Act of 1833 suspended the right of public meeting in Ireland; but did it suspend the right of trial by jury? Even under that Act, that right was untouched, and it was reserved for the Radicals of the 19th century to deprive the people of Ireland both of their right of public meeting and their right to Constitutional trial. Again, it was said that Lord Spencer had expressed the opinion that if he had power to prohibit public meetings, it would greatly strengthen the hands of the Executive Government. But he (Mr. Sexton) contended that the hands of the Executive in Ireland, in that respect, needed no strengthening whatever; and in saying that he stood upon the experience of last year. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had gone into matters of history, but had not touched either of the two questions he had put to him, notwithstanding that he admitted they were somewhat pertinent to the matter in hand. Was it statesmanlike or consistent on the part of the right hon. and learned Gentleman to make that admission, and then sit down with a triumphant air after evading those questions altogether? The Lord Lieutenant had undoubtedly prohibited meetings at Sheriffs' sales, where it was not to be wondered at that the people were exasperated into a state of excitement. But when the Lord Lieutenant exercised the power of prohibiting meetings for the discussion of the agrarian question, was the Executive in any case obliged to resort to force for the preservation of the peace? On the contrary, he said that the moment the proclamation appeared, the public stood aside, and there was no disturbance of the peace. Did it become necessary for the authorities to prosecute any individuals, or did the people in any way persevere in having meetings which were forbidden? Again the answer was in the negative. Then he (Mr. Sexton) said that the past year's experience abundantly proved that the existing powers of the Lord Lieutenant were ample, and that, so far as the clause before the Committee was concerned, the Preamble of the Bill contained a false and unfounded statement. The Preamble of the Bill said that the operation of the ordinary law had become insufficient for the repression and prevention of crime, and that it was expedient to make further provision for that purpose. He (Mr. Sexton) traversed, denied, and declared that statement to be false. The powers already in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant were ample for the preservation of peace and order, and he challenged any hon. or right hon. Gentleman to get up and deny the truth of the statement. Now, if the hands of the Lord Lieutenant were strong enough to combat the difficulties of the situation, as they were abundantly proved to be, it followed that the clause was unnecessary. He once more asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman if the Lord Lieutenant had, in any case, used force in connection with public meetings in Ireland; if public inconvenience had in any case ensued upon these meetings; had the powers of the Lord Lieutenant been found sufficient for the purpose of dealing with them; and, why, if they were, the Government were about to strengthen them?

Sir William Harcourt

MR. O'DONNELL said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had expressed great reluctance in supporting a clause for the further limitation of public liberty in Ireland. Irish Members must do him the justice to say that his reluctance was admirably dissembled. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had stated that, under the existing law, there was no means of dealing with a prohibited meeting except by dispersing it by force. That being so, would the right hon. and learned Gentleman say that when this clause was obtained the Government would allow public meetings to proceed without dispersing them by force? Would they judge by results whether any action was to be taken with regard to them? He failed to perceive the reason for the previous statement earlier in the evening of the right hon. and learned Gentleman as to the progress of the Bill. If he were so anxious about the time of the Committee, it was difficult to understand why he should delay the Committee so considerably by the introduction of utterly superfluous matter in his lengthy endeavour to prove that the clause was strictly in the ways of the Liberal Party. He (Mr. O'Donnell) would suggest that the right hon. and learned Gentleman should, in future, take all arguments of that kind as said; for it was well understood that the ways of the Liberal Party were always compatible with the most rigorous coercion in Ireland; and, although he stated that the majority of the House would bear him out in his opinion, he (Mr. O'Donnell) ventured to say that there was very little sympathy with the principles of the Liberal Party among those Members who now supported it anywhere outside the four corners of Great Britain. The only result of the clause would be to create as many punishable offences as it might suit the policy or fears of an incompetent Viceroy to call into existence. It had been said as a satire upon foreign tyrants that nothing was easier than to govern by a state of siege. Her Majesty's Government had set about governing Ireland by that means, and the application of that régime, discoverable in the present clause, was the most objectionable that could be imagined, because it amounted to this—that the Viceroy, upon some information from persons of whom nothing was known, and whose right to be listened to could not be tested, might prohibit any public meeting in Ireland. That meeting might be most orderly, the speeches at it most mild, and many things might be said there within the bounds of reasonable criticism and appropriate denunciation; yet because the meeting was for the purpose of considering things distasteful to the Government, and the speeches calculated to exhibit the fallacy of the Government policy, the Lord Lieutenant could come down upon it with the whole force of the Bill, bringing before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction in connection with it any persons he chose, and subjecting them to the degradation and pain of six months' imprisonment with hard labour. The clause gave power to the Lord Lieutenant to create a number of undefined offences, and to trust to the Resident Magistrates to punish them with undefined penalties. He (Mr. O'Donnell) had been accused by an hon. Member, a Friend of the Liberal Party in all their attempts upon the liberties of the Irish people, with having misrepresented the Government in saying that their method of procedure with regard to the Bill was simply to declare their policy and refuse to accept any Amendments. He should be glad to find that he had in that respect misrepresented the policy of the Government, and would be ready to apologize to the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor), if he could see the slightest disposition on the part of the Government to accept the smallest reasonable Amendments to the clause.

[Eleventh Night.]

MR. H. SAMUELSON rose to Order. Was it permissible for any hon. Member to discuss the principle of the clause upon an Amendment?

THE CHAIRMAN said, as the Minister in charge of the Bill, in expressing the displeasure he felt at the manner the subject was being dealt with, had introduced a somewhat extended discussion upon the clause, it would hardly be becoming for him (the Chairman) to draw the line too strictly. It was entirely out of Order to discuss the merits of a clause upon a simple Amendment.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he could assure the Committee that he had no intention of following the eloquent second reading speech of the Secretary of State for the Home Department; because that would have the effect of leading the Committee too far from the subject before them. The hon. Member who had just intervened without reason (Mr. H. Samuelson) was, to a certain extent, justified by the action of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and it was doubtless owing to a truly Liberal tenderness for the conduct of his Chiefs that he had not risen to Order during the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. H. SAMUELSON again rose—
[Cries of "Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN indicated that the hon. Member for Dungarvan was not out of Order.

MR. O'DONNELL, resuming, said, the hon. Member for Frome, having intervened without reason, had now intervened without Order. But to continue. If this clause were passed, unamended as he presumed it would be, in conformity with the programme laid down by the Government, it would be impossible for public opinion in Ireland to find legitimate expression, and in that case it would not only seek, but find illegitimate expression. The conduct of the Government in refusing any Amendment to the clause was simply in keeping with their action upon other clauses of the Bill.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not think that a very fair charge, inasmuch as he had just signified his willingness to accept the first Amendment on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Patrick Martin).

MR. O'DONNELL said, the rapid acceptance of the proposal of the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Patrick Martin) showed how much the clause stood in need of amendment, and the intervention of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was therefore simply rhetorical. He (Mr. O'Donnell) had said if the public were prevented in the expression of their grievances, not only were the people of a country injured, but the Government was also injured, because it shut itself out from the knowledge of what was necessary to the good government of the country. Consequently, the refusal to grant the liberty of public meeting in Ireland was as much a blow against good government as against public liberty; and it confirmed the impression that good government and public liberty were, at the present time, equally apart from the designs of the Liberal Party.

MR. OALLAN said, he thought that the Secretary of State for the Home Department, when referring to the Act of 1833, might have given the Committee some information as to the state of Ireland at the time that Act was introduced. According to a very instructive book by Mr. Leader called Coercive Measures in Ireland, which gave some very interesting information as to the proceedings of the Liberal Party, it appeared that in the year preceding the passing of the Act, there were, amongst other crimes, 172 homicides, 1,465 robberies, 468 burglaries, and 425 illegal meetings—of which there had not been one last year—753 attacks on houses, 2,083 illegal notices, 280 arsons, and 3,156 serious assaults. Altogether the crimes connected with the disturbed state of the country at that time amounted to upwards of 9,000, and crime was then increasing. This Act when passed would apply to all Ireland. The happy and prosperous Province of Ulster would be just as much under the purview of this Act as would be the most disturbed parts of the county of Galway. The Act of 1833 did not extend to all Ireland, for the Lord Lieutenant was empowered to issue his proclamation, saying that a district was disturbed, and directing the application of the Act to that district. The Secretary of State for the Home Department, in showing his erudition in coercion, might have referred to the experiences of the Head of the Government, then a Member of a Cabinet, but not a Liberal Cabinet, for the Prime Minister, like many others, had seen the error of his ways. In 1833 the Clontarf meeting was put down by proclamation, and O'Connell was convicted by Judge and jury for having been one of the promoters of that meeting. In referring to the Act of 1833 the Secretary of State for the Home Department kept the Committee in ignorance of the real state of the country at that time. The right hon. and learned Gentleman also concealed from the Committee the fact that the Act of 1833 contained a safeguard that the present Act did not contain—namely, that it should only operate in districts which had been proclaimed by the Lord Lieutenant.

Question put, and negatived; words inserted accordingly.

MR. DILLON said, the next Amendment was one standing in the name of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), and in the temporary absence of his hon. Friend he (Mr. Dillon) would move it. It was, in page 4, line 15, to leave out from "which" to "safety," in line 16, inclusive, and insert "the holding of which he has reason to believe would lead to a breach of the peace." There were some important considerations connected with the Amendment, and he hoped that in moving it he would not interfere with the right of any other hon. Member to make an Amendment on the same subject. Perhaps the Chairman would kindly put the question as one to leave out the word "which," and thus enable other Amendments to be put. This Amendment raised some important considerations, and he hoped the Government would see their way to accepting it. He listened with considerable attention while the Secretary of State for the Home Department was reading the extract from the 1st clause of the Act of 1833, and one thing had struck him as being very extraordinary. This clause provided that the Lord Lieutenant might prohibit

[Eleventh Night.]

"Any meeting which he has reason to believe to be dangerous to the public peace or the public safety."

Now, public peace and public safety were two very different things. If a meeting was believed to be dangerous to the public peace, it was believed that the dangers were such that they might amount to a breach of the peace. Allow him to point out that a meeting might be dangerous to the public safety, because it was held in furtherance of a movement which, in the opinion of the Government, was not a proper movement. There was no meeting held in England in furtherance of any reform which, in the opinion of a large section of the House of Commons, and very often of the Government of the day, was not dangerous to the public safety, because it was held in furtherance of a movement which the House and the Government might strongly disapprove of. If the words proposed to be left out were left in, no public meeting could be held in Ireland in furtherance of a public movement which the Lord Lieutenant considered the Government ought not to approve of. If the Secretary of State for the Home Department was so very anxious to go on the precedent of the Bill of 1833—and he (Mr. Dillon) submitted with confidence to the Committee that the right hon. and learned Gentleman ought not to go beyond the Bill of 1833—he certainly ought to remove the word "or," and make the clause read

"dangerous to the public peace and the public safety," which were the words of the Act of 1833.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) would excuse him if he said that the words of the Act of 1833 were "which shall be deemed to be dangerous to public peace or safety." Then the Act of 1833 went further than the present Government had thought it necessary to go, for to the two conditions he had enumerated were added the words "or inconsistent with the due administration of the law."

MR. DILLON said, he had not the Act of 1833 with him; but he would remind the Committee that the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in support of the contention that the clause was necessary, also read portions of a letter from Earl Spencer, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and the wording of the letter was that it would be necessary to strengthen the hands of the Government by enabling him to prohibit meetings which he considered dangerous to the public peace and public safety. These were certainly the words of the Lord Lieutenant as read by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He (Mr. Dillon) wished to point out that the word "and" made a most important difference. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) would put it in the power of the Lord Lieutenant to prohibit any meeting, the holding of which he considered would lead to a breach of the peace. The question was, were they to place power in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant to prohibit meetings which, in his opinion, were dangerous to the public safety, or was the power to be confined to meetings which, in the opinion of His Excellency, would be likely to lead to a breach of the peace? One of the strongest arguments in favour of the Amendment was the dreadful penalty which was imposed for the offence. The punishment was an excessive and severe one, and as the clause stood, it, no doubt, would be inflicted on persons who simply attended the meeting, and did nothing illegal. He (Mr. Dillon) had had a good deal of experience in attending meetings in Ireland, and he knew of numberless instances in which prohibitions had been made on so short notice that it was absolutely necessary, in order to prevent bloodshed, that some of the popular leaders should attend and call upon the people to disperse. He challenged the Government to instance a single case in which popular leaders had attended meetings to advise the people to disperse, and in which they had not been successful. He asserted, without the possibility of contradiction, that at some meetings the magistrates had acted in a most unreasonable and provoking way, and it was only through the exercise of the influence of the popular leaders that bloodshed and frightful disorder had not occurred. The dispersion of a meeting was excessively dangerous. A meeting was, perhaps, announced a week in advance, the country was canvassed, numerous masses of people were called upon to attend, and perhaps on the Saturday night a proclamation was published in The Dublin Gazette—a paper almost unknown in Ireland—prohibiting the proposed meeting as illegal. How were the people of the country districts to be informed of the proclamation, unless it be through their own leaders? He could mention many cases in which people had started to meetings in thousands; but they had been met on the road by priests and leaders of the Land League, and requested to turn back, in consequence of the prohibition of the meeting. The Government could not point to a single instance in which the leaders of the Land League had refused to exercise their influence, and to exercise it with effect in preventing collisions between the police and the people. He supposed he did not overstate it when he said that close upon 100 meetings had been proclaimed during the last year, and that in not a single case had a life been lost and a collision taken place between the authorities and the people. Was it to be supposed that every one of the thousands of people who attended a meeting, innocent of the fact that it had been proclaimed, were to be subject to six months' imprisonment with hard labour? How could the Government expect popular leaders to attend on the spot, and exercise their influence in preventing a collision between the police and the people, if by that attendance they would place themselves in danger of six months' imprisonment with hard labour? He knew of an instance of a meeting in the streets of Dublin, which was dispersed at half-an-hour's notice. He used his influence with the people to cause them to disperse, and they did so; there was no collision with the authorities, although the provocation given by the police was positively frightful. If this clause had been law at that time, he would have been subject to six months' imprisonment for being on the spot. If he had not been there, the people would have been left without any advice, and without any information as to whether the meeting was illegal or legal, except such as they could obtain from the police proclamation. One of the chief objections to this clause was that it would place hundreds and thousands of people in the position of having committed an offence against this Act, when it was utterly impossible to know that their attendance at a meeting would be any offence at all. Another great objection to the clause was that it would enormously increase the danger of collisions between the police, and the military, and the people, because he took it that whenever a meeting was prohibited the military would be sent. If this clause was passed, it would be made a penal offence, punishable by a severe penalty, for any popular leader to attend the place of a proclaimed meeting, and use his influence to cause the people to turn back. He feared that this could only be regarded as a deliberate attempt on the part of the Government to cause collisions between the police and the people. This was a question fraught with very great danger, and, therefore, he earnestly advised the Committee to consider carefully what would be the effect of the clause before they proceeded any further with its consideration.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 15, leave out from "which" to "safety," in line 16, inclusive, and insert "the holding of which he has reason to believe would lead to a breach of the peace."—(Mr. Dillon.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'which he has reason to believe,' stand part of the Clause."

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR wished to ask the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) if he had not an Amendment to propose on this subject?

THE CHAIRMAN: If it is decided that these words stand part of the clause, the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) cannot move his Amendment.

[Eleventh Night.]

Mr. HEALY said, he had not intended to move the Amendment, because he understood the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had a better Amendment to propose.

Mr. DILLON asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. LABOUCHERE moved, as an Amendment, in page 4, line 15, to leave out from the word "which" to the word "safety," in line 16, both inclusive, and insert—

"Convened for an unlawful purpose, or with an intent to carry out a lawful object riotously and tumultuously."

Anyone who took the trouble to read the newspapers that morning would see a good deal about what legal and illegal meetings were, because in all the papers there was a report of an appeal from a conviction of the magistrates of Weston-super-Mare, in regard to a public meeting of the Salvation Army. The magistrates prohibited a public meeting of the Salvation Army, and they committed certain chieftains of this Army for insisting upon marching through the town. The matter was carried to the Superior Court at Westminster, and, from the proceedings in that Court, he (Mr. Labouchere) gathered that the only public meetings which were illegal, according to the English law, were meetings convened for unlawful purposes, or with intent to carry out a lawful object riotously and tumultuously; and that was the reason why he had embodied these words in his Amendment. As the clause now stood, it was left to the Lord Lieutenant to decide whether a meeting was dangerous to the public peace or public safety. The consequence would be that there would be no sort of appeal from the decision of the Lord Lieutenant, because he would say—"I have reason to believe it;" whereas, if they laid down some sort of limitation, it would be open at once for anyone to contest before the Irish tribunals whether the Lord Lieutenant was exceeding his power or not. The Lord Lieutenant would have to say whether a meeting he prohibited was a lawful one or an unlawful one; and if he were to prohibit a meeting that was lawful in itself, the tribunals would step in and stop him. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department would very probably say—"The Lord Lieutenant is a man actuated by the very best motives—he never will make a mistake." Well, he (Mr. Labouchere) was quite ready to admit that Earl Spencer was a man actuated by the very best motives; but, supposing he was, he (Mr. Labouchere) should be sorry to give anyone, either in this country or Ireland, absolute power for the suppression of public meetings, simply because he believed he would not abuse it. What the right hon. and learned Gentleman never seemed to remember was that this Bill was not to be in force only during such time as Earl Spencer was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. It was not "Earl Spencer" who was mentioned in the Bill, but "The Lord Lieutenant," and the measure was to last for three years. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: Keep the Government in.] The right hon. and learned Gentleman said—"Keep the Government in," and he (Mr. Labouchere) should endeavour to do that; but, notwithstanding all their efforts, it might be that the Government could not be kept in; and he would put it to the Committee, at least to hon. Gentlemen on that (the Ministerial) side of the House, suppose there was a change of Government, would they like to intrust the power of deciding what was or what was not a public meeting to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther)? It was obvious to everyone on that side of the House that the right hon. Gentleman, if these powers were intrusted to him, would, as he himself would say, use them; but, as they would say, abuse them. He had more than once pointed out that if the right hon. and learned Gentleman had power to prohibit public meetings, and put persons in prison in Great Britain under the Bill, he would have to put down the meetings of the Prime Minister in Mid Lothian, supposing the Prime Minister enunciated such views as those he enunciated during his political campaign. Such a course as that would only be carrying out the views of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and he (Mr. Labouchere) therefore said, ought they not to put some limitation to the right to suppress public meetings of any noble Lord who might be Lord Lieutenant, or any right hon. Gentleman—and he said “or any right hon. Gentleman,” because he presumed the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire might be again the Adviser of a Conservative Lord Lieutenant, and the right hon. Gentleman’s stronger will would practically prevail. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department objected to definitions. He would say—“Good gracious, if you have a definition here you will want one everywhere—you will want a definition of murder.” But there were definitions in the Bill—there was a long clause full of definitions—and, as a matter of fact, the right hon. and learned Gentleman wanted to be allowed to define where he wished, to limit the power of the Bill, and not to be allowed to define where he wanted to extend it. He (Mr. Labouchere) would now move his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 15, to leave out from the word “which,” to the word “safety,” in line 16, both inclusive, in order to insert the words “convened for an unlawful purpose, or with an intent to carry out a lawful object riotously and tumultuously.”—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question proposed, “That the words ‘which he has reason to believe’ stand part of the Clause.”

MR. TREVELYAN said, the words the Lord Lieutenant might, from time to time, by order in writing, to be published in the prescribed manner, prohibit any meeting “which he has reason to believe to be dangerous to the public peace or the public safety,” exactly expressed the object with which the power of stopping these meetings had hitherto been exercised, and the motive with which it would be exercised in the future. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), by his Amendment, begged them not to put themselves under the great disadvantage of having no opportunity of ascertaining what the feeling of the people of Ireland was. The hon. Gentleman’s argument was not tenable, because if the Government wished to get at what public feeling in Ireland was, they were not likely to prohibit meetings at which that public feeling would be expressed in a legal, orderly, and quiet manner. They would not prohibit them, however unfavourable that public feeling might be to them and to their existence as a Government. The way the Government interpreted the words of the clause was this—that it would apply to meetings which were calculated to lead to a breach of the public peace—meetings which were calculated—he did not for a moment say intended—it might be indirectly, but which were calculated to result ultimately in outrage and violence against individuals, or against a class, or which might intimidate individuals, or which might hinder people in the exercise of their just rights. It was meetings of this class that the Lord Lieutenant had prohibited in considerable numbers—no doubt, in the numbers named by the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon). On that point—and this was, in fact, the only argument he would endeavour to press before the House—he rested on the authority of hon. Gentlemen opposite below the Gangway. They admitted that this power had been very frequently used—they admitted that it was an existing and recognized power. He did not for a moment wish to represent those hon. Members as approving of the exercise of that power. The hon. Member for Northampton said in terms, or implied, that he trusted the present Viceroy. [MR. LABOUCHERE: I said I would trust him comparatively.] That was hardly what His Excellency had a right to expect from the hon. Member. However, the hon. Member trusted the present Viceroy to a certain extent; but said that within the next three years another Government might come in. Well, he (Mr. Trevelyan) had no reason to think that another Lord Lieutenant would exercise these powers in a manner different to that in which Earl Spencer would exercise them. But suppose he did. Suppose they had an arbitrary Lord Lieutenant and an oppressive Chief Secretary for Ireland, if these powers were intrusted to them and they abused them, hon. Members could avail themselves of their right of protesting. Here they had a power which had been frequently put in force. It was a power which had been protested against by some hon. Members individually; but Parliament, as a whole, approved of it, and it had been put in force for 12 months past, and Parliament, as a body, had recent administration of his Predecessor, and he did not attempt to meet the arguments advanced against the clause. He (Mr. Dillon) did not see how the argument was to be met, that this clause would render people who went to meetings liable to punishment; and against that the only argument was an apprehension, which was not shown to be well founded, as to something that might happen in the future. The Act would work against a number of people who might be doing a perfectly innocent thing, and were in no way acting against the law.

[Eleventh Night.]

Mr. P. MARTIN said, he agreed in the statement that under the existing law the Lord Lieutenant had power by proclamation to prohibit the holding of a meeting, and that it was in the interest of peace and good order that his order should be obeyed. Proclamations of that character had been issued by the late and many previous Viceroy. But this clause enlarged and extended that power which the Lord Lieutenant now had, made his arbitrary will the sole test of the legality of the exercise of that power, and would render it an offence in anyone to attend once the order was made. At present, it was true, the Lord Lieutenant, after proclamation made, might send down and disperse a meeting; but, though it was the duty of every subject of the Queen to leave quietly on request of the lawful authority, yet the proclamation did not, under the existing law, prevent him from thereafter contesting the legality of the order. That he was correct in the view which he submitted as to the present limit on the power of the Lord Lieutenant, and the effect of its exercise, was shown in the most conclusive manner by the manner in which framers of the Act of 1833 dealt with the subject of illegal meetings. Unquestionably, in that Act, as in the present Bill, a new offence was created; but it was created, not by virtue of the issue of the proclamation, as was proposed in this Bill, but by the notification of the fact of the proclamation. That was shown by the 2nd section of the Statute, which said—

“And in case any of the persons so met or assembled together shall not disperse or depart within the space of one quarter of an hour from the time of such notice or demand being given shall be deemed guilty of misdemeanour, and it shall be lawful for them to be indicted for the same.”

Mr. Dillon

Then there were special provisions, showing that there must be a special notification to those persons by a Justice of the Peace. That section conclusively showed that the framers of the Act meant the misdemeanour to be constituted by the fact of notification. But in this Bill the offence was made punishable on proof simply that the order had been made, and the fact of attending at the meeting. The instant the proclamation was made from Dublin Castle, although it might not be notified to any person, say, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, persons attending a meeting held at half-past 4 in some distant part of the country would be held guilty and liable to six months' imprisonment with hard labour. When he found that the framers of the Act of 1833—the most stringent Act ever placed on the Statute Book with respect to Ireland—did not give such power, he thought it necessary to introduce a safeguard in the way suggested in the Amendment which stood in his name. He thought the Government could not refuse to amend this clause of the Bill. In reference to the allusion which had been made by the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the name of Lord Althorp, let him remind the Committee that though the Act of 1833 was introduced when Lord Althorp was Prime Minister, yet, as he believed, it was in consequence of the passing of that Act and his disgust with its unnecessary stringency that Lord Althorp had found himself compelled to retire from the Cabinet.

Mr. BIGGAR said, that owing to the absence of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt), who had special charge of the Bill, the Committee were not in a position to listen to arguments upon the question, and he thought the best thing now to do was to report Progress. It was exceedingly inconvenient to have a discussion on an Amendment when the Minister in special charge of the Bill was not present to be influenced by the arguments advanced, and to reply to them on the one hand, or to give way to their arguments and amend the Bill on the other. He therefore moved to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,”—(Mr. Biggar,) —put, and agreed to.

an attempt, although it might succeed here, would never deceive the Irish people. Meetings were to be prescribed, and they had sought to be informed of the view of the Lord Lieutenant as to the particular gatherings which were to be put down, but, so far, without success. Was an indoor meeting liable to be proclaimed as well as an outdoor meeting? As far as his own knowledge of Irish meetings went—and he had the fortune to attend a great many, both indoor and outdoor meetings—he was ignorant of disturbance. If a meeting was announced to be held in the Rotunda in Dublin to denounce the policy of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, or the Secretary of State for the Home Department, would it be proclaimed, notwithstanding that there would be no fear that such a meeting would be conducted in a tumultuous manner? Were indoor meetings to be placed in the same category as outdoor meetings, for some of the former would be very similar in character to the latter? There was very poor accommodation for indoor public meetings in all Irish towns. Save, perhaps, Dublin, Belfast, Cork, and a few other cities, there were very few town halls or public buildings in the country which would hold over 200 people. It appeared to him that the Government were going to proceed on an altogether fallacious assumption. They were going to prohibit meetings; and why? Not only because they would be dangerous to the “public safety,” but because they would be dangerous to the “public peace;” and the subsection spoke of “meeting,” and not of “public meeting.” It would, therefore, be open to the Lord Lieutenant to put a stop to private as well as public meetings; and whose information were they going to act on? Why, on the information of the Clifford Lloyds of Ireland. It would not, in reality, be the Lord Lieutenant who would be exercising the power to prohibit meetings, but the Clifford Lloyds. He did not believe that the present Lord Lieutenant would be a bit more careful in his action than any other Lord Lieutenant; he did not believe the stuff and nonsense about the way in which the Liberal Government would carry out the Bill. He would as soon trust the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson); he would as soon trust the Duke of Marlborough, or whoever he was, with the power of carrying out the Bill as the present Chief Secretary and Earl Spencer. He did not attach the smallest importance to the Administration which would carry the Bill out, because it would not, in any case, be the Lord Lieutenant or the Chief Secretary who would act. The voice, indeed, might be the voice of Jacob, but the hands would be those of Mr. Clifford Lloyd and such like people. The Government would have to act on the information of the local authorities; and he therefore wished to know whether every meeting to be held henceforth in Ireland, whether in the open or indoors, was to be at the mercy of the local authorities? On what principle would the Government act? Would they, at the request of the local authorities, suppress meetings convened for the purpose of advocating fair rents and complaining of high ones, or to complain of the adjudications of a certain Sub-Commissioner? Under what circumstances would the Government act? That might depend on the temper of the Mr. Clifford Lloyds at the moment, and, from first to last, the Lord Lieutenant would have nothing to do. The power would be in the hands of the local authorities—the village tyrants, acting against law and order, and against such power Irish Members protested.

Mr. DILLON said, he was obliged to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland for admitting that he (Mr. Dillon) had done nothing against the course of law and order. By the admission of the right hon. Gentleman he had successfully kept the people within the law, and made them obey the laws; and yet a clause was now to be passed which could only have been justified if he and his friends had not exercised their influence. The Chief Secretary for Ireland said that collisions might take place. Therefore, the people were to be punished, by these very stringent powers, for acts which they had not done, and he and his friends were not to get any credit for the influence they had exercised. Was that fair and reasonable? While there was no ground for arguments, there was nothing to support this clause, except that the right hon. Gentleman thought something might happen. He admitted that collisions had not happened during the recent administration of his Predecessor, and he did not attempt to meet the arguments advanced against the clause. He (Mr. Dillon) did not see how the argument was to be met, that this clause would render people who went to meetings liable to punishment; and against that the only argument was an apprehension, which was not shown to be well founded, as to something that might happen in the future. The Act would work against a number of people who might be doing a perfectly innocent thing, and were in no way acting against the law.

[Eleventh Night.]

Mr. P. MARTIN said, he agreed in the statement that under the existing law the Lord Lieutenant had power by proclamation to prohibit the holding of a meeting, and that it was in the interest of peace and good order that his order should be obeyed. Proclamations of that character had been issued by the late and many previous Viceroy. But this clause enlarged and extended that power which the Lord Lieutenant now had, made his arbitrary will the sole test of the legality of the exercise of that power, and would render it an offence in anyone to attend once the order was made. At present, it was true, the Lord Lieutenant, after proclamation made, might send down and disperse a meeting; but, though it was the duty of every subject of the Queen to leave quietly on request of the lawful authority, yet the proclamation did not, under the existing law, prevent him from thereafter contesting the legality of the order. That he was correct in the view which he submitted as to the present limit on the power of the Lord Lieutenant, and the effect of its exercise, was shown in the most conclusive manner by the manner in which framers of the Act of 1833 dealt with the subject of illegal meetings. Unquestionably, in that Act, as in the present Bill, a new offence was created; but it was created, not by virtue of the issue of the proclamation, as was proposed in this Bill, but by the notification of the fact of the proclamation. That was shown by the 2nd section of the Statute, which said—

“And in case any of the persons so met or assembled together shall not disperse or depart within the space of one quarter of an hour from the time of such notice or demand being given shall be deemed guilty of misdemeanour, and it shall be lawful for them to be indicted for the same.”

Mr. Dillon

Then there were special provisions, showing that there must be a special notification to those persons by a Justice of the Peace. That section conclusively showed that the framers of the Act meant the misdemeanour to be constituted by the fact of notification. But in this Bill the offence was made punishable on proof simply that the order had been made, and the fact of attending at the meeting. The instant the proclamation was made from Dublin Castle, although it might not be notified to any person, say, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, persons attending a meeting held at half-past 4 in some distant part of the country would be held guilty and liable to six months' imprisonment with hard labour. When he found that the framers of the Act of 1833—the most stringent Act ever placed on the Statute Book with respect to Ireland—did not give such power, he thought it necessary to introduce a safeguard in the way suggested in the Amendment which stood in his name. He thought the Government could not refuse to amend this clause of the Bill. In reference to the allusion which had been made by the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the name of Lord Althorp, let him remind the Committee that though the Act of 1833 was introduced when Lord Althorp was Prime Minister, yet, as he believed, it was in consequence of the passing of that Act and his disgust with its unnecessary stringency that Lord Althorp had found himself compelled to retire from the Cabinet.

Mr. BIGGAR said, that owing to the absence of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt), who had special charge of the Bill, the Committee were not in a position to listen to arguments upon the question, and he thought the best thing now to do was to report Progress. It was exceedingly inconvenient to have a discussion on an Amendment when the Minister in special charge of the Bill was not present to be influenced by the arguments advanced, and to reply to them on the one hand, or to give way to their arguments and amend the Bill on the other. He therefore moved to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,”—(Mr. Biggar,) —put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

BATHS AND WASHHOUSES ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. STANHOPE, Bill to amend the Baths and Washhouses Acts, ordered to be brought in by Mr. STANHOPE, Mr. CHAPLIN, and Mr. GORST.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 201.]

EJECTMENTS SUSPENSION (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Colonel NOLAN, Bill for the suspension of Ejectments in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Colonel NOLAN, Mr. O'SHEA, Mr. JUSTIN M'CARTHY, Mr. LALOR, Mr. MARTIN, Mr. DICKSON, Mr. FINDLATER, Mr. LEA, Mr. MOORE, Mr. BIGGAR, Mr. RICHARD POWER, and Mr. WHITWORTH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 202.]

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 15th June, 1882.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading— Customs and Inland Revenue Buildings (Ireland)* (142); Public Schools (Scotland) Teachers* (143); Local Government (Gas) Provisional Order* (144); Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 7)* (145); Local Government Provisional Order (No. 8)* (146); Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 9)* (147); Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders* (148); Tramways Provisional Orders (No. 3)* (149); Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 4)* (150).

Second Reading—Entail (Scotland) (115).

Committee—Report—Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Act (1874) Amendment (120).*

Report—Municipal Corporations (Unreformed) (140).*

Third Reading—Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment (104); Boiler Explosions* (129); Local Government Provisional Orders* (106); Local Government Provisional Orders (Poor Law)* (107), and passed.*

EGYPT—THE POLITICAL CRISIS—THE RIOTS AT ALEXANDRIA.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I beg to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can give to the House any information with respect to Egypt, and especially information with respect to the course which Her Majesty's Government propose to take with reference to recent events in Alexandria and the state of things there?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, in answer to the noble Marquess, I have to state that a telegram was received yesterday from Alexandria which reported that all was quiet. The town was patrolled day and night, and the troops were apparently doing their duty. The Khedive and Dervish Pasha had assured the Consuls of their confidence in the maintenance of public order. There was a considerable panic among the Europeans, and numbers have taken refuge on board the iron-clads and on an Egyptian steamer. Arrangements have been made to have the refugees removed in merchant vessels. One has been taken up by the Admiral, another at Port Said is to be sent at once to Alexandria, and two more are being engaged. Sir Beauchamp Seymour has been asked to telegraph whether these are sufficient. Sir Edward Malet arrived at Alexandria yesterday. He telegraphed at 10.30 P.M. yesterday that at present the military are behaving well, and keeping order in the streets—apparently in earnest. As to the measures which the Government have taken, and propose to take, in connection with the European Powers and with Turkey, with regard to Egypt, I can well understand that your Lordships must feel great curiosity in the matter, but it is out of my power to give the House any further information at this moment.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I have heard the statement of the noble Earl with very great regret. I can understand, with respect to the general policy being pursued in Egypt, that the time has probably not come for announcing the intentions of Her Majesty's Government, or for discussing the expediency of the course which they propose to take. I can understand that, with respect to the relations that this country maintains with France, there must for the present be considerable reserve, though I hope it is fully understood by Her Majesty's Government, as well as by others, that we are free to obtain the objects of English policy alone, if we cannot attain them in concert with other Powers. But other more pressing matters have been going on, which Parliament can hardly pass over without notice, and with respect to which I think the reticence of Her Majesty's Government is misplaced. Great works of British industry are being destroyed; vast quantities of British capital are not only being imperilled, but investments that have developed during long years of confidence are being utterly destroyed, so that they cannot be restored again; and while the lives of British subjects, of British officials, of officers of the British Fleet are being sacrificed in a seaport town within sight of the Fleet, surely, my Lords, it is not too much that Parliament should ask to know what measures the Government propose to take for the protection of these imperilled interests and lives in this moment of acute crisis, and that your Lordships should ask for some explanation as to the position of the Fleet, and the functions which it is supposed to perform. For what was the Fleet sent to Alexandria? For what is it kept there? Many views could be advanced with respect to the object that the Fleet has to fulfil. It might be supposed that its object was to support the Government of the existing Viceroy; but that object it clearly has not fulfilled. It might be thought that it was to demonstrate the power of Great Britain; but it has demonstrated exactly the reverse. It might be supposed that its object was to enforce the demands which the Government have put forward in most peremptory language, and of which, according to their declarations, they are prepared to exact the fulfilment if necessary. Among those demands one for the removal of Arabi Pasha stands prominent; but he has not been removed; and, if we are not misinformed, he has been taken into counsel by the Representatives of the Sultan with the knowledge of the Representative of England, with a view to the maintenance of that order, which neither the Suzerain nor the Foreign Powers can maintain. The Fleet, therefore, has done nothing whatever to fulfil the pledge given by Her Majesty's Government that they would exact the fulfilment of their demands. It might be supposed that at least the Fleet would perform the humbler, but most useful and necessary, function of protecting British lives and property. But all that it has been able to do is to furnish a safe place from which British officers, powerless to prevent what has occurred, have been able to witness the painful and revolting spectacle of British subjects slaughtered at the water's edge. My Lords, if these things are true, it becomes necessary to ask why the Fleet is there, and why it stays there? This is called a Naval Demonstration; but what does it demonstrate? Does it demonstrate anything else than the impotence of Great Britain and the feebleness of her Ministers? If it had not been for the Fleet, much of what has happened would not have occurred; though the Fleet has done nothing else, it has been very potent to inflame the passions of the Egyptian people. It is not too much to say that upon those who sent that Fleet there, without the resolution to follow up the act with the force necessary to give effect to their policy—that upon them lies the responsibility of the bloodshed which was caused by the passions which the presence of the Fleet has provoked? My Lords, with no wish to interfere with the course of the policy upon more lasting matters which will be pursued by Her Majesty's Government, and only desiring to know what provision they are taking to meet the actual crisis, and to protect lives and industry that are actually threatened, we have a right to call upon the Government for a more full declaration of their actions and intentions. It would, undoubtedly, be a very humiliating thing to withdraw the Fleet; but to leave it there to look on helplessly and passively, while British menaces are being disregarded and British policy frustrated—while the work which British industry has laboriously built up during long years and at great expense are being destroyed, and while British subjects are being slaughtered, is a lower, a still deeper depth of humiliation.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, at critical moments during the late Administration I sometimes, but not in exaggerated numbers, put Questions to Her Majesty's Government; but in no instance did I insist upon having information when it was declared undesirable that it should be given. The noble Marquess, in making this violent attack upon Her Majesty's Government, has not given any indication of the measures which he would wish to see taken, otherwise than by suggesting that it would be desirable that we should separate ourselves from France, forbear to ally ourselves with other Powers, and withdraw our Fleet from Alexandria. [Cries of "No!"] The noble Marquess certainly said that unless we were going to take active measures in Alexandria, it would be better that the Fleet should leave that place.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I said that it would be better that the Fleet should come away than that it should be the helpless and passive spectator of the destruction of British lives and property.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I deny that the Fleet is either helpless or passive. The noble Marquess, the other day, when he made a great condemnation of the policy of the Government, came before your Lordships with a telegram in his hand, and advised us to take immediate action by proceeding in a particular way in connection with the subject of certain earthworks at Alexandria. We, however, thought it more judicious to ascertain the views of those who were on the spot; and we found that the opinion of the Egyptian functionaries, of the English functionaries, and of our Admiral, was that we had better not take the sudden step recommended by the noble Marquess. The Admiral has a discretionary power to act; and I beg to say that I believe he will act in the way which may be most judicious. But we shall not be driven by any taunts into doing anything which we may think injudicious with regard to the lives of the Europeans in Egypt. With regard to the question generally so intimately connected with the whole subject, the noble Marquess admits—and I might be forgiven were I to express some surprise at his doing so—that he does not require further explanation now.

ENTAIL (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(The Earl of Rosebery.)

(No. 115.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Rosebery.)

EARL CAIRNS said, he did not intend to oppose the Bill at this stage. On the contrary, from his present information, he was disposed to give it his support. He wished, however, to urge upon his noble Friend the desirability of allowing a reasonably long period to elapse before the stage of Committee, so as to enable the House to consider the Bill carefully. Amongst other things, there was a power in the measure very similar to the Settled Land Bill, which had passed through their Lordships' House, and was now in "another place." Under the present Bill, unless he were mistaken, the money produced from a sale in Scotland must be invested in the estate and be subject to the restrictions of the entail; but under the Settled Land Bill the money might be used for various other purposes—for example, the improvement of other land. He was by no means certain that the securities with regard to the money produced by the sale of land were as wide as they should be in the present Bill.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH said, he was not going to oppose the second reading of the Bill; but he thought some more information with regard to it was wanted. His noble Friend ought to have given some general details as to the object of the Bill. There had been so many alterations of late in the Law of Entail in Scotland that it was very difficult to know what the law was. In the 7th and 10th clauses there were some important points, these provisions being of an extremely stringent character. There might be very good reasons for the next heir refusing his consent to the disentailing of the land; but if he did, as he understood the Bill, the heir in possession had only to apply to the Court. The Court was not called upon to make an investigation to satisfy itself that the application was right and good; but it should immediately proceed to direct a sale as if the consent had been obtained, whether the heir liked it or not. Cases might arise with regard to minors, in which such powers as these might lead to great hardships. He referred to these points to show that the noble Earl in charge of the Bill ought to direct his attention to them. The Bill had been brought on for second reading so rapidly that he had not had time to communicate with Scotland and obtain the views of the Legal Profession in regard to it, or to ascertain the general feeling of the country. Moreover, the half-yearly county meetings were all over, and there would be no opportunity, at any rate for some time, to obtain an expression of opinion from them. He thought the noble Earl should allow them ample time, though, of course, he would not ask for a very considerable delay, before taking the Bill in Committee. It would be necessary to consider several Amendments, which it would take some time to prepare.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN said, it seemed to him the object of the Bill was practically to do away with entails in Scotland altogether. As he understood the provision, any heir of entail in possession would be able to disentail his estate without the consent or against the wishes of the next heir of entail. There would be no power to prevent the disentail by the fact that the next heir of entail was under 21 years of age, or of any legal disability. He was not at all opposed to the principle of the Bill; but he hoped the noble Earl (the Earl of Rosebery) would, when the Bill came into Committee, explain what would be the practical effect of its operation. He quite agreed, although there had been many Entail Bills for Scotland, that it was highly desirable that some such Bill as this should be passed, because at this moment it was almost impossible to understand exactly what the law really was, there were so many different cases. There were the cases of those old entails before the passing of the Rutherford Act; there were the new entails subsequent to the Act, and the entails which had been altered by the Act of 1875. In consequence of the different Acts, which only applied to some entails and not to all, there was a state of confusion, and he thought it was highly desirable to put a stop to that state of things. He hoped the noble Earl would agree to postpone the Committee for some little time, so that if the Bill passed it would be a satisfactory one, and that they should not require any further measures dealing with the same subject.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: My Lords, as it does not appear that any other noble Lords wish to address the House, I will, with your permission, say a very few words in reply to, or in acknowledgment of, what has been said; because, as a matter of fact, my first duty is to thank the House very sincerely for the spirit in which it has approached the consideration of this Bill. As regards what has been said about the haste with which this Bill has come to the second reading, I will only say that, having heard no word of objection privately or publicly against the Bill, I fixed the second reading for to-day; but if any noble Lord had wished me to postpone it, and given me the slightest intimation to that effect, I should have thought it my duty to accede to the request. I need hardly say that any day which is convenient to the noble and learned Earl (Earl Cairns) and the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Buccleuch) will be fixed for Committee on the Bill. As regards what the noble and learned Earl said, I admit that, in my opinion, there is very great force in it. I do not myself think that the uses to which the entail money are to be applied under the Bill are sufficiently wide; but, in introducing a Bill of this nature to your Lordships' House, it is necessary for the Government to consider not merely what is desirable in the abstract, but the attitude which might be maintained by noble Lords towards it; and, therefore, I think we introduced a Bill in this respect, as in others, of an extremely moderate character. As to what fell from the noble Duke, I have to thank him very warmly for not offering his opposition—which would necessarily be a most powerful opposition—to the Bill. It is quite true that the next heir under this Bill will not have the option or power of opposing a sale, but it is true that his interest will be preserved from the result of the sale; and I would remark that, if the opposition of the next heir were to be valid against such a sale, it would be practically of no use bringing in a Bill at all; because under the Act of 1875, passed under the late Government, the power given was to dispense practically with all consent except that of the next heir; and, therefore, if we did not dispense with the consent, and make one step in advance, it would have been useless bringing in a Bill at all. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lothian), whose support of the Bill I must also acknowledge, seemed to be a little vague as to the main object of the Bill. The object of the Bill may be stated in one word; it is, that no man in future, no landed proprietor, need remain under entail unless he chooses; but all the interests which have been hitherto respected are respected now. If the heirs of these estates get their due proportion, I do not think there is much to complain of. The noble Duke, I think, complained that I had not offered any explanation of this important measure. The fact is, I did offer an explanation when I introduced the Bill—only the audience was exceedingly limited. At the suggestion of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), I have added a Memorandum to the Bill, which will give a far more lucid explanation than I could give. I do not know that there is anything else which has fallen from the noble Lord that renders it necessary for me to say more. I can only repeat my thanks to noble Lords for the spirit in which they have received this measure, and ask them to give it a second reading. I shall consult their convenience in naming a day for the Committee stage.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday the 29th instant.

House adjourned at a quarter past
Five o'clock, till To-morrow,
a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 15th June, 1882.

MINUTES.]—PRIVATE BILLS (by Order)—Third Reading—North London Suburban Tramway*; Swindon, Marlborough, and Andover Railway*, and passed.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Surrey Trial of Causes* [204]; Real and Personal Estate (Accumulation of Income)* [205]; Cruelty to Animals* [206]; Ancient Monuments* [207].

Second Reading—Metropolitan Board of Works (Money) [176].

Committee—Prevention of Crime (Ireland) [167]

—R.P. [Twelfth Night]; Vagrancy (re-comm.)* [199]—R.P.

Report—Local Government Provisional Order (No. 11)* [186].

NOTICES OF QUESTIONS.

EGYPT—THE POLITICAL CRISIS.

MR. M'COAN: I beg to give Notice that to-morrow I shall ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in sending the troops now said to have been telegraphed for by the Khedive and Dervish Pasha, the Sultan will do so as Sovereign of Egypt or as mandatory of the European Powers; and, in either case, whether any and what guarantee has been taken by the Powers that the intervention thus made by the Porte shall be strictly limited to, and cease with, the suppression of the present revolutionary movement?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, I think it only courteous to the hon. Member to say that I shall not be able to answer the Question. It is, no doubt, an extremely interesting Question, but I shall be quite unable to answer it.

MR. BOURKE: I beg to give Notice that to-morrow I shall ask the Prime Minister, Whether His Majesty the Sultan has shown any indisposition to take those measures which the Governments of England and France have suggested to him for the restoration of order in Egypt, and to make good the authority of the Khedive; whether he will state the reasons which induced Her Majesty's Government to press the Sultan to consent to a Conference; and whether Her Majesty's Government will join in any demand the Powers may make upon the Sultan to act as their mandatory instead of as Sovereign of Egypt?

MR. ONSLOW: I beg to give Notice that to-morrow I shall ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that the officers and men of Her Majesty's ship Superb who were killed in the recent outbreak were buried at sea, and why they were not buried at Alexandria; whether Her Majesty's Government have warned British subjects at Cairo, whose safety now depends upon Arabi Pasha, that they had better leave Egypt; and what arrangements have been made to receive the large number of European refugees now at Alexandria on board the ships of the fleet?

QUESTIONS.

TURKEY AND GREECE—MURDER OF MR. OGLE.

MR. H. SAMUELSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Greek Government have yet instituted the long promised inquiry into the murder of Mr. Ogle; and, if not, whether Her Majesty's Government will use their best endeavours to secure the earliest possible investigation of the case, and the presence thereof of a representative of this country?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Her Majesty's Minister at Athens telegraphed on the 10th instant that the preliminary inquiry into the circumstances of Mr. Ogle's death had been actively carried out, and that the Greek Government were now prepared to proceed to an investigation at Volos, at which a British Representative would attend. Mr. Merlin, British Consul at the Piræus, will accordingly be present at the inquiry, which will be proceeded with as soon as possible.

DEBTORS' (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1880—KENNETH MACKENZIE, A BANKRUPT.

DR. CAMERON asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been called to the deposition of the bankrupt, Kenneth Mackenzie, examined at Dingwall, in which he deposed that he was indebted to an amount exceeding two hundred pounds, but had no books or accounts, and that such books as he at one time kept he had burnt within four months of the presentation of a petition against him for cessio, and that he had written to one creditor offering to pay him ten shillings in the pound "if he would pretend to accept two shillings, and not tell the other creditors;" whether, under "The Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880," it is a crime punishable by imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a bankrupt, within four months next before the presentation of a petition for cessio, to have destroyed or mutilated any book, document, paper, or writing, relating to his property or affairs, or, if his debts exceed two hundred pounds, not to have kept such books or accounts as, according to the usual practice of his business, are necessary to explain his transactions, unless he proves to the satisfaction of the court that he had no intent to defraud; and, why no proceedings were taken by the Crown Office under that statute in Mackenzie's case?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): Sir, I have made inquiry into this matter. The deposition of Kenneth Mackenzie was made more than a year ago, on 3rd June, 1881. It contains the admissions set out in the Question. Mackenzie stated that he kept certain books in pencil; but they do not appear to have been proper mercantile books. He was the son of a crofter, residing in his father's house, and had no shop of his own, although he seems to have obtained a quantity of boots and shoes on credit. He appears to have been an ignorant man, imperfectly acquainted with the English language. The provision of the Debtors Act is correctly recited in the Question. The case was reported to my Predecessor, and fully investigated by his instructions. The Procurator Fiscal reported that, in his opinion, and that of the Sheriff who presided at the examination, the case was a very trifling one, and the Crown Counsel decided at the time that there were not materials for a successful prosecution.

ARREARS OF RENT (IRELAND) BILL—THE IRISH CHURCH FUND.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he will state what were the arrears in respect of the permanent income of £293,455 per annum of the Irish Church Fund on the 1st April 1881, and the arrears on the 1st April 1882; and, whether it is proposed by the Government to make any allowance, on the principle of the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill, to the persons from whom this income, consisting of the tithe rent-charge, perpetuity rents, and interest on mortgage, is derived?

MR. COURTNEY: The arrears on the permanent income of the Irish Church Fund were, on the 1st of January, 1881, £156,000, and those on the 1st of January, 1882, are estimated at £148,000. These are accumulated arrears. I cannot admit the analogy implied in the latter part of the Question, and as yet no suggestion has been made for remission of the character indicated.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—MILITIA SURGEONS PENSIONS.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that, on the compulsory retirement under 68A. Circular, January 1882, of militia surgeons holding commissions from lord lieutenants of counties, at the age of sixty-five, the pension of six shillings a day, to which, under certain circumstances, such surgeons were entitled to have been refused them; and, if he will explain under what enactment the right to this pension is alleged to have been destroyed?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to my hon. and learned Friend, I have to state that until 1829 Militia surgeons were members of the permanent Staff, and, like other officers of that Staff, entitled to pensions on reduction of the force, or on retirement through age or infirmity. But no Militia surgeon appointed since 1829—that is to say, during the last 53 years—has been entitled to a retiring allowance. Her Majesty has always had the power to decide at what age Militia officers should cease to serve, and in 1872 this age was fixed at 60, although retirement was not enforced in every case. In 1881 it was decided that at 65 all Militia surgeons must retire, this being a boon to them compared with other Militia officers.

SMALL TENEMENTS AND HIGHWAY RATES—LEGISLATION.

MR. HICKS asked the President of the Local Government Board, When he proposes, in pursuance of his promise of March 10th, to bring in a short Bill to again place owners of small tenements in the same position as regards highway rates as they now are as regards poor rates, and in which they were as to highway rates before the repeal of the 13 and 14 Vic. c. 99, by the Act 38 and 39 Vic. c. 66?

MR. DODSON: On Monday, Sir.

CRIMINAL LAW — RELEASE OF CRAWSHAY CRAWSHAY, A CONVICT.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If there was any special reason for discharging from custody a prisoner named Crawshay Crawshay, who was convicted of fraudulently embezzling public money belonging to the Heston and Isleworth Local Board, at the Central Criminal Court, on 2nd April 1881, when he had only served half his sentence; and, whether he was aware that at the above trial there were seven other similar indictments against the prisoner that were not proceeded with, and that the Recorder, in passing sentence, said,

“Had the Board proceeded with the other Bills, and not recommended you to mercy, it would have been my duty to have sentenced

you to penal servitude. You will go to prison for two years with hard labour?”

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, there were very special reasons for discharging this prisoner. Early in the present year the Recorder reported to him that, under the circumstances of the case, the prisoner should not have been convicted; that he had not had fair play, and that the testimony on which he was convicted was incorrect and misleading; and that, in his (the Recorder's) opinion, all further punishment ought to be remitted. In these circumstances, he had ordered the discharge of the prisoner.

TRADE AND COMMERCE—TREATY OF COMMERCE WITH SPAIN.

MR. HENRY LEE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any progress has been made in securing for this Country, by means of the “most favoured nation clause,” the advantages obtained by France and Germany in the Treaty recently made by them with the Government of Spain; whether he is aware that the difference between the terms given to France, and those accorded to nations not having a Treaty of Commerce, is from 35 to 70 per cent.; whether he can state the quantity of Spanish wine imported into Bordeaux during the past year; and, if he is aware that the Spanish wines are reduced in strength, adulterated, and coloured with a certain drug, in order to render them available for the English market?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government are not at present in a position to make public the nature of the exchange of ideas which is now taking place between the two Powers with the view to place their commercial relations on a better footing. I am aware that in the case of some goods the difference of rate of duty referred to does exist. The French official figures for 1881 of the import of Spanish wine into Bordeaux separately are not yet published; but the total importation of such wine was about 5,500,000 hectolitres, or five-sevenths of the imports from all countries. We are aware that both Spanish and Italian wines are largely mixed with French wines and with water, and exported to this and other countries; and, accord-recent administration of his Predecessor, and he did not attempt to meet the arguments advanced against the clause. He (Mr. Dillon) did not see how the argument was to be met, that this clause would render people who went to meetings liable to punishment; and against that the only argument was an apprehension, which was not shown to be well founded, as to something that might happen in the future. The Act would work against a number of people who might be doing a perfectly innocent thing, and were in no way acting against the law.

Mr. P. MARTIN said, he agreed in the statement that under the existing law the Lord Lieutenant had power by proclamation to prohibit the holding of a meeting, and that it was in the interest of peace and good order that his order should be obeyed. Proclamations of that character had been issued by the late and many previous Viceroy. But this clause enlarged and extended that power which the Lord Lieutenant now had, made his arbitrary will the sole test of the legality of the exercise of that power, and would render it an offence in anyone to attend once the order was made. At present, it was true, the Lord Lieutenant, after proclamation made, might send down and disperse a meeting; but, though it was the duty of every subject of the Queen to leave quietly on request of the lawful authority, yet the proclamation did not, under the existing law, prevent him from thereafter contesting the legality of the order. That he was correct in the view which he submitted as to the present limit on the power of the Lord Lieutenant, and the effect of its exercise, was shown in the most conclusive manner by the manner in which framers of the Act of 1833 dealt with the subject of illegal meetings. Unquestionably, in that Act, as in the present Bill, a new offence was created; but it was created, not by virtue of the issue of the proclamation, as was proposed in this Bill, but by the notification of the fact of the proclamation. That was shown by the 2nd section of the Statute, which said—

“And in case any of the persons so met or assembled together shall not disperse or depart within the space of one quarter of an hour from the time of such notice or demand being given shall be deemed guilty of misdemeanour, and it shall be lawful for them to be indicted for the same.”

Mr. Dillon

Then there were special provisions, showing that there must be a special notification to those persons by a Justice of the Peace. That section conclusively showed that the framers of the Act meant the misdemeanour to be constituted by the fact of notification. But in this Bill the offence was made punishable on proof simply that the order had been made, and the fact of attending at the meeting. The instant the proclamation was made from Dublin Castle, although it might not be notified to any person, say, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, persons attending a meeting held at half-past 4 in some distant part of the country would be held guilty and liable to six months' imprisonment with hard labour. When he found that the framers of the Act of 1833—the most stringent Act ever placed on the Statute Book with respect to Ireland—did not give such power, he thought it necessary to introduce a safeguard in the way suggested in the Amendment which stood in his name. He thought the Government could not refuse to amend this clause of the Bill. In reference to the allusion which had been made by the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the name of Lord Althorp, let him remind the Committee that though the Act of 1833 was introduced when Lord Althorp was Prime Minister, yet, as he believed, it was in consequence of the passing of that Act and his disgust with its unnecessary stringency that Lord Althorp had found himself compelled to retire from the Cabinet.

Mr. BIGGAR said, that owing to the absence of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt), who had special charge of the Bill, the Committee were not in a position to listen to arguments upon the question, and he thought the best thing now to do was to report Progress. It was exceedingly inconvenient to have a discussion on an Amendment when the Minister in special charge of the Bill was not present to be influenced by the arguments advanced, and to reply to them on the one hand, or to give way to their arguments and amend the Bill on the other. He therefore moved to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,”—(Mr. Biggar,) —put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

BATHS AND WASHHOUSES ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. STANHOPE, Bill to amend the Baths and Washhouses Acts, ordered to be brought in by Mr. STANHOPE, Mr. CHAPLIN, and Mr. GORST.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 201.]

EJECTMENTS SUSPENSION (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Colonel NOLAN, Bill for the suspension of Ejectments in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Colonel NOLAN, Mr. O'SHEA, Mr. JUSTIN M'CARTHY, Mr. LALOR, Mr. MARTIN, Mr. DICKSON, Mr. FINDLATER, Mr. LEA, Mr. MOORE, Mr. BIGGAR, Mr. RICHARD POWER, and Mr. WHITWORTH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 202.]

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 15th June, 1882.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading— Customs and Inland Revenue Buildings (Ireland)* (142); Public Schools (Scotland) Teachers* (143); Local Government (Gas) Provisional Order* (144); Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 7)* (145); Local Government Provisional Order (No. 8)* (146); Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 9)* (147); Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders* (148); Tramways Provisional Orders (No. 3)* (149); Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 4)* (150).

Second Reading—Entail (Scotland) (115).

Committee—Report—Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Act (1874) Amendment (120).*

Report—Municipal Corporations (Unreformed) (140).*

Third Reading—Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment (104); Boiler Explosions* (129); Local Government Provisional Orders* (106); Local Government Provisional Orders (Poor Law)* (107), and passed.*

EGYPT—THE POLITICAL CRISIS—THE RIOTS AT ALEXANDRIA.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I beg to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can give to the House any information with respect to Egypt, and especially information with respect to the course which Her Majesty's Government propose to take with reference to recent events in Alexandria and the state of things there?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, in answer to the noble Marquess, I have to state that a telegram was received yesterday from Alexandria which reported that all was quiet. The town was patrolled day and night, and the troops were apparently doing their duty. The Khedive and Dervish Pasha had assured the Consuls of their confidence in the maintenance of public order. There was a considerable panic among the Europeans, and numbers have taken refuge on board the iron-clads and on an Egyptian steamer. Arrangements have been made to have the refugees removed in merchant vessels. One has been taken up by the Admiral, another at Port Said is to be sent at once to Alexandria, and two more are being engaged. Sir Beauchamp Seymour has been asked to telegraph whether these are sufficient. Sir Edward Malet arrived at Alexandria yesterday. He telegraphed at 10.30 P.M. yesterday that at present the military are behaving well, and keeping order in the streets—apparently in earnest. As to the measures which the Government have taken, and propose to take, in connection with the European Powers and with Turkey, with regard to Egypt, I can well understand that your Lordships must feel great curiosity in the matter, but it is out of my power to give the House any further information at this moment.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I have heard the statement of the noble Earl with very great regret. I can understand, with respect to the general policy being pursued in Egypt, that the time has probably not come for announcing the intentions of Her Majesty's Government, or for discussing the expediency of the course which they propose to take. I can understand that, with respect to the relations that this country maintains with France, there must for the present be considerable reserve, though I hope it is fully understood by Her Majesty's Government, as well as by others, that we are free to obtain the objects of English policy alone, if we cannot attain them in concert with other Powers. But other more pressing matters have been going on, which Parliament can hardly pass over without notice, and with respect to which I think the reticence of Her Majesty's Government is misplaced. Great works of British industry are being destroyed; vast quantities of British capital are not only being imperilled, but investments that have developed during long years of confidence are being utterly destroyed, so that they cannot be restored again; and while the lives of British subjects, of British officials, of officers of the British Fleet are being sacrificed in a seaport town within sight of the Fleet, surely, my Lords, it is not too much that Parliament should ask to know what measures the Government propose to take for the protection of these imperilled interests and lives in this moment of acute crisis, and that your Lordships should ask for some explanation as to the position of the Fleet, and the functions which it is supposed to perform. For what was the Fleet sent to Alexandria? For what is it kept there? Many views could be advanced with respect to the object that the Fleet has to fulfil. It might be supposed that its object was to support the Government of the existing Viceroy; but that object it clearly has not fulfilled. It might be thought that it was to demonstrate the power of Great Britain; but it has demonstrated exactly the reverse. It might be supposed that its object was to enforce the demands which the Government have put forward in most peremptory language, and of which, according to their declarations, they are prepared to exact the fulfilment if necessary. Among those demands one for the removal of Arabi Pasha stands prominent; but he has not been removed; and, if we are not misinformed, he has been taken into counsel by the Representatives of the Sultan with the knowledge of the Representative of England, with a view to the maintenance of that order, which neither the Suzerain nor the Foreign Powers can maintain. The Fleet, therefore, has done nothing whatever to fulfil the pledge given by Her Majesty's Government that they would exact the fulfilment of their demands. It might be supposed that at least the Fleet would perform the humbler, but most useful and necessary, function of protecting British lives and property. But all that it has been able to do is to furnish a safe place from which British officers, powerless to prevent what has occurred, have been able to witness the painful and revolting spectacle of British subjects slaughtered at the water's edge. My Lords, if these things are true, it becomes necessary to ask why the Fleet is there, and why it stays there? This is called a Naval Demonstration; but what does it demonstrate? Does it demonstrate anything else than the impotence of Great Britain and the feebleness of her Ministers? If it had not been for the Fleet, much of what has happened would not have occurred; though the Fleet has done nothing else, it has been very potent to inflame the passions of the Egyptian people. It is not too much to say that upon those who sent that Fleet there, without the resolution to follow up the act with the force necessary to give effect to their policy—that upon them lies the responsibility of the bloodshed which was caused by the passions which the presence of the Fleet has provoked? My Lords, with no wish to interfere with the course of the policy upon more lasting matters which will be pursued by Her Majesty's Government, and only desiring to know what provision they are taking to meet the actual crisis, and to protect lives and industry that are actually threatened, we have a right to call upon the Government for a more full declaration of their actions and intentions. It would, undoubtedly, be a very humiliating thing to withdraw the Fleet; but to leave it there to look on helplessly and passively, while British menaces are being disregarded and British policy frustrated—while the work which British industry has laboriously built up during long years and at great expense are being destroyed, and while British subjects are being slaughtered, is a lower, a still deeper depth of humiliation.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, at critical moments during the late Administration I sometimes, but not in exaggerated numbers, put Questions to Her Majesty's Government; but in no instance did I insist upon having information when it was declared undesirable that it should be given. The noble Marquess, in making this violent attack upon Her Majesty's Government, has not given any indication of the measures which he would wish to see taken, otherwise than by suggesting that it would be desirable that we should separate ourselves from France, forbear to ally ourselves with other Powers, and withdraw our Fleet from Alexandria. [Cries of "No!"] The noble Marquess certainly said that unless we were going to take active measures in Alexandria, it would be better that the Fleet should leave that place.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I said that it would be better that the Fleet should come away than that it should be the helpless and passive spectator of the destruction of British lives and property.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I deny that the Fleet is either helpless or passive. The noble Marquess, the other day, when he made a great condemnation of the policy of the Government, came before your Lordships with a telegram in his hand, and advised us to take immediate action by proceeding in a particular way in connection with the subject of certain earthworks at Alexandria. We, however, thought it more judicious to ascertain the views of those who were on the spot; and we found that the opinion of the Egyptian functionaries, of the English functionaries, and of our Admiral, was that we had better not take the sudden step recommended by the noble Marquess. The Admiral has a discretionary power to act; and I beg to say that I believe he will act in the way which may be most judicious. But we shall not be driven by any taunts into doing anything which we may think injudicious with regard to the lives of the Europeans in Egypt. With regard to the question generally so intimately connected with the whole subject, the noble Marquess admits—and I might be forgiven were I to express some surprise at his doing so—that he does not require further explanation now.

ENTAIL (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(The Earl of Rosebery.)

(No. 115.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Rosebery.)

EARL CAIRNS said, he did not intend to oppose the Bill at this stage. On the contrary, from his present information, he was disposed to give it his support. He wished, however, to urge upon his noble Friend the desirability of allowing a reasonably long period to elapse before the stage of Committee, so as to enable the House to consider the Bill carefully. Amongst other things, there was a power in the measure very similar to the Settled Land Bill, which had passed through their Lordships' House, and was now in "another place." Under the present Bill, unless he were mistaken, the money produced from a sale in Scotland must be invested in the estate and be subject to the restrictions of the entail; but under the Settled Land Bill the money might be used for various other purposes—for example, the improvement of other land. He was by no means certain that the securities with regard to the money produced by the sale of land were as wide as they should be in the present Bill.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH said, he was not going to oppose the second reading of the Bill; but he thought some more information with regard to it was wanted. His noble Friend ought to have given some general details as to the object of the Bill. There had been so many alterations of late in the Law of Entail in Scotland that it was very difficult to know what the law was. In the 7th and 10th clauses there were some important points, these provisions being of an extremely stringent character. There might be very good reasons for the next heir refusing his consent to the disentailing of the land; but if he did, as he understood the Bill, the heir in possession had only to apply to the Court. The Court was not called upon to make an investigation to satisfy itself that the application was right and good; but it should immediately proceed to direct a sale as if the consent had been obtained, whether the heir liked it or not. Cases might arise with regard to minors, in which such powers as these might lead to great hardships. He referred to these points to show that the noble Earl in charge of the Bill ought to direct his attention to them. The Bill had been brought on for second reading so rapidly that he had not had time to communicate with Scotland and obtain the views of the Legal Profession in regard to it, or to ascertain the general feeling of the country. Moreover, the half-yearly county meetings were all over, and there would be no opportunity, at any rate for some time, to obtain an expression of opinion from them. He thought the noble Earl should allow them ample time, though, of course, he would not ask for a very considerable delay, before taking the Bill in Committee. It would be necessary to consider several Amendments, which it would take some time to prepare.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN said, it seemed to him the object of the Bill was practically to do away with entails in Scotland altogether. As he understood the provision, any heir of entail in possession would be able to disentail his estate without the consent or against the wishes of the next heir of entail. There would be no power to prevent the disentail by the fact that the next heir of entail was under 21 years of age, or of any legal disability. He was not at all opposed to the principle of the Bill; but he hoped the noble Earl (the Earl of Rosebery) would, when the Bill came into Committee, explain what would be the practical effect of its operation. He quite agreed, although there had been many Entail Bills for Scotland, that it was highly desirable that some such Bill as this should be passed, because at this moment it was almost impossible to understand exactly what the law really was, there were so many different cases. There were the cases of those old entails before the passing of the Rutherford Act; there were the new entails subsequent to the Act, and the entails which had been altered by the Act of 1875. In consequence of the different Acts, which only applied to some entails and not to all, there was a state of confusion, and he thought it was highly desirable to put a stop to that state of things. He hoped the noble Earl would agree to postpone the Committee for some little time, so that if the Bill passed it would be a satisfactory one, and that they should not require any further measures dealing with the same subject.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: My Lords, as it does not appear that any other noble Lords wish to address the House, I will, with your permission, say a very few words in reply to, or in acknowledgment of, what has been said; because, as a matter of fact, my first duty is to thank the House very sincerely for the spirit in which it has approached the consideration of this Bill. As regards what has been said about the haste with which this Bill has come to the second reading, I will only say that, having heard no word of objection privately or publicly against the Bill, I fixed the second reading for to-day; but if any noble Lord had wished me to postpone it, and given me the slightest intimation to that effect, I should have thought it my duty to accede to the request. I need hardly say that any day which is convenient to the noble and learned Earl (Earl Cairns) and the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Buccleuch) will be fixed for Committee on the Bill. As regards what the noble and learned Earl said, I admit that, in my opinion, there is very great force in it. I do not myself think that the uses to which the entail money are to be applied under the Bill are sufficiently wide; but, in introducing a Bill of this nature to your Lordships' House, it is necessary for the Government to consider not merely what is desirable in the abstract, but the attitude which might be maintained by noble Lords towards it; and, therefore, I think we introduced a Bill in this respect, as in others, of an extremely moderate character. As to what fell from the noble Duke, I have to thank him very warmly for not offering his opposition—which would necessarily be a most powerful opposition—to the Bill. It is quite true that the next heir under this Bill will not have the option or power of opposing a sale, but it is true that his interest will be preserved from the result of the sale; and I would remark that, if the opposition of the next heir were to be valid against such a sale, it would be practically of no use bringing in a Bill at all; because under the Act of 1875, passed under the late Government, the power given was to dispense practically with all consent except that of the next heir; and, therefore, if we did not dispense with the consent, and make one step in advance, it would have been useless bringing in a Bill at all. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lothian), whose support of the Bill I must also acknowledge, seemed to be a little vague as to the main object of the Bill. The object of the Bill may be stated in one word; it is, that no man in future, no landed proprietor, need remain under entail unless he chooses; but all the interests which have been hitherto respected are respected now. If the heirs of these estates get their due proportion, I do not think there is much to complain of. The noble Duke, I think, complained that I had not offered any explanation of this important measure. The fact is, I did offer an explanation when I introduced the Bill—only the audience was exceedingly limited. At the suggestion of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), I have added a Memorandum to the Bill, which will give a far more lucid explanation than I could give. I do not know that there is anything else which has fallen from the noble Lord that renders it necessary for me to say more. I can only repeat my thanks to noble Lords for the spirit in which they have received this measure, and ask them to give it a second reading. I shall consult their convenience in naming a day for the Committee stage.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday the 29th instant.

House adjourned at a quarter past
Five o'clock, till To-morrow,
a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 15th June, 1882.

MINUTES.]—PRIVATE BILLS (by Order)—Third Reading—North London Suburban Tramway*; Swindon, Marlborough, and Andover Railway*, and passed.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Surrey Trial of Causes* [204]; Real and Personal Estate (Accumulation of Income)* [205]; Cruelty to Animals* [206]; Ancient Monuments* [207].

Second Reading—Metropolitan Board of Works (Money) [176].

Committee—Prevention of Crime (Ireland) [157]

—R.P. [Twelfth Night]; Vagrancy (re-comm.)*

[199]—R.P.

Report—Local Government Provisional Order (No. 11)* [186].

NOTICES OF QUESTIONS.

EGYPT—THE POLITICAL CRISIS.

MR. M'COAN: I beg to give Notice that to-morrow I shall ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in sending the troops now said to have been telegraphed for by the Khedive and Dervish Pasha, the Sultan will do so as Sovereign of Egypt or as mandatory of the European Powers; and, in either case, whether any and what guarantee has been taken by the Powers that the intervention thus made by the Porte shall be strictly limited to, and cease with, the suppression of the present revolutionary movement?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, I think it only courteous to the hon. Member to say that I shall not be able to answer the Question. It is, no doubt, an extremely interesting Question, but I shall be quite unable to answer it.

MR. BOURKE: I beg to give Notice that to-morrow I shall ask the Prime Minister, Whether His Majesty the Sultan has shown any indisposition to take those measures which the Governments of England and France have suggested to him for the restoration of order in Egypt, and to make good the authority of the Khedive; whether he will state the reasons which induced Her Majesty's Government to press the Sultan to consent to a Conference; and whether Her Majesty's Government will join in any demand the Powers may make upon the Sultan to act as their mandatory instead of as Sovereign of Egypt?

MR. ONSLOW: I beg to give Notice that to-morrow I shall ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that the officers and men of Her Majesty's ship Superb who were killed in the recent outbreak were buried at sea, and why they were not buried at Alexandria; whether Her Majesty's Government have warned British subjects at Cairo, whose safety now depends upon Arabi Pasha, that they had better leave Egypt; and what arrangements have been made to receive the large number of European refugees now at Alexandria on board the ships of the fleet?

QUESTIONS.

TURKEY AND GREECE—MURDER OF MR. OGLE.

MR. H. SAMUELSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Greek Government have yet instituted the long promised inquiry into the murder of Mr. Ogle; and, if not, whether Her Majesty's Government will use their best endeavours to secure the earliest possible investigation of the case, and the presence thereof of a representative of this country?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Her Majesty's Minister at Athens telegraphed on the 10th instant that the preliminary inquiry into the circumstances of Mr. Ogle's death had been actively carried out, and that the Greek Government were now prepared to proceed to an investigation at Volo, at which a British Representative would attend. Mr. Merlin, British Consul at the Piræus, will accordingly be present at the inquiry, which will be proceeded with as soon as possible.

DEBTORS' (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1880—KENNETH MACKENZIE, A BANKRUPT.

DR. CAMERON asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been called to the deposition of the bankrupt, Kenneth Mackenzie, examined at Dingwall, in which he deposed that he was indebted to an amount exceeding two hundred pounds, but had no books or accounts, and that such books as he at one time kept he had burnt within four months of the presentation of a petition against him for cessio, and that he had written to one creditor offering to pay him ten shillings in the pound "if he would pretend to accept two shillings, and not tell the other creditors;" whether, under "The Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880," it is a crime punishable by imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a bankrupt, within four months next before the presentation of a petition for cessio, to have destroyed or mutilated any book, document, paper, or writing, relating to his property or affairs, or, if his debts exceed two hundred pounds, not to have kept such books or accounts as, according to the usual practice of his business, are necessary to explain his transactions, unless he proves to the satisfaction of the court that he had no intent to defraud; and, why no proceedings were taken by the Crown Office under that statute in Mackenzie's case?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): Sir, I have made inquiry into this matter. The deposition of Kenneth Mackenzie was made more than a year ago, on 3rd June, 1881. It contains the admissions set out in the Question. Mackenzie stated that he kept certain books in pencil; but they do not appear to have been proper mercantile books. He was the son of a crofter, residing in his father's house, and had no shop of his own, although he seems to have obtained a quantity of boots and shoes on credit. He appears to have been an ignorant man, imperfectly acquainted with the English language. The provision of the Debtors Act is correctly recited in the Question. The case was reported to my Predecessor, and fully investigated by his instructions. The Procurator Fiscal reported that, in his opinion, and that of the Sheriff who presided at the examination, the case was a very trifling one, and the Crown Counsel decided at the time that there were not materials for a successful prosecution.

ARREARS OF RENT (IRELAND) BILL—THE IRISH CHURCH FUND.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he will state what were the arrears in respect of the permanent income of £293,455 per annum of the Irish Church Fund on the 1st April 1881, and the arrears on the 1st April 1882; and, whether it is proposed by the Government to make any allowance, on the principle of the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill, to the persons from whom this income, consisting of the tithe rent-charge, perpetuity rents, and interest on mortgage, is derived?

MR. COURTNEY: The arrears on the permanent income of the Irish Church Fund were, on the 1st of January, 1881, £156,000, and those on the 1st of January, 1882, are estimated at £148,000. These are accumulated arrears. I cannot admit the analogy implied in the latter part of the Question, and as yet no suggestion has been made for remission of the character indicated.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—MILITIA SURGEONS PENSIONS.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that, on the compulsory retirement under 68A. Circular, January 1882, of militia surgeons holding commissions from lord lieutenants of counties, at the age of sixty-five, the pension of six shillings a day, to which, under certain circumstances, such surgeons were entitled to has been refused them; and, if he will explain under what enactment the right to this pension is alleged to have been destroyed?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to my hon. and learned Friend, I have to state that until 1829 Militia surgeons were members of the permanent Staff, and, like other officers of that Staff, entitled to pensions on reduction of the force, or on retirement through age or infirmity. But no Militia surgeon appointed since 1829—that is to say, during the last 53 years—has been entitled to a retiring allowance. Her Majesty has always had the power to decide at what age Militia officers should cease to serve, and in 1872 this age was fixed at 60, although retirement was not enforced in every case. In 1881 it was decided that at 65 all Militia surgeons must retire, this being a boon to them compared with other Militia officers.

SMALL TENEMENTS AND HIGHWAY RATES—LEGISLATION.

MR. HICKS asked the President of the Local Government Board, When he proposes, in pursuance of his promise of March 10th, to bring in a short Bill to again place owners of small tenements in the same position as regards highway rates as they now are as regards poor rates, and in which they were as to highway rates before the repeal of the 13 and 14 Vic. c. 99, by the Act 38 and 39 Vic. c. 66?

MR. DODSON: On Monday, Sir.

CRIMINAL LAW—RELEASE OF CRAWSHAY CRAWSHAY, A CONVICT.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If there was any special reason for discharging from custody a prisoner named Crawshay Crawshay, who was convicted of fraudulently embezzling public money belonging to the Heston and Isleworth Local Board, at the Central Criminal Court, on 2nd April 1881, when he had only served half his sentence; and, whether he was aware that at the above trial there were seven other similar indictments against the prisoner that were not proceeded with, and that the Recorder, in passing sentence, said,

“Had the Board proceeded with the other Bills, and not recommended you to mercy, it would have been my duty to have sentenced

you to penal servitude. You will go to prison for two years with hard labour?”

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, there were very special reasons for discharging this prisoner. Early in the present year the Recorder reported to him that, under the circumstances of the case, the prisoner should not have been convicted; that he had not had fair play, and that the testimony on which he was convicted was incorrect and misleading; and that, in his (the Recorder's) opinion, all further punishment ought to be remitted. In these circumstances, he had ordered the discharge of the prisoner.

TRADE AND COMMERCE—TREATY OF COMMERCE WITH SPAIN.

MR. HENRY LEE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any progress has been made in securing for this Country, by means of the “most favoured nation clause,” the advantages obtained by France and Germany in the Treaty recently made by them with the Government of Spain; whether he is aware that the difference between the terms given to France, and those accorded to nations not having a Treaty of Commerce, is from 35 to 70 per cent.; whether he can state the quantity of Spanish wine imported into Bordeaux during the past year; and, if he is aware that the Spanish wines are reduced in strength, adulterated, and coloured with a certain drug, in order to render them available for the English market?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government are not at present in a position to make public the nature of the exchange of ideas which is now taking place between the two Powers with the view to place their commercial relations on a better footing. I am aware that in the case of some goods the difference of rate of duty referred to does exist. The French official figures for 1881 of the import of Spanish wine into Bordeaux separately are not yet published; but the total importation of such wine was about 5,500,000 hectolitres, or five-sevenths of the imports from all countries. We are aware that both Spanish and Italian wines are largely mixed with French wines and with water, and exported to this and other countries; and, according to M. Leroy Beaulieu's statement, they are also drunk in Paris; but it does not appear to be usually necessary to colour the mixture in the case of Spanish wines, which are often of very dark colour.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE MURDERS OF MR. BOURKE AND CORPORAL
WALLACE.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true, as stated in the "Times" correspondence from Ireland on Monday, that by a singular omission of the authorities the three dragoons appointed to protect the late Mr. Bourke were unprovided with horses, except at the expense of the person protected, the result having been that Mr. Bourke, bringing but one guard with him, and having him upon the same vehicle as himself, lost the advantage which a separate and double guard would have afforded him; whether it is true that in consequence of the regulation that no trooper is to carry his carbine loaded, unless at full cock, the practice is not to load until the occasion arises; and, if so, whether any alteration of the regulations in both matters is contemplated?

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT asked the Secretary of State for War, with reference to the recent assassination of Mr. Bourke and his escort, Whether it was consistent with the orders given about escorts that only one man should be on that duty; whether Cavalry soldiers employed on escort duty should be mounted or dismounted; what order as to arms of escorts being loaded has been given; and, whether, if Corporal Wallace, of the Royal Dragoons, was married, any special allowance will be made to his widow or family; and, if so, whether such sum will be paid out of the Consolidated Fund or charged on the district in which the murder took place?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, it was no omission on the part of the authorities that the three men appointed to protect Mr. Bourke were unprovided with horses. Neither the Constabulary nor the soldiers employed on protection duty are mounted, as, in point of fact, they could not use their arms so well as when on foot or in cars. There is no intention whatever to make any change in this respect. Mr. Bourke's being escorted by only one man was a distinct violation of orders; and, although this appears to have been done at his own urgent request, it should not have been allowed by the officer in charge. Arrangements are being made by the Irish Government for the escorts being always on a separate vehicle from the person guarded. As to the arms being loaded, the instruction of the Commander of the Forces was that the rifles were not to be carried loaded except when immediate danger was apprehended. Sir Thomas Steele has now issued an order that the men's rifles are to be loaded. With reference to the last part of my hon. and gallant Friend's Question, I am sorry to say that I only this morning have heard that the widow of Corporal Wallace was not on the married establishment, he having married without leave. I will look further into the matter; but I fear that I cannot now say what ought to be done about her.

DIPLOMATIC SERVICE—FOREIGN LAN-GUAGES—THE EXAMINATION
PAPERS.

MR. JERNINGHAM asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been called to the unpractical, and even grotesque, nature of some of the Foreign papers set for translation to candidates for the Diplomatic Service; and, whether he sees his way to remedying the evil of the present system?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, no complaint has been made of the nature of the Papers set for translation in examination for the Diplomatic Service; but my hon. Friend, perhaps, alludes to those set in a recent examination of Foreign Office clerks for special acquirements in foreign languages, which appear not of a kind to test the practical knowledge required, and to which the attention of the Civil Service Commissioners has been called.

POST OFFICE—TELEPHONE LICENCES.

THE O'DONOGHUE asked the Postmaster General, If, taking into account that nearly a month has elapsed since he informed the House that he was considering the application of the London and Globe Telephone and Maintenance Company, Limited, for a licence, he can now state the decision at which he has arrived; and, if not, within what period he expects to be able to announce his decision?

Sir Charles W. Dilke

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, the question as to the granting of Telephone Exchange licences involves many important and difficult issues. The subject has been for some time engaging my careful attention; and, although I regret that I cannot fix the precise time when I shall be able to announce a decision, I can assure the hon. Member that there shall be no unnecessary delay. I could not, within the limits of an answer to a Question, state the points that have to be considered, nor do I think it expedient that they should now be stated.

EVICCTIONS (IRELAND) — MR. JAMES SHERIDAN, DRUMHALRY, GRANARD, CO. LONGFORD.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Mr. James Sheridan, of Drumhalry, in the barony of Granard, county of Longford, who was, on the 8th May, evicted from his land by the sheriff with a force of Constabulary; whether it is the fact that Mr. Sheridan was served with a writ in August 1881 for four years' rent; whether he then produced a receipt for the greater portion of this rent at the trial, and the plaintiff, the owner of the land, obtained judgment in the Common Pleas Division for one half-year's rent, £12 5s.; whether the sheriff sent Mr. Sheridan a notice that he had an order against him for £12 5s. with 13s. costs; whether Mr. Sheridan paid the amount of rent and costs, and holds the sheriff's receipt for the same; and, whether he can say under what circumstances Mr. Sheridan was evicted from his land on the 8th May?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, Mr. Sheridan's landlady obtained a writ for a sum of £12 5s. The sheriff sold the interest in trust for the landlady. Sheridan did not attend the sale, but afterwards went to the sheriff and asked him to take the money from him and forego the sale. The sheriff consented, but informed Sheridan at the same time that there would be additional costs, which Sheridan agreed to pay, but afterwards refused, on being informed of their amount. Subsequently, the agent got the writ on the sheriff's assignment, the costs not being forthcoming.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PROCLAMATION OF THE CITY OF LIMERICK.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the magistrates of the borough of Limerick were given an opportunity of expressing their views to the Government on the state of that city before its late proclamation; whether they have, since the proclamation, addressed a protest to the Irish Government against that measure; whether the grounds of that protest have been considered, and, if not, whether they will be considered, by the Government; and, whether the proclamation was the result of private information in possession of the Government, or of the general condition of the city; and, if of the latter, whether he will state what circumstances of its condition have led to the step in question?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, a letter fully explaining all the facts of this case was addressed by the Lord Lieutenant to the Mayor of Limerick on the 10th instant. If the hon. and learned Member will communicate with the authorities of Limerick he will learn the nature of that letter, which, I think, answers the first three paragraphs of his Question. The city was proclaimed under the Act 6 Will. IV., c. 15, as in a state of disturbance, with a view of extra police being sent there on the recommendation of the County Inspector of Constabulary, after consulting and with the concurrence of the Resident Magistrate permanently stationed there, and the Special Resident Magistrate of the district.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked whether the proclamation was the result of private information in the possession of the Government or of the general condition of the city?

MR. HEALY: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that Question, I should like to ask whether the Special Resident Magistrate is Mr. Clifford Lloyd?

MR. TREVELYAN: I have received no information relating to the general state of the city; but I hold in my hand a long list of riots and assaults on the police. This list occupies nearly four pages, and upon looking over it, I see that many of the cases are of a serious nature. As to the letter, I shall be very glad if the hon. and learned Member will communicate with the City authorities.

EMIGRATION ACTS—EMIGRANTS IN HULL.

MR. MOORE asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to the large number of emigrants landed from time to time in Hull, and to the absence of any suitable lodging accommodation for them; whether his attention has been more particularly called to the case of a lodging-house keeper named Brodie, who was charged at the Hull Police Court on the 16th May with receiving lodgers into his house in excess of the certified number, and who frankly admitted that he offered to take in as many as 500 emigrants, whereas he was only licensed for 73, stating that there was no other course open to him, the evening being wet, and there being some 1,600 emigrants just landed in the town, unable to find accommodation elsewhere; and, whether the Board of Trade will inquire into the state of the lodging-houses in Hull in the interest of the large emigrant traffic passing through that town?

MR. DODSON: Sir, I have been requested to answer this Question in consequence of a medical inspection having recently been made, by my direction, as to the sanitary state of Hull, in connection with which the condition of emigrants landing there was investigated. I understand from the Inspector that cases have occurred in which the provisions of the Public Health Act in regard to common lodging-houses have been violated in order to provide accommodation for excessive numbers of emigrants. This, however, appears to be altogether exceptional, and as only occurring when the lodging-houses provided for this class have been filled, which, however, is not often the case. The lodging-houses provided for the emigrants he found to be well kept.

CUSTOMS RE-ORGANIZATION—OUT-DOOR CLERKS.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, If he is aware that the dissatisfaction of the Custom House clerks with the position they are being placed in by the reorganization is increasing, and that the answers given have not reassured them; if he is aware that they look upon the new position as a direct violation of the conditions on which they entered the service of the Crown, though they are afraid to make individual complaints, believing that a black mark will be set against those who do so; and, what steps he proposes to take to assure the House and the Country that these men are being treated with justice?

Mr. Trevelyan

MR. COURTNEY: We know of no reason that would lead us to suppose that any dissatisfaction exists among the Custom House clerks who have been transferred to the out-door department with the position in which they have been placed by the recent re-organization, nor have they, in our opinion, any reasonable ground for being dissatisfied. There is no ground for saying that the new position of such clerks is in direct violation of the conditions on which they entered the Service of the Crown, inasmuch as there was nothing in those conditions to prevent their being transferred to any other branch of the Customs Department for the good of the Public Service if unwilling to accept pensions. No impediment has been placed in the way of clerks affected by the change making fair and reasonable representations respecting their cases, individually or collectively, either to the Treasury or to the Board of Customs.

POST OFFICE (TELEGRAPHIC DEPARTMENT)—A SIXPENNY RATE FOR TELEGRAMS.

MR. E. STANHOPE asked the Postmaster General, Whether he will lay upon the Table the Correspondence which has passed between him and the Committee of Lloyd's with reference to a proposal to adopt a sixpenny rate for certain telegrams, and an undertaking on the part of the Committee to indemnify the Government against any loss that might accrue from the experiment?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, it is not usual to lay on the Table such Correspondence as that to which the hon. Member refers, and I regret, therefore, that I am not able to comply with his request. I may, perhaps, add that in declining the proposal to which reference is made I was mainly influenced by the opinion that whenever sixpenny telegrams are introduced, they should not be confined to any particular company or association, but that the public generally should participate in the change.

SOUTH AFRICA — ZULULAND — JOHN DUNN AND THE ZULU CHIEFS.

MR. RICHARD asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he is aware that the large Zulu deputation which visited Natal in April last, to ask for the release of Cetewayo, included twenty Chiefs and Headmen from John Dunn's territory, and that while they were in Pietermaritzburg Dunn, who had followed them to that town, publicly threatened them with personal violence on their return to Zululand; and, whether Dunn's conduct has been brought under the notice of Sir Henry Bulwer?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY, in reply, said, that Sir Henry Bulwer had sent a full Report with enclosures to the Colonial Office on that matter; but there was nothing either in the Report or in the enclosures which led them to credit the statement that John Dunn had publicly threatened those Chiefs with personal violence. The Papers would be laid on the Table, and the hon. Member would be able to judge of the matter for himself. It was true that the deputation to Natal included 20 Chiefs and Headmen from John Dunn's territory.

EGYPT—THE SOUDAN—CONSULATE AT KHARTOUM.

MR. CROPPER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that the appointment of Mr. Mieville to the Consulship of the Soudan has been cancelled on account of health; and, if so, whether any other appointment has yet been made?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, it has been decided on grounds of health to appoint Mr. Mieville to some other post, and to select another gentleman for the Consulate at Khartoum. No fresh appointment has, however, yet been made.

SUNDAY LABOUR—EMPLOYMENT OF WORKMEN ON SUNDAY.

MR. HICKS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that workmen were employed last Sunday upon the repairs now in progress at the Continental Hotel, Waterloo Place; and, whether he will take any steps in the matter?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I do not think this is a matter in which I am called upon to interfere.

MR. HICKS asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether it was not a fact that no steps could be taken in that matter under the 34 & 35 Vict. without the intervention of the police or the stipendiary magistrates of London?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: That does not alter the answer I have given.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIAN FOR THE KILLENKEY DIVISION, RATHDRUM UNION.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the election of Poor Law Guardian for the Killenkey Electoral Division of Rathdrum Union, and to the objection made to the return by Mr. John Gaskin, one of the candidates, on the ground that votes were improperly received by the clerk of the union in his capacity of returning officer, Whether it is true that the Local Government Board refused Mr. Gaskin a scrutiny of the voting papers, stating that they were quite satisfied with the explanation given by the returning officer; whether, on being furnished with specific objections by Mr. Gaskin, the Board, in a letter to him dated the 24th May 1882, made the following admission:—

"In regard to Dr. Truell's own votes as landlord, the Board do not think the returning officer ought to have allowed more than six votes, and they are in communication with the returning officer on this subject; but the additional six votes did not affect the final result of the election;"

whether he will now, as President of the Local Government Board in Ireland, order an independent investigation to be held as to the validity and exact number of the votes taken at the election in question; and, whether he has any objection to lay the Correspondence on the subject upon the Table of the House?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, it is very important that the public should be satisfied that elections have been conducted according to law, and where there is reasonable uneasiness there is no objection to ordering an inquiry. I have communicated with the Local Government Board to this effect.

LOCAL BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND) ACT—CASE OF JOSEPH MAGILL, BELFAST.

MR. EWART asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether it is the case that the proceedings in the bankruptcy of Joseph Magill, late of Belfast, an extensive trader, have been in court since July 1875; that the printworks and property where his business was carried on were sold for £28,000, in June 1880, and possession taken by the purchasers in November 1880; that, during the last seven years, large sums have been paid into court, now amounting to £20,000, but nothing paid out, except costs to solicitors; whether it is the case that a local solicitor, instructed by creditors, cannot appear in the Bankruptcy Court, where Dublin solicitors have exclusive audience, with such results as stated above; and, whether the Government intend to proceed with a Local Bankruptcy Act this Session?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): Sir, this is a most complicated case. The firm, consisting of three partners, petitioned for an arrangement as to the joint estate of the firm, and Mr. Magill, one of the partners, also petitioned for a like arrangement as to his separate estate, consisting principally of the Whitewell Print Works. Considerable litigation ensued as to the rights of the creditors of the joint and separate estates, and the trading was continued by a trustee under creditors' resolution until the sale of the Whitewell Works in 1880, which was, I understand, the earliest period at which, owing to the depression of trade, a sale could be advantageously had. The purchase money was £28,000, and of this £24,000 was covered by mortgages. Under the conditions of sale the purchasers were let into possession on part payment of the purchase money, and further sums on account have been since paid into Court. Some costs have been paid, but no dividend yet declared. If any creditor has been or is dissatisfied he can bring his complaint at any time before the Court for redress. It is not the case that a local solicitor cannot appear in the Bankruptcy Court in Ireland. Every solicitor in Ireland has equal right to appear and have audience there. Last Session I did my best to get on the Local Bankruptcy Bill; but this Session the House knows that the state of Business is such that I have little hope of doing anything effectually in this direction.

SEA AND COAST FISHERIES (IRELAND).

MR. LEAMY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is one of the Trustees to aid the Sea and Coast Fisheries of Ireland; whether over thirty thousand pounds of charity money collected from the public is lying unproductive in the hands of the Trustees; if he is aware that some years ago the Trustees recommended that the fund should be transferred to the Inspectors of Fisheries, to be lent by them to the sea coast fishermen; and, if he will take steps to have that recommendation carried into effect?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, as Chief Secretary for Ireland, I am an ex-officio trustee of the charity known as the Trustees to Aid the Sea and Coast Fisheries of Ireland. There is undoubtedly a considerable sum of money—falling much short of £30,000, however you regard it—which is lying unemployed as far as loans to fishermen are concerned. In 1879 the trustees proposed to transfer the trust fund to the Government; but it was found there were difficulties in the way. I hope to have an opportunity of going into this question in Ireland when the Session is over, and consulting with my brother trustees in Dublin as to the best means of making use of any of the trust money that may be available for loans to fishermen.

CRIME AND POLICE (IRELAND)—DETECTIVE POLICE FORCE—COLONEL BRACKENBURY.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What are the special qualifications of Colonel Brackenbury for the organization or command of a detective police force in Ireland?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, Colonel Brackenbury has been appointed an assistant Under Secretary to His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, to relieve the Under Secretary of duties relating to police and crime. In this capacity he exercises a general administrative control over the whole of the police in Ireland; but does not supersede the heads of the police in their executive functions. The Government have satisfied themselves that Colonel Brackenbury is a man of exceptional ability and energy. If the hon. Member chooses, I will read the successive positions of trust and difficulty in which Colonel Brackenbury has almost continuously served. ["No, no!"]

Mr. Trevelyan

INDIA (BENGAL)—THE DURBHUNGA RAJ.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for India, If he will lay upon the Table of the House the letter in which Mr. M. Finucane, Bengal Civil Service, resigned the managership of the Durbhunga Raj at the end of 1880, on the ground that he could not conscientiously carry out large proposed enhancements of rent; whether the resignation of Mr. Finucane was accepted; and, whether a relative of the Lieutenant Governor, Sir Ashley Eden, was forthwith appointed in his place manager to the Maharajah of Durbhunga at an increased salary?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, Mr. Finucane was never manager of the Durbhunga Estate. He was lent by Government to assist in completing the survey of the estate under the manager, Colonel Money. Colonel Money is a distant connection by marriage of Sir Ashley Eden; but was selected for the post of manager of the estate by Sir Richard Temple when Lieutenant Governor. Nothing is known of Mr. Finucane's letter of resignation. It is believed that he completed the survey on which he was employed.

INDIA—IMPORTATION OF PETROLEUM—RELAXATION OF PRECAUTIONARY LEGISLATION.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for India, If it is true, as stated in the Calcutta correspondence of the "Times," that, immediately on the receipt of a communication from him, Lord Ripon caused a measure to be introduced into the Indian Legislative Council relaxing the precautions on the importation of petroleum into India; whether it is true that immediately on the receipt of another communication from him Lord Ripon suspended further progress with the measure in question; whether he will lay Copies of these communications upon the Table of the House; how many members of the Indian Legislative Council were present at the meeting of that body at which the measure relaxing the precautions on the importation of petroleum was introduced, and what were their names; and, whether Government will take steps to secure some representation of the interests of 200,000,000 subjects of the Crown?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, as I have already stated, the measure was introduced in consequence of certain communications made to the Government of India. Its progress appears to have been suspended in consequence of representations which have been made in India, and not, so far as I am aware, in consequence of any communication from me. The correspondence which has passed with the Government of India is entirely telegraphic, and necessarily represents imperfectly the facts which were before me. As soon as it is sufficiently complete to give full information, there will probably be no objection to its production. The Secretary of State has frequently expressed a strong opinion as to the undesirability of carrying on important legislation at Simla in the absence of unofficial members of the Legislative Council; but it is evident that this matter was urgent, and, if dealt with at all, did not admit of delay.

MR. O'DONNELL: Can the noble Lord give the House any information respecting the number of Members of the Legislative Council, who took upon themselves to move in this matter?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No, Sir; all that we know has reached us by telegraph, and I have already communicated it to the House.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—RELEASE OF PERSONS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any, and, if any, what security was taken from the following suspects on their release from imprisonment on reasonable suspicion of having committed crimes of violence; and, if no security was taken, whether the reasonable suspicion was proved to be unreasonable?—

Name of Prisoner.	Prison.	Ground stated for his Arrest in the Warrant. Reasonably suspected of
Thomas Winterscathill ..	Galway	Reasonably suspected of
Patrick Quinlan ..	Limerick	Reasonably suspected of
William Quinlan ..	"	Reasonably suspected of
Michael Walsh ..	Nass	Reasonably suspected of
	Dundalk	Reasonably suspected of
	Galway	Reasonably suspected of
	Monaghan	Reasonably suspected of
	Armagh	Reasonably suspected of
	Enniskillen	Reasonably suspected of
	Enniskillen	Reasonably suspected of
	Clonmel	Reasonably suspected of
	Monaghan	Reasonably suspected of
Patrick Gallogly		Reasonably suspected of
Patrick Beirne ..	"	Reasonably suspected of John Sheridan ..	"	Reasonably suspected of Rodger Brien ..	"	Reasonably suspected of Cornelius Kelleher	"	Reasonably suspected of

MR. TREVELYAN: If the hon. Baronet will consult the Protection of Person and Property Act, he will find that it does not empower the Lord Lieutenant to require a prisoner on release to give any security for his future good behaviour. His Excellency, however, authorizes me to say that in each of the cases referred to in this Question he caused inquiry to be made whether the prisoners could be released without danger to the peace of the district, and based his decision in each case upon a consideration of the result of such inquiry and of all the other circumstances. The hon. Member must remember that these people were never tried, and that there is no public record of the extent to which they were suspected or had participated in the offences which are opposite their names; and it may be that in some instances there were no grounds for the suspicion.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked whether an undertaking had not been given by the Chief Secretary for Ireland or his Predecessor that persons imprisoned on suspicion of crimes of violence would not be released without being brought to trial?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR wished to know whether it was not a fact that a pledge was given by the Predecessor of the Chief Secretary for Ireland that no man should be imprisoned under the Protection of Person and Property Act except on such grounds as would, in the opinion of the Government, have secured a conviction before an impartial jury?

MR. HEALY asked whether the Chief Secretary for Ireland would have any objection to put into the form of a Parliamentary Paper the grounds on which the suspicion of His Excellency was founded?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I can answer no Question as to the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant except in the most general terms. As to whether any pledge was given by my Predecessor, that is a serious question, and one which I cannot answer without Notice.

MR. BRODRICK inquired whether the depositions made previous to the imprisonment of each "suspect" would be produced?

[No answer was given.]

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND) — APPLICATIONS OF PERSONS EVICTED TO THE LAND COURTS.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How many of the tenants evicted last month had made application to the Land Courts?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I have telegraphed to Dublin to ask to have this information made out. It will take several days to get it.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS) — ENGLISH POLICY.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether in September last Mr. Cookson used the following language to Arabi Pasha:—

Sir Herbert Maxwell

"I told him that if they persisted in assuming the government of the country the army must be prepared to meet the united forces of the Sultan and of the European Powers, both of whom were too much interested in the welfare and tranquillity of Egypt to allow the country to descend, through a military government, to anarchy;"

and, whether that language was approved by Her Majesty's Government?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, my hon. Friend is justified in assuming that Her Majesty's Government approve it.

THE IRISH CHURCH FUND—AMOUNT OF THE SURPLUS.

MR. VILLIERS STUART asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it would be right to conclude, from the Irish Church Funds Return, that on and after 1932 the permanent income of the Commission will be £293,000 per annum; and, whether that income may be safely taken as representing, at the rate of three-and-a-half per cent. a capital of between £8,000,000 and £9,000,000 sterling; and that, therefore, after paying off the National School Teachers' Fund, the Intermediate Education Fund, and the Royal University Fund, in all about £2,900,000, between £5,000,000 and £6,000,000 will still remain available for the Arrears Bill and other purely Irish purposes?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, the permanent income of the Church Fund, as given in the Returns recently presented, is taken from the last Report of the Church Commission, which shows the state of the Fund on the 31st of December, 1880. Its position in this respect had not appreciably altered at the date when the Return was prepared. But it does not follow that the relations between the permanent and terminable income of the Fund will always remain the same. Persons owing rent-charges, rent, or mortgages to the Church Fund, may redeem their liabilities. The terminable income would be thereby increased, and the permanent income diminished. The Government are not prepared to undertake responsibility for the calculation made by the hon. Member. But I must observe that the present value of a capital of £8,000,000 or £9,000,000, accruing 50 years hence, would be only £1,600,000 or £1,800,000.

ARMY—OFFICERS OF THE RESERVE.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any order has been or is about to be issued, giving permission to Officers of the Reserve to wear the uniform of their late regiment at Court; or if he will state the decision of the authorities on the subject?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the hon. Baronet, I have to state that with respect to the uniform of some classes of Reserve officers orders have been already issued, but not as to all; but full Regulations will shortly be issued.

NAVY—DOCKYARDS—MEMORIAL OF ESTABLISHED SHIPWRIGHTS.

MR. PULESTON asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether Memorials of the established shipwrights of Her Majesty's dockyards, sent in due form through the proper channels, have been received; and, if so, whether any consideration has been given to the subject?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Sir, the Memorials referred to by the hon. Member have been received and carefully considered by the professional advisers of the Admiralty; but the increases of pay asked for by the shipwrights have not been recommended for adoption. A reply has not yet been sent, because it has been customary to defer the announcement of the Board's decision in such cases until after the Estimates have been voted.

SPIRITS ACT, 1880—EVASION OF THE PROVISIONS OF THE ACT AT PETER-HEAD.

DR. CAMERON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether, since by sections 146, 148, and 151 of "The Spirits Act, 1880," it is enacted that any person who, in Scotland, sells or exposes to sale spirits, otherwise than in premises for which he is licensed to sell spirits, shall incur a penalty of not less than £25, with forfeiture of the spirits in his possession; that any person who buys or procures spirits from such unlicensed person shall incur a fine of £100; and that any officer or person employed by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue who, by any wilful act, neglect, or default, does or permits, or agrees to do or permit, any thing in contravention or evasion of "The Spirits Act, 1880," shall incur a fine of £500, and be disqualified from serving Her Majesty in any office or employment; if he would state what officer or person in the employment of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue is responsible for permitting, and agreeing to permit, a contravention or evasion of this Act, in Peterhead, by three persons allowed by the Excise authorities, after attention had been called to the fact in this House, to sell liquor without confirmation of their certificates, and without licences, as if they were licensed grocers and publicans; and, whether the Commissioners of Inland Revenue intend taking any action in respect of their officer's deliberate breach of section 151 of the Spirits Act of 1880?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, the Board of Inland Revenue are alone responsible for the course which was advisedly pursued in the special circumstances of these cases; and, therefore, action will not be taken against any of their officers in the matter. The Board did not grant licences; they only abstained for a short period at their discretion from Excise interference with the sale of liquor, the Justices' clerk having had reason to believe that a further Court would be held about the middle of this month. Any other course of action would have been unjust towards the applicants, who, but for the accidental non-attendance of a quorum in the Confirmation Court, would doubtless have had their certificates fully confirmed past all dispute. If, notwithstanding this explanation, any person should consider himself aggrieved by the action of the magistrates and the Commissioners, it is open to him to contest the matter by proceeding before the magistrates for a penalty for the sale of intoxicating liquor without a magistrate's certificate.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—JAMES BANON.

MR. MARUM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will favourably consider the case of James Banon, a suspect in Kilmainham Gaol, with a view to his release, who has a large family dependent upon him, and 60 acres of land, without any person to attend to the same during his incarceration, now extending to nearly three months' duration?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, James Banon was arrested on the 11th of April last, and has, therefore, been little more than two months in custody. His Excellency yesterday reconsidered his case, and decided that he cannot at present order his release.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE AFFRAY AT BALLINA.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to the manner in which the coroner's juries, in the case of the boy Melody at Ballina, were empanelled; if he can state what compensation the Government has given to the family of Melody, and the families of those who were wounded in the recent affray; and, whether he can now give the House an assurance that the services of Sub-Inspector Ball, under whose orders the occurrence took place, have been entirely dispensed with?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Attorney General has not yet received the depositions in this case. He has telegraphed to the Sessional Crown Solicitor to know the cause of the delay.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered that portion of my Question which relates to compensation to the family of the boy Melody.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): Sir, I am advising the Government on this matter, and I have asked them not to come to a final decision until I have had an opportunity of looking into the matter. We had expected before this to have had intelligence on the subject.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: In that case I beg to give Notice that next week I shall repeat my Question.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—THE POSTMASTER AT MILFORD, CO. CORK—CASE OF MATTHEW MURPHY.

MR. LEAMY asked the Postmaster General, Whether he has any objection to re-instate Mr. Mathew Murphy, of Milford, county Cork, in the office of postmaster of that town, he being now competent and willing to discharge the duties of the office?

Mr. FAWCETT: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that certain inquiries are being made in reference to this case, and I am consequently unable at the present time to answer his Question.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. JOHN O'BRIEN.

Mr. DILLON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is it a fact that Mr. John O'Brien, who was arrested in November last, charged with inciting to Boycotting, whereas the real charge against him, by local authorities, and reported to the Castle, was

"Being the ringleader of a riotous mob in the town of Roscrea, on the night of 26th August, 1881."

if it is a fact that Mr. O'Brien was sent for trial, in company with two others, on said charge; if it is a fact that Judge Barry, at the Kilkenny Winter Assizes, on hearing the evidence of the police, ordered the prisoner's discharge, without going into the evidence for the defence; and whether Judge Barry said, "In this case the police were the real aggressors;" and, whether Mr. O'Brien will now be released?

Mr. TREVELYAN: The charge upon which John O'Brien has been arrested is that stated in the Returns before Parliament—"Boycotting." It is quite true that this man was suspected of having formed one of a mob of persons who assaulted the police in the town of Roscrea on the 26th of August last. Several of the police were very badly injured on the occasion, and two persons were sent for trial at the Winter Assizes as having been engaged in the assault. O'Brien was in custody under the Protection Act at the time of the Assizes, and was not put on his trial. The Crown Solicitor informed me that it was distinctly proved that they were in the mob, but the Judge did not think there was sufficient evidence of participation in the riot, and stopped the case. but that he did not say the Constabulary were the aggressors, nor did he utter one word condemnatory of them. His Excellency has had O'Brien's case under consideration, but finds he cannot at present order his release.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS. JOHN AND CORNELIUS KELLEHER, WILLIAM WALSH, AND MAURICE GLEESON.

Mr. DILLON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether John and Cornelius Kelleher, William Walsh, and Maurice Gleeson are still detained in Kilmainham Gaol, although three others, arrested on the same day, in the same district, and on the same charge, have been released; and, if so, why the above-named are not released?

Mr. TREVELYAN: Sir, His Excellency considers every case upon its own merits. He has had the case of the persons referred to in this Question of the hon. Member under consideration, but finds that he cannot at present order their release.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—EXTRA PAY—EX-CONSTABLE WALSH.

Mr. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that the extra pay to be voted to the police will include allowances to men not paid off before the 24th April last; and, whether, in that case, there is any reason for refusing to allow the extra amount to Ex-Sub-Constable Walsh, who was not paid off until the 27th April?

Mr. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Inspector General of Constabulary informs me that the words of the Order issued to the Constabulary in reference to the proposed grant are that members of the Force who were serving in the Force on the 24th of April, 1882, will be entitled to participate in the grant. Ex-Constable Walsh was discharged from the Constabulary on the 13th of February, and is not entitled to share in the extra pay.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—RELEASE OF PERSONS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT.

Mr. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How many persons are now in custody in Ireland under the Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act of last year; how many of these persons are permit, any thing in contravention or evasion of "The Spirits Act, 1880," shall incur a fine of £500, and be disqualified from serving Her Majesty in any office or employment; if he would state what officer or person in the employment of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue is responsible for permitting, and agreeing to permit, a contravention or evasion of this Act, in Peterhead, by three persons allowed by the Excise authorities, after attention had been called to the fact in this House, to sell liquor without confirmation of their certificates, and without licences, as if they were licensed grocers and publicans; and, whether the Commissioners of Inland Revenue intend taking any action in respect of their officer's deliberate breach of section 151 of the Spirits Act of 1880?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, the Board of Inland Revenue are alone responsible for the course which was advisedly pursued in the special circumstances of these cases; and, therefore, action will not be taken against any of their officers in the matter. The Board did not grant licences; they only abstained for a short period at their discretion from Excise interference with the sale of liquor, the Justices' clerk having had reason to believe that a further Court would be held about the middle of this month. Any other course of action would have been unjust towards the applicants, who, but for the accidental non-attendance of a quorum in the Confirmation Court, would doubtless have had their certificates fully confirmed past all dispute. If, notwithstanding this explanation, any person should consider himself aggrieved by the action of the magistrates and the Commissioners, it is open to him to contest the matter by proceeding before the magistrates for a penalty for the sale of intoxicating liquor without a magistrate's certificate.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—JAMES BANON.

MR. MARUM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will favourably consider the case of James Banon, a suspect in Kilmainham Gaol, with a view to his release, who has a large family dependent upon him, and 60 acres of land, without any person to attend to the same during his incarceration, now extending to nearly three months' duration?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, James Banon was arrested on the 11th of April last, and has, therefore, been little more than two months in custody. His Excellency yesterday reconsidered his case, and decided that he cannot at present order his release.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE AFFRAY AT BALLINA.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to the manner in which the coroner's juries, in the case of the boy Melody at Ballina, were empanelled; if he can state what compensation the Government has given to the family of Melody, and the families of those who were wounded in the recent affray; and, whether he can now give the House an assurance that the services of Sub-Inspector Ball, under whose orders the occurrence took place, have been entirely dispensed with?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Attorney General has not yet received the depositions in this case. He has telegraphed to the Sessional Crown Solicitor to know the cause of the delay.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered that portion of my Question which relates to compensation to the family of the boy Melody.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): Sir, I am advising the Government on this matter, and I have asked them not to come to a final decision until I have had an opportunity of looking into the matter. We had expected before this to have had intelligence on the subject.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: In that case I beg to give Notice that next week I shall repeat my Question.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—THE POSTMASTER AT MILFORD, CO. CORK—CASE OF MATTHEW MURPHY.

MR. LEAMY asked the Postmaster General, Whether he has any objection to re-instate Mr. Mathew Murphy, of Milford, county Cork, in the office of postmaster of that town, he being now competent and willing to discharge the duties of the office?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that certain inquiries are being made in reference to this case, and I am consequently unable at the present time to answer his Question.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. JOHN O'BRIEN.

MR. DILLON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is it a fact that Mr. John O'Brien, who was arrested in November last, charged with inciting to Boycotting, whereas the real charge against him, by local authorities, and reported to the Castle, was

"Being the ringleader of a riotous mob in the town of Roscrea, on the night of 26th August, 1881."

if it is a fact that Mr. O'Brien was sent for trial, in company with two others, on said charge; if it is a fact that Judge Barry, at the Kilkenny Winter Assizes, on hearing the evidence of the police, ordered the prisoner's discharge, without going into the evidence for the defence; and whether Judge Barry said, "In this case the police were the real aggressors;" and, whether Mr. O'Brien will now be released?

MR. TREVELYAN: The charge upon which John O'Brien has been arrested is that stated in the Returns before Parliament—"Boycotting." It is quite true that this man was suspected of having formed one of a mob of persons who assaulted the police in the town of Roscrea on the 26th of August last. Several of the police were very badly injured on the occasion, and two persons were sent for trial at the Winter Assizes as having been engaged in the assault. O'Brien was in custody under the Protection Act at the time of the Assizes, and was not put on his trial. The Crown Solicitor informed me that it was distinctly proved that they were in the mob, but the Judge did not think there was sufficient evidence of participation in the riot, and stopped the case. but that he did not say the Constabulary were the aggressors, nor did he utter one word condemnatory of them. His Excellency has had O'Brien's case under consideration, but finds he cannot at present order his release.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS. JOHN AND CORNELIUS KELLEHER, WILLIAM WALSH, AND MAURICE GLEESON.

MR. DILLON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether John and Cornelius Kelleher, William Walsh, and Maurice Gleeson are still detained in Kilmainham Gaol, although three others, arrested on the same day, in the same district, and on the same charge, have been released; and, if so, why the above-named are not released?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, His Excellency considers every case upon its own merits. He has had the case of the persons referred to in this Question of the hon. Member under consideration, but finds that he cannot at present order their release.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—EXTRA PAY—EX-CONSTABLE WALSH.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that the extra pay to be voted to the police will include allowances to men not paid off before the 24th April last; and, whether, in that case, there is any reason for refusing to allow the extra amount to Ex-Sub-Constable Walsh, who was not paid off until the 27th April?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Inspector General of Constabulary informs me that the words of the Order issued to the Constabulary in reference to the proposed grant are that members of the Force who were serving in the Force on the 24th of April, 1882, will be entitled to participate in the grant. Ex-Constable Walsh was discharged from the Constabulary on the 13th of February, and is not entitled to share in the extra pay.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—RELEASE OF PERSONS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How many persons are now in custody in Ireland under the Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act of last year; how many of these persons are classified by the Government as being under the suspicion of "personal association with crime;" what is the cause of the prolonged delay in setting at liberty the persons not so classified; and how soon their release may be expected; if he will state the number and names of the persons now imprisoned in Ireland under the statute of the 34th of Edward III.; and, whether the Government will undertake to release those persons, and to abandon the use of the statute?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the number in custody yesterday was 216. The number of such persons who are charged in the warrants as suspected of being implicated in crimes other than intimidation is 125. The cases are being considered and decided upon by the Lord Lieutenant day by day as rapidly as their due consideration will allow. His Excellency must be satisfied that the release can be made without danger to the peace of the district. I have called for the information asked for in the latter part of the Question, but have not yet received it.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND)—COUNTY WEXFORD.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that, on June 13th, two tenants on the property of Mr. Bate, in the county of Wexford, were evicted, and, immediately after the eviction, their houses were burned down by the emergency men who took possession; and, whether, in view of the right of redemption possessed by these tenants, the Government will consent to include such conduct amongst offences as defined by the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, these evictions were on title. The holdings became the absolute property of the landlord on his obtaining possession of them, and he had a legal right to destroy the buildings. The tenants did not possess in this case any right of redemption.

IRELAND—MR. O'SHEA'S VISIT TO KILMAINHAM GAOL.

MR. G. W. ELLIOT asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is able to state if any person accompanied the honourable Member for Clare on the occasion of his visit to Kilmainham Prison, and what entry was made in connection with that visit in the prison books; whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a Return of the visits made to the political prisoners in Kilmainham Prison during their incarceration, with the names and dates; and, whether, in any instance, visitors have been admitted to see the prisoners without their names being recorded?

MR. TREVELYAN: I know absolutely nothing about this matter; but I have asked the hon Member for Clare whether any gentleman went with him on that occasion, and he says that he was alone.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This is not the first time that the Government has been asked about this matter, and I recollect that when I asked a somewhat similar Question about this matter some days ago—"Order!"—the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland said the Government were ignorant of everything connected with it. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is entitled to ask a Question arising out of the answer given by the right hon. Gentleman, but he is not entitled to enter upon other matters.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman could inform us whether any gentleman was admitted to the prison on the same day as the hon. Member for Clare went, and, if so, whether he was obliged to enter his name in the Visitors' Book?

MR. TREVELYAN: Yes, Sir, I will inquire.

MR. O'SHEA: Perhaps I may be allowed to say that nobody went to Kilmainham with me, and that I have since asked my hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork whether anybody else went to see him on that day, and he tells me that nobody went.

THE IRISH FISHERIES—THE REPORT, 1881.

MR. BLAKE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Why the Report of the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries for 1881 has not been presented; and, if he will take measures to have it in the hands of Members before the Second Reading of the Sea Fisheries (Ireland) Bill on the 28th instant?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Inspectors of Fisheries inform me that the Report is all in type, and is now undergoing revision. They expect to have it ready for presentation in the course of a week.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS. T. & P. MORRISSY.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the time has arrived for the release of Mr. Thomas Morriessy and his brother, whose parents have suffered great loss by their imprisonment, and who have been already confined for a period of seven months?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant has had the cases of Messrs. Thomas and Patrick Morriessy under his consideration, and has decided that he cannot at present order their release.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. JOHN DARCEY.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the time has arrived for the release of John Darcey, who has now been incarcerated since June 17th 1881; and, if the Government be not willing to order Mr. Darcey's release, whether they will permit his transfer from Dundalk to Galway Gaol, so that he may be able to communicate with his wife and children, who have suffered severe loss from his imprisonment?

MR. TREVELYAN: His Excellency has re-considered Mr. John Darcey's case, but finds that he cannot at present order his release. His application to be transferred to Galway Gaol had been considered last December, when it was decided that it could not be acceded to; but the reasons which then applied need not now apply, and the application shall be re-considered.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. WILLIAM KEOGH.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the time has arrived for the release of Mr. William Keogh, who has been imprisoned since February 10th in Monaghan Gaol, on the comparatively slight offence of preventing the payment of rents; and, whether two suspects from the same district, arrested on a similar charge, were released after an imprisonment of three months?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, His Excellency has ordered further inquiry to be made into Mr. William Keogh's case.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. ARTHUR MOLONEY.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the time has arrived for the release of Mr. Arthur Moloney, who has been detained since January 3rd, and whose business has severely suffered from his incarceration?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, His Excellency informs me that he has Mr. Arthur Moloney's case still under his consideration.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. THOMAS CUNNINGHAM.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the time has come for the release of Mr. Thomas Cunningham, at present confined in Kilmainham Prison; whether he has been incarcerated since December 29th last; and, whether all the other suspects from the same district (Loughrea) have been already released?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, Mr. Thomas Cunningham has been under detention since the 29th of December last. His Excellency has the case under consideration, and I will let the hon. Member know the result when I hear it.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. J. P. QUINN.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Lord Lieutenant considers that the peace of Dublin, where he resides, would be endangered by the release of Mr. J. P. Quinn from Ennis-killen Gaol; if it is the fact that, although he has been arrested for incitement to non-payment of rent, the Government can show no speech containing such incitement; whether he is aware that Mr. Quinn simply acted under Mr. Brennan, who has since been released, in the Land League office; and, if he can assign any reason for Mr. Quinn's continued detention, now that men holding higher positions in the Land League organization have been released?

MR. TREVELYAN: His Excellency had this case under consideration on the day before yesterday, and is unable at present to order Mr. Quinn's release. I must repeat to the hon. Gentleman—what I have said in answer to many questions asked from various points of view—that I can enter into no detail in matters referring to the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant.

EGYPT—THE POLITICAL CRISIS.

MR. BOURKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Has any reparation been demanded for the losses and injuries sustained by British subjects in the late disturbances in Egypt; and, if so, from whom; and, whether Papers cannot be now presented relating to the mission of Dervish Pasha, and the proceedings consequent thereupon?

MR. SLAGG: Before the hon. Baronet answers that Question, I should like to ask another which relates to the same subject. It is, Whether he can give any information as to what steps, if any, have been taken by Her Majesty's Government in regard to the protection of the property of two citizens of Manchester—Mr. Dobson and Mr. Richardson—who lost their lives in the recent disturbances at Alexandria? I should like also to refer the hon. Baronet, if the House will permit me, to an important telegram sent to me this morning from Alexandria. I may say that I have been waited upon by an influential deputation of merchants largely interested in British commerce in Egypt. They have laid before me telegrams which really describe a dreadful state of things in Alexandria. The telegram is to this effect, and addressed to a friend of mine, who is possessed of ships in Alexandria—

"The Consul asks urgently, and for reasons of humanity, can you obtain permission from buyers of steamships to allow more than two voyages to Cyprus with fugitives? Do your utmost to arrange this matter, and obtain leave for more voyages if possible."

It seems from the report my friend brings me that the people are leaving Alexandria in large numbers. Another friend has a telegram to the effect that European life and property are no longer safe.

MR. O'DONNELL: Sir,—

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, I do not think it is desirable to allow Questions to be interpolated with other Questions. It is not fair to other Members who are waiting to put their Questions. The Question on the Paper to which I will reply is that of my right hon. Friend Mr. Bourke. I may say that no claims have yet been presented. As soon as any such are received they will be referred in the usual manner to the Law Officers of the Crown. The Papers relating to the mission of Dervish Pasha cannot be detached from the rest of the Papers, which will be brought out as speedily as possible. With regard to the promise I made yesterday to the junior Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright), the Colleague of my hon. Friend (Mr. Slagg), I may say that we have received from the British Consul and Admiral at Alexandria a list of the British subjects reported killed. The list substantially agrees with that which has been published in the papers already, although there is one name published which does not appear in our list. With regard to the Question put by my hon. Friend (Mr. Slagg), I may say that a telegram has been received from Mr. Cookson, to the effect that steps have been taken to look after the private effects of Messrs. Dobson and Richardson. With regard to the other Question—although I must apologize for interpolating an answer—as it has been asked I will answer it. A vessel from Port Said has been ordered to Alexandria for the reception of fugitives, and two other private ships have also been made available for persons who wished to go on board—providing, of course, they are persons whose means are such that they cannot reasonably be expected to pay for their passages. The first vessel was taken up by the Admiral to convey persons to Malta. I have no knowledge with regard to the other two ships. There appear to be about 300 British subjects in Alexandria who desire to quit at the present time. The total European population of Egypt is, of course, very large indeed. There are about 30,000 Greeks, 15,000 French, 15,000 Italians, and 4,000 British (including Maltese), and 4,000 Austrian and German subjects.

SIR JOHN HAY: I wish to ask the hon. Baronet whether it is true that we have been afraid to bury persons who were Europeans in the cemetery at Alexandria, and that Her Majesty's Ship Superb has been used as a hearse to take the bodies to sea?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Notice has been given that a Question like this will be put to-morrow, and I should prefer to answer then.

MR. BOURKE: Are we to understand that the Papers relating to Dervish Pasha will be among the second batch of Papers that are promised?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The most important Papers are being hurried on, which relate to what has taken place up to the middle of May. The other Papers are being prepared as rapidly as possible, and it would be extremely inconvenient to lay a later Paper on the Table before an earlier one.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: When are we likely to get any of these Papers?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I cannot give any promise; but the further Papers are being got ready as rapidly as possible. They are not yet in the condition of the first revise, but the second batch will be ready next week. The right hon. Gentleman must know that there never has been a case in which important Papers were brought out with such rapidity as in this case. ["Oh, oh!"] This is so, and it will be impossible, if you search the whole records of the Foreign Office, to find out Papers that have been presented with such rapidity.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: Will these Papers refer to matters up to the 17th of April?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: To the middle of May.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I should like to ask whether the rumour has reached the hon. Baronet that the Eastern Telegraph Company had been obliged to close its doors at Cairo?

MR. ONSLOW: May I also ask whether it is the intention of the Government, considering that these difficulties have arisen owing to the action of Her Majesty's Government, that those persons who can afford to pay for their passage are really to pay, or whether the Government do not intend to give a free passage to all, and also to victual them?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Up to the present Sir Edward Malet has not called upon British subjects to leave the country, nor have any other foreign Consuls called upon their fellow-subjects to do so.

MR. O'KELLY: I should like to ask whether it is true that the Khedive has called on the Sultan for 18,000 or any other number of Turkish troops? ["Order!"]

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I think the opinion of the House is that that Question should not be answered without Notice.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Perhaps the hon. Baronet is now able to answer the Question of which I gave him Notice yesterday. It is, Whether Arabi Pasha was present at the conference which took place between Dervish Pasha and the Khedive; and, further, whether, in the Report which was made by the representatives of the Government in the first instance, it was not stated that Arabi was present?

MR. LABOUCHERE: On the same subject I would like to ask whether the hon. Gentleman would state whether the Vice Consul or any representative of Her Majesty's Government remains at Cairo—whether in that case Her Majesty's representative is in communication with Arabi, and whether he regards him as a traitor to his Sovereign, or a Minister of his Sovereign? [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I think it is right to point out that in Questions of a grave character such as these the hon. Baronet is entitled to ask that Notice should be given, and also, if he thinks proper, to decline to answer on public grounds. Having made this observation, I do not think it my duty to interpose as regards the Question which has just been put.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir,—

MR. HEALY: I rise to Order. I should like to observe that the hon. Baronet stated just before that he could not answer a Question which had been put from the Irish Benches because the feeling of the House seemed to be against an answer being given. As soon, however, as Questions were put from the Liberal and Conservative Benches, the hon. Baronet was ready enough to answer.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: It is impossible that the hon. Member should know what I am about to say. I rose for the purpose of answering the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. J. Lowther), as his Question seemed to grow out of the the Question on the Paper. I was going to decline to reply to the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), because his Question does not seem to grow out of the one on the Paper. As regards the right hon. Gentleman's Question, it would have been better if it had been on the Paper, so that an answer might have been given to it in the ordinary way. The meeting which took place between the European Consuls was a meeting between the Representatives of Germany, Austria, Italy, Russia, France, and England. There were present at that meeting the Khedive, Dervish Pasha, and the whole of his suite from Constantinople, and Arabi Pasha also. The object of that meeting was to receive an answer to a demand that had been made on Dervish Pasha by the Representatives of the Powers in regard to steps which should be satisfactory to the Great Powers to insure the safety of Europeans in Egypt. Dervish Pasha stated that Arabi had informed him that he would implicitly obey the orders given by the Khedive. The Khedive immediately issued orders for restoring the public tranquillity. These are the words to which I alluded yesterday—

"Dervish Pasha said that under the urgent circumstances of the case he would assume joint responsibility with Arabi Pasha for the execution of the orders of the Khedive."

The European Consuls then said that the danger to the security of Europeans took precedence over all other questions for the moment, and that the political situation did not enter into the discussion. They also said to the Khedive and the Imperial Commissioners that they thought the discussion that had taken place with regard to the Europeans had nothing to do with the objects of Dervish Pasha's mission in Egypt. That meeting was on Monday.

MR. ONSLOW: Then why has the Khedive gone to Alexandria?

MR. J. LOWTHER: The hon. Baronet has not noticed my second Question—Whether in the Report made by the British representatives in Egypt to Her Majesty's Government, it was stated that Arabi Pasha was present at the meeting just described?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Yes, Sir, it was so stated. It is a detailed Report, but I have just given the substance to the House.

MR. O'DONNELL: With reference to the measures taken for the preservation of peace in Alexandria, I wish to ask if any steps have been taken towards bringing to justice the Europeans who are reported to have commenced the disturbances by stabbing Arabs?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: That Question does not seem to grow out of the one on the Paper, and I am unable to give the House any information on the subject, because I think any information I give should be of a well-founded character.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE HALL OF SCIENCE, OLD STREET.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Vice President of the Council, in reference to his statement that the present teachers of the Science Classes at "Hall of Science" were recognized by the late Government, when Mrs. Besant, Miss Alice, and Hypatia Bradlaugh became qualified to earn grants from public monies for sciences classes taught by them; whether they were returned to the Education Department in 1879 as teachers in classes in the Hall of Science; and, who was the Member of the late Government by whom their application was approved?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, when the application was made in 1879 for the recognition of the science classes at the Hall of Science, the teachers returned were Dr. Aveling, Doctor of Science, London, and B.A. of Cambridge, with Annie Besant and E. Richardson as assistants. When my attention was first called to this matter by the hon. Member for Harwich (Sir Henry Tyler), Mrs.

Besant and the Misses Bradlaugh were acting as assistants to Dr. Aveling. No change has taken place since that time except that the Misses Bradlaugh have passed the necessary examination for teachers, and have been recognized as such. In reply to the last Question of the hon. Member, my statement on Thursday last was that these classes "were admitted to grants by the late Government." What I wished to convey by that was that they were admitted to grants during the late Administration. I am quite prepared to assume the responsibility for the continuance of the grant, as well as for the recognition of the Misses Bradlaugh as qualified teachers. Under the conditions upon which grants are made, as laid down by the "Science Directory," no Administration would be justified in refusing to recognize these classes or their teachers.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The right hon. Gentleman is, no doubt, correct in one sense in stating that the late Government recognized these classes. As I was at that time at the Education Office, perhaps the House will allow me to state what had occurred. Certain rules are laid down as to the recognition of science classes; and if these provisions are complied with, as a matter of course the application is sanctioned. Application, I believe, was made in regard to these classes in the latter months of the last Administration. It was made by a committee, at the head of which was a clergyman of the Church of England, and as it seemed, no doubt, to the officer of the Department that the conditions had been complied with, the application was passed; but neither the Lord President, nor myself, nor any senior permanent official, was aware that any classes had been recognized in connection with the Hall of Science. I do not wish to censure the decision arrived at by the present Government; but what I want to say is this, that that decision was adopted on a full and complete knowledge of all the facts, in the ignorance of which a mere formal sanction was given by the late Government.

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, I have always understood that when anything is done in the Department under my control by my subordinate officers that I am responsible, and I wish distinctly to repeat that until 1881 I knew nothing about these grants until a Question was put to me by the hon. Member for Harwich. Those grants were made while the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) was Vice President of the Council, occupying my position. They were continued for two years, and I find nothing to justify me in withdrawing those grants, and I take all responsibility for their continuance.

SCIENCE AND ART—THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

MR. COOPE asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the Government is now prepared to carry out the long needed extension of the buildings of the National Gallery, in order to give sufficient space, not only for the works of art already in the possession of the Nation, but also for those which may be presented or bequeathed by private individuals; and, whether greater facilities in future will be afforded to the public to visit the National Collection by lighting the Galleries by Electricity on certain evenings in the week?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Sir, the Estimates for the current year contain no provision for making an addition to the buildings of the National Gallery. The very heavy expenditure for completing the Natural History Museum and the New Law Courts has prevented the Government from entertaining many other demands in respect of public buildings. With reference to the use of the electric light in the National Gallery, the responsibility rests wholly with the Trustees; but I think they would be wise in waiting the results of experiments in other public buildings, especially as regards their safety.

PRISONS (ENGLAND) ACT—PRISON DISCIPLINE.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will cause an independent, or effectually searching, inquiry to be made into the truth, or otherwise, of the numerous complaints against convict prison management which, for months past, have appeared in the "Civil Service Gazette" and other newspapers, and purporting to be written by the warders of those prisons; and, whether it is true, as recently stated in a letter in the "Times," signed "Assistant Warder," at Chatham, that assaults upon the warders "with the fist, stones, bricks, &c. are of almost daily occurrence?"

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, whenever any allegations are brought forward against the management of prisons I always take care that strict inquiry is made into them. For that purpose I have the valuable assistance of Visiting Committees and of the Visitors of the convict prisons, who are entirely independent of the Government. I am happy to say that the Prison Congress the other day gave an unanimous and favourable verdict in favour of the management of prisons. But the prison authorities have a responsible duty in maintaining discipline among the worst classes of society, and I cannot entertain or give credit to anonymous charges in newspapers made by convicts who do not give their names, or by warders who may or may not have been discharged, and who adduce no evidence of what they allege. In my opinion, if I did so I should seriously injure prison discipline, and give encouragement to insubordination.

THE PENAL SERVITUDE COMMISSION, 1879—SPIKE ISLAND.

MR. MULHOLLAND asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What steps are being taken to carry out the recommendation of Lord Kimberley's Commission on Penal Servitude as regards the abolition of Spike Island Convict Prison, and what is the cause of the delay in presenting the Report by the Committee on Convict Labour, appointed some months ago; and, how many times the Committee had met up to the present time?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, as to Spike Island, I have not yet received an answer. The Report of the Committee is in draft, and it will be adopted before the end of the present month.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—JUDICIAL RENTS.

MR. TOTTENHAM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Sub-Commissioners under the Land Act, in making out their orders as to judicial rents, are in the habit of specifically defining the items in respect of which deductions for tenants' improvements are made from the rent, under Clause 8, sub-section 9, together with the amount so deducted; and, if he would have any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a specimen Copy of the order made out in such cases?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): No, Sir; the Assistant Commissioners do not in their orders fixing fair rents specify the improvements in respect of which deductions from former rents are made, nor do they specify the amount deducted. Each order is accompanied by a Schedule of improvements, but the amount of money added to or deducted from the rent in respect of such improvements is not stated in the Schedule. There is no objection to laying a specimen copy of the order made in such cases on the Table; but it is already published in the Appendix to the Report of the Lords' Committee.

NAVY—LIABILITY OF OFFICERS—RETIRED PAY.

MR. ST. AUBYN asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether Naval and Marine officers placed upon half-pay since March 1870 are liable to be called upon to serve?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Sir, I presume that the Question of the hon. Member refers to officers on retired pay, as all naval officers on half-pay are, of course, liable to serve; and officers of the Royal Marines placed temporarily on half-pay from ill-health, or on reduction of establishment, may also, at any time, be recalled to full pay if fit. With regard to naval officers who have been placed on the Retired List since 1870, it is laid down in Article 254 of the Queen's Regulations that they may be called into active service in case of war or emergency. There is no such definite provision regarding retired Marine officers; but it has never been doubted that, in such circumstances, all who are capable of serving Her Majesty would be ready to do so.

ARREARS OF RENT (IRELAND) BILL—THE IRISH CHURCH FUND.

MR. ANDERSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, under the scheme for creating a graduated surplus on the Irish Church Fund, showing £85,597 in 1882, and £24,288 in 1918, he proposes to consider the first of the sums, or the last, or what intermediate sum, a safe basis for the further loan to pay land arrears; whether that new loan is to be a sum on which the surplus from the Church Fund is to pay both the interest and a sinking fund; or, if it is to pay only the interest, leaving the repayment to begin after 1918, when £6,674,000 of present liabilities will be extinguished; and, whether, considering that it is only by postponing liabilities, and spreading over thirty-five years annuities and debts to the National Debt Commissioners intended to be paid much sooner, that any surplus at all can be shown or created, he would endeavour, by some extension of the period, to make the surplus sufficient to pay the whole liability under the Arrears Bill, so as to avoid throwing any part of the burden on the British taxpayer?

MR. W. H. SMITH asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will state the financial arrangements he proposes to make in order to procure the sum of one million five hundred thousand pounds from the Irish Church Fund for the purposes of the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill, seeing that the charges on the Church Fund under existing arrangements (including the repayment of debt) are in excess of the gross yearly income of the fund for many years to come, and that income is liable to serious reduction from the heavy arrears which are accumulating?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GLADSTONE): Sir, I suppose the first of these Questions is suggested by the Return lately laid on the Table, moved for by the junior Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson). It has naturally been supposed that the Return gave information that I intended to lay before the House as the basis of the Arrears Bill, so far as the Church Surplus Fund is concerned; but that is not the case. The Return was moved for without the smallest reference to the Arrears Bill. We are preparing information that will be more relevant to the case; and I suggest that it would be more convenient, especially considering the difficulty of giving a clear answer on a subject of this kind, that we should wait for the further Return, which I hope will be in the hands of Members on Monday next.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881— LOANS TO OCCUPIERS.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the practical impossibility of obtaining an opportunity for discussing the restrictions imposed by Treasury Minute of the 21st December, 1881, upon Loans to Occupiers, under sec. 31, Land Act, 1881, he will consent to relax the most onerous of all, namely, that fixing £100 as the minimum sum to be lent?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I can only say at present that it is a very large and important matter that is involved in this Question; it is no less than this, whether the advances to be made by the Treasury in the cases of particular holdings shall assume the character partially of loans and partially of gifts. I do not wish now to express an opinion whether it ought or ought not to be done. In my opinion, it is much too important a subject to be treated as a mere matter of Executive detail. The question was carefully considered some months ago, when my noble Friend Lord Frederick Cavendish—now lost to the country—was Secretary to the Treasury, and the course that has been adopted is the only course we felt authorized to adopt. The subject is one which will be adverted to at a time when a statement is made to the House as to the course the Government advises on this and other points of importance.

EVICTIONS (IRELAND).

MR. HEALY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If it is the fact, as stated in the press, that the late Mr. Walter Bourke had issued ejectments against such of his tenants (amongst others) as sought to get a fair rent fixed under the Land Act, and that he was about to evict them while their applications were pending; whether the Government have had brought to their knowledge the fact that many tenants who have applied to the Land Courts are meantime threatened with eviction, which must ensue before their cases are decided; and, if he intends to take any steps to protect the interests of such tenants until the Courts have decided upon their applications?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I need not say it was my duty to obtain information on these points from the Irish Government. I understand that the facts are that the agent of the gentleman unfortunately murdered last week, Mr. Bourke, evicted nine families, consisting of 68 persons, for non-payment of rent. All these tenants owed more than two years' rent, one of them nearly seven years' rent, and they refused altogether to pay. It is also stated that they were led to believe that the Land League would see after their rents, and provide them with huts. It is likewise stated that there were no special hardships in these cases. In Galway, Mr. Bourke issued ejectments against five tenants, of whom two subsequently appealed to the Land Court. It was on his return from attending the place where the tenants who appealed did not appear that he was shot. In Mayo ejectment decrees are pending against several tenants; but we have not sufficient information in respect to those decrees, nor have we, nor can we have, general information of the number of tenants who, having applied to the Land Courts, are threatened with eviction. Tenants so threatened can apply to the County Court of the district in which the execution is issued, for the purpose of having the execution stayed. I believe the provision of the law in that respect ought to be sufficient. With regard to the general question as to the stoppage of evictions, I have to repeat to the House that the only mode in which we can shorten the painful proceedings going on, and to some extent, of necessity, going on in Ireland, is by earnestly recommending and entreating the House to make progress and dispatch with the Bills we have now in hand. Every day adds, on the average, 20 to the number of evicted families, or 120 a-week, subject to deductions which I cannot exactly state, on account of those who may be replaced as caretakers. That is going on, and must go on, and we have not the power to check it, even if it were right we should, on which I do not give an opinion at present. I do think the House will feel, without distinction of sections or Parties, that this is a most powerful reason for our endeavouring to get forward with the legislation in hand, in order that the numerous persons who are in arrear and who are unable to pay their rents may have the opportunity of reaching a better and more secure position.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. PARNELL: I wish to ask, Sir, whether the Irish Government can give any information as to the number of tenants whom Mr. Walter Bourke sold out in the county of Mayo before the passing of the Land Act, and so deprived of the legal value of their holdings or title to the protection of the Court. With reference to the appeal of the Prime Minister to expedite the passing of the—[Cries of "Order!"]

MR. GLADSTONE: I have no information from the Irish Government on the subject of Mr. Bourke and his property, except that which I have given; but if the hon. Member will put down the particulars, or let me have them, I will take care to cause inquiry to be made.

MR. HEALY: The facts which have been stated as to the evictions going on and the manner of carrying them out, suggests a Question which I desire to address to the right hon. Gentleman—namely, Whether, as a number of new crimes are being invented by the Prevention of Crimes Bill, he could not include a clause making harsh and cruel evictions of the character which the Chief Secretary for Ireland described yesterday a crime punishable in the same way as "Boycotting?"

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member does not require to be told that the proper time for proposing a new clause is when the Bill is in Committee.

EGYPT AND ITALY—CESSION OF ASSAB BAY.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, with regard to his statement relating to Assab Bay, Her Majesty's Government have recommended the Government of Egypt to agree to the demand of Italy with regard to that harbour; and, what is the exact position of the negotiations on the subject of the Italian establishment at Assab, and of the projected Convention between the Italian and Egyptian Governments? The hon. Member further asked if the right hon. Gentleman was aware that a Bill was presented in the Roman Chamber by Signor Mancini, on the 12th of June, with reference to the Italian establishment in Assab Bay, which declared it to be an Italian colony, made it a free port, exempted the natives from taxation for 30 years, declared that their religion would be respected, and gave the Italian Government the right of making concessions of land and concluding treaties with neighbouring rulers; and, whether, under the circumstances, the right hon. Gentleman still adheres to his previous answer that there has been no recent cession of Assab Bay to the Italians?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the hon. Member has taken a most extraordinary course. He has asked the Prime Minister a long Question on foreign policy without giving any Notice of it. I must say that anything more remarkable I have never seen in all my experience.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: The statement to which I referred has only just appeared; but as it was antecedent to the answer of the Prime Minister that no cession had been made of Assab Bay, or that, at all events, the Government were not cognizant of any cession, I thought I was in Order in pointing out a want of knowledge on the part of Her Majesty's Government.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The hon. Gentleman has given no reason whatever for not putting the Question on the Notice Paper. ["Order!"] He has not given any shadow of a reason. [Renewed cries of "Order!"] More extraordinary conduct—

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I must appeal to you, Sir, whether the hon. Baronet is in Order in using such language?

MR. SPEAKER: If I understand the hon. Baronet correctly, he desires that the Question should be put on the Paper. If so, he is within his right.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I was alluding, not to the Question being put on the Paper, but to the censure which the hon. Baronet made.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I not only must maintain that censure, but I must increase it.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I must appeal to you, Sir.

MR. SPEAKER: I did not interfere with regard to the Question of the hon. Member for Greenwich, as I did not think it was out of Order; but in so far as he puts a Question which is not on the Paper, the hon. Baronet has a perfect right to complain of that part of the Question which was put without Notice.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: My hon. Friend called your attention, Sir, not to the hon. Baronet declining to answer the Question, but to the terms of censure which he used.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I have said, Sir, that I have never known anything more extraordinary than the course taken by the hon. Member with regard to this Question; and I was going on to say, when I was interrupted, that I not only maintain the censure which I gave at first — [Loud cries of "Order!" and "Withdraw!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I am bound to say that if any hon. Member, in putting a Question, which he does entirely within his own right, is subject to censure, that censure should come from the Chair.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The censure, Sir — [Loud cries of "Withdraw!"] In consequence of repeated interruptions, I have never been allowed to finish my sentence. The course adopted by the hon. Member, to which I wish to call attention, began with the Question of which he gave public Notice to the Prime Minister about 10 days ago. The hon. Member wished to ask whether the Prime Minister was aware of the fact that Her Majesty's Government had recently ceded Assab Bay to Italy? These words were struck out at the Table, after public Notice was given; and I am very sorry the Question was so altered, because the Prime Minister would have been able to have made a most indignant reply to the Question in the form in which public Notice was given.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I rise to Order. I never stated anything of the sort.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I am not speaking of the Question which appeared on the Paper, but of the previous Question.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I have a copy of it here. I was perfectly cognizant of the fact that the British Government could not cede Assab Bay to Italy, as it did not belong to the British Government. The words of my Question were these—"And also in view of the recent cession of Assab Bay to Italy;" but not by Her Majesty's Government.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I was speaking, not of the terms of the Question as it was put on the Paper, but of the terms of the Question as it was originally given by the hon. Member, and as it was first printed.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I beg to repeat, Sir, that I never said anything of the sort.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I will place the Question as originally printed before the hon. Member. With regard to the Question on the Paper, I must ask the hon. Member to reserve his desire for further knowledge of the details until the Papers, which we are now bringing out rapidly, are laid upon the Table. I would remind the hon. Member that three weeks ago I answered the Question as it now stands on the Paper.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I beg to give Notice, Sir, that in consequence of the answer of the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, I shall, on the earliest opportunity, draw the attention of the House to this subject, and move a Resolution. As I cannot allow these words to go uncontroverted, I may state that the Question which I put to-day is not in the least degree similar to the one which the hon. Baronet answered last week.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The Question to which I referred was asked by the hon. Member several weeks ago, and led to a discussion across the Table between my right hon. Friend on the Front Bench opposite (Mr. Bourke) and myself. My right hon. Friend said that the Italian flag was not flying at Assab Bay when the late Government left Office. I said it was flying there when the late Government left Office, and that was the case.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I will repeat my Question on Monday.

MR. BOURKE: I never suggested that the late Government gave their sanction to the cession of Assab Bay—quite the reverse.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The present Government also have done nothing with regard to the cession of Assab Bay. They proposed an agreement between Turkey, Italy, and Egypt on the subject. That was declined. It fell to the ground, and nothing whatever was done.

MR. BOURKE: Did not you recommend the Khedive to cede Assab Bay?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The Italians were already at Assab Bay at the time when the late Government went out of Office. We recommended that the position should be “regularized,” and that there should be an agreement between the Porte, the Khedive, and the Italian Government on the subject. That agreement was declined. It never came to anything, and nothing whatever was done.

MR. BOURKE rose, amid cries of “Chair!” and “Order!” to make some further remarks, when—

MR. SPEAKER: The House will, perhaps, allow me to say that in Questions of this character Notice should be given.

PARLIAMENT—SCOTCH BUSINESS.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he will consider the expediency of suspending the Half-past Twelve Standing Order for the remainder of the Session, and thus give the Scotch Members an opportunity of forwarding measures interesting to that part of the United Kingdom, and not affecting England and Ireland, in those sixteen hours formerly appropriated to the business of the House, but of which it is deprived by the Standing Order in question?

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he would like to ask, also, Whether there was any truth in the statement that it was proposed to send Scotch Business to a Committee of Scotch Members, so as to enable those Gentlemen to deal with it in the day-time instead of the dead of night, before the breakfast hour?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, in answer to the Question of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, I am very sensible of the importance of the subject, and I do not wonder that he should put the Question just as if he were in despair; but I must own that to ask the Government to abolish the Half-past Twelve Rule at the present moment is only asking them to add another subject of discussion to the subjects we have already in hand—when the time at their disposal, and at the disposal of the House, is unfortunately very inadequate for its immediate purposes. With respect to the rumour inquired about by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), I should have thought, Sir, if there were any truth in its being intended to make a proposal of this kind, the proposal would have appeared in due course upon the Notice Paper of the House. All I have to say upon this subject at present is that the Government are very ready indeed to receive any suggestion that can be made of a practical character upon this Question, and that it is one to which, undoubtedly, they will give their own serious attention at the earliest moment when they can bring any results of their consideration into a practical form.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Prime Minister whether he would consider the desirability of committing the Irish Coercion Bill to a general Committee of Irish Members?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir, I have no intention of doing that, and I think it would be irregular, under the circumstances; but I may observe, that if I did, the fact would appear that it is only a small minority of Irish Members who oppose the Bill.

WAYS AND MEANS—INLAND REVENUE —DUTIES ON GOLD AND SILVER PLATE.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in view of the serious depression of the silver trade, owing to the uncertainty prevailing in the minds of manufacturers and dealers respecting the duties upon gold and silver plate, and, seeing the various objections to the grant of a drawback upon existing stocks, and, seeing that no drawback has been allowed in the case of holders of duty-paid stocks of cotton and other European goods in India, who have had to sacrifice very largely under the recent Budget, Her Majesty's Government are prepared to adhere to their determination not to abolish the duties in the present Session of Parliament?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GLADSTONE): Sir, there is a good deal in the suggestion evidently meant to be conveyed by this Question; but I believe, as far as my knowledge and means of forming a judgment goes, that the mode indicated by the hon. Gentleman is the only mode out of the embarrassment attending this subject. But, considering the time of the year, and that nearly two months have elapsed since the financial plans of the Government were announced, I do not think anything but the prevalence of a general wish will justify Her Majesty's Government in making a proposal on the subject at the present time.

SCIENCE AND ART—THE NATIONAL GALLERY—THE HAMILTON PALACE COLLECTION.

MR. COOPE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he is prepared to avail himself of the opportunity afforded by the sale of the Hamilton Palace Collection, to secure to the Nation some of the unrivalled works of art contained in it?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the subject is one to which the attention of the Trustees of the National Gallery has been carefully directed, as is known to me by their Correspondence with the Treasury, which will, I think, shortly reach its conclusion.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. STOREY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the large increase in the number of evictions in Ireland, he will take immediate steps to introduce a Bill temporarily to stop evictions, or will give special facilities for the discussion of the Bill of the honourable and gallant Member for Galway?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I may, perhaps, remind the hon. Member that to expedite our proceedings is the only manner in which we can possibly act in a beneficial way in this question. With that view, it is the intention of the Government, in consequence of the experience we have had, to ask the House to hold a Morning Sitting to-morrow, and on Fridays, during the present pressure of Business. When that is over we shall see how we stand. Moreover, it is my intention to move to-morrow—which I may as well mention publicly now—that the Arrears (Ireland) Bill do take precedence on all days when it is set down for discussion of all other Orders of the Day and Notices of Motion except the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: When that Motion is made, I shall ask the Government for some general account of what Business they intend to take besides that.

MR. CHAPLIN: I beg to give Notice that, when the right hon. Gentleman makes that Motion, I shall ask the Government to give facilities for the discussion of the Agricultural Tenants' Compensation Bill this Session, as that measure is awaited with so much anxiety by great numbers of farmers.

ADULTERATION ACTS—LARD CHEESE.

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON asked the President of the Board of Trade a Question of which he had given him private Notice—namely, Whether, in an answer given on Monday last, he had not attributed to Lord Vernon language which had really been used by the President of the Royal Agricultural Society?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Sir, I have had the advantage of a conversation with Lord Vernon, and I am glad of an opportunity of correcting a mistake which seems to have caused Lord Vernon some little annoyance. It appears that the words which I quoted as having been spoken by Lord Vernon at a meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society were really spoken by the President, Mr. Dent. The mistake arose in this way. The Report from which I derived my information put these remarks down to the President, having previously spoken of Lord Vernon as Chairman, and hence my mistake. These remarks were to the effect that the introduction of lard or oleomargarine would enable dairy companies to work up their skim milk into a wholesome article of food; that the Council should be careful before writing to request the interference of the Board of Trade, as it was a question whether the public were not benefited by such forms of cheap and wholesome food. I am very glad to have the opinion of so eminent an authority as the President of the Royal Agricultural Society on this subject; and I may say that, from all the information I have been able to get, I am inclined to agree entirely with his view. These remarks were made by the President before Dr. Voelcker's Report, but after a statement by Dr. Voelcker, which his subsequent Report confirmed, that these cheeses were perfectly wholesome food. The letter from the Royal Agricultural Society was received on the 9th of June.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—THE ITALIAN GOVERNMENT.

MR. G. W. ELLIOT gave Notice that, on Monday next, he would ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, as he had stated that anarchy would not be allowed to continue in Egypt, he had seen the report of a speech made by the Italian Foreign Minister, to the effect that Italy would not consent to the armed intervention of certain Powers, and whether that referred to England and France?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, I shall not be able to answer the Question more fully on Monday than I can answer it now. I can assure the hon. Member that the Italian Government is acting completely in concert with Her Majesty's Government in the steps that are being taken at Constantinople. I think it only courteous to add that the Government always declines to discuss what is said by foreign Ministers in foreign Assemblies.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT: I should like to ask the hon. Baronet a Question already put to him by the hon. Member for Roscommon (Mr. O'Kelly), but which he did not answer—namely, Whether a requisition has been made by the Khedive or Dervish Pasha that 18,000 Turkish troops should at once be sent to Alexandria from Constantinople? If that is the case, it would take some days before those troops could arrive; and I should like to know, in the present position of affairs, whether, supposing an outbreak, which is said to be imminent at any moment, should occur, and supposing the Egyptian troops should also rise against the European inhabitants, what steps Her Majesty's Government have ordered to be taken in that event?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The reason I did not answer the hon. Member for Roscommon was that I did not hear his Question.

MR. HEALY: The hon. Member asked it twice.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I assure the hon. Member I did not hear the terms of it. With regard to the Question just put, a portion of it I am unable to answer. I believe Dervish has on several occasions asked for troops, but I cannot state precisely the number of Turkish troops that have been applied for. It is not in my power to answer the other portion of the Question.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Are we to understand that Dervish Pasha has asked for Turkish troops, and the European Powers have concurred?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I really cannot give any answer. There are still measures being taken by the European Powers at Constantinople in reference to the steps to be taken in Egypt. I cannot answer further.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT: May we not get some assurance from the Government that some steps will, at any rate, be taken to protect the European population in Alexandria?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I have already stated that there is a large force of men-of-war at Alexandria, and that Sir Beauchamp Seymour has a large force, which he is empowered to land. No doubt, instructions have been given to some of the foreign admirals to a like effect. It is also probable that seamen and marines will also be landed. Besides the Squadron at Alexandria, five ships, the Minotaur, the Achilles, the Agincourt, the Northumberland, and the Sultan, left Gibraltar for Malta at 7 o'clock this morning under Sir Beauchamp Seymour's orders.

MR. CHAPLIN: Are we to understand distinctly from the Government that in the event of there being any fear of further massacres at Alexandria sailors and marines will be landed?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The measures upon which Sir Beauchamp Seymour and Sir Edward Malet may agree will be carried into effect; but I cannot anticipate them. Those on the spot are far better able to judge of the steps to be taken than we can be.

SIR JOHN HAY: Is it not the fact that even the five ships to be added to the Fleet at Alexandria will not make them capable of landing 1,000 men? Is it not the case, also, that those ships are of too great draught to enter the harbour at Alexandria?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: We have already refused to go into detail on those matters; but I believe it is the fact that considerably more than 1,000 men might be landed.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVILEGE—UN-PARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE.

MR. MACARTNEY: I regret to have to rise, Sir, to bring a matter of Privilege before the House. After the Vice President of the Council had answered a Question asked by the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow), the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor), sitting below me, said aloud,

"What a miserable hound that Lord George Hamilton is!" I instantly said, "That is very improper language to use, and especially in the hearing of other Members." Upon this the hon. Member for Roscommon (Mr. O'Kelly) said, "He is an eavesdropper." The remark was made in so loud a tone, that I think it must have been heard by Members sitting behind and around. I said, "That remark is equally improper"——

MR. CALLAN: I rise to Order. I wish to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether this is really a question of Privilege.

MR. SPEAKER: I understand that the hon. Member was pointing out the state of disorder which lately arose in the House.

MR. MACARTNEY: No, Sir; I was calling attention to the remarks I heard.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member, no doubt, should properly have taken notice of those remarks at the time. I believe the hon. Gentleman did rise, but I did not call upon him. If that is so, I think he is quite entitled to call the attention of the House to the matter.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I rise simply to make an appeal to my hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney), and to ask him whether it is conducive to the dignity of the House that such a matter as this should be discussed? If one hon. Member in conversation chooses to apply opprobrious language to another, so much the worse for him.

MR. MACARTNEY: I regret that I should have annoyed my noble Friend the Member for Middlesex, but I thought the language was so unjustifiable that it ought to be taken notice of. Not only was that language used, but when I complained the hon. Member for Roscommon told me that I was an eavesdropper. I wish to ask you, Sir, whether we who sit here in a mixed Party—[A laugh]—very much mixed, I think—should be subjected to have these kind of remarks made out aloud in our hearing?

MR. SPEAKER: I think the House may desire to know from the hon. Members, whose language has been called in question, whether that language has been properly attributed to them.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: In a private conversation addressed to an hon. Friend sitting two places from me, I made use of certain observations.

These were not addressed to the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney), and when he wished to discuss with me those observations I declined; and then he, apparently much irritated, threatened to appeal to you, Sir. I told him he was at liberty to do so.

MR. O'KELLY: When the hon. Member for Tyrone interfered in a conversation which was not directed to him, and with which he had practically nothing at all to do, threatening to call the attention of the House to the matter, I did say to him that he was acting the part of an eavesdropper, because I considered that the conversation, not being addressed to him, he had no reason to intervene.

MR. SPEAKER: I think the House will expect the hon. Members to express regret, because, although these observations were not made openly, still they were made in this House, where hon. Members are accustomed to speak of one another with respect. I am persuaded that the hon. Members, when they come to reflect upon the matter, will think it right to withdraw their observations.

MR. O'KELLY: So far as I am concerned, I will express my regret to the House for having made use of the observations.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I shall not have the least hesitation in withdrawing any expression I have made use of, and which may be considered to be improper. But I may be allowed to say that the account given of the observations by the hon. Member was not altogether correct. However, whatever the expressions were which hon. Members sitting around me reasonably think they have a right to complain of, I willingly withdraw them.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 157.]

(Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 14th June.]

[TWELFTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

PART II.

OFFENCES AGAINST THIS ACT.

Clause 7 (Illegal meetings).

Amendment again proposed,

In page 4, line 15, to leave out from the word "which," to the word "safety," in line 16, both inclusive, in order to insert the words "convened for an unlawful purpose, or with an intent to carry out a lawful object riotously and tumultuously."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'which he has reason to believe' stand part of the Clause."

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he entertained a hope that the Government would accept this reasonable Amendment. Should they not do so, he did not think it was necessary to expend a very long time in discussing the matter. The Prime Minister had said that if there were Members in that House who considered that evictions were crimes—and there certainly were persons in that House who considered evictions to be crimes—the proper time for bringing forward a provision for putting a stop to such evictions would be during the Committee on this Bill. He confessed that he entertained a hope that before long they would come to some clause which would, at any rate, justify some action in that direction on the part of the Committee. In regard to this clause, the Chief Secretary for Ireland had stated that the Bill would give no fresh powers to the Lord Lieutenant, and that the Lord Lieutenant at present could proclaim any meeting; but it was a very serious question whether the Lord Lieutenant in Ireland, or whether the Executive in England, should have a right to intervene in a legally constituted public meeting. The Lord Lieutenant had assumed that right; but it was very doubtful whether he himself, and the police who acted in consequence of a proclamation of that kind, would not be liable to an action. But, be that as it might, he contended that the Bill itself made a distinction. According to this Bill, not only might the Lord Lieutenant proclaim a meeting which he had reason to think dangerous to the safety of the public, but he might punish, under the provisions of the Bill, anyone who attended that meeting. Now, that was a power which he did not possess at present, and it seemed to him a fair and reasonable thing that when anyone was arrested and brought before a magistrate for attending a public meeting, he should have the right to raise the question whether the meeting was convened for an unlawful purpose, or for the purpose of carrying out a lawful object riotously and tumultuously. That was the simple object of his Amendment.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he gathered from the expressions made use of by the hon. Member that he intended to persevere with this Amendment. Personally, he thought the Amendment unnecessary, because it sought to limit the power the Lord Lieutenant at present had by law. He objected very much to the clause as it stood in the Bill, and he should have been prepared to vote for an Amendment upon it in regard to the punishment; but he objected to the proposal of his hon. Friend, on the ground of the restriction it placed on the power of the Lord Lieutenant. He certainly thought that the power possessed by the Lord Lieutenant in reference to the prohibition of public meetings at the present moment was sufficient; but as the Amendment restricted that power he was unable to support it.

MR. MARUM said, the law as to public meetings was the same both in England and Ireland, and it had been recently held by English Judges in the case of the Salvation Army riots at Weston-super-Mare that if a meeting held for a lawful purpose were interfered with by other persons, it was for the Government to prevent that interference. In the case in question, certain persons attended a meeting of the Salvation Army, and met another army in the same town. There was a free fight, and they overpowered the constables. The matter was brought before the local magistrates, who issued a circular in the nature of a proclamation, prohibiting another meeting of the Salvation Army in consequence of the previous fight which had taken place, anticipating that a similar occurrence might happen again. The question was submitted to a Superior Court whether, under the circumstances of the case, the magistrates were justified in issuing that prohibition, and Mr. Justice Field and Mr. Justice Cave gave a lucid judgment, in which they held the magistrates were not justified under the circumstances in the action they took, but that it was the duty of the Executive to have a sufficient force in the town to preserve the peace, and that the fact of a large procession going through the town drawing together a considerable number of persons, if its object was peaceable, had a legal right to hold that meeting. The Judges, therefore, quashed the conviction; and he gathered that the law of England, in consequence of that decision, was that a lawful meeting could be held for a lawful purpose, and that if it were so interfered with by any other persons it was the duty of the Government to prevent the interference. In his opinion, it was an extremely doubtful matter whether, in Ireland, the Lord Lieutenant, or the Executive, were justified in the proclamations they had issued hitherto; and there was no wonder, under these circumstances, that it had been thought necessary to bring forward a specific clause to enable the Lord Lieutenant to prohibit public as well as private meetings. It seemed to have been forgotten that under the previous sections of this Bill very large powers had been conferred. Any person who took part in an unlawful assembly was liable to the penalties of the Act; and not only that, but any person, by act or words spoken, would fall within the provisions of the 4th section, so that an influence of a very potent character would be exercised upon any person who desired to attend a public meeting. If a man went to a meeting quite innocently, and it turned out to be an unlawful one, or if words were spoken or acts done of a certain character, he would have rendered himself liable to very serious penalties. These were matters that should be taken into consideration when they had to consider that the Lord Lieutenant, of his own caprice, without any control, was to be able to stop any public meeting in Ireland. Yesterday, in discussing the question, it seemed to have been forgotten that they had already passed the 4th and 5th sections of the Bill, and that they would be in full force and effect. He asked why it was necessary that the arbitrary powers conferred by this clause should be vested in the Lord Lieutenant? He knew that they must bow to the inevitable, and that the section would pass, and his observations were hardly directed against a refusal of this power, because, as he said, it was inevitable that it would be given. But

These were not addressed to the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney), and when he wished to discuss with me those observations I declined; and then he, apparently much irritated, threatened to appeal to you, Sir. I told him he was at liberty to do so.

MR. O'KELLY: When the hon. Member for Tyrone interfered in a conversation which was not directed to him, and with which he had practically nothing at all to do, threatening to call the attention of the House to the matter, I did say to him that he was acting the part of an eavesdropper, because I considered that the conversation, not being addressed to him, he had no reason to intervene.

MR. SPEAKER: I think the House will expect the hon. Members to express regret, because, although these observations were not made openly, still they were made in this House, where hon. Members are accustomed to speak of one another with respect. I am persuaded that the hon. Members, when they come to reflect upon the matter, will think it right to withdraw their observations.

MR. O'KELLY: So far as I am concerned, I will express my regret to the House for having made use of the observations.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I shall not have the least hesitation in withdrawing any expression I have made use of, and which may be considered to be improper. But I may be allowed to say that the account given of the observations by the hon. Member was not altogether correct. However, whatever the expressions were which hon. Members sitting around me reasonably think they have a right to complain of, I willingly withdraw them.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND)

BILL.—[BILL 157.]

(Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 14th June.]

[TWELFTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

PART II.

OFFENCES AGAINST THIS ACT.

Clause 7 (Illegal meetings).

Amendment again proposed,

In page 4, line 15, to leave out from the word "which," to the word "safety," in line 18, both inclusive, in order to insert the words "convened for an unlawful purpose, or with an intent to carry out a lawful object riotously and tumultuously."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'which he has reason to believe' stand part of the Clause."

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he entertained a hope that the Government would accept this reasonable Amendment. Should they not do so, he did not think it was necessary to expend a very long time in discussing the matter. The Prime Minister had said that if there were Members in that House who considered that evictions were crimes—and there certainly were persons in that House who considered evictions to be crimes—the proper time for bringing forward a provision for putting a stop to such evictions would be during the Committee on this Bill. He confessed that he entertained a hope that before long they would come to some clause which would, at any rate, justify some action in that direction on the part of the Committee. In regard to this clause, the Chief Secretary for Ireland had stated that the Bill would give no fresh powers to the Lord Lieutenant, and that the Lord Lieutenant at present could proclaim any meeting; but it was a very serious question whether the Lord Lieutenant in Ireland, or whether the Executive in England, should have a right to intervene in a legally constituted public meeting. The Lord Lieutenant had assumed that right; but it was very doubtful whether he himself, and the police who acted in consequence of a proclamation of that kind, would not be liable to an action. But, be that as it might, he contended that the Bill itself made a distinction. According to this Bill, not only might the Lord Lieutenant proclaim a meeting which he had reason to think dangerous to the safety of the public, but he might punish, under the provisions of the Bill, anyone who attended that meeting. Now, that was a power which he did not possess at present, and it seemed to him a fair and reasonable thing that when anyone was arrested and brought before a magistrate for attending a public meeting, he should have the right to raise the question whether the meeting was convened for an unlawful purpose, or for the purpose of carrying out a lawful object riotously and tumultuously. That was the simple object of his Amendment.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he gathered from the expressions made use of by the hon. Member that he intended to persevere with this Amendment. Personally, he thought the Amendment unnecessary, because it sought to limit the power the Lord Lieutenant at present had by law. He objected very much to the clause as it stood in the Bill, and he should have been prepared to vote for an Amendment upon it in regard to the punishment; but he objected to the proposal of his hon. Friend, on the ground of the restriction it placed on the power of the Lord Lieutenant. He certainly thought that the power possessed by the Lord Lieutenant in reference to the prohibition of public meetings at the present moment was sufficient; but as the Amendment restricted that power he was unable to support it.

MR. MARUM said, the law as to public meetings was the same both in England and Ireland, and it had been recently held by English Judges in the case of the Salvation Army riots at Weston-super-Mare that if a meeting held for a lawful purpose were interfered with by other persons, it was for the Government to prevent that interference. In the case in question, certain persons attended a meeting of the Salvation Army, and met another army in the same town. There was a free fight, and they overpowered the constables. The matter was brought before the local magistrates, who issued a circular in the nature of a proclamation, prohibiting another meeting of the Salvation Army in consequence of the previous fight which had taken place, anticipating that a similar occurrence might happen again. The question was submitted to a Superior Court whether, under the circumstances of the case, the magistrates were justified in issuing that prohibition, and Mr. Justice Field and Mr. Justice Cave gave a lucid Judgment, in which they held the magistrates were not justified under the circumstances in the action they took, but that it was the duty of the Executive to have a sufficient force in the town to preserve the peace, and that the fact of a large procession going through the town drawing together a considerable number of persons, if its object was peaceable, had a legal right to hold that meeting. The Judges, therefore, quashed the conviction; and he gathered that the law of England, in consequence of that decision, was that a lawful meeting could be held for a lawful purpose, and that if it were so interfered with by any other persons it was the duty of the Government to prevent the interference. In his opinion, it was an extremely doubtful matter whether, in Ireland, the Lord Lieutenant, or the Executive, were justified in the proclamations they had issued hitherto; and there was no wonder, under these circumstances, that it had been thought necessary to bring forward a specific clause to enable the Lord Lieutenant to prohibit public as well as private meetings. It seemed to have been forgotten that under the previous sections of this Bill very large powers had been conferred. Any person who took part in an unlawful assembly was liable to the penalties of the Act; and not only that, but any person, by act or words spoken, would fall within the provisions of the 4th section, so that an influence of a very potent character would be exercised upon any person who desired to attend a public meeting. If a man went to a meeting quite innocently, and it turned out to be an unlawful one, or if words were spoken or acts done of a certain character, he would have rendered himself liable to very serious penalties. These were matters that should be taken into consideration when they had to consider that the Lord Lieutenant, of his own caprice, without any control, was to be able to stop any public meeting in Ireland. Yesterday, in discussing the question, it seemed to have been forgotten that they had already passed the 4th and 5th sections of the Bill, and that they would be in full force and effect. He asked why it was necessary that the arbitrary powers conferred by this clause should be vested in the Lord Lieutenant? He knew that they must bow to the inevitable, and that the section would pass, and his observations were hardly directed against a refusal of this power, because, as he said, it was inevitable that it would be given. But the object of his Amendment was to restrict the powers of the Lord Lieutenant. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had very properly brought forward the fact that under the section—

“The Lord Lieutenant may from time to time, by order in writing to be published in the prescribed manner, prohibit any meeting which he has reason to believe to be dangerous to the public peace or the public safety.”

In the decision he (Mr. Marum) had alluded to at the commencement of his observations—namely, the Weston-super-Mare case—it was distinctly laid down by the Judges that although in the opinion of the magistrates the public safety and the public peace were in danger, nevertheless the magistrates were not authorized to issue a proclamation prohibiting a contemplated meeting, so that they might prevent similar riots. It was, therefore, established that an apprehension in regard to the public safety, or of the commission of a breach of the peace, was not sufficient in Common Law to authorize the issue of a proclamation of this kind. He did not know whether it was intended by the words “public safety” to include anything beyond the public peace. The section said “the public peace or the public safety;” but it was not questioned whether public safety meant anything more than public peace. His remarks on the present Amendment would render unnecessary any lengthened observations on the next Amendment which stood in his name, which was to the effect that no proclamation should take effect except on a sworn information in writing.

MR. P. MARTIN said, that in considering the Amendment they ought to have regard to what the exact state of the law was. At the present moment, under the existing law, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was, as had been stated by the Attorney General, empowered to prohibit a meeting; but he (Mr. P. Martin) submitted that under the existing law, if the Lord Lieutenant prohibited a meeting, it was competent for any person who had attended that meeting, if indicted in a Court of Justice, to question the legality of the proclamation issued by the Lord Lieutenant. No doubt, it was the duty of every subject of the Queen, when he came to the meeting and found such a proclamation had been issued, to leave the meeting at once; but he was still at liberty to question, if prosecuted, the legality of the proclamation. The learned Attorney General for England (Sir Henry James) might recollect that in the celebrated case of the prosecution against Mr. O'Connell the legality of what was known as the celebrated proclamation of Clontarf had been strongly questioned. The Act of 1833 had been referred to by the Secretary of State for the Home Department. The framers of the Act of 1833 knew that the law was as he (Mr. P. Martin) had stated it; and on referring to the 2nd section of that Act, it would be found that when, for the first time, power was given to the Lord Lieutenant, by Statute, to make this proclamation, it was prescribed that persons attending a proclaimed meeting should be guilty of a statutable misdemeanour, and indictable at Common Law only after notice given and knowledge. It was only in that way, even under the Act of 1833, stringent as that Act was, that punishment was inflicted upon any person who was present at a meeting which had been proclaimed by the Lord Lieutenant. What was proposed to be done by this Bill, if it passed into an Act, was totally and entirely different. What was stated in this section was that—

“The Lord Lieutenant may from time to time, by order in writing to be published in the prescribed manner, prohibit any meeting which he has reason to believe to be dangerous to the public peace or the public safety.”

Therefore, it would be incompetent for anyone to question anything except the fact that the meeting was proclaimed, and that it took place. The section went on to say that—

“Any person who is present at a meeting prohibited in pursuance of this Act shall be guilty of an offence against this Act.”

Under that clause, the Lord Lieutenant had power to prohibit a meeting that was perfectly legal and justifiable; but a person attending it would be liable to six months' imprisonment. It would apply even to a meeting that took place in a vestry of a chapel in Ireland. Suppose such a meeting was called for 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and the Lord Lieutenant proclaimed it at 10 minutes past 4, any person who was present at the meeting, whether he knew of the proclamation or not, was at once, under this section, if it were passed into law, made guilty of an offence punishable by imprisonment with hard labour. There was nothing in the section to provide that a guilty knowledge should be brought home to the accused. Therefore, the clause did two things—it did away with the protection which existed under the present law of a right to question the ground on which the proclamation was issued; and it went further, and enabled a person to be convicted of an offence, for which the penalty was six months' imprisonment with hard labour, although at the time he attended the meeting he might not have been aware of the existence of such proclamation. The Act of 1833 was extremely stringent, but it contained no provision as stringent as this. Under the Act of 1833 a person present at a proclaimed meeting must first be requested to leave, and it was only after refusing to leave that he was liable to be indicted at Common Law for a misdemeanour. They all knew that the Act of 1833 was an Act which had always been looked upon as the most unjust and tyrannical measure which had ever been placed on the Statute Book, and so unjust and tyrannical that the Parliament which passed it had to modify it the very next year. But even in that Act the injustice which might be inflicted under the operation of the present clause could not have been committed.

THE CHAIRMAN wished to point out to the hon. and learned Member that he was speaking against the entire clause, upon which there were a number of Amendments, and that he was altogether departing from the Amendment now before the Committee.

MR. P. MARTIN said, he was afraid the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair had not understood the drift of his argument. Perhaps he had been enlarging a little unnecessarily; but he was illustrating the evil effect of allowing the present words to remain without amendment in the Bill, and desired to show that if the clause was to remain without the Amendment in its present state, it would be contrary to all precedent, and not be in accordance even with the Act of 1833.

THE CHAIRMAN said, there were various Amendments upon the Paper, which would come on for discussion in regular order; but the hon. and learned Member was at present discussing the whole clause.

MR. P. MARTIN said, he did not intend to do so, and if he had transgressed he regretted it. The object of the Amendment, he conceived, was to safeguard the clause, by making it necessary, in case of prosecution, that the Executive should be bound to prove that the meeting was in fact what was recognized in law as an illegal meeting. To show the necessity for some such protection for persons who might be innocent, he had considered it desirable to show what would be the practical working of the clause in its present form, unamended, and the evil effects of permitting the mere belief of the Lord Lieutenant, even though it could be shown that belief was unreasonable and ill-founded to subject any persons who attended to liability to six months. It was in aid of the view he desired to present that he had alluded to the Act of 1833, which, as he had stated, did not make the fact of attendance criminal until notice had been given to the persons present at the meeting; and he had then been going on to illustrate that the punishment, even after guilty knowledge was established, was simply by indictment under the Common Law, with the protection of a jury. No doubt there was considerable difficulty in discussing an Amendment of this character when there were a number of other Amendments upon it.

MR. DILLWYN said, he ventured to express an earnest hope that the Government would listen to the very moderate proposal of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). The hon. and learned Member who had just spoken showed that the clause placed great additional power in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant. They were now giving powers of a most arbitrary character, together with a summary penalty upon people who attended public meetings. The Act of 1833 did not give such powers, and he confessed that he did not like to leave it absolutely to the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant upon a penal question of this sort. He thought there ought to be a definition, and a hard line drawn, as to what was to constitute an illegal meeting, and that it ought not to be left to the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant. He, therefore, appealed to Her Majesty's Government to modify the clause in the direction of the proposal of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). He did not like the Bill at all, and he certainly did not like this clause; but, at the same time, he thought this clause would be made much more acceptable, and much more workable, and much more efficient if the feelings and traditions of the Supporters of Her Majesty's Government on that side of the House were studied by agreeing to a modification of it. Therefore, even now, at the last hour, he would venture to hope that Her Majesty's Government would reconsider the clause, and accede to the very moderate demand his hon. Friend (Mr. Labouchere) had made.

Mr. J. LOWTHER said, it appeared to him that if Her Majesty's Government on their responsibility had announced that the Irish Executive considered the clause to be necessary, it was hardly worth while to entertain Amendments such as that proposed by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). What would be the effect of the proposal now made? The hon. Member proposed that the Lord Lieutenant, who could now prohibit meetings at discretion, should not be able to do so unless he was in a position to prove that they would be dangerous to public safety. ["No, no!"] He had before him the Amendment, which proposed to leave out the words—

"Which he has reason to believe to be dangerous to the public peace or the public safety," in order to insert the words—

"Convened for an unlawful purpose, or with an intent to carry out a lawful object riotously and tumultuously."

It seemed to him that that would make it a matter of the greatest difficulty to stop the meetings which, in the opinion of the Government, were dangerous to the public safety. It must be borne in mind that meetings were not always ostensibly and openly convened for the purpose they were designed to carry out. A meeting was not unfrequently ostensibly convened for a comparatively harmless object; but, in the opinion of the Government, it might not be safe, in the interest of the security of the State, that an excited meeting in a particular locality should take place at all. Her Majesty's Government, stated on the authority of the Lord Lieutenant, that he and those who advised him attached the greatest importance to this clause. The clause itself, he would fairly admit, was a matter for argument, and whether a Bill of this kind should be passed at all was undoubtedly a fair matter for difference of opinion. His own opinion was that it was most desirable to pass a Bill upon these lines; but, of course, hon. Members below the Gangway held a different opinion, approaching the question as they did from an entirely different standpoint. But he trusted that those who wished—as he understood the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) to wish—the Bill to be passed into law would not lend their countenance and support to an Amendment which could have no other effect than to render the clause practically unworkable and useless. Under those circumstances, he trusted that the Committee would not accept any Amendment of this kind.

Mr. STOREY said, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Lowther) asserted that the effect of adopting this Amendment would be to make the clause practically useless for all purposes in Ireland. What he wished to point out to the right hon. Member was this. If the clause were modified according to the wish of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), the present power of the Lord Lieutenant would still be retained in its entirety. What the hon. Member for Northampton wished to do was this—he wanted to draw a clear definition between meetings convened for an unlawful purpose, and meetings convened with an intent to carry out a lawful object riotously and tumultuously, and a class of other meetings which might take place in Ireland, and which had taken place in Ireland. He might give an illustration, which ought to come home to the Treasury Bench. There was a meeting in Hyde Park in favour of Reform in 1866. That was a meeting which the Government of the day prohibited; but it was a meeting which nevertheless was held, and it was held in defiance of the action of the Government, the leaders of the Reform movement stating their intention of contesting the legality of the prohibition. Would the late Chief Secretary for Ireland say that, in regard to such meetings as that, the legality of which might be freely asserted, it was reasonable to provide that every person who attended them was to be liable to six months' imprisonment with hard labour. The proposition of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) was one which he thought the Government might reasonably accept. If there was a meeting for an unlawful purpose, or a meeting with an intent to carry out a lawful object riotously and tumultuously, then let them take the power to prohibit it, and also the power to send a man who attended it to gaol for six months. He did not mean to say, personally, that he agreed even with that. He thought there ought to be a further limitation—namely, in the case of meetings which might have ended in tumult, but which might not have been called for the purpose of tumult. He thought it would be very unfair to send men to gaol for attending a meeting of that kind. He had listened to the statement of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, when he suggested to the Committee that they might fairly trust the Irish Executive Government; but the right hon. Gentleman was unable to tell them that the Government which might succeed the present one might not act very differently from the manner in which the present Government would act. He should like to call the attention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland to the words of his Predecessor, the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), who said that there were two grounds on which a meeting ought to be dispersed—one was danger to individuals attending them, and the other was that, directly or indirectly, they might be the occasion of an excitement that would probably lead to a breach of the peace. Now, he had sat upon the Bench in the North of England, and he understood what it was to have a meeting prohibited, because it was calculated to lead to a breach of the peace; but he was prepared to say that no public meeting had been held in a time of excitement in the North of England, or in any part of England, which could not have been prohibited, according to the elastic definition of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster)—namely, a meeting which led, either directly or indirectly, to excitement which might end in a breach of the peace. He would ask what were all their public meetings if they were worthy of the name of public meetings at all, and were to have any influence upon public affairs? All their meetings were full of excitement; they were unable to make any effect upon Parliament until a time of excitement came, and it was the same in Ireland, and yet, according to a Liberal Ministry, and to a late Liberal Chief Secretary for Ireland, they ought to prohibit meetings upon such a ground as this; but he had never understood the late Chief Secretary for Ireland to say that he would hold for a moment that if a man attended such a meeting as that, even if it were prohibited, he ought to be liable to six months' imprisonment, and be deprived of the right of contesting the prohibition of the meeting. Under these circumstances, he pressed upon the Government, though probably he and his Friends who entertained the same view were almost helpless in the matter, that they should reconsider their decision with regard to this Amendment. No doubt those who supported it were few in number; but, nevertheless, they pressed upon the Government, having regard to their own declarations in past days, and to the danger which might possibly arise if the clause passed in its present form, that they should accept some modification in the clause as it stood at present.

Mr. Dillwyn

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought it would be far better to negative the clause altogether than to make it perfectly nugatory and useless, as would be the effect of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). It was altogether beside the mark to say that such a clause as this was not wanted in England. They all knew that perfectly well. Nor would it apply to such meetings as that which was presided over the other day in Hyde Park by the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen). Everybody knew that the feeling of the community in England was on the side of the law, and, therefore, meetings might be held without danger in this country which would be altogether unsafe under the present condition of Ireland. It was upon that ground that meetings had been prohibited within the last two years in Ireland, and upon that ground alone. He complained that the same arguments were urged over and over again. The opinion of the Government was that the powers which were taken in the year 1833 were necessary at the present day. He fully understood that hon. Members opposite were not of that opinion; but the Government did not obviously share that view, or they would never have introduced the present Bill.

MR. SEXTON said, there was a definition of prohibition in the Act of 1833.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the definition of prohibition was that public notice should be given, and a similar definition was given in this clause—namely, that it should be a meeting which the Lord Lieutenant had reason to believe “to be dangerous to the public peace or the public safety.” There was quite as much necessity to take such powers as there were in the year 1833. The Irish Executive were of opinion that the powers were necessary, and that they should not be confined to meetings convened for an unlawful purpose; but it was not likely that meetings would be made public which were convened for an unlawful purpose, or with an intent to carry out a lawful object riotously or tumultuously, and, therefore, the Government could not accept the words of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). There might be many meetings held which it was desirable to prohibit altogether outside the terms of the hon. Member’s Amendment. No doubt such a ground would be the ordinary ground for magisterial intervention in England; but the Government had never pretended or claimed that they desired to deal with such cases in Ireland. They asked for exceptional powers here to deal with an exceptional danger. It was highly probable that meetings might be convened for an unlawful purpose at which the language used might be of such an inflammatory character as to lead to evil results; and they felt that it ought to be within the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant, who was the person responsible for the public safety in Ireland, to prohibit such a meeting. He wished hon. Members opposite to understand clearly that, in the view of the Government, it was perfectly idle to expect that they could depart from the principle they had laid down in this clause, or accept Amendments which would, in point of fact, entirely defeat the object of the Bill.

Sir William Harcourt

MR. CALLAN said, he thought the Home Secretary had misled the Committee as to what the practical effect of adopting the Amendment would be. The right hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to think that if the Amendment were adopted the offence which the clause dealt with would have to be brought under the purview of a jury. Now, the Amendment only struck out the words—

“Which he has reason to believe to be dangerous to the public peace and the public safety;”

and it provided that the Lord Lieutenant might prohibit any meeting—and it provided that any person who was present at such a meeting so prohibited should be guilty of an offence under the Act. Therefore, the adoption of the Amendment would not place any offence against the Act under the purview of a jury.

“Convened for an unlawful purpose, or with an intent to carry out a lawful object riotously and tumultuously;”

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I never said that it would.

MR. CALLAN said, he had not asserted that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had said so, because if he had said so in expressed terms he would have intentionally misled the Committee; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman had done so unintentionally, because he had pointed out that no jury would find a person guilty; and, therefore, he had led the Committee to believe that if they accepted the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) they would place the matter under the purview of a jury. According to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), the Lord Lieutenant would be able to prohibit any meeting convened for an unlawful purpose, or with an intent to carry out a lawful object riotously and tumultuously. And how was that intent to be ascertained? Had they not their Clifford Lloyds, and their County Inspectors Smiths, and their Sub-Inspectors to swear informations that they believed such meetings were convened for an unlawful purpose, and with intent to carry out illegal objects, and in that case the Lord Lieutenant would have full power to prohibit them. Anyone attending such a meeting would come under the Act, and would be taken away from the protecting influence of a jury. It was perfectly clear that if the Committee adopted the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) the Lord Lieutenant would still have full power to suppress any meeting called for an unlawful purpose, or to carry out any unlawful object riotously and tumultuously. They had 300 police officials in Ireland—Sub-Inspectors who would be prepared to swear to any intent that might suit the purpose of the Government. The Home Secretary said that if they adopted the Amendment it would defeat the object the Government had in inserting this clause. He could only gather that that object was to suppress all public meetings in Ireland for the next three years, and to place them completely and entirely at the mercy of the Castle officials; and, under these circumstances, he should certainly vote for the Amendment.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had just told the Committee that certain liberties of speech and action on the part of Her Majesty's subjects could be tolerated in this country, because the feeling here was on the side of the law. Why was the feeling here on the side of the law? It was for a very simple reason—because the law was on the side of the people, because the law was tender of public rights, and because the law was a safeguard of public liberty. Therefore, the feeling in England was, to a very great degree, on the side of the law. If the same treatment were extended to Ireland it would be soon seen that the feelings of the people there would be on the side of the law; but the law in Ireland had been, and was every day being made, the enemy of liberty, the enemy of public right, the enemy of freedom of speech, and of freedom of action—aye, and of freedom of thought, if the law could reach that. Under these circumstances, was it wonderful if the feeling of the people of Ireland was not altogether on the side of the law? If they treated the people of England to the same law that they gave to the Irish people, they would refuse to submit to it; and they would then see whether the feeling of the English people would be on the side of the law. Let them treat the people of England to the Protection of Person and Property Acts; let them treat the people of England to a measure like this; let them treat the people of England to any one of the five coercion measures which had been brought forward since the date of the Act of Union, and then they would see if the feeling of the people of England would be on the side of the law. The feeling of the people of Ireland was what the law of England had made it. It had made it incumbent on every high-spirited man in Ireland to have no feeling on the side of the law, except in so far as the law might be in accord with justice and morality.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member was getting very general in his remarks. He ought to recollect that there was a particular Amendment before the Committee.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he would not contest the ruling of the right hon. Gentleman; but he had been replying to words which had fallen from the Home Secretary, and he thought the Irish Members ought to be free to reply to arguments such as those which had been brought forward on the part of the Government.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had allowed the hon. Member a considerable amount of latitude; but he was now going into a general disquisition, which was not covered by the Amendment.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, that the hon. Members who represented Irish constituencies were under great difficulties, and, of course, they had to submit; but he had been pleading for his own people, and his own country, and the liberties of Irishmen. He hoped he would be excused if he had in any degree, even by an eighth of an inch, gone too far, or occupied half a minute too much of the time of the Committee in replying to the arguments addressed to the Committee by the Home Secretary, and which he had considered to be very important, and calculated to have some effect upon the feeling of the House. Unfortunately, the people of Ireland were placed at the mercy of the Lord Lieutenant in these matters; but the Lord Lieutenant himself was very little more than a name in these cases. The Lord Lieutenant sat in Dublin Castle, and could not personally investigate these districts, or be aware of what was going on in them, or what was likely to go on. He was bound to act upon information supplied to him by men who were notoriously the enemies of Ireland, and the enemies of Irish liberty and of Irish rights—by men convicted at the present moment even under the newly-made Act of Parliament—the Landlord and Tenant Act, which had just been passed—convicted by the decisions of the Sub-Commissioners of having been the robbers of the Irish people for generations; and it was to be upon information supplied by such men that the Lord Lieutenant was to act. Could any man doubt what the result would be under such circumstances? Did anyone not know that the landlords of Ireland hated and detested public meetings for any purpose whatever? If these men could have their own way, there would be a wholesale prohibition of public agitation, or of any public meeting for the assertion of public rights, from one end of the country to the other. It might be said, as a counter argument, that if such had been the will of the landlords there would have been no public meetings. He granted that this power had not been carried out to its utmost limit; but this was a new measure to enable them to carry it out to any limit they chose. Public meetings in Ireland had hitherto been regarded as safeguards, not only of the rights, but of the liberties of the people, and also as affording protection for the peace of the country. He believed that if public meetings could have been held in Ireland during the past two years, there would have been a far better state of things there than now existed. While public meetings were free there was very little crime in Ireland; but since they had been suppressed crime had increased. Under this system of terrorism and oppression crime was bound to grow up and flourish, and it was his firm conviction in regard to this measure that it would not tend to the repression of crime. There could be no doubt that there would be a strong feeling of irritation in the minds of the people when they found themselves shut out from every legitimate mode of agitation. It had been some sort of consolation to the people of Ireland, when they believed that they had grievances to ventilate, to know that the public platforms were open to them, and that they could give public expression to their feelings; it was a satisfaction to them to find that men were able to denounce the injustice which was practised upon them, and to plead for their rights and their liberties. Many a man who went to a meeting of that kind went home with a feeling that there was still in Ireland someone who could speak for them and protect their interests by making a claim for justice and a protest against oppression. But what would happen now? Nothing of the kind could occur. The Irish tenant would have to brood over his grievance in secret. He would have to consult with a few men as desperate as himself; and, maddened by the injustice of being shut from every opportunity of public complaint, and thrown upon his own desperate resources for the vindication of his rights and redress of his wrongs, he would resort to acts that were illegal. He regretted to see the Home Secretary come down there and, in the English House of Commons, ask for the destruction of every fragment of Irish liberty. Where were the great Members of the Liberal Party who in former days had pleaded for liberty? Why did they not come there now and plead for the liberty of the subject in Ireland? Was the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster ashamed to show his face and to speak before the English nation in support of these tyrannical measures? Why was not even the Prime Minister himself present? The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) was committed to this Bill; but he left the work of arguing in favour of tyranny and oppression to other hands than his own.

[Tuesd. Night.]

Mr. T. D. Sullivan

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must point out to the hon. Member that he had never once spoken on the subject of the Amendment, but had been discussing the entire clause. He had not at all referred to the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN: Well, then, Mr. Playfair, I will say no more.

MR. LEAMY said, the rejection by the Government of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) showed conclusively that their object was to stifle free speech in Ireland for the next three years. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary said it was desirable that the Lord Lieutenant should be able to put down meetings at which he reasonably believed speeches might be made of an inflammatory character calculated to excite the public to a breach of the peace, so that a meeting was to be put down, not because it was held for an illegal object, not on account of hostile influence that might be at work for bringing about a breach of the peace, not because it was unlawful or illegal, but simply because the Lord Lieutenant, or anybody thinking for him—for they knew very well the Lord Lieutenant must act on the information of others—believed that at that meeting certain speeches would be delivered which were objectionable. It was evident that the clause was introduced in order to strike at free speech. The Lord Lieutenant, under the present law, had power practically to put down every meeting in Ireland, and he therefore failed to see why the Government should ask for these extraordinary powers. The mere fact of the Lord Lieutenant forbidding a meeting was to constitute every man attending it a criminal in the eye of the law, and liable to six months' imprisonment with hard labour. Suppose a meeting was called in Ireland for a perfectly legitimate object, such as reform of the Land Laws, or an extension of the suffrage—which was very much wanted in Ireland—the Lord Lieutenant would have power to put down such a meeting as that, so that any man at present deprived of a vote who attended it should, for supporting his claim for an extension of the suffrage, be liable to be sent for six months to gaol, and condemned to herd with thieves of the worst character and description, as if he had been guilty of some crime against morality. It was very well to point out that before the Lord Lieutenant could act upon this belief, he must receive information from someone, probably someone living in the locality in which the meeting was to be held, and they all knew that the people who would furnish information of that character to the Castle were men utterly opposed to the popular view that was taken in Ireland of public affairs—men who thought that reform had gone far enough in Ireland, who would like to see no further reform in any direction, and who would easily allow themselves to be persuaded into the belief that a breach of the peace was contemplated, which might be prejudicial to the public safety. He did not like the words "public safety;" he thought they had rather an anomalous sound. He remembered, within the last seven or eight months, public meetings being held in the City which he represented (Waterford), and he was aware that a deliberate attempt was made to endeavour to get that meeting proclaimed. Information was sworn before the magistrate that if the meeting was held it would lead to a breach of the peace on that occasion. The information so sworn was not taken notice of by the authorities, because, happily, the magistrate, and even the police in Waterford, were on the best possible terms with the people; and they knew from long experience that on the occasion of ordinary popular demonstrations they could firmly trust to the people themselves. The result was that large public demonstrations had never been attended with anything tending to a breach of the peace. Nevertheless, this information was sworn, and, no doubt, the gentlemen who sought to have the meeting prohibited had persuaded themselves that it ought to be stopped. It was not stopped; and how were they to know that informations, not a bit more justified, might lead to the stoppage of other meetings in different parts of Ireland? He felt perfectly convinced that the circumstances under which meetings had been proclaimed during the time the late Chief Secretary was in Office—during the last 12 months—were equally questionable; and if this power now sought to be introduced under the present clause had been in the hands of the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), there would not have been a single public meeting held in Ireland during the last two years. He thought the Government would have acted in a more straightforward manner if they had said that for the next two or three years there should be no public meeting in Ireland. He thought they might reasonably accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), if they only designed to put down illegal meetings, or to put down meetings which, in their opinion or judgment, were summoned with an evil intent, or with an intention of carrying out a lawful object in some way that might be considered tumultuously and riotously. That would be a sufficiently extensive power to place in their hands; but they appeared to want the power of taking away every vestige of liberty in Ireland. The moment this Bill passed, he thought it would be the duty of the Irish people to call as many meetings as possible, in order to ascertain if it were intended to allow any meeting whatever to be held. By that means they would soon expose the hands of the Government, and see whether these great powers were to be entrusted to the Lord Lieutenant, simply because he was a Member of the Liberal Party, and was supposed to profess Liberal opinions. He confessed that he himself would rather trust to an Irishman. What guarantee had they for the presumption that any new Lord Lieutenant would be a man of Liberal views, and what guarantee had they for supposing that Lord Spencer would remain long in his present Office? He might very soon become disgusted with the position he was called upon to occupy, and some desperate man might be sent over, who would put a stop to every meeting, no matter how legitimate was the object for which it was called.

MR. GIBSON said, this particular Amendment was really an Amendment that would kill the clause; it was not at all an Amendment to the clause; but, if carried, it would take the life and principle out of it. He did not apply that general criticism to all the Amendments which had been put on the Paper, but only to this particular Amendment. What was it? It was one which asked the Committee to say that it was right only to entrust the power to the Lord Lieutenant to put down meetings that were convened for a certain purpose and with a specific intent. Anyone must see at a glance that that would practically put the Lord Lieutenant at the mercy of the notice that would be issued convening the meeting, and the convener of the meeting would simply have to take care not to convene it for the particular purpose mentioned in the Amendment. Such a proposition would obviously destroy the clause. He would not say that that was the object of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), but he rather thought it was. The Government obviously would not ask for a power like the present unless they were satisfied, on mature consideration, that there was no alternative which would enable them to act without it. Yesterday a letter from the Viceroy had been read, from which it appeared that he had every desire to look at this matter from the fairest and most reasonable standpoint. He believed that if the Viceroy were entrusted with the power named in the Bill it would not be used secretly, and he hoped that it would be left to him to consider whether the meetings were likely to disturb the public peace or the public safety; and, further, that wise and rational counsel would be brought to bear upon the matter. For his own part, he would regret that any Act of Parliament should interfere with the expression of legitimate public opinion; and he ventured to think that neither in England nor in Ireland would any man who understood the condition of the country wish to see any section of an Act applied to check legitimate discussion or fair criticism of abuses. But Ireland at present was in a most critical and dangerous political position; and the Committee would understand that with regard to many parts of the country meetings of certain kinds, held upon certain conditions, might unquestionably be dangerous to the public peace and public safety. Therefore, he did not think it unreasonable that the very difficult and responsible power given by the section should be vested in the head of the Irish Administration. It was, of course, very easy for hon. Members below the Gangway to talk of the tyrannical exercise of an arbitrary discretion; but they lived in a country where the tyrannical exercise of discretion was impossible. One had only to look at the Question Paper to see that nothing great or small could be done without its being brought before the House of Commons; and, therefore, with regard to the power of the clause, whether it were exercised by the present able and capable Nobleman at the head of the Irish Administration, or the Viceroy who succeeded him, he felt sure it would be exercised under conditions that would place it within the reach of the fullest public discussion and examination.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, that although the right hon. and learned Gentleman had professed himself desirous of preserving the right of public meeting, he was about to vote for a clause which, if it were passed without Amendment, would make it absolutely impossible to hold any popular meeting in Ireland during the next three years. Suppose a meeting got up for the most legitimate purpose, and that it was known that the opinions which some people were likely to express there would be distasteful to other persons who might attend the meeting, the Viceroy in that case would say—"This is a meeting which is likely to disturb the peace, and it cannot be held." A person wishing to stop a meeting would only have to say that he was going to oppose, and that there would be a riot, and the Viceroy would consider himself bound to suppress it. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department said this power was as much needed now as it was in the year 1833. He (Mr. Justin McCarthy) did not admit that; but if it were true, what a censure did the words of the right hon. Gentleman pass upon a Government that, after the 50 years of coercion which had elapsed, now brought in another Coercion Bill for the purpose of governing Ireland! He did not think that the policy of the English Government with regard to Ireland had ever been more sternly condemned than by the words of the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

DR. COMMINS said, they had been told it was not the intention of the Government to interfere in any way with the right of public meeting, or with the free expression of public opinion in Ireland; the sentiment had been repeated so often that he thought the Committee were almost tired of it. But notwithstanding this, when any Amendment was introduced with the object of safeguarding that expression of opinion, it was opposed in the strongest possible way, not only by the Government, but by hon. Members on the Opposition Benches. Another of the stock arguments which were bandied from one side of the House to the other had just been made use of by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson). He confessed he was surprised to hear the right hon. and learned Gentleman say that the Government desired the power in the clause; that it was necessary, and that, therefore, the clause should be passed. Why, that argument might be applied to every conceivable law which the Government wished to introduce; but, besides that, it constituted a comprehensive support of tyranny—it was in itself a most illogical and unconstitutional argument. It was inconsistent with the liberties of that House to try to influence the vote of any Member of it by saying he must pass the clause because the Government thought they ought to have absolute power. He protested against that argument.

MR. GIBSON said, he objected to that being represented as his argument. He had said that the House and the country were thoroughly acquainted with the state of affairs in Ireland; and therefore he thought it not unreasonable, with these facts before them, that the Government should ask for these additional powers.

DR. COMMINS said, he was only carrying the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman to its logical end in saying that because the Government thought they required this power, therefore it ought to be granted. If that were not the conclusion which the right hon. and learned Gentleman wished to be drawn, his argument had no meaning whatever. The argument had been put forward on both sides of the House ad nauseam; it was a stock argument introduced against any modification of this most objectionable clause which Irish Members wished to amend. But he was glad to hear that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin disclaimed any desire to carry it to its legitimate conclusion. Another of the arguments of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was that he himself, and everyone in the House who had spoken against the Amendments put forward by Irish Members, and against this one in particular, desired nothing more than that there should be free expression of public opinion in Ireland. If that were the case, he would only say that hon. and right hon. and learned Gentlemen had taken a very strange way of showing the sincerity of their desire. Why, the clause entirely prevented the expression of any public opinion in Ireland whatever. The clause made no provision for weighing and testing the opinion expressed, by the ordinary rules of law, as to whether or no it constituted an offence; but the expression of public opinion was made an offence beforehand, and if the clause remained without Amendment it would give power to the Lord Lieutenant, not only to declare a meeting illegal, but to make it an offence for anybody to be present as a listener. That amounted to an extension of the law which no ukase, law, or decree issued in foreign countries could parallel. The Government said that all they wanted was the power to convict without a jury, because, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had said in the course of the present discussion, it was of no use to send cases before juries who would not convict. That, undoubtedly, was the right hon. and learned Gentleman's argument, and it constituted the raison d'être of the clause. But the clause not only took away trial by jury—it took away trial by evidence. Trial by jury might, perhaps, be dispensed with if an adequate tribunal were substituted for it; but it was impossible that any reasonable assent could be given to a trial without evidence. The latest effort of coercive rule in Ireland rendered some amount of reasonable suspicion necessary; but this clause dispensed even with that, and by it a sentence of six months' imprisonment with hard labour could be inflicted without there being a suspicion of guilt against anybody. The mere attendance at a meeting prohibited beforehand on suspicion would be a crime of itself, even if the person so attending had no knowledge that the meeting had been prohibited. But it was said it was only proposed to prohibit meetings under circumstances that made it a proper thing to do so; to which he replied—"Let those circumstances be defined in the Act." That the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton proposed to do, and the definition supplied by him appeared to be quite sufficient to arm the hands of the Irish Executive in doing what was right. Surely they needed no power to prohibit a meeting held for an illegal purpose. That power the Amendment left untouched, and the Home Secretary, moreover, said—"If such a purpose is openly expressed in the notice calling the meeting, then we should not need this power; we could deal with a case of that kind under the powers we have." Well, even if other powers were necessary for that purpose, let them be given. If it could be shown that under cover of a Constitutional purpose there was an intention to incite to crime, then the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton gave power to the Lord

Lieutenant to suppress any such meeting. That being so, he asked, what more power was required by the Irish Executive? There was no meeting which ought to be suppressed that did not come within the two categories in the Amendment before the Committee; and if something must be done in order to prevent the peace being disturbed, or illegality being done at any public meeting, he contended that the clause as it was proposed to be amended was ample for the purpose. In case of the prohibition of a perfectly harmless meeting, without the Amendment there would be no evidence to show what it was that induced the belief in the mind of the Lord Lieutenant that the meeting was likely to be dangerous to the public peace or the public safety, nor any means of afterwards tracing the person who might have misled the Lord Lieutenant with regard to the meeting. It had been pointed out that the Lord Lieutenant would never act propria motu; and, therefore, if information were given to him that a public meeting ought to be suppressed, and in consequence of that information he were to subject persons to penalties who were not liable at all, there would be no means of finding out who were the real disturbers of the public peace by misleading the Lord Lieutenant. The clause, without amendment, would give facilities to the spy and the informer, and to persons wishing to interfere with the legitimate expression of public opinion, who would be enabled to effect their nefarious purposes with impunity, for there would be no means of bringing them to justice. "But," said the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin, "you have the power of preventing such abuses, because you can always put questions in the House of Commons with regard to any abuse of power in Ireland." Now, he did not think any person who had regarded the course of events in that country would deny that there had been a great abuse of power on the part of somebody; but he should like to know of any person who had been brought to justice for that abuse of power in consequence of the questions that had been asked. He was unable to recollect a single instance of the kind; and, therefore, he concluded that the protection on which the right hon. and learned Gentleman relied was perfectly useless. He cordially supported the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton, because he considered there ought to be some safeguards to protect the people, not against abuse on the part of the Lord Lieutenant, for he did not believe he would abuse his powers intentionally; but against the action of those in whom he would have to trust, and for whom Irish Members had no feeling of confidence—the persons who would be able to put the Lord Lieutenant in motion, so to speak, and utilize his great powers for the purposes of private malice and private partizanship, or for purposes equally to be deplored, and which had already too many facilities for their attainment in Ireland. If the clause was to be worked by the Lord Lieutenant, there must soon be a situation vacant at the Castle; he would be obliged to have a chief prophet, and the opposition of himself and his Colleagues to the clause might be modified if it were known who was to be elevated to that irresponsible post.

MR. BIGGAR said, he differed from the hon. Member for Roscommon (Dr. Commins) on one important point. The hon. Gentleman had told them that the questions put to the Government with regard to Irish abuses had not borne any fruit during the last two years. He confessed there was great difficulty in getting redress of grievances by means of questions and Motions; but he had always felt that if the practice were persevered in beneficial results must follow. Indeed, they knew that substantial advantages had accrued already from the questions asked and the speeches made in denunciation of the Government policy towards Ireland during the last 12 months. The results up to the present time were that they had got rid of a Chief Secretary and a Lord Lieutenant, and he held that a very substantial benefit had been derived from the pressure brought to bear on the Government and on public opinion in Ireland. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had referred to a large meeting which was held in Hyde Park in 1866. Now, he thought the parallel drawn by the right hon. and learned Gentleman should have been carried farther. The people in Ireland would not complain if fault were found by the Lord Lieutenant with a meeting at which real outrage took place; but, as far as he could remember, no prosecution followed the meeting in Hyde Park, although the railings were torn down, and the meeting had been prohibited. He challenged the right hon. and learned Gentleman to say that outrage had taken place at any meeting held in Ireland. It was notorious that the meetings held there had been of the most peaceable character. The Government should speak frankly and say they would only allow meetings to take place when the promoters engaged that no fault should be found with their policy. That was the real meaning of the clause; and the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) simply provided that some specific offence should be expected to take place before a meeting was prohibited, and before the parties attending that meeting as spectators should become criminally liable for so doing. On the question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill," he should probably be able to give the Committee reasons why persons should not be prosecuted criminally on account of things of which they were ignorant. The right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had scarcely stated the case fairly when he said that the Amendment before the Committee proposed that persons should only be liable to prosecution for attending a meeting if it were held for an unlawful object. With submission to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, that was not so. The Amendment required that a specified offence should be charged before the Lord Lieutenant should use his power of prohibition; whereas the clause allowed him to say that he found fault with a meeting because it was likely to lead to disturbance. The Irish Executive was, of course, responsible to the House of Commons for the use made of the information at their disposal; and, therefore, before they put down a meeting, or prosecuted anyone criminally for attending it, they ought to be satisfied that some substantial offence was intended before the powers of this clause were put in motion.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 67; Noes 38: Majority 29.—(Div. List, No. 138.)

[Twelfth Night.]

MR. MARUM, in moving in line 15, after the word "believe," to insert "grounded upon information in writing and on oath," said, this Amendment was not opposed to the principle of the clause. He regarded it as a very important Amendment, and a very substantial one, not being simply an Amendment in form. The object of it was to secure that if meetings were prohibited by the Lord Lieutenant as dangerous, the belief of the Lord Lieutenant as to their danger must be grounded upon information in writing or upon oath. He desired to prevent liberty of speech being curtailed, except upon sworn information. It was the ordinary rule of evidence that the property or liberty of the subject should not be taken away or interfered with, except on sworn evidence; and when so enormous a power was about to be conceded to the Lord Lieutenant, it should be safeguarded by not being left to the personal view of an individual. They all knew the high personal character of the present Lord Lieutenant, who was exceedingly and deservedly popular and well known in Ireland; but, in addition to the personal character of the Lord Lieutenant, there ought to be sworn information as to the circumstances which required a meeting to be prohibited. It should not be left to the caprice of a single individual. He thought that that was not an unreasonable proposal. It ought not to be within the uncontrolled discretion of the Executive to curtail any man's liberty and privileges; and, in his opinion, the Amendment would exercise some check upon the authorities, by providing that the information as to the danger likely to result from a meeting should be given on oath. If the Amendment were accepted, he thought they would be able to go on rapidly with the remaining parts of the Bill. He and his Colleagues would do all in their power to expedite it. [Cries of "No!" from the Irish Members.] What he meant was that they would not do anything of a dilatory character to prolong the discussion. He must say that, to a certain extent, he looked upon the Bill as inevitable. No doubt, they all wished to have the provisions of the Bill properly discussed; but they would not obstruct if they were met in a conciliatory spirit as regarded the Amendments they might feel it their duty to propose.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 15, after the word "believe," to insert the words "grounded upon information in writing and on oath."—(Mr. Marum.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he would be glad if he could meet the views of the hon. and learned Member, who always showed a reasonable spirit; but the fact was that this very same question had been discussed at considerable length on the 1st clause of the Bill as to whether the Lord Lieutenant should exercise his discretion in regard to suspending trial by jury. The question then considered was, whether the Lord Lieutenant should act upon his own responsibility, or whether it was necessary he should have sworn information from other persons? The Government argued upon that clause that full responsibility in the matter must be left to the Lord Lieutenant, and that there should be no one else upon whom the responsibility could be thrown. It was quite plain that a dangerous meeting might be suddenly called, and that very little notice that it was going to be held might be given. Under such circumstances, there might not be sufficient time to get the sworn information to which the Amendment pointed; and, therefore, he was bound to say that the ground on which he declined to accept the Amendment was the same ground on which he had declined to accept a similar Amendment on the 1st clause.

MR. SEXTON said, he did not know whether his hon. and learned Friend felt much honoured by the compliment which had been paid to him by the right hon. and learned Gentleman in regard to the reasonable spirit which had actuated him. He hoped his hon. and learned Friend had well considered the somewhat ardent disposition he seemed to possess to expedite the passage of the Bill. It did not seem that any desire to expedite the Bill by exercising forbearance on the part of the Irish Members would be met in a corresponding spirit by Her Majesty's Government. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary said, in answer to the Amendment, that the responsibility must remain with the Lord Lieutenant. It was needless to point out that the responsibility would equally remain with the Lord Lieutenant, whether he acted upon sworn information or upon hearsay evidence, or some mere whisper, or some vague letter. In any case the belief of the Lord Lieutenant would be the supreme factor. The Amendment allowed the Lord Lieutenant full and free play over every description of public meeting whatever. It did not propose to limit the criminal responsibility of holding an improper meeting even in the case of an ignorant person who, by misadventure, might be present at such a meeting. It left this grievous blow at the rights of the subject untouched. It only sought to accomplish one single object—namely, that the Lord Lieutenant, before declaring a meeting unlawful, and exposing an innocent person to be imprisoned for six months with hard labour, should act upon sworn information. They were told by the Home Secretary that a meeting might be called suddenly, and that the Lord Lieutenant might not have time to get sworn information. Upon that point he would challenge the right hon. and learned Gentleman to sustain or verify his argument by any reference to past facts connected with Ireland. Was it a fact that these meetings were convened with haste? Was it not well known that there was always a week or a fortnight's notice of them in advance? The notices were distributed freely in the locality, and there was ample time to prepare evidence, because in Ireland the police were ubiquitous. They consisted of a large force distributed very skilfully all over the country, and nothing could take place in the humblest hamlet or the remotest nook without their knowledge. As soon as it was decided to hold a meeting the police knew when and where it was to be held, and what was the object of it. Under these circumstances, with an intelligent force pervading the whole of Ireland, and exercising a vigilant surveillance over the whole public proceedings of the country, he could not see why it should not be necessary to have a sworn information. The police, in every case, could furnish such information, and could state the grounds they had for apprehending a breach of the peace. A meeting could be prohibited for two causes—one that a breach of the peace was apprehended at the meeting itself, and another that danger was apprehended to some person who resided in the district. Those were the two grounds which would justify the Lord Lieutenant in proceeding to take action, and it would be perfectly easy for sworn information to be got, and to transmit it to Dublin Castle. If sworn information were required, two advantages would follow. One would be that the Lord Lieutenant, before prohibiting a meeting, would have before him evidence on the subject in regular form. At present the Government avoided the point, by arguing that sworn information would evade the responsibility of the Lord Lieutenant. In this objection they were acting with an ignorance remarkable in persons of their experience and ingenuity. The only effect of requiring the Lord Lieutenant to act upon sworn information would be to assure the people of Ireland that the Lord Lieutenant, before he used this drastic power, had evidence before him—that he was not prohibiting a public meeting upon the mere whisper of the informer, or the tattle of the spy, but upon a tangible statement placed before him in regular form on the sanction of an oath. The second advantage would be that if the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant was subsequently questioned, it would be open to the Irish Representatives to require the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to lay upon the Table the sworn information upon which His Excellency had acted, or, at any rate, to call upon him to do so, leaving the onus of a refusal upon the right hon. Gentleman himself. Whenever the rights of the subject were affected, or the liberties of the people abrogated, it was not only a matter of extreme importance, but of right, that there should be in the official archives a record of the reasons which had led to such an interference with liberty. That was his only reason for supporting this demand for sworn information. He had listened until he was sick of hearing of the Government acting upon their own responsibility. It was an empty and misleading phrase. In this matter the Government had no responsibility whatever. Responsibility meant liability to answer, and responsibility ceased when the Government refused to answer. It was in order to give the materials for enabling them to answer that he called upon them to act only on sworn information.

MR. DILLWYN said, he must confess that he looked upon the Amendment as a very important one, and he still entertained hopes that the Government might be induced to agree to it. The Home Secretary said it was not necessary, in matters of this kind, for the Lord Lieutenant to have sworn information, because he did not require it in cases where he suspended trial by jury. That sounded very well; but, at the same time, it must be remembered that when they suspended trial by jury they substituted another tribunal, which they considered to be quite as satisfactory. But here it was not the case of substituting one tribunal for another, but the case of constituting a new crime; and he certainly thought that before they constituted a new crime the Lord Lieutenant ought to be satisfied by sworn information before he proceeded to take action. He (Mr. Dillwyn) was, therefore, of opinion that this was a most important Amendment, and that it ought to be adopted. In the one case they substituted a new tribunal, and in the other they constituted a new crime. Everyone who recognized the importance of this distinction would, he was satisfied, support the Amendment.

Mr. BIGGAR said, he wished to call the attention of the Committee to another point in the reply of the Home Secretary, where the right hon. and learned Gentleman directed attention to the 1st clause of the Bill. Under that clause, persons who were to be put on their trial before the Special Commission constituted by the Bill must, in the first instance, have been committed for trial upon sworn evidence. First of all, a sworn information must have been laid before a magistrate, and must have been brought under the knowledge of the Attorney General, who, on reading it, would have directed a prosecution; but, in the case to which the Amendment applied, there would be no evidence of any information having been given at all. The Lord Lieutenant might, of his own mere motion, without any information at all from anybody, prohibit a meeting; and he thought it was in the interests of the Lord Lieutenant himself that the Amendment should be accepted, because, in that case, the Lord Lieutenant might be able to say—"I had no opinion whatever as to the desirability of holding this meeting; but I have been reading a statement that something unlawful is likely to take place at it, and, therefore, it is my duty to prohibit it." To supply the Lord Lieutenant with evidence of some kind would be satisfactory to this extent—that it would raise a reasonable suspicion in his mind that some disorder might take place; and, in the next place, he would be able to offer some tangible and reasonable excuse for prohibiting a public meeting. As the matter now stood, the Lord Lieutenant could offer no excuse at all, further than that someone thought it was undesirable to hold the meeting. If the Lord Lieutenant had, in writing, on sworn information, the grounds on which he founded his decision, it would be a perfect answer to any complaint made against him or the Government for suppressing a meeting; but there would be no answer at all if there was an entire absence of any writing, or of any information on oath. In such a case the responsibility would be entirely thrown upon the Lord Lieutenant, and he would have no means of defending himself. If the Lord Lieutenant had the safeguard provided by the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Marum); if it was proposed to censure him for having prohibited a public meeting, he would be able to fall back upon the information upon which he had acted; which he would be unable to do if he acted upon hearsay evidence alone, because the person upon whose testimony the Lord Lieutenant acted would inevitably, in the event of a question being raised as to the wisdom of the discretion exercised, dispute what it was alleged he had actually said. Therefore, in the interest of the Lord Lieutenant himself, it would be much better to agree to the present Amendment; and it was also desirable, because it was not impossible that there might be sworn evidence of a dishonest character, in which case it would be the duty of the Irish Representatives to expose the transaction, and to call upon the Government to dismiss the person by whom it had been given. But, as the case now stood, there were no means of tracing who the informer was, or of testing the value of his information, or of finding out whether a meeting had been improperly prohibited. He regretted that the Government should steadfastly decline to be influenced by argument or reason; but, at the same time, it was the duty of the Irish Members to press these considerations upon their attention.

Mr. Dillwyn

Mr. O'KELLY said, he did not know whether the Government still refused to accept the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Kilkenney (Mr. Marum). Whenever there was a reasonable ground for interfering with a meeting, no doubt the Lord Lieutenant would receive abundant information to enable him to act. It would be in the power of the police to supply ample sworn information. It might put the Government to a small amount of additional trouble; but in a most important matter of this kind, where the liberties of the people were at stake, the Government ought not to hesitate taking trouble when it became necessary in order to base their action upon reasonable cause. If the Government acted as they would be able to act under the clause as it stood, the rights of public meeting would be at the mercy of any malicious person in Ireland; and they would see occurring, very frequently, what had already occurred in the past—namely, that some malicious person in a district would supply the Lord Lieutenant with information, which had no solid foundation whatever, and thereby deprive the people of the district of the right to hold a public meeting. He thought these were powers which the Government ought to exercise with the utmost discretion, and that they ought to surround their exercise with every possible guarantee for the liberty of the subject. If they accepted this Amendment, some slight guarantee would still remain for the right of public meeting. There would also be this further advantage—that there would be some ground available for the House by which it might be able to pass a judgment upon the action of the Lord Lieutenant. It was most important, he thought, that hon. Members should be able to challenge the action of the Irish Executive. The Irish Executive was a centralized Body, and it acted from motives which the public had great difficulty in understanding. It was desirable that the Members from Ireland should be able to challenge the Representatives of the Executive in that House to defend the action they deemed it expedient to take. If the Amendment were adopted, there would be a record on which to go, by which they would be able to pin the Government to a responsibility for everything they did.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 41; Noes 59: Majority 18.—(Div. List, No. 139.)

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, in the absence of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), he begged to move the Amendment next upon the Paper. It would be evident to the Committee that the words "dangerous to the public safety" might be applied to anything that the Government found to disagree with their own views. The meaning of the Amendment was, therefore, obvious, and he trusted the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary would be able to agree to it.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 16, to leave out the words "or the public safety."—(Mr. T. P. O'Connor.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'or the public safety' stand part of the Clause."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had already stated that he had followed the language of the Act of 1833. The words "public peace or the public safety" indicated what it was that the clause was intended to protect, and to omit them would be to take away the very ground on which the clause rested.

Mr. HEALY said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to think there was no material difference between the state of the country at the present time, and the state of the country 50 years ago, and his argument practically amounted to this—that what was good for Ireland then was good now. It was quite clear that the clause would enable the Lord Lieutenant to stop any meeting he pleased, and he was unable to see why the clause did not end at "meeting" in line 15. To his mind, there was no reason whatever for the remaining words of the clause, and the argument that they were included in this Bill because they were in the Act of 1833 was inadmissible. Irish Members desired a statement as to the character of the meetings which the Government wished to prohibit, because he did not attach much importance to the words of qualification at the end of the clause. If he

Bill passed, he thought it would be the duty of the Irish people to call as many meetings as possible, in order to ascertain if it were intended to allow any meeting whatever to be held. By that means they would soon expose the hands of the Government, and see whether these great powers were to be entrusted to the Lord Lieutenant, simply because he was a Member of the Liberal Party, and was supposed to profess Liberal opinions. He confessed that he himself would rather trust to an Irishman. What guarantee had they for the presumption that any new Lord Lieutenant would be a man of Liberal views, and what guarantee had they for supposing that Lord Spencer would remain long in his present Office? He might very soon become disgusted with the position he was called upon to occupy, and some desperate man might be sent over, who would put a stop to every meeting, no matter how legitimate was the object for which it was called.

MR. GIBSON said, this particular Amendment was really an Amendment that would kill the clause; it was not at all an Amendment to the clause; but, if carried, it would take the life and principle out of it. He did not apply that general criticism to all the Amendments which had been put on the Paper, but only to this particular Amendment. What was it? It was one which asked the Committee to say that it was right only to entrust the power to the Lord Lieutenant to put down meetings that were convened for a certain purpose and with a specific intent. Anyone must see at a glance that that would practically put the Lord Lieutenant at the mercy of the notice that would be issued convening the meeting, and the convener of the meeting would simply have to take care not to convene it for the particular purpose mentioned in the Amendment. Such a proposition would obviously destroy the clause. He would not say that that was the object of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), but he rather thought it was. The Government obviously would not ask for a power like the present unless they were satisfied, on mature consideration, that there was no alternative which would enable them to act without it. Yesterday a letter from the Viceroy had been read, from which it appeared that he had every desire to look at this matter from the fairest and most reasonable standpoint. He believed that if the Viceroy were entrusted with the power named in the Bill it would not be used secretly, and he hoped that it would be left to him to consider whether the meetings were likely to disturb the public peace or the public safety; and, further, that wise and rational counsel would be brought to bear upon the matter. For his own part, he would regret that any Act of Parliament should interfere with the expression of legitimate public opinion; and he ventured to think that neither in England nor in Ireland would any man who understood the condition of the country wish to see any section of an Act applied to check legitimate discussion or fair criticism of abuses. But Ireland at present was in a most critical and dangerous political position; and the Committee would understand that with regard to many parts of the country meetings of certain kinds, held upon certain conditions, might unquestionably be dangerous to the public peace and public safety. Therefore, he did not think it unreasonable that the very difficult and responsible power given by the section should be vested in the head of the Irish Administration. It was, of course, very easy for hon. Members below the Gangway to talk of the tyrannical exercise of an arbitrary discretion; but they lived in a country where the tyrannical exercise of discretion was impossible. One had only to look at the Question Paper to see that nothing great or small could be done without its being brought before the House of Commons; and, therefore, with regard to the power of the clause, whether it were exercised by the present able and capable Nobleman at the head of the Irish Administration, or the Viceroy who succeeded him, he felt sure it would be exercised under conditions that would place it within the reach of the fullest public discussion and examination.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, that although the right hon. and learned Gentleman had professed himself desirous of preserving the right of public meeting, he was about to vote for a clause which, if it were passed without Amendment, would make it absolutely impossible to hold any popular meeting in Ireland during the next three years. Suppose a meeting got up for the most opposition to them should be withdrawn. With regard to the question as to whether the Act would apply to indoor meetings, he should say that it would so apply. It would be found in the Act of 1833 that power was given to the magistrates to enter any house, room, or other place where they had information that meetings were to be held; and the object of the Government would not be fulfilled if indoor meetings of an inflammatory kind were allowed on occasions and under circumstances likely to lead to the use of language calculated to be injurious to the public safety, because although the meeting might be of little interest in the urban district in which it was held, the report of it would be sent far and wide in the country. These were the views of Her Majesty's Government; and, although he could not hope to persuade hon. Members opposite to adopt them, he had felt it his duty to state the grounds on which the Government proposed this clause of the Bill. That being so, he trusted he should not be considered to act unreasonably in declining to accept an Amendment which was inconsistent with the intention of the Government. The words "or public safety" were meant as an instruction to the Lord Lieutenant that he should read by their light the information which he might receive from the Resident Magistrates. For his own part, he believed that this object would be fulfilled, and that the Lord Lieutenant would act strictly in accordance with what he understood to be the intention of the Government.

MR. SEXTON said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had informed the Committee that Irish Members in that part of the House were desirous that the words "public peace" should be left out of the clause as well as the words "public safety." But that was not so; the proposal was simply to leave out the words "or public safety." They all understood the meaning of the former words, but felt that in speaking of "public safety" they were entering upon the region of the vague and the mysterious. It appeared to him to be perfectly consistent with the Government intentions that this phrase, which dated from the worst period in the French Revolution, should be omitted from the clause. The right hon. and learned Gentleman desired the Committee to remember that the liberties of the people of Ireland were protected by the conscience of the Lord Lieutenant. He (Mr. Sexton) would point out that in a calculation of this kind the Lord Lieutenant's conscience was an unknown quantity, and whatever might be the estimate placed upon it by the Secretary to the Home Department, he, for one, objected to the conscience of any man being the arbiter of the liberties of Irishmen; and he invited hon. Members to consider how the English people would act and think if it were proposed to confide their liberties to the conscience of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. The hon. Member for Wexford had put a very pertinent question when he asked why the phrase "public safety," taken from the Act of 1833, was considered good enough to suit the present day? The two periods were perfectly distinct in their characteristics, and he had already pointed out that the country, in the year 1833, was in a state of insurrectionary movement, or rather in a state of inchoate civil war. The measures which it might have been well to apply to the state of things then existing were quite inadequate or inapplicable to the present. Moreover, it could not be too often pointed out that persons who attended public meetings were not under the Act of 1833, as a matter of course, thrown into gaol at the will of the Lord Lieutenant. They had an opportunity of questioning the decision of the Lord Lieutenant—they held their meetings, and after that they had the right to go before a jury. These were things which constituted a remarkable difference between the Act of 1833 and the Bill now before the Committee, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman could not be said to have touched his case until he had shown why it was reasonable that the Constitutional right of trial by jury should be left untouched in 1833, and abolished in 1882. No matter on what important point Irish Members sought to amend this Bill, their efforts were unavailing. Their object had been simply to define the powers of the Lord Lieutenant, so that the people might know under what circumstances they would come under the lash of that power; they had endeavoured to define the conditions on which the Lord Lieutenant should interfere, and to obtain some idea of the kind of information on which he would act; but on each of these points they had been met by the right hon. and learned Gentleman with a distinct refusal. The proposal that the Lord Lieutenant should prohibit public meetings when the public peace was endangered had been admitted by his hon. Friends to be reasonable and intelligible; but this expression, "public safety," was vague and indefinite in the extreme. The present clause would extend the powers of the Lord Lieutenant, which now almost amounted to omnipotence, in a sense that would require him to be acquainted, not only with the past and present, but with the future. He contended that the Amendment was a most reasonable one, and that so long as the Government could exercise their power of preventing the disturbance of the public peace, which was a very well understood thing, it was unnecessary to give them powers, under the phrase of "public safety," which would allow them to suppress all political discussions, and prevent criticism on the Party in power.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he thought that the Amendment would not at all interfere with the object which the Government professed to have in introducing this clause into the Bill. Either the public safety was the same thing as the public peace, or it was not. If it were not so, then he thought the Government should inform the Committee what meaning they attached to the phrase, because he assumed that when the Bill passed into law they would have some definite idea of its meaning in their mind. As far as he could understand from his right hon. and learned Friend's defence of the phrase "public safety," some such language was to be found in the Act of 1833. But that was not a very apt precedent. The Act of 1833 was a very severe one; it was brought in when Lord Wellesley was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and two years afterwards it was obliged to be admitted that it was a total failure, inasmuch as, notwithstanding the extensive powers which it gave to the Executive, it was safer to disobey than to obey the law. Unless his right hon. and learned Friend was prepared to state the meaning which he attached to the words "public safety," it seemed to him not unreasonable that the Amendment should be accepted.

M^r. Sexton

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he did not think the words were of great importance one way or another. They seemed to him to be superfluous, and it was difficult to understand why the Government were so firm in insisting upon them. The clause said—

"The Lord Lieutenant may, from time to time, by order in writing, to be published in the prescribed manner, prohibit any meeting which he has reason to believe to be dangerous to the public peace or the public safety."

Now, he would like to know how a thing could be dangerous to the public safety without being dangerous to the public peace. He could not see anything in the words which the Amendment sought to strike out but mere surplusage. He could imagine an occurrence which would endanger the public safety without laying individuals or a number of persons open to the charge of having imperilled the public peace. An earthquake, for instance, might imperil the public safety very much; but he did not see how anybody in Ireland could be held accountable for the occurrence of an earthquake, even under this Act. What, then, was the use of the words? Was it not sufficient for all purposes of the Government that the Lord Lieutenant should have power to suppress meetings which he believed to be dangerous to the public peace? There was no need for him to go beyond that, nor, turning his eyes to the distant future, to form fantastic notions of possible events which might occur years hence when politics and laws had undergone very material alterations. If that were so, there was no need for the retention of these paltry words in the clause. It was a noticeable fact that whenever Irish Members on those Benches, or hon. Members opposite, proposed to leave out any words, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary to the Home Department rose at once and declared that the words in question constituted, so to speak, the gem or pearl of the measure, and that without them the rest of the Bill would be useless. That was the case with regard to the words "public safety." He never knew an individual who set such an extraordinary value on every atom of his work as did the Home Secretary, who told them the Bill would be mangled if these words were left out. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary was a bold legislator; but it seemed to require a great amount of hardihood to make such a contention in the face of facts.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the hon. Member having described the words "public safety" as being paltry and little, one would have supposed he would be content to let them alone. But, for his part, he regarded them as words of importance which should be retained in the clause. The hon. Member had complained that the Government never accepted the suggestions of himself and his Friends. But he would point out that, in making those suggestions, hon. Members opposite were, so to speak, trying "to pick the plums out of the pudding;" and, under those circumstances, it was not to be wondered at that he was rather anxious to retain them. Hon. Members opposite had an aptitude to discover the exact words which, by their omission or insertion, would neutralize every section of the Bill. It had been said that the condition of Ireland in 1833 was much worse than at the present time. He wished he could think it was so. He believed the condition of Ireland was quite as bad as it was in 1833, and that it was even more liable to inflammation by dangerous language. It was this that the Government desired to guard against. As regarded the first part of the clause, it was only intended to confirm and sanction what had been done and what was being done. With regard to the second part, it was intended only to give a more summary and complete power of stopping public meetings. It must, therefore, not be supposed that now for the first time the stoppage of public meetings was suggested. As he had before pointed out, he could not hope that hon. Members opposite would agree with the view of the Government; but he had felt it his duty to state, as clearly as possible, what were the intentions of the Government, and what was the meaning of the words in question. Notwithstanding it had been said that the Lord Lieutenant would not be restrained by these words, but would stop every meeting, Her Majesty's Government believed that the Lord Lieutenant would consider himself strictly bound by them. Her Majesty's Government had deliberately included these words in the Bill, and they regarded them as proper directions to the Lord Lieutenant, that, in the exercise of his power to prohibit public meetings, he should consider what was dangerous to the public peace or the public safety.

MR. GIVAN said, he differed from many hon. Members opposite, and he also took a different view to the right hon. and learned Gentleman who had spoken last. The Amendment was certainly a very dangerous and bitter plum for the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary. One could understand what was dangerous to the public peace, but no human being could understand what the words "public safety" might be construed to mean. At the present time small meetings were being held in his own county, to protest against most iniquitous proceedings that had been taken on behalf of the landlords. The landlords were suing their tenants by writ, in order to obtain their arrears of rent before the Arrears Bill was passed. These meetings might, under this clause, be construed to be dangerous to the public safety of a certain class. He would ask the Home Secretary whether a meeting called to protest against iniquitous proceedings of this kind were to be suppressed because, in the opinion of a magistrate representing the Lord Lieutenant, they were meetings to protest against the exercise of a just right on the part of the landlords? As the words now stood — namely, "public peace or public safety"—the Lord Lieutenant might be induced to believe that even a meeting convened by tenant farmers for legitimate or legal purposes might be dangerous to the safety of a particular interest, and, therefore, ought to be suppressed. Several months ago a meeting was held in the town of Saintfield to review the proceedings of the Commissioners. The police attended, in the belief that it was intended to denounce the action of the Commissioners; but it turned out that the meeting was held for the purpose of acknowledging the benefit the Prime Minister had conferred on Ireland by the passing of the Land Act. This was one of the most dangerous powers that could be given to any Government; but as he believed every reasonable power ought to be given to the Lord Lieutenant for the suppression of crime, he would offer no opposition to His Excellency having power to suppress meetings dangerous to the public peace. He, however, thought peace or public safety that they should be used. Whilst in Ireland many meetings had been prohibited, meetings which were of a perfectly Constitutional character had never been prohibited.

[Twelfth Night.]

MR. LALOR said, he thought the Government were guilty of want of candour in withholding from the Committee the true meaning of the clause. Up to the present the Government had not had the courage to arrest the members of the Ladies' Land League and cast them into gaol as "suspects." They had not the courage to say that the meetings of the Ladies' League were calculated to provoke a breach of the peace; but he had no doubt that, under this clause, the Lord Lieutenant would hold the meetings were dangerous to the public safety.

MR. GILL said, it was a very curious thing that, notwithstanding the appeals of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) and other hon. Members, no Member of the Government, up to the present, had given any definition whatever of the words "public safety." The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland had mentioned "Boycotting," and that was the only thing that he could bring forward. He (Mr. Gill) considered that that expression, "public safety," was exceedingly vague and misleading. For instance, he did not see why, under this Act, the Lord Lieutenant should not prohibit meetings which might be called to consider the maladministration of the Land Act. It might certainly be illegal to hold meetings to condemn the Land Act itself; but he did not see why meetings should be illegal if they were simply called to condemn the administration of that Act. But the Lord Lieutenant, with the political conscience that had been attributed to him, might see a danger to the public safety even in a meeting called to condemn the administration of the Land Act. There were very many meetings which might be prevented in a similar way. The Attorney General for Ireland had said that the administration of this Act would be quite different from anything that might bring these meetings before a Court of Justice. The Government had stopped, by refusing an Amendment to this Bill, anything which could make the administration resemble a Court of Justice; they had refused to assent to the proposition that the reasons for prohibiting meetings should be sent up to the Lord Lieutenant in writing and upon oath. They had already refused to admit this Amendment, which was considered a great safeguard in the administration of this clause. The things that might be held to imperil the public safety would be so numerous, according to the conscience of the person who might administer this clause, that they should certainly be defined. For instance, if the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had a proper political conscience, similar to that of the Prime Minister or the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and many others—if there were meetings called to interfere with Free Trade, they might be prevented in Ireland. If the conscience of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was similar to that of many hon. Gentlemen sitting on this side of the House, he might prohibit meetings called in favour of Free Trade; in fact, there was no kind of meeting, politically speaking, that might not be prevented by the great latitude given by the words "public safety." Would the Home Secretary consent to put in the word "and," instead of "or," so that the clause would read "public peace and public safety?" That would give a certain amount of protection to free political opinion in Ireland.

MR. W. HOLMS said, he trusted the Committee would not agree to the proposal of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), that they should allow meetings to be held endangering the public safety. They might safely trust the Lord Lieutenant to say whether meetings, if held, would be antagonistic to the public safety. It was true that there was nothing which the English people held more dear than liberty of speech and the liberty of the Press; but he thought the Committee might fairly trust to the Lord Lieutenant in this matter.

MR. LEAMY said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down thought they—that was the English Members—might safely trust the Lord Lieutenant in Ireland to decide whether a proposed meeting was likely to be dangerous to the public safety. He would like to know whether the hon. Member would be prepared to stand up in this House and say that, under any circumstances, he was prepared to trust any man in England to decide whether a proposed meeting was likely to endanger the public safety? The hon. Member told them how jealous the English people were of the freedom of speech and of the right of public meeting, and, at the same time, he refused to support an Amendment which was only calculated, ever so slightly, to preserve to Ireland some vestige of freedom of speech. This Amendment was not open to the charge that it was one calculated to kill the clause. The Irish Members supported the Amendment only because they believed the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Givan) had aptly described "public safety" when he said the words conferred on the Lord Lieutenant a dubious and unlimited power. The Solicitor General for Ireland said the words had been carefully selected, so that this power should not interfere with Constitutional liberty. The hon. and learned Gentleman forgot that, at the opening of his speech, he said that this clause was one which tended to the restriction of the right of public meeting. He (Mr. Leamy) did not know what difference there was between Constitutional and public liberty.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PORTER) remarked, that he said that it interfered as little as possible with public liberty.

MR. LEAMY said, that, of course, he would accept the explanation of the hon. and learned Gentleman, but he would like to put this question to the Committee. They all had before their minds the great agitation of the last two or three years; and he would like to ask any man on the Liberal Benches whether, if the Lord Lieutenant had had power, when the Tories were in Office, to put down any meeting which he believed would be likely to be dangerous to the public safety, that agitation would not have been put down by the simple exercise of such power? He was not now going to make any charge against the Tories; but he was perfectly certain that the majority of the Irish Conservatives believed that the land agitation was hostile to the public safety, quite independently of any interest which was likely to be assailed by that agitation. He believed that the majority of Conservatives, not merely in Ireland, but in England, were firmly convinced that the land agitation was at any time during the three years—certainly when it assumed any large proportions at all—hostile to the public safety. Therefore, if this Bill had been law, a Conservative Lord Lieutenant would have put these meetings down, and would have put an end to that agitation which had assisted the present Government to pass their Land Bill, and which was encouraged by the present Government so long as it served their purposes, but which they were inclined to put down now because they thought that they could do without it. It was for these reasons that he and his hon. Friends objected to these words. Any great agitation spreading over the country—any agitation which brought large masses of the people within its ranks, and which had for its object a great reform—might, in the opinion of the Government of the day, be dangerous to the public safety. And what had they to do? They would simply have to request the Lord Lieutenant to stop every meeting of such agitation, and, if called to account, they would simply point to this clause in the Act of Parliament in justification of their action. If their action were to be called into question in the House of Commons, the Chief Secretary would say, as he said to-day—

"If I am asked any question with reference to the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant, I shall answer the question in the most general terms."

Of course, if they gave this power to the Lord Lieutenant it was impossible for them to call his action into question. They were told, when the last Coercion Bill was going through the House, they might bring every case of arrest before the House, and they might, if they chose, discuss every arrest. When, however, they did bring cases of arrest before the House, what answer did the late Chief Secretary give them? He got up in his place and said he acted under an Act of Parliament which this House had passed; he exercised a reasonable suspicion under the Act, and that was all he had to do. If a meeting was prohibited in Ireland, and they asked a question of the Chief Secretary, what would he say? He would say that this House, after mature deliberation and by a large majority, gave to the Lord Lieutenant these exceptional powers, and that when they gave these exceptional powers they must have expected them to be exercised. Yes, and the Lord Lieutenant would exercise them with a vengeance! It was plain that the object of the Liberal Party was to put down proper agitation in Ireland; but he had no doubt that they would be sorry for the step they were now taking.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, the great object of the Bill was to bring peace to Ireland, and he was astonished that the Irish Members did not unite with the Government in passing a measure which would assuredly conduce to the welfare of their country. For 55 years he had had in his employment between 50 and 60 Irishmen, who came every year for the hay harvest, and they had behaved remarkably well. For 55 years he had never had a complaint to make against any one of those Irish people; and at this moment there was in his house one family, some of whose members had come annually there for 85 years. It was painful to him, who had been associated with Irish people all his life, to find hon. Gentlemen opposite strenuously opposing a measure whose only object was to bring peace and tranquillity to their country, and to promote the investment of capital in that country. The lack of such investment was a matter from which Ireland greatly suffered, and anything which interfered with the public peace or public safety drove away capital. England would not invest capital in Ireland, unless the public peace there was assured, and the object of this Bill was to assure it. The opposition to this Bill was doing great injury abroad to the Irish cause, and if hon. Gentlemen opposite would only unite with the Government in passing this Act, they would find the opinion of Europe was with them. In former days he heard, over and over again, complaints made in foreign countries against the English government of Ireland; but now foreigners were beginning to find that no complaint was to be made against the conduct of the English in Ireland. They were beginning to learn that the English estates in Ireland were perfectly well managed.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am afraid I must call the hon. Baronet's attention to the fact that he is going beyond the subject.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he was sorry if he, one of the oldest Members of the House, had for a moment trans-

gressed. If he had done so, his only excuse could be that he had been carried away by his desire to influence, as much as he could, the welfare of Ireland. He appealed to hon. Gentlemen opposite to unite with the Government in restoring peace and tranquillity to Ireland, which was a most beautiful country, inhabited by a people full of humour, and having many good and attaching qualities. The ruffians who brought disgrace on it were not Irishmen, but Irish-Americans.

MR. O'DONNELL assured the hon. and gallant Baronet who had just addressed the Committee, that the Irish Members fully recognized the warmth of the sympathies which he had expressed with regard to their country—and, indeed, if there was any chance of the hon. and gallant Baronet being appointed to carry out the provisions of this Bill—[SIR HARRY VERNEY: I would have great pleasure.]—many of their objections would vanish. All he could do, in response to the hon. and gallant Baronet's appeal, was to assure him that if any English Government brought in a Bill for England anything akin to the atrocious character of this Bill, the Irish Members would be happy to unite with the hon. and gallant Baronet against it. They, however, had to deal in this matter with personages very different from the hon. and gallant Baronet; they had to deal with the regular supporters of Her Majesty's Government in Ireland, such as the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland and the hon. Member for Paisley (Mr. W. Holms), the latter of whom, with a love of liberty worthy of Wallace, had declared that he would have no objection to leave the liberties of an entire country at the disposal of one man.

MR. W. HOLMS said, he drew a distinction between liberty and license.

MR. O'DONNELL: Very well. The worthy countryman of Wallace would leave it to a single person to distinguish between liberty and license. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland stated that it was the object of the Government, in opposing this Amendment, to restrict public liberty in Ireland as little as possible. He would like to know if it was the object of the Government to restrict public liberty in Ireland as much as possible? What better form of words could they have used than the form of words which existed in their unamended clause? The Lord Lieutenant was to have power to prohibit any meeting which he believed to be prejudicial to public safety, and the Committee were allowed no definition of what the Lord Lieutenant might consider to be prejudicial to the public safety. The formula of "public safety" was a very common one to autocrats and to Jacobins. Whether to an Irish individual tyrant, or to a committee of savage repression such as was found in the French Revolution, public safety was a common formula under which could be committed any deed of crime and terrorism. The hon. Member for Paisley (Mr. W. Holmes) ingenuously chose to assume that the Irish Members were pleading for permission to hold meetings dangerous to the public safety in Ireland. The Irish Members were pleading for liberty to hold public meetings in Ireland which should not be summarily prevented at the caprice, which might be prompted by malevolence or mere ignorance, of any man who might be sent over to fill the post of Lord Lieutenant. This quibble of "public safety" received a very sufficient answer before the English Courts only a couple of days ago. There was a religious movement in England operating by great assemblies and processions, and a number of magistrates took it upon themselves to stop the gatherings of the Salvation Army on the plea of public safety; on the plea that if the meetings were permitted to be held tumults and disorder might be the consequence. Justices Field and Cave, however, pointed out that assemblies whose object was not in itself unlawful could not become unlawful or dangerous to the public safety simply because some person or persons might threaten to impede and obstruct the meetings and bring about tumults and brawls. On what ground could the Lord Lieutenant forbid a public meeting in Ireland on the plea of danger to public safety? Would he apprehend that some riot would take place at the meeting? It would be the duty of the Lord Lieutenant in that case to protect a lawful meeting against the rioters. The hon. Member for Paisley (Mr. W. Holmes) said there was nothing of which Englishmen were more jealous than the right of public meeting. Emphatically he (Mr. O'Donnell) stated that it was only with regard to public meetings in England, and with regard to the liberties of Englishmen, that the English people were jealous. There was no exercise of tyrannical power in Ireland by the Lord Lieutenant which would not be supported by the English political Party to which that Lord Lieutenant belonged; and if, on the plea of public safety, the Lord Lieutenant sought, in the most brutal manner, to suppress lawful meetings in Ireland, his conduct would be treated with the same calm indifference by English public opinion which English public opinion showed when, on the plea of greater economy, English officials in India starved prisoners by hundreds in their gaols. Such a thing as sympathy with a race outside England, apart, of course, from political considerations and Party exigencies, existed only amongst a very small minority of the English people. If the Lord Lieutenant, when the clause was passed unamended, were to suppress, on the plea of public safety, every meeting called, no matter for what purpose, and if the Irish Members complained in that House of the suppression, the only answer they would receive from the Chief Secretary of the day, or from one or other Irish Officials in the House, would be that the Lord Lieutenant suppressed the meetings because, in his opinion, they were dangerous to the public safety, and the enthusiastic plaudits of the Government Party of the day would support any declaration of that description. In refusing to propose any limitation, in refusing to grant any definition which would enable the people to understand what was meant by the words "public safety," the Government simply gave a further indication of its intention to hand Ireland over to an uncontrolled and uncontrollable despotism. He did not know whether the liberators of Bulgaria had consulted any of the Turkish Pashas in this matter; but he could imagine no clause which was more worthy of Turkish domination than the present. There was no Bashi-Bazouk ever let loose in Bulgaria who did not make out that he laid waste the province out of his regard for public safety. He (Mr. O'Donnell) did not agree entirely with his hon. Friend the Member for Waterford in his denunciation of this called a meeting to advocate the cutting down of rents 25 per cent, and told the tenants not to pay without that reduction, would that be considered an illegal meeting? Meetings of the kind were announced by placards, and any one drawing up the announcement would take care to frame it so as to make it as peaceable as possible. If he intended to do an illegal act he would use no words in the placard tending to discover to the Executive the real character of the meeting. It would, therefore, be left to the opinion of the magistrates. Now, the meetings held in Ireland were generally for the purpose of considering the rent question, and hence the importance of a statement on the part of the Government. Again, the Government might have a Bill before Parliament to deal with the Land Question, for instance, and a meeting might be called to consider it. Was that the kind of meeting the Government wished to prevent? Did the Government mean that the magistrates in various parts of Ireland were to be intrusted with the grave power of suppressing public meetings? He would not then enter upon a discussion of the character of the Resident Magistrates; but he said that the men who had to do with the suppression of crime in Ireland were the last men in the world to be intrusted with the powers of the clause, because it was very well known that if a man was in a position in which he was intrusted with the maintenance of peace and order of a district, he would be likely to strain a point in what he believed to be the interest of peace and order. He would consider that the main thing was the maintenance of peace and order, and that the interest of the subject was of very little importance as compared with it. It was very easy to understand a Resident Magistrate putting down a public meeting on the mere assumption that the public peace might be disturbed if it took place. He would not say that in this matter the Lord Lieutenant's check did not amount to something, but he did say that, as the Resident Magistrates were the persons from whom the Executive Government were bound to get their information, unless some statement were made as to the kind of meetings aimed at, the power in the clause was too wide to give to any individual. Again, it was not clear whether it was intended to put down indoor as well as outdoor meetings, and he asked, if it was not the intention of the Government to suppress indoor meetings, that this should be stated in the Bill. He believed there were not more than half-a-dozen towns in Ireland in which buildings existed suitable for a meeting of 500 persons. Of course, the urban population had, comparatively speaking, not the same interest in the rent question as the rural population; and although he could understand the Government taking power to prevent meetings in rural districts, he could not see why they should be at so much trouble to prevent meetings in the cities of Dublin, Cork, or Belfast, for instance. He thought some consideration was due to the arguments advanced in favour of the Amendment, which he trusted the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary to the Home Department would see his way to adopt.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was difficult to define the character of the meetings over which this power was to be exercised. The hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) had put the case of a meeting being called for the purpose of adversely criticizing a Bill to deal with the Irish Land Question, which the Government of the day might have before Parliament, and he had asked whether such a meeting would come within the meaning of the clause? He should say certainly it would not. With regard to the use of the words proposed to be omitted, from the hon. Member's own point of view, if he believed the power of the clause would be abused, it was really immaterial whether the words were left out or not. But Her Majesty's Government did believe that these words would be binding on the conscience of the Lord Lieutenant. Probably the hon. Member thought that the Lord Lieutenant, ex officio, had no conscience; but the Government had proceeded on the opposite assumption, and believed he would be bound by the directions contained in the Act, and that he would not stop any meeting, however adverse it might be to himself or the Government, unless he were convinced that the meeting would be injurious to the public peace or the public safety. That was the reason why these words were put into the clause; and as, from the hon. Member's point of view, it was said they were of no use at all, he would suggest that the opposition to them should be withdrawn. With regard to the question as to whether the Act would apply to indoor meetings, he should say that it would so apply. It would be found in the Act of 1833 that power was given to the magistrates to enter any house, room, or other place where they had information that meetings were to be held; and the object of the Government would not be fulfilled if indoor meetings of an inflammatory kind were allowed on occasions and under circumstances likely to lead to the use of language calculated to be injurious to the public safety, because although the meeting might be of little interest in the urban district in which it was held, the report of it would be sent far and wide in the country. These were the views of Her Majesty's Government; and, although he could not hope to persuade hon. Members opposite to adopt them, he had felt it his duty to state the grounds on which the Government proposed this clause of the Bill. That being so, he trusted he should not be considered to act unreasonably in declining to accept an Amendment which was inconsistent with the intention of the Government. The words "or public safety" were meant as an instruction to the Lord Lieutenant that he should read by their light the information which he might receive from the Resident Magistrates. For his own part, he believed that this object would be fulfilled, and that the Lord Lieutenant would act strictly in accordance with what he understood to be the intention of the Government.

Mr. Healy

MR. SEXTON said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had informed the Committee that Irish Members in that part of the House were desirous that the words "public peace" should be left out of the clause as well as the words "public safety." But that was not so; the proposal was simply to leave out the words "or public safety." They all understood the meaning of the former words, but felt that in speaking of "public safety" they were entering upon the region of the vague and the mysterious. It appeared to him to be perfectly consistent with the Government intentions that this phrase, which dated from the worst period in the French Revolution, should be omitted from the clause. The right hon. and learned Gentleman desired the Committee to remember that the liberties of the people of Ireland were protected by the conscience of the Lord Lieutenant. He (Mr. Sexton) would point out that in a calculation of this kind the Lord Lieutenant's conscience was an unknown quantity, and whatever might be the estimate placed upon it by the Secretary to the Home Department, he, for one, objected to the conscience of any man being the arbiter of the liberties of Irishmen; and he invited hon. Members to consider how the English people would act and think if it were proposed to confide their liberties to the conscience of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. The hon. Member for Wexford had put a very pertinent question when he asked why the phrase "public safety," taken from the Act of 1833, was considered good enough to suit the present day? The two periods were perfectly distinct in their characteristics, and he had already pointed out that the country, in the year 1833, was in a state of insurrectionary movement, or rather in a state of inchoate civil war. The measures which it might have been well to apply to the state of things then existing were quite inadequate or inapplicable to the present. Moreover, it could not be too often pointed out that persons who attended public meetings were not under the Act of 1833, as a matter of course, thrown into gaol at the will of the Lord Lieutenant. They had an opportunity of questioning the decision of the Lord Lieutenant—they held their meetings, and after that they had the right to go before a jury. These were things which constituted a remarkable difference between the Act of 1833 and the Bill now before the Committee, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman could not be said to have touched his case until he had shown why it was reasonable that the Constitutional right of trial by jury should be left untouched in 1833, and abolished in 1882. No matter on what important point Irish Members sought to amend this Bill, their efforts were unavailing. Their object had been simply to define the powers of the Lord Lieutenant, so that the people might know under what circumstances they would come under the lash of that power; they had endeavoured to define the conditions on which the Lord Lieutenant should interfere, and to obtain some idea of the kind of information on which he would act; but on each of these points they had been met by the right hon. and learned Gentleman with a distinct refusal. The proposal that the Lord Lieutenant should prohibit public meetings when the public peace was endangered had been admitted by his hon. Friends to be reasonable and intelligible; but this expression, "public safety," was vague and indefinite in the extreme. The present clause would extend the powers of the Lord Lieutenant, which now almost amounted to omnipotence, in a sense that would require him to be acquainted, not only with the past and present, but with the future. He contended that the Amendment was a most reasonable one, and that so long as the Government could exercise their power of preventing the disturbance of the public peace, which was a very well understood thing, it was unnecessary to give them powers, under the phrase of "public safety," which would allow them to suppress all political discussions, and prevent criticism on the Party in power.

Mr. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he thought that the Amendment would not at all interfere with the object which the Government professed to have in introducing this clause into the Bill. Either the public safety was the same thing as the public peace, or it was not. If it were not so, then he thought the Government should inform the Committee what meaning they attached to the phrase, because he assumed that when the Bill passed into law they would have some definite idea of its meaning in their mind. As far as he could understand from his right hon. and learned Friend's defence of the phrase "public safety," some such language was to be found in the Act of 1833. But that was not a very apt precedent. The Act of 1833 was a very severe one; it was brought in when Lord Wellesley was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and two years afterwards it was obliged to be admitted that it was a total failure, inasmuch as, notwithstanding the extensive powers which it gave to the Executive, it was safer to disobey than to obey the law. Unless his right hon. and learned Friend was prepared to state the meaning which he attached to the words "public safety," it seemed to him not unreasonable that the Amendment should be accepted.

Mr. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he did not think the words were of great importance one way or another. They seemed to him to be superfluous, and it was difficult to understand why the Government were so firm in insisting upon them. The clause said—

"The Lord Lieutenant may, from time to time, by order in writing, to be published in the prescribed manner, prohibit any meeting which he has reason to believe to be dangerous to the public peace or the public safety."

Now, he would like to know how a thing could be dangerous to the public safety without being dangerous to the public peace. He could not see anything in the words which the Amendment sought to strike out but mere surplusage. He could imagine an occurrence which would endanger the public safety without laying individuals or a number of persons open to the charge of having imperilled the public peace. An earthquake, for instance, might imperil the public safety very much; but he did not see how anybody in Ireland could be held accountable for the occurrence of an earthquake, even under this Act. What, then, was the use of the words? Was it not sufficient for all purposes of the Government that the Lord Lieutenant should have power to suppress meetings which he believed to be dangerous to the public peace? There was no need for him to go beyond that, nor, turning his eyes to the distant future, to form fantastic notions of possible events which might occur years hence when politics and laws had undergone very material alterations. If that were so, there was no need for the retention of these paltry words in the clause. It was a noticeable fact that whenever Irish Members on those Benches, or hon. Members opposite, proposed to leave out any words, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary to the Home Department rose at once and declared that the words in question constituted, so to speak, the gem or pearl of the measure, and that without them the rest of the Bill would be useless. That was the case with regard to the words "public safety." He never knew an individual who set such an extraordinary value on every atom of his work as did the Home Secretary, who told them the Bill would be mangled if these words were left out. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary was a bold legislator; but it seemed to require a great amount of hardihood to make such a contention in the face of facts.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the hon. Member having described the words "public safety" as being paltry and little, one would have supposed he would be content to let them alone. But, for his part, he regarded them as words of importance which should be retained in the clause. The hon. Member had complained that the Government never accepted the suggestions of himself and his Friends. But he would point out that, in making those suggestions, hon. Members opposite were, so to speak, trying "to pick the plums out of the pudding;" and, under those circumstances, it was not to be wondered at that he was rather anxious to retain them. Hon. Members opposite had an aptitude to discover the exact words which, by their omission or insertion, would neutralize every section of the Bill. It had been said that the condition of Ireland in 1833 was much worse than at the present time. He wished he could think it was so. He believed the condition of Ireland was quite as bad as it was in 1833, and that it was even more liable to inflammation by dangerous language. It was this that the Government desired to guard against. As regarded the first part of the clause, it was only intended to confirm and sanction what had been done and what was being done. With regard to the second part, it was intended only to give a more summary and complete power of stopping public meetings. It must, therefore, not be supposed that now for the first time the stoppage of public meetings was suggested. As he had before pointed out, he could not hope that hon. Members opposite would agree with the view of the Government; but he had felt it his duty to state, as clearly as possible, what were the intentions of the Government, and what was the meaning of the words in question. Notwithstanding it had been said that the Lord Lieutenant would not be restrained by these words, but would stop every meeting, Her Majesty's Government believed that the Lord Lieutenant would consider himself strictly bound by them. Her Majesty's Government had deliberately included these words in the Bill, and they regarded them as proper directions to the Lord Lieutenant, that, in the exercise of his power to prohibit public meetings, he should consider what was dangerous to the public peace or the public safety.

MR. GIVAN said, he differed from many hon. Members opposite, and he also took a different view to the right hon. and learned Gentleman who had spoken last. The Amendment was certainly a very dangerous and bitter plum for the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary. One could understand what was dangerous to the public peace, but no human being could understand what the words "public safety" might be construed to mean. At the present time small meetings were being held in his own county, to protest against most iniquitous proceedings that had been taken on behalf of the landlords. The landlords were suing their tenants by writ, in order to obtain their arrears of rent before the Arrears Bill was passed. These meetings might, under this clause, be construed to be dangerous to the public safety of a certain class. He would ask the Home Secretary whether a meeting called to protest against iniquitous proceedings of this kind were to be suppressed because, in the opinion of a magistrate representing the Lord Lieutenant, they were meetings to protest against the exercise of a just right on the part of the landlords? As the words now stood — namely, "public peace or public safety"—the Lord Lieutenant might be induced to believe that even a meeting convened by tenant farmers for legitimate or legal purposes might be dangerous to the safety of a particular interest, and, therefore, ought to be suppressed. Several months ago a meeting was held in the town of Saintfield to review the proceedings of the Commissioners. The police attended, in the belief that it was intended to denounce the action of the Commissioners; but it turned out that the meeting was held for the purpose of acknowledging the benefit the Prime Minister had conferred on Ireland by the passing of the Land Act. This was one of the most dangerous powers that could be given to any Government; but as he believed every reasonable power ought to be given to the Lord Lieutenant for the suppression of crime, he would offer no opposition to His Excellency having power to suppress meetings dangerous to the public peace. He, however, thought that the words "public safety" would be liable to misconstruction.

[Twelfth Night.]

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Givan) had made a discovery rather late in the day. The hon. and learned Gentleman had spoken of some meetings just held in the North of Ireland; but he must be perfectly aware that the landlords were only exercising their legal rights, although they were making a very unjust and wicked use of their legal rights. His hon. and learned Friend must very well know that in protesting against the exercise of legal rights by landlords he was violating the 4th clause of the Act, which he (Mr. Givan) and many of his Friends supported. If such meetings as those the tenants of Monaghan held to protest against iniquities on the part of landlords were to be put down by this Act, the hon. Gentleman himself would have a very heavy responsibility on his own shoulders. The words "public safety" had a most important bearing; they entirely enlarged, and not merely enlarged, but altered, the scope and even the purpose of the clause. What was the meaning of the words? Public safety in practice meant the status quo; public safety bore such a meaning in the minds of those who controlled and influenced and upheld the status quo. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary was justified in objecting to that definition of public safety, because it was by breaking down the status quo in a country on the Continent of Europe that the right hon. and learned Gentleman and his Colleagues secured their present positions. He took it that, as a general rule, the public safety and the status quo were, in the eye of the existing Government, convertible terms. The Home Secretary and his Colleagues had based their Bill on the disturbed state of Ireland—on the crimes and outrages prevailing there. But the public safety was not required to include every outrage and crime committed in Ireland. Every crime and outrage committed in Ireland was a crime and outrage against the public peace. What, then, did the Home Secretary mean by keeping in the clause the words "public safety?" He meant to retain for the Lord Lieutenant the right to put down any meeting which did not suit the Vice-Regal or Party purposes of the Lord Lieutenant for the time being. If the Government wanted to put down crime and outrage, the words "public peace" were quite sufficient for their purpose; but if they wanted to interfere with the right of public meeting, if they wanted to stifle the expression of free political opinion, they required the words "public safety;" these words were required if the Government wished to have the expression of political opinion dependent upon their will and pleasure. The Home Secretary had used a new argument in favour of the Bill, for he said these words would be binding on the conscience of the Lord Lieutenant. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had read of various forms of conscience in the course of his political reading. The late Lord Beaconsfield once spoke of an historic conscience; but now a new kind of conscience had been unfolded—the Vice-Regal conscience. The Vice-Royalty was a pale and shadowy reflex of Royalty, and he supposed the Vice-Regal conscience would be a shadowy reflex of the honest conscience which ought to allow a free expression of opinion. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary knew what he was doing by keeping in these words. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had given the right hon. and learned Gentleman credit all through for knowing exactly what he meant in this Bill. The right hon. and learned Gentleman wanted to make the Bill as autocratic as he could; he did not much mind stopping crime and outrage, but wanted to put down, wherever he could, honest expression of opinion which might be inconvenient to the English Government.

MR. DILLWYN said, one of the objections he had to the Bill was that new crime and new power should be disposed of by generalities. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) and the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Givan) had challenged the Home Secretary to give a definition of public safety, but the right hon. and learned Gentleman had not yet done so. Were the words to be absolutely undefined? Were they to be construed to mean anything? He listened very attentively to the speech of the Home Secretary, but it gave him no satisfaction. He trusted they might, even yet, receive some satisfactory definition of the words.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PORTER) said, it must be obvious to everybody that the Bill was not introduced for the purpose of re-enacting any existing laws. It was a Bill which was brought in to meet a special state of circumstances—a state of circumstances which every Member of the community, and particularly every Irishman, must view with the greatest regret, no matter what their opinion might be as to the remedy proposed. The Bill was intended to meet a temporary emergency, and the Bill would be temporary in its character. It proposed restrictions upon personal liberty, and this clause was one which pointed in that direction. Necessity, however, justified the interference which this clause would introduce. No one regretted more than he did the certainty, which did appear to him, that this was an absolutely necessary clause. The words proposed to be omitted were very important, and he would tell the Committee why. A meeting that was calculated to interfere with the public peace was one which the authorities should have power to put down. The words “public safety” appeared to be as important as the words “public peace.” It should not be forgotten that many of the meetings which had been prohibited, and which in the interest of good government and order must necessarily be prohibited, were meetings not calculated to promote that which lawyers would call a breach of the peace. Everybody who knew anything about the state of Ireland knew that many meetings had been held, and many others had been prohibited, the intention of which was not to produce any immediate breach of the peace, and as to which meetings no conscientious man in the position of the Lord Lieutenant could certify that, in his opinion, the intention was to create a breach of the peace. As a matter of fact, the meetings were intended to promote a no less dangerous form of crime—for crime it would be when this Bill passed—he referred to “Boycotting.” Numbers of meetings had been called for that purpose, and it was an opinion very prevalently held that, in order to meet the present existing state of facts, it was absolutely necessary to give the Government power to deal with these meetings. The meetings were held to denounce certain individuals, and to recommend that the denunciation should be enforced by the sanction of social exclusion. Everybody knew that a denunciation of a person acquired immense force from the attendance of a large number of people at the meeting; and it was in order to grapple with the general practice of “Boycotting”—widely extended and largely diffused—it was in order to prevent public meetings for that purpose he had described amongst others, that this clause was imperatively necessary. A good deal had been said as to the vagueness of the clause, and as to the danger of intrusting the power the clause provided to the Lord Lieutenant or to anyone. There was, of course, a certain amount of risk; but hon. Members ought to see that the interposition of the Lord Lieutenant was an interposition in favour of the liberty of the subject, and not against it. The clause was not designed to prohibit all meetings. If a meeting was prohibited the prohibition must be left to some authority. That authority could not be a legal tribunal, because it was impossible, in the first instance, to say what the character of the meeting would be. The prohibition must be left to the discretion of some person, and that discretion must be regulated, not by vague statement, but by legal principles, which must be clearly defined. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Givan) had given instances of meetings, which meetings he thought would be prohibited under these words of the clause. It appeared to him (the Solicitor General for Ireland) that the words of the Bill were carefully chosen so as to prevent any interference with Constitutional liberty, and that the cases which his hon. and learned Friend had referred to were cases of meetings which would have been considered, under the Act of 1833, calculated to interfere with the due administration of the law. They were not meetings which could be thought to be dangerous to the public peace or the public safety. As he had said, the discretion must be left somewhere; and he thought that the guide which was afforded by this section, and the responsibility which the powers imposed upon the present Lord Lieutenant, or upon any Gentleman who might succeed him in his high and responsible position, would be a sufficient guarantee that the extensive powers of the Bill would not be used unless the Lord Lieutenant saw it was absolutely necessary for the public peace or public safety that they should be used. Whilst in Ireland many meetings had been prohibited, meetings which were of a perfectly Constitutional character had never been prohibited.

MR. LALOR said, he thought the Government were guilty of want of candour in withholding from the Committee the true meaning of the clause. Up to the present the Government had not had the courage to arrest the members of the Ladies' Land League and cast them into gaol as "suspects." They had not the courage to say that the meetings of the Ladies' League were calculated to provoke a breach of the peace; but he had no doubt that, under this clause, the Lord Lieutenant would hold the meetings were dangerous to the public safety.

MR. GILL said, it was a very curious thing that, notwithstanding the appeals of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) and other hon. Members, no Member of the Government, up to the present, had given any definition whatever of the words "public safety." The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland had mentioned "Boycotting," and that was the only thing that he could bring forward. He (Mr. Gill) considered that that expression, "public safety," was exceedingly vague and misleading. For instance, he did not see why, under this Act, the Lord Lieutenant should not prohibit meetings which might be called to consider the maladministration of the Land Act. It might certainly be illegal to hold meetings to condemn the Land Act itself; but he did not see why meetings should be illegal if they were simply called to condemn the administration of that Act. But the Lord Lieutenant, with the political conscience that had been attributed to him, might see a danger to the public safety even in a meeting called to condemn the administration of the Land Act. There were very many meetings which might be prevented in a similar way. The Attorney General for Ireland had said that the administration of this Act would be quite different from anything that might bring these meetings before a Court of Justice. The Government had stopped, by refusing an Amendment to this Bill, anything which could make the administration resemble a Court of Justice; they had refused to assent to the proposition that the reasons for prohibiting meetings should be sent up to the Lord Lieutenant in writing and upon oath. They had already refused to admit this Amendment, which was considered a great safeguard in the administration of this clause. The things that might be held to imperil the public safety would be so numerous, according to the conscience of the person who might administer this clause, that they should certainly be defined. For instance, if the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had a proper political conscience, similar to that of the Prime Minister or the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and many others—if there were meetings called to interfere with Free Trade, they might be prevented in Ireland. If the conscience of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was similar to that of many hon. Gentlemen sitting on this side of the House, he might prohibit meetings called in favour of Free Trade; in fact, there was no kind of meeting, politically speaking, that might not be prevented by the great latitude given by the words "public safety." Would the Home Secretary consent to put in the word "and," instead of "or," so that the clause would read "public peace and public safety?" That would give a certain amount of protection to free political opinion in Ireland.

MR. W. HOLMS said, he trusted the Committee would not agree to the proposal of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), that they should allow meetings to be held endangering the public safety. They might safely trust the Lord Lieutenant to say whether meetings, if held, would be antagonistic to the public safety. It was true that there was nothing which the English people held more dear than liberty of speech and the liberty of the Press; but he thought the Committee might fairly trust to the Lord Lieutenant in this matter.

MR. LEAMY said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down thought they—that was the English Members—might safely trust the Lord Lieutenant in Ireland to decide whether a proposed meeting was likely to be dangerous to the public safety. He would like to know whether the hon. Member would be prepared to stand up in this House and say that, under any circumstances, he was prepared to trust any man in England to decide whether a proposed meeting was likely to endanger the public safety? The hon. Member told them how jealous the English people were of the freedom of speech and of the right of public meeting, and, at the same time, he refused to support an Amendment which was only calculated, ever so slightly, to preserve to Ireland some vestige of freedom of speech. This Amendment was not open to the charge that it was one calculated to kill the clause. The Irish Members supported the Amendment only because they believed the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Givan) had aptly described "public safety" when he said the words conferred on the Lord Lieutenant a dubious and unlimited power. The Solicitor General for Ireland said the words had been carefully selected, so that this power should not interfere with Constitutional liberty. The hon. and learned Gentleman forgot that, at the opening of his speech, he said that this clause was one which tended to the restriction of the right of public meeting. He (Mr. Leamy) did not know what difference there was between Constitutional and public liberty.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PORTER) remarked, that he said that it interfered as little as possible with public liberty.

MR. LEAMY said, that, of course, he would accept the explanation of the hon. and learned Gentleman, but he would like to put this question to the Committee. They all had before their minds the great agitation of the last two or three years; and he would like to ask any man on the Liberal Benches whether, if the Lord Lieutenant had had power, when the Tories were in Office, to put down any meeting which he believed would be likely to be dangerous to the public safety, that agitation would not have been put down by the simple exercise of such power? He was not now going to make any charge against the Tories; but he was perfectly certain that the majority of the Irish Conservatives believed that the land agitation was hostile to the public safety, quite independently of any interest which was likely to be assailed by that agitation. He believed that the majority of Conservatives, not merely in Ireland, but in England, were firmly convinced that the land agitation was at any time during the three years—certainly when it assumed any large proportions at all—hostile to the public safety. Therefore, if this Bill had been law, a Conservative Lord Lieutenant would have put these meetings down, and would have put an end to that agitation which had assisted the present Government to pass their Land Bill, and which was encouraged by the present Government so long as it served their purposes, but which they were inclined to put down now because they thought that they could do without it. It was for these reasons that he and his hon. Friends objected to these words. Any great agitation spreading over the country—any agitation which brought large masses of the people within its ranks, and which had for its object a great reform—might, in the opinion of the Government of the day, be dangerous to the public safety. And what had they to do? They would simply have to request the Lord Lieutenant to stop every meeting of such agitation, and, if called to account, they would simply point to this clause in the Act of Parliament in justification of their action. If their action were to be called into question in the House of Commons, the Chief Secretary would say, as he said to-day—

"If I am asked any question with reference to the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant, I shall answer the question in the most general terms."

Of course, if they gave this power to the Lord Lieutenant it was impossible for them to call his action into question. They were told, when the last Coercion Bill was going through the House, they might bring every case of arrest before the House, and they might, if they chose, discuss every arrest. When, however, they did bring cases of arrest before the House, what answer did the late Chief Secretary give them? He got up in his place and said he acted under an Act of Parliament which this House had passed; he exercised a reasonable suspicion under the Act, and that was all he had to do. If a meeting was prohibited in Ireland, and they asked a question of the Chief Secretary, what would he say? He would say that this House, after mature deliberation and by a large majority, gave to the Lord Lieutenant these exceptional powers, and that when they gave these exceptional powers they must have expected them to be exercised. Yes, and the Lord Lieutenant would exercise them with a vengeance! It was plain that the object of the Liberal Party was to put down proper agitation in Ireland; but he had no doubt that they would be sorry for the step they were now taking.

[Twelfth Night.]

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, the great object of the Bill was to bring peace to Ireland, and he was astonished that the Irish Members did not unite with the Government in passing a measure which would assuredly conduce to the welfare of their country. For 55 years he had had in his employment between 50 and 60 Irishmen, who came every year for the hay harvest, and they had behaved remarkably well. For 55 years he had never had a complaint to make against any one of those Irish people; and at this moment there was in his house one family, some of whose members had come annually there for 85 years. It was painful to him, who had been associated with Irish people all his life, to find hon. Gentlemen opposite strenuously opposing a measure whose only object was to bring peace and tranquillity to their country, and to promote the investment of capital in that country. The lack of such investment was a matter from which Ireland greatly suffered, and anything which interfered with the public peace or public safety drove away capital. England would not invest capital in Ireland, unless the public peace there was assured, and the object of this Bill was to assure it. The opposition to this Bill was doing great injury abroad to the Irish cause, and if hon. Gentlemen opposite would only unite with the Government in passing this Act, they would find the opinion of Europe was with them. In former days he heard, over and over again, complaints made in foreign countries against the English government of Ireland; but now foreigners were beginning to find that no complaint was to be made against the conduct of the English in Ireland. They were beginning to learn that the English estates in Ireland were perfectly well managed.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am afraid I must call the hon. Baronet's attention to the fact that he is going beyond the subject.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he was sorry if he, one of the oldest Members of the House, had for a moment trans-

gressed. If he had done so, his only excuse could be that he had been carried away by his desire to influence, as much as he could, the welfare of Ireland. He appealed to hon. Gentlemen opposite to unite with the Government in restoring peace and tranquillity to Ireland, which was a most beautiful country, inhabited by a people full of humour, and having many good and attaching qualities. The ruffians who brought disgrace on it were not Irishmen, but Irish-Americans.

MR. O'DONNELL assured the hon. and gallant Baronet who had just addressed the Committee, that the Irish Members fully recognized the warmth of the sympathies which he had expressed with regard to their country—and, indeed, if there was any chance of the hon. and gallant Baronet being appointed to carry out the provisions of this Bill—[SIR HARRY VERNEY: I would have great pleasure.]—many of their objections would vanish. All he could do, in response to the hon. and gallant Baronet's appeal, was to assure him that if any English Government brought in a Bill for England anything akin to the atrocious character of this Bill; the Irish Members would be happy to unite with the hon. and gallant Baronet against it. They, however, had to deal in this matter with personages very different from the hon. and gallant Baronet; they had to deal with the regular supporters of Her Majesty's Government in Ireland, such as the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland and the hon. Member for Paisley (Mr. W. Holms), the latter of whom, with a love of liberty worthy of Wallace, had declared that he would have no objection to leave the liberties of an entire country at the disposal of one man.

MR. W. HOLMS said, he drew a distinction between liberty and license.

MR. O'DONNELL: Very well. The worthy countryman of Wallace would leave it to a single person to distinguish between liberty and license. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland stated that it was the object of the Government, in opposing this Amendment, to restrict public liberty in Ireland as little as possible. He would like to know if it was the object of the Government to restrict public liberty in Ireland as much as possible? What better form of words could they have used than the form of words which existed in their unamended clause? The Lord Lieutenant was to have power to prohibit any meeting which he believed to be prejudicial to public safety, and the Committee were allowed no definition of what the Lord Lieutenant might consider to be prejudicial to the public safety. The formula of "public safety" was a very common one to autocrats and to Jacobins. Whether to an Irish individual tyrant, or to a committee of savage repression such as was found in the French Revolution, public safety was a common formula under which could be committed any deed of crime and terrorism. The hon. Member for Paisley (Mr. W. Holmes) ingenuously chose to assume that the Irish Members were pleading for permission to hold meetings dangerous to the public safety in Ireland. The Irish Members were pleading for liberty to hold public meetings in Ireland which should not be summarily prevented at the caprice, which might be prompted by malevolence or mere ignorance, of any man who might be sent over to fill the post of Lord Lieutenant. This quibble of "public safety" received a very sufficient answer before the English Courts only a couple of days ago. There was a religious movement in England operating by great assemblies and processions, and a number of magistrates took it upon themselves to stop the gatherings of the Salvation Army on the plea of public safety; on the plea that if the meetings were permitted to be held tumults and disorder might be the consequence. Justices Field and Cave, however, pointed out that assemblies whose object was not in itself unlawful could not become unlawful or dangerous to the public safety simply because some person or persons might threaten to impede and obstruct the meetings and bring about tumults and brawls. On what ground could the Lord Lieutenant forbid a public meeting in Ireland on the plea of danger to public safety? Would he apprehend that some riot would take place at the meeting? It would be the duty of the Lord Lieutenant in that case to protect a lawful meeting against the rioters. The hon. Member for Paisley (Mr. W. Holmes) said there was nothing of which Englishmen were more jealous than the right of public meeting. Emphatically he (Mr. O'Donnell) stated that it was only with regard to public meetings in England, and with regard to the liberties of Englishmen, that the English people were jealous. There was no exercise of tyrannical power in Ireland by the Lord Lieutenant which would not be supported by the English political Party to which that Lord Lieutenant belonged; and if, on the plea of public safety, the Lord Lieutenant sought, in the most brutal manner, to suppress lawful meetings in Ireland, his conduct would be treated with the same calm indifference by English public opinion which English public opinion showed when, on the plea of greater economy, English officials in India starved prisoners by hundreds in their gaols. Such a thing as sympathy with a race outside England, apart, of course, from political considerations and Party exigencies, existed only amongst a very small minority of the English people. If the Lord Lieutenant, when the clause was passed unamended, were to suppress, on the plea of public safety, every meeting called, no matter for what purpose, and if the Irish Members complained in that House of the suppression, the only answer they would receive from the Chief Secretary of the day, or from one or other Irish Officials in the House, would be that the Lord Lieutenant suppressed the meetings because, in his opinion, they were dangerous to the public safety, and the enthusiastic plaudits of the Government Party of the day would support any declaration of that description. In refusing to propose any limitation, in refusing to grant any definition which would enable the people to understand what was meant by the words "public safety," the Government simply gave a further indication of its intention to hand Ireland over to an uncontrolled and uncontrollable despotism. He did not know whether the liberators of Bulgaria had consulted any of the Turkish Pashas in this matter; but he could imagine no clause which was more worthy of Turkish domination than the present. There was no Bashi-Bazouk ever let loose in Bulgaria who did not make out that he laid waste the province out of his regard for public safety. He (Mr. O'Donnell) did not agree entirely with his hon. Friend the Member for Waterford in his denunciation of this Bill. This clause, allowing the Lord Lieutenant to suppress meetings dangerous to the public safety, would, he was sure, only be exercised in Ireland in a number of cases in which "public safety" was, in the view of the Government, a phrase interchangeable with the phrase "safety of a Ministerial policy and Party."

MR. MACLIVER said, it was a great pity that Irish Members would persist in misrepresenting the feelings of hon. Gentlemen on the Liberal side of the House. Whatever might be said by Irish Members as to the right of public meeting, that right was held by Liberal Members more strongly, and more firmly, and more consistently, than it ever could be held by Irish Members. Irish Members ought to remember that the clause now before the Committee was one which was demanded by the condition of Ireland. It was folly to compare the condition of Ireland with the condition of England, and to say that the same law with regard to public meeting should be observed in Ireland as was now observed in England. It was also unfair to Members on the Liberal side of the House to say that they would have no disposition to impose on any other part of the United Kingdom except Ireland the conditions with regard to public meetings that it was proposed to impose by this clause. Liberal Members would not shrink from imposing restrictions upon the right of public meetings upon any part of the Kingdom where it was shown the state of affairs was the same as in Ireland. It was also an entire misrepresentation to say that this clause and this Bill were designed to curtail the liberty of the subject in Ireland. They were intended to put down crime in Ireland, and any meetings which, in the opinion of the Lord Lieutenant, were calculated to promote crime, should be suppressed in the forcible and straightforward manner suggested by the Bill. Much as he would deprecate anything that would restrict public liberty and public meeting, he supported this clause.

MR. REDMOND said, the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken had said this clause was demanded by the condition of Ireland. The Committee must remember they were not now discussing the whole of the Bill, but one particular clause of the Bill. The effect of this particular clause was to enlarge the powers which were already possessed by the Lord Lieutenant and by the magistrates in Ireland for curtailing, in certain cases, the right of public meeting. The hon. Member for Plymouth (Mr. Macliver), when he laid down the proposition that this clause was demanded by the condition of Ireland, should have supported his proposition by facts. The right of public meeting in Ireland was not to-day, even under the ordinary law, an absolute right. Upon information sworn by an individual, a magistrate might interfere with the right of public meeting, and the Lord Lieutenant had the power already, under the ordinary law, to interfere with meetings which might be called for the purpose of disturbing the public peace. That was a power which was now exercised by the Lord Lieutenant in very many cases. During the last two or three years it had been exercised in such a way as to lead the people to believe that the power was much too large, and, therefore, it was proper that the further enlargement of the power which was now demanded should be justified, not by general terms such as the hon. Member (Mr. Macliver) had employed, but by specific facts. Could the hon. Gentleman do that which the Government had not done—that was, prove that the powers which were already possessed in Ireland by the Crown were not sufficient to put down illegal meetings? Could the hon. Gentleman deny that meetings called for the purpose of interfering, or meetings calculated to interfere, with the public peace in Ireland, had been suppressed under the ordinary law administered by the Lord Lieutenant? If he could not deny that, upon what ground did he justify the present proposal to very largely increase the powers which, in the present state of things in Ireland, had been proved to be sufficient for their purpose? They were told that this proposal was not designed or intended to curtail public liberty in Ireland. They had not to consider what was intended by this provision, but what this provision might be capable of doing if it were carried out. The intention of the present Lord Lieutenant and of the present Chief Secretary might be very good. It was very easy to assert that these Officials had nothing but the best intentions; but he could not help remembering that the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. W. E. Forster) went to Ireland amidst the universal acknowledgment of Members on both sides of the House that his intentions were very good. The Irish knew how long the right hon. Gentleman's good intentions lasted. How long were the good intentions of Lord Spencer and the present Chief Secretary to last? It came to this, that the Committee were asked to place the power in the hands of a single individual to put down every form of public meeting in Ireland. To bring this power into operation it was not necessary there should be any evidence whatever either of illegal intent on the part of those who called the meeting, or who were about to hold the meeting, or that in the opinion of responsible persons in the locality the meeting was likely to interfere with the public safety. If an Amendment had been adopted making it necessary that before this power should be brought into play sworn information should be lodged in regard to the meetings, very much of his objection to the clause might have been removed. He objected to the clause as it now stood, because it placed an absolute power in the Lord Lieutenant, and because he refused to give absolute discretion over the liberties of a whole nation, no matter how trustworthy he might appear to be, and no matter how high-minded he might be. These were the considerations which made it necessary for him and his hon. Friends to protest against this clause. He could not help saying that he listened with feelings of very great impatience to the protestations of hon. Members on the Liberal side of the House of their desire to preserve liberty in Ireland. They told the Committee it was their desire to preserve the liberty of the subject in Ireland, and in the same breath they supported a proposal which left it at the discretion of a single man to put down every form of public meeting if he chose. The good intentions of the present Lord Lieutenant and the present Chief Secretary might not last long; but suppose those good intentions did last, how long were the present Government and the present men who ruled Ireland to continue in Office? No one could tell, and he was convinced that the hon. Member for Plymouth (Mr. Macliver) would hesitate before he placed such sweeping powers as were conferred by this Bill in the hands of a Tory Government. He begged the Committee to remember what the present powers of the law were in Ireland, and he asked them whether a tittle of evidence had been adduced to show that those powers had proved inefficient in the past? Unless that had been proved, he contended there was no justification for the proposal—a proposal which not only placed the right of public meeting in the hands of an individual, but which increased that penalty which might be imposed upon men who, as the law stood at present, might perhaps attend a meeting without knowing it had been proclaimed, and without knowing it was illegal in any shape or form. They were told they ought not to prolong the discussion upon every point of the Bill; but the contention was that in a Bill so drastic as this every step that the Government took along the path of coercion must be justified by facts and figures, and with regard to this proposal they had not attempted, in any shape or form, to justify their demand. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) cited, in palliation, he (Mr. Redmond) supposed, of the want of evidence, that in cases like these the facts were known to the country. Well, but the facts with regard to the suppression of public meetings in Ireland, the facts with regard to the failure of the powers of the law to cope with the illegal meetings in Ireland were not known to the country, and were not known to this House. There had not been any failure on the part of the ordinary law to cope with the illegal meetings in Ireland, and he challenged the Government to prove that in any individual case the present powers possessed by the Government had not been sufficient for their purpose.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that he is now arguing against the whole clause, and not upon the immediate Amendment before us.

MR. REDMOND said, that the Amendment before them was to leave out the words "public safety," and that was an Amendment which, to his mind, could be supported by the strongest arguments. He considered that the public safety under this Bill must in reality mean the same thing as the public peace. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor

General for Ireland told them that meetings called for the "Boycotting" of individuals, though, perhaps, no violence might take place at those meetings, and the public peace might not be broken, could not be interfered with by this Bill unless the words "public safety" were included. He (Mr. Redmond) denied that altogether. When this Bill passed, an attempt at "Boycotting" an individual would become an offence under the Act, and any meeting called to promote the "Boycotting" of any person would be a meeting called to break the public peace, and also to interfere with public safety. Every meeting called for that purpose during the last two years had been suppressed by the powers the Lord Lieutenant already possessed. Surely that was a matter which ought to engage the very serious attention of this Committee. The scope of this clause, and the intention of the Bill, were to deal with crime in Ireland—with secret crime and secret organization. The effect of interfering in any way with public meeting would undoubtedly be to promote crime and to increase the strength of secret organization. The Government said they desired to strike at secret power; and they went about suppressing public meetings. He trusted that not only upon this point, not only with reference to this particular Amendment, but that upon the whole clause, his hon. Friends would give a persistent and determined opposition.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, the retention of the words "public safety" was not worth the time the Committee had already spent upon it. Surely, when the Lord Lieutenant possessed such extensive powers as to prohibit any meeting which he had reason to believe would be dangerous to the public peace, he had ample power, and he (Mr. T. A. Dickson) had no doubt that the Law Officers would be able to make the words "public peace" elastic enough to cover any difficulty. He was surprised that the Government should insist upon retaining the words "public safety" when they had already in the clause the words "public peace." He hoped the Government would agree to omit the words "public safety" on the ground that they were really unnecessary.

MR. HEALY noticed that not a single Member of the Government had as yet risen to support the retention of these words. Two or three hon. Members on the Government side rose to maintain the Government in reference to the clause as a whole; but in reference to a restricted portion of it—namely, the desirability of maintaining public safety, the Government, even amongst their own supporters, had not had a single friend. Was not that a remarkable fact? The hon. and gallant Baronet, whose words they were always happy to hear when he spoke in sympathy with them—whose words, he might say, came upon them like the shadow of a great rock in a weary land—had not a word to say as to the extended powers which would be given to the Government in regard to public safety under the Bill. He would point out, especially to Members like the hon. Member for Plymouth (Mr. MacIver), that they rather misunderstood the position of the Irish Members in reference to this matter. It had been said that if the condition of England were analogous to the condition of Ireland, hon. Members would have no hesitation in supporting the Government in bringing in a Bill for the former country; but that, he would point out, was supposing a fallacy, because it supposed that hon. Gentlemen and the Government knew as much about Ireland as they knew about England. The hon. Member to whom he was particularly referring knew nothing at all about Ireland, except what he read out of the English newspapers; and those journals, it should be remembered, got their information from a few Orange editors connected with the Irish Press. He was astonished that there were still Members to be found to get up in this House and repeat this time-worn fallacy; and he maintained that Gentlemen opposite, who at present formed Her Majesty's Ministry and their supporters, were as incompetent to legislate for Ireland as they were to legislate for Madagascar. He should like to make the position of the Irish Party, with regard to this Amendment, clear. Of course, they did not hope to pass the Amendment. They did not hope to carry any Amendment of any kind whilst the Home Secretary had the management of the Bill; but they wanted to be able to say, when crime redoubled—as undoubtedly it would—"Crime has redoubled; we told you it would." He wished to be able to point out to the Government that the arguments of the Irish Members were looked upon as stupid, and laughed at. Well, they hoped that during the three years that this Bill had to run, or when the period had passed away and they found on the Treasury Bench a Ministry somewhat more sympathetic, in consequence of what had gone before, this new Ministry would be willing to listen to them, and would say—"Your arguments were right before, and we are sorry that you were not listened to." Quite lately, a most remarkable statement had come from the Government through the mouth of the highest Official in the Irish Executive—namely, the Lord Lieutenant—to the effect that it was the intention of Her Majesty's Administration to drive public discontent in that country beneath the surface. That, he maintained, was one of the most unfortunate admissions that had ever come from the mouth of a Lord Lieutenant. Earl Cowper had told them this at Belfast, after the arrests of the "suspects," and again on leaving Dublin. This Bill would drive Irish discontent beneath the surface, because the people would find that it was too dangerous to take part in open agitation, and they would, therefore, be obliged to have resort to private agitation. If the Irish people were unable to understand the changes which had been made in the law, and in view of the fact that the Government were endeavouring to drive their discontent beneath the surface, they would, in the words of Shakespeare, "Take the law into their own hands and break it." The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had asked them what was their remembrance of public safety? Surely they remembered the phrase being made use of by Robespierre and his followers, and they had not heard those words, except in Lord Grey's Act, since the famous days of 1793. He was referring to the days when men's heads were taken off by a Committee of Public Safety. But in those days, although that Committee consisted of several individuals, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary now proposed to leave public safety in the hands of one man. The power the right hon. and learned Gentleman was bestowing upon Officials in the Bill was far more vast than hon. Members seemed to think. The Lord Lieutenant would have power to put down a meeting, whether public or private. He would ask this. What was an assembly of people at Mass, but a public meeting; what was an assembly of people in a chapel, or a church, or a meeting-house, but a public meeting; and, under this clause, what was there to restrain the Lord Lieutenant, if he chose to do so, from preventing people attending services at meeting-houses, chapels, and churches? Under this clause, meetings of Presbyterians in the North of Ireland could be prevented; and if there should be a recurrence there of public bigotry, similar to that private bigotry which manifested itself in this country, there would be power in the hands of, perhaps, some of the strongest bigots to put down every kind of public worship in Ireland. It might be argued, for instance, that the priests, whom, by the way, The Saturday Review had called "surpliced ruffians," were in the habit of haranguing their congregations on political subjects at Mass. The Government had arrested several priests; and, in the interests of what they were pleased to call "public safety," they might interfere still further with these gentlemen, and put down almost all the religious observances of the people in Ireland. He was not referring in particular to the Protestant Provinces of Ireland, or the Catholic Provinces; but he maintained that wherever there was to be a meeting of the people—wherever the people assembled together, three constituting a meeting—there would be power in the hands of the Executive to suppress such meeting. It had been fallaciously argued that the Government already possessed that power. In one sense, no doubt, it was true that the police had had the power of dispersing meetings at the point of the bayonet, or by the use of a few buckshot; but it was not the fact that the Lord Lieutenant, for the purposes of public safety, had had the power of putting down all manner of public meetings in Ireland. He would call attention to the fact that any action bringing a person under this Bill would be punished by six months' imprisonment. If a man took part in a public meeting, six months' imprisonment; if he took part in a riot, six months' imprisonment; if he took forcible possession, six months' imprisonment; if he ran a newspaper against the wishes of the Government, six months' imprisonment; strike high, or strike low, the punishment was the same—six months' imprisonment. He would appeal to the Government whether it was really necessary to maintain this extravagant provision in their measure? Not a single Member on the Government side of the House had risen to support it, except the Home Secretary and the Solicitor General; and beyond theirs, not a single argument in its favour had been used. No doubt, the Government had many willing assistants, and that many hon. Members would support them on their side of the House. Whatever the Government did there were many hon. Members who would throw up their hats and cry—"Well done!" But there were none of them ready to get up and defend, by their speeches, the retention of the words "public safety" in the Bill. The Home Secretary had made many trips in his operations recently. He had prosecuted members of the Salvation Army, and, by an extraordinary misapplication of the law, he had attempted to make them give security for the maintenance of the peace. He had failed in his endeavour, and why? Because he should have attempted, not to make them give security against breaches of the peace, but to give security for good behaviour. In this Bill, in a similar manner, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had mixed up security for the peace and security for public safety. If he had prosecuted the Salvation Army with the object of getting them to give security for good behaviour, no doubt he would have been successful; but he had mixed up two things just as he was mixing up two things in this measure. He (Mr. Healy) would invite the right hon. and learned Gentleman, if he could not accede to the Amendment they were now discussing, at any rate, to agree to omit from the clause the word "or," and insert the word "and." That was to say, the clause, instead of running thus—

Mr. Redmond

"The Lord Lieutenant may from time to time," &c., "prohibit any meeting which he has reason to believe to be dangerous to the public peace or the public safety," should run—

"Prohibit any meeting which he has reason to believe to be dangerous to the public peace and the public safety."

He had no objection to the concurrence of the two words "peace" and "safety;" but he did object to the clause as it stood. This latter point was not a very large one, but he thought it was worthy of consideration.

Mr. Healy

MR. BYRNE said, he begged to support the Amendment. This seemed to some Members of the Committee to be a very small matter. The Amendment only consisted of four words; but he ventured to say that there were no words in the Bill so strong as these. Like a great many other clauses, this one was drawn in a very elastic, and, it did not seem to him, a proper manner. The Lord Lieutenant would have power to prohibit any meeting he had reason to believe would be dangerous to the public peace; and one would think that such a power as that would be quite sufficient without going into the question of public safety. What did "public safety" mean? The Government pretended that they only asked for power to prevent crime, and further powers to enable them to govern Ireland in such a manner as to preserve the public peace. Well, if the Committee granted all these things to punish for what had been committed in the past, and regulate what was to be done in the future, he did not see why it could not be done without going into this question of the public safety. Looking at the present condition of Ireland, they could not fail to see that there was a great deal of meaning in this clause. As he read it, it meant nothing less than this—that for the future no section of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland should have the power of holding a meeting for any purpose, particularly if its object was in any way connected with politics, or the rights and extended privileges of the people. He ventured to say that, under this clause, the Lord Lieutenant would be able to put down any agitation whatever, whether it were for Home Rule or connected with the Land Question, whether it had reference to an extension of the fisheries or the construction of piers, the improvement of harbours or the extension of the franchise. Meetings in connection with all these subjects it would be in the power of the Lord Lieutenant to put a stop to. Such a power, he contended, was too much to give to an Executive officer of a Constitutional Government. If they looked back at the seed sown by the landlords, if they looked to the history of the country, and traced the circumstances which had led to its present condition, they would see great reason why they ought not to draw the knot too tight for fear of snapping the rope. It had already been pointed out by an hon. Member that the men who were evicted from their homes were now hungry men and dangerous men. The hon. Member for Galway had said that if he had been turned out of his holding, with his wife and children, on the roadside, and had been obliged to look on while those depending on him sickened and died, the chances were that he, too, would become a dangerous man. Well, with so many evictions, and so many hungry and dangerous men in Ireland, he ventured to say that this clause, passing as it was without amendment, would be in the future pregnant, not of good government and peace, but of that which would lead to the suppression of public meetings for any purpose whatever in Ireland.

Question put.

The Committee divided.—Ayes 154; Noes 56: Majority 98.—(Div. List, No. 140.)

MR. HEALY said, there existed on the other side of the House, as the division had shown, a strong opinion against this unrestrained interference with the right of public meeting on the part of the Lord Lieutenant. What he would propose, therefore, was this—that they should insert this Proviso—

“Provided, That this section shall not apply in the case of any meeting to promote or oppose the candidature of any person seeking election as a Member of the House of Commons or of any other representative body.”

It appeared to him that this was an Amendment which every Member of the House ought to support. It proposed merely that the power of the Lord Lieutenant should be restrained so far as meetings for bond fide electoral purposes were concerned. It was well known that at certain periods meetings were obliged to be held for electoral purposes, and that “Boycotting” meetings, and meetings with the object of inducing landlords to reduce their rents, could not be held under cover of electoral objects. Her Majesty’s Government surely would not be afraid to adopt a system that was practised in France. In that country these public meetings at electoral periods took place without hindrance. There was likely to be an election in Mallow in a very short time, as it was probable that the Attorney General for Ireland would be going where “Obstruction ceased from troubling and the weary were at rest.” Before the right hon. and learned Gentleman came into the enjoyment of his dignified repose, he (Mr. Healy) wished to make provision for the unrestrained right of public meeting during the contest which would ensue upon his retirement.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 16, after “safety,” insert—
“Provided, That this section shall not apply in the case of any meeting to promote or oppose the candidature of any person seeking election as a Member of the House of Commons or of any other representative body.”—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that he entirely agreed with the principle of the Amendment; but he could not accept it in exactly the terms in which it was offered. If the hon. Member would agree to a modification of the clause, so as to make his object clearer, he (Sir William Harcourt) would be very glad to see whether words could not be devised to carry out the object in view.

MR. HEALY said, he should be very happy, under those circumstances, to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HEALY said, the next Amendment he had to propose was to insert the sub-section—

“A copy of such order shall be forthwith served in the prescribed manner on the promoters of such meeting, if known.”

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 16, after “safety,” insert the following sub-section:—“A copy of such order shall be forthwith served in the prescribed manner on the promoters of such meeting, if known.”—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had no objection to this Amendment; but he should prefer that the words “if possible” should be inserted after the word “manner.”

MR. HEALY said, he should be willing to accept the right hon. and learned Gentleman's proposal if his Amendment were agreed to.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. DILLON said, that, in the absence of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), he begged to move the sub-section to provide that threats, or alleged threats, on the part of any persons whatever, to interrupt with violence a public meeting should not be a reason for the prohibition of such meeting. He hoped the Government would be able to accept the Amendment, which would cover a class of cases which were of considerable importance to the Irish Members. It was well known that a great many cases had occurred, especially in the Province of Ulster, where attempts had been made by the landlords to prevent those interested in the affairs of the tenantry from holding meetings to agitate for an amelioration of their condition. The landlords and their agents had circulated statements to the effect that they would forcibly interfere with such meetings or demonstrations, and the Government in consequence had felt themselves bound to send a sufficient force into these districts to secure peace and prohibit meetings, in the interests, of course, of one party—the landlord party. In the future, if meetings were to be prohibited in consequence of threats to the effect that the opposite party would interfere with a meeting of tenants, no meetings would be held. In the North of Ireland, when the Orange Party had chosen to hold meetings, they had not been interfered with by the Land League; but, on the other hand, the Orange Party had very frequently published notices and placards, calling on their friends to attack the meetings of the Land League or of the tenantry, and drive those who took part in them from the field. Of course, as a matter of fact, while, in spite of these placards and threatening notices, the meetings were held, in not a single instance had the persons who had threatened put in an appearance. Their announced intention had been to drive the holders of the meetings like dogs across the Boyne, but they had never done so; they had been afraid. In many instances, however, their threats had been communicated to Dublin Castle, whence, the belief being entertained that there was danger of a breach of the peace, instructions were issued to the police to suppress the meetings. He only mentioned these points to show the Government that this Amendment had been drawn up in no spirit of Obstruction, but that it was a serious Amendment, and that unless it was adopted the issue of threatening notices would be an absolute prohibition of all meetings that were not Orange meetings North of the Boyne.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 16, after "safety," insert "Provided always, That threats, or alleged threats, on the part of any persons whatever, to interrupt with violence a public meeting, shall not be a reason for the prohibition of such a meeting."—(Mr. Dillon.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, everyone knew that rival meetings were the cause of considerable disturbance in Ireland, and to accept this Amendment would be to tie the hands of the Lord Lieutenant.

MR. SEXTON said, he thought the objection of the right hon. and learned Gentleman scarcely met the case put by his hon. Friend. The right hon. and learned Gentleman stated that there were rival factions in Ireland, and that, where meetings were held by these rival factions, there was a great prospect of a breach of the peace being committed. Probably, then, it was desirable that meetings, where these factions existed, should be protected; but, as a rule, it was not the case, where meetings in the interests of the tenant farmers were held, that the opposite party was a party of any appreciable strength; and what his hon. Friend desired was that the mere announcement by a person that there would be a disturbance should not be sufficient to induce the Lord Lieutenant to suppress a meeting. Any landlord, or agent, or bailiff, or hanger-on about these people—and he need not inform the Committee that there were many hangers-on who were only too ready to make mischief—would be able, without difficulty, to put a stop to a meeting which might be objectionable to him by simply writing to the authorities to say that there was likely to be a disturbance, or by posting up a placard to the same effect. Or a bailiff or a hanger-on could publish an advertisement in an Orange paper threatening to interfere with the meeting, and that would be decided by the authorities to be evidence that there was danger of a breach of the peace. The Lord Lieutenant should use his discretion, and have power to refuse to put a stop to a meeting unless he thought sufficient reason had been shown for such a course. He (Mr. Sexton) did not mean to say that where there really were two serious rival factions meetings they should be allowed to take place; but where there were not two great factions, where only one individual, or a small group of individuals, objected to the course about to be taken by the majority, he did not think that any announcement or threat of theirs should be allowed by the Lord Lieutenant to interfere with the holding and peaceable conduct of a meeting or demonstration.

MR. DILLON said, it was not true, as the Home Secretary had stated, that if this Amendment were passed the hands of the Lord Lieutenant would be tied. That functionary was entitled, at the present moment, to prohibit meetings where he had reason to believe they would be dangerous to the public peace. He (Mr. Dillon) would mention a case, with all the circumstances of which he was acquainted, which would show how easy it would be, unless there were some proper safeguards adopted, for a single individual, or a small clique, to put a stop to a legitimate meeting. A meeting had been convened in favour of the Land League at a place in County Fermanagh. The local landlord was strongly opposed to this meeting, and the local Orange Lodge put up a notice to the effect that they would drive those who intended to hold the meeting like dogs out of the district. Well, the magistrates of the place dined with the landlord, and on the occasion of this social meeting had informations sworn before them that there was likely to be a disturbance if the Land League meeting were held. It had since been discovered that the men who swore the informations were immediately under the influence of this local landlord. The whole thing was concocted at the landlord's table; information was sent up to Dublin Castle, with the result that the Lord Lieutenant prohibited the meeting. An enormous number of people came into the town, and it was with the utmost difficulty that the leaders of the popular Party prevented a collision taking place between the soldiery and the people. All the people were with the Land League, and the only danger of a disturbance arose from the fact that, acting upon these sworn informations, a military force was sent down from Enniskillen. So general was the opinion in favour of the meeting that no Orangeman would have dared to interfere with it. What was desired on this occasion was that the Lord Lieutenant should not accept the posting of threatening placards by single individuals as an evidence that there was likely to be a disturbance in the district. The Lord Lieutenant should not act upon entirely baseless rumours, but should inquire into the matter, and satisfy himself that there was real danger of a breach of the peace. Where there was a powerful faction opposed to a very small minority he should not be persuaded that there was likely to be any danger.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not think the words of the Amendment would exactly do. What he understood to be the desire was, that a meeting which would not be stopped by the Lord Lieutenant under the former words should not be stopped through a device of the kind suggested by hon. Members. He quite agreed that this kind of thing ought not to be allowed to take place, and he would therefore undertake to introduce into the Bill words calculated to render the success of such a device impossible.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SEXTON said, he proposed to insert, at the end of the first paragraph, this Proviso—“Provided, however, that the Lord Lieutenant shall not issue such order unless by and with the advice of the Privy Council in Ireland.”

One of the things he objected to most strenuously in the whole Bill was this clause, and the unrestricted nature of the personal and despotic power that the Lord Lieutenant would possess under it. This was a fair specimen of the kind of power that was to be found in the Bill. The Lord Lieutenant, of his own motion, might say what class of meeting was to be prohibited, and for what reason it was to be prohibited, and might act upon the merest hint or whisper that he received. There was nothing to guide them as to the manner in which the Lord Lieutenant would exercise his powers. On looking through the Bill he found there were occasions upon which the Lord Lieutenant would be bound to consult the Privy Council of Ireland—when, for instance, he proposed to proclaim a district. On such an occasion he would be bound to consult the Privy Council, and without doing so he would not be allowed to proclaim a district. He (Mr. Sexton) further found, on reference to Clause 25, that the Lord Lieutenant might, from time to time, by and with the advice of the Privy Council, make, and when made revoke, add to, and alter rules in relation to certain matters which were stated in the Bill. He (Mr. Sexton) was at a loss to see why the Lord Lieutenant should be released from a similar obligation in reference to such an important matter as the prohibition of a public meeting. He did not for a moment conceal the fact that he had no admiration whatever for the Privy Council of Ireland. He thought it was about the worst constituted body to take part in the government of a country of any body in the world. It consisted of the heads of the Military Profession, the Judges, and persons in the pay of the Crown, who had no sympathy whatever with the people of Ireland; who, in fact, had gained their position by desertion of the popular cause, and who now hated that cause with all the hatred of renegades. But so much did he feel that unrestricted power of this kind was bad for the people who exercised it, and bad for the people over whom it was exercised, that he would rather amend the Bill by requiring the Lord Lieutenant to have the concurrence of the Privy Council, than leave the powers of the section solely in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 16, at the end of the foregoing Amendment, to insert the words "Provided however, That the Lord Lieutenant shall not issue such order unless by and with the advice of the Privy Council in Ireland."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, he should oppose the Amendment, as he did not think the Lord Lieutenant should be allowed to shelter himself behind the Privy Council. He would rather leave the power solely with the Lord Lieutenant.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought they had discussed this matter somewhat fully upon Clause 1. With regard to the Lord Lieutenant's right of suspending trial by jury, it had been suggested that the responsibility should rest upon various other bodies, under cover of the Privy Council; but the House had come most decidedly to the determination that in a matter of such grave importance the responsibility of the Lord Lieutenant ought to be undivided. As had been already stated, the Government, as a whole, were responsible for the action of the Lord Lieutenant, and he and the Government could be called to account by Parliament. It was far better, therefore, that the responsibility of the Lord Lieutenant should be undivided.

MR. P. MARTIN said, he thought they ought to be consistent in this matter. He must confess that he had never seen a greater mass of inconsistency than was to be found in this Bill. In the proclamation of a district, and in the subsequent clauses, the Lord Lieutenant was required to seek the aid of the Privy Council. Here, however, it was sought to vest in him undivided responsibility. He (Mr. P. Martin) agreed with the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) that though the Irish Privy Council was, as at present constituted, a body which certainly demanded sweeping reformation, yet there was this reason for its introduction in the section—that it preserved some semblance, at least, of that which the present Government apparently sought to ignore—namely, the right of Irishmen in some way to intervene and have some voice in the conduct of their own affairs. As an Irishman, he desired Irishmen to have a voice in the management of their own affairs. So long as they had a voice in the management of their own affairs the better would those affairs be managed; and he did contend, although he had not a very high opinion of the Irish Privy Council, that, for the sake of giving Irishmen some voice in a matter of this description, he should feel himself compelled to vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) if it were pressed to a division,

Mr. Sexton

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PORTER) said, there was a distinction to be drawn between the functions to be performed by the Lord Lieutenant under the present section, and those under the section dealing with the proclaiming of a district. Under the present clause, the suppression of a meeting would be an Executive act; whereas the proclaiming of a district was a matter of general policy, and did not affect any individual case—it applied to a whole district. It had always been the case, in matters of this kind, that where large districts were concerned the Privy Council should be appealed to; but that where the action to be taken was of a less general character the Lord Lieutenant should act upon his own responsibility. It might be right or it might be wrong to have this clause in the Bill; but if the Bill was to have any practical utility at all, it would be impossible to accept such Amendments as this. If it were accepted, there would not be time between the receipt of the information that the meeting was about to be held, and the time at which that assembly would take place, to summon the Privy Council and hold a meeting. These meetings in the country districts were held under such circumstances that very often the Executive knew nothing about them until the night before they were to be held. It was thoroughly idle, therefore, to say that the Lord Lieutenant should consider the information he received, and call together the Privy Council in time to be able to take action, if action were necessary. It was said that this was a mere matter of form, this summoning of the Privy Council; and, whether it was or not, in a great many cases it would be utterly impossible for the Privy Council to be summoned, and after a consultation to take action, until the meeting it was called to consider was all over.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he would remind the Committee that in 1843, in the case of the proclaiming of the famous Clontarf meeting in Dublin, what occurred was this. It was believed that the meeting was likely to be a dangerous one, and the hurried arrangement which the Solicitor General for Ireland had referred to was made at once. The Privy Council were summoned, and, unless he was very much mistaken, the famous proclamation to put a stop to this meeting was issued only the night before the day upon which 50,000 or 60,000 people were expected to assemble. Every possible care was taken to prevent a collision between the military and the people. The hon. Member (Mr. P. Martin) had referred to the constitution of the Privy Council; and, as he had done so, it was but right that he (Sir Patrick O'Brien) should make him a present of this one remark. On the occasion when the Privy Council met to proclaim the Clontarf meeting, the only person who opposed its being proclaimed was an official of the Government, none other than Sir Edward Blakeley. He it was who, in advance of all the other members of the Privy Council, desired to preserve the liberty of the people.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, the Solicitor General for Ireland had misled the Committee, although, no doubt, unintentionally. It was not necessary for the Lord Lieutenant to consult the Privy Council in the case of proclaiming a meeting when it was thought likely to be dangerous. Under such circumstances a meeting could be proclaimed at any moment. The Lord Lieutenant could proclaim a meeting without the consent of the Privy Council, and anyone who attended that meeting would be liable to imprisonment.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he did not want to misrepresent the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, and the Committee would see whether he had rightly understood him or not. He took it that his objection to giving the Privy Council the right of consulting with the Lord Lieutenant before a meeting was proclaimed was because information of a meeting that was likely to be dangerous might only be received on the eve of that meeting, and that there would, therefore, not be time to call the Privy Council together. Was that a fair representation of the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman? ["Yes!"] He might take it that that was the case. He was astonished, then, that the hon. and learned Gentleman, who was a barrister of many years' practice, and who had achieved great success, had endeavoured to make use of such an argument, which showed the real meaning of the whole clause. The Lord Lieutenant, it was said, might only hear of a meeting on the eve of that meeting, and His Excelency would issue his proclamation, therefore, almost simultaneously with his receipt of information. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) would recall this argument to the attention of the Government when they came to the next portion of the clause.

[Twelfth Night.]

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, the objection that there would not be time to call the Privy Council together appeared to him to be one without the slightest force. The members of the Privy Council, or rather a large number of them, resided quite close to Dublin, and their services, if they were required, could be availed of almost immediately. In the case of the Clontarf meeting, which was to have been held on the Sunday, six hours before the day on which the people were expected to assemble—because he believed it was not until 6 o'clock on the Saturday night that the decision was arrived at—the proclamation was issued. It had been pointed out that by leaving out all reference to the Privy Council in this clause, they left the Lord Lieutenant with an undivided responsibility, and rendered that official and the Government responsible to the House. But what was the value of that responsibility, when the Irish Members, and those who supported the popular Party in Ireland, were only a very small minority in the House? Surely, it was known very well that whatever was done by the Lord Lieutenant, or by the Government, if called in question in Parliament, would be flatted by the large majority of Members. What the Irish Members wanted to do, and all that it was in their power to do, was to have such safeguards put into the Bill as they thought necessary at the time of the passing of the measure. So far as the responsibility of the Government was concerned, all it ever came to was a badgering for some time by half-a-dozen Members, who had no weight, and whose utterances had no effect upon Parliament. It did no good to badger the Lord Lieutenant or the Government; but, as it was quite conformable with ordinary legislation of this kind to fetter the Lord Lieutenant with the necessity of appealing to the Privy Council, he trusted this Amendment, to safeguard the interests of those who wished to hold public meetings, would be accepted.

Mr. SHEIL said, it seemed to him that the hon. and learned Solicitor

General for Ireland had argued in such a way as to entirely upset the arguments of the Home Secretary. The Solicitor General's argument was that the Privy Council could not be summoned because there would be no time to do it. Then they might take it that at the very last moment a telegram must be received from some police official, or some private individual, saying that a certain meeting was to be held and that the peace was likely to be broken, and that then, on his own responsibility, the Lord Lieutenant was to say whether or not that meeting should be allowed to take place. Surely such a thing was impossible. It stood to reason, what the Irish Members argued over and over again on this and other parts of the Bill, that the responsibility the Government intended to take upon themselves, or throw upon the Lord Lieutenant, would be necessarily relegated by him to other individuals, for whom he could not be in a position to answer, and with whom he could have had no conference. Suppose a meeting was to be held on Sunday, and the Lord Lieutenant only received notice of it on Saturday night, how could he come to a conclusion? He could only do so upon information that he received that the meeting ought to be suspended. On that recommendation he would suspend the meeting. Surely this was not on his own responsibility. He (Mr. Sheil) denied any such statement. If the Lord Lieutenant really did act upon his own responsibility, he should not so much object to the Bill, particularly in the hands of the noble Lord who at present filled the position of Viceroy; but they had argued it over and over again, and now once more they had to repeat the argument, and to remind the Committee that it was not the Lord Lieutenant who was responsible. The people who really would be responsible, and were responsible, were people whom Parliament would never be able to bring to book. Parliament knew nothing of them. He would point out to the Government that most of the objections to the clauses in this Bill were on the score of this responsibility. The Government said the Lord Lieutenant would be responsible; but that was really not so, because this high official received his information from parties all over Ireland who were in a position far beneath him, and of whom he knew very little.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, that, whenever any doubt arose as to any clause of this Bill, the Irish Members claimed the benefit of the doubt for liberty, while the Government claimed the benefit of the doubt for tyranny; and, unhappily, the majority of the Committee seemed inclined to go with the Government in every case. It was, no doubt, pleasant for hon. Gentlemen to be saved the trouble of making up their own minds, and to leave two or three Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench to perform that duty for them. His hon. Friend had said that, according to the showing of the Attorney General himself, the Lord Lieutenant claimed to act in the matter on the spur of the moment. He could not have time to consider. The Bill was intended not to give him time to make any inquiry into the truth of allegations in telegrams that might be sent to him. Some fine evening a telegram might be sent to him stating that on the following morning a meeting was to be held in some part of the country which would constitute a great peril to the public peace and public safety. Not a moment's time was given to the Lord Lieutenant to reflect or inquire whether the information was well-founded; but he was forthwith to take action upon it. Suppose the Lord Lieutenant was easily alarmed, as such people had been from time to time, then, of course, in the working of this measure a good deal would depend upon the personal character and temper of the Lord Lieutenant for the time being. A story was told of a Lord Lieutenant, a good many years ago, who was persecuted with alarming reports by a class of people in Ireland who found it their interest to work upon his fears, and who were then, as now, the opponents of freedom and public liberty in Ireland. They continually poured letters into the Lord Lieutenant's hands giving accounts of terrible affairs about to happen throughout the country. One morning, one of these gentlemen rushed hastily into the Lord Lieutenant's bedroom, and exclaimed—"Oh! my Lord, the people of Dublin are all about to rise!" His Excellency was a man of some discretion and judgment, and his reply was, that he thought it was about time for everybody to rise. But there might be a Lord Lieutenant of very much less firmness of character than that gentleman, and one who might, on similar information, take the very opposite course, by telegraphing orders to prevent public meetings from taking place. Such things were possible, and Irish Members felt perfectly certain that under this measure such things would occur from time to time; therefore, it was not too much to ask that the Lord Lieutenant should be required to consult either his Privy Council or some other body upon the necessity for taking action before acting upon alarming and probably absurd announcements made by frightened or ill-meaning individuals. For these reasons, he supported the Amendment, as he thought every lover of liberty ought to do.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 41; Noes 213: Majority 172.—(Div. List, No. 141.)

MR. PARNELL proposed an Amendment, which he hoped the Government would agree to accept—namely, in line 16, after "safety," to insert—

"Provided, That in case of meetings for lawful objects summoned by handbill, placard, or other public advertisement, and whereof six days' notice has been given, the Lord Lieutenant shall give by similar notice in the district at least three clear days' notice of such prohibition."

The object of that Amendment was to provide that where six days' notice was given of a meeting, the Lord Lieutenant should give a notice of half that period, warning people not to attend the meeting. The reasonable character of that Amendment was apparent on the face of it, because, if suitable notice was not given to people in any locality where a meeting was summoned to be held, many of the people who lived perhaps 10 miles or 15 miles from the place of meeting would attend without any knowledge that the meeting had been prohibited, and that they had rendered themselves liable to imprisonment for six months with hard labour. The way in which this clause was drafted illustrated the sweeping character of the whole Bill. There was not the slightest safeguard against persons being swept into one wide net and sentenced to imprisonment; and it would appear as if the promoters of the Bill desired to envelop the Government in Ireland in a suit of armour in which there should not be the slightest possible chink, and, at the same time, to provide the Government with a weapon of such a character as would enable them to strike down every form of Constitutional agitation. There was not the slightest safeguard provided for the liberties and rights of the subject in any part of the Bill, just as there was a similar absence of any proviso or safeguard in this clause; and one of the reasons why it was so necessary to insist on drawing attention to this matter was that these clauses were all, one after the other, characterized by that utter want of any sort of consideration for Constitutional rights in Ireland. Nothing was thought of except the desire to arm the Crown in a way in which it had never been armed before in any Constitutionally-governed country, and to take away every right, liberty, and safeguard in respect to the exercise of Constitutional privileges. He hoped the Government, by according a different reception to this Amendment to that given to others, would show that they were sensible of the necessity of altering the character of this clause, at least to this extent.

[Twelfth Night.]

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. TREVELYAN said, that, in a matter in which prompt action might be a primary object, it was equally important that the Government should not be bound by conditions of time; but by this Amendment the Government would be strictly bound, while it by no means followed that the promoters of a meeting would also be strictly bound. The Government would be absolutely bound to three days; but it might very well be that a handbill, or other notice of a meeting, might be posted at a place of which the Government might have no cognizance, or the handbills might be passed on from hand to hand, and not posted; and he thought it extremely likely that even when a notice was posted it might not come to the knowledge of the Government within the three days laid down. Though the Government were not willing to accept this Amendment, or the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), which was also on the Paper, still they did not wish to take anybody by surprise, or to betray anyone into finding himself in opposition to the law without being fully aware of it. The provision which the Government preferred provided that these meetings should be conducted with due formality and publicity, and that was practically the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny (Mr. P. Martin), which was lower down on the Paper. That Amendment, with hardly any alteration, the Government would be willing to accept. They had already accepted the Amendment, providing that a copy of any order of prohibition should be served on the promoters of the meeting, and they thought if they accepted these two Amendments all the conditions of publicity would be met.

MR. PARNELL said, he was sorry that the Chief Secretary had not met his objection, or the necessity for pressing his Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman said the Government might not receive notice of a meeting until the time for prohibition had elapsed. All he could say was, that that was a question of detail, and his object was to secure for the people of a district notice of the prohibition before they arrived at the place of meeting. He thought that a reasonable requirement; but if the Government wished to provide that a copy of a notice convening a meeting should be served at the nearest police station to the place of meeting, he would be willing to introduce such a Proviso. If the right hon. Gentleman thought six days' notice was too short a time, and that the three days might elapse before the Lord Lieutenant or the authorities in Dublin could receive information of an intended meeting and its character, then let the time be extended, say, to 10 days. The principle of the Amendment, however, he must insist upon—namely, that the people of a district should have public notice beforehand, for a reasonable time, that the Lord Lieutenant had prohibited the meeting in question. As to the provision of the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny—namely, that two magistrates should attend at the meeting, that was reasonable in its way; but it did not attain the object he wished to attain—the object which the Chief Secretary had admitted to be a reasonable one; and he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would reconsider the matter, and agree to the principle of the Amendment, although the terms might be altered.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, when the Government agreed to serve notice of prohibition on the promoters of a meeting, they supposed that that would be a sufficient notice through the promoters; but there was another objection to this Amendment. The Amendment proposed that the Government should have no power to prohibit a meeting unless they did so three days before the day of the meeting. Suppose the Government did not learn the dangerous nature of a meeting until two days before the day, they would not be able to prohibit the meeting, although they then knew the dangerous character of it.

Mr. Parnell

MR. MARUM said, that the notices of meetings were usually made to the people on Sunday by means of placards posted at the chapels in the district. Some time ago a meeting was announced in his own county, and, although the meeting had been notified for 10 days, the proclamation did not arrive until the evening of the Friday before the meeting was to be held. The time was so short that it was almost impossible to countermand the meeting. However, on receipt of a telegram, he went to the meeting, and with great difficulty stopped it. It was not an unreasonable proposal to make that where a meeting was convened to take place, where it would be difficult to countermand it, that every facility should be given for the purpose of stopping it.

MR. REDMOND said, he did not think the argument of the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) against the adoption of the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork would bear a moment's examination. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that the Government might not, if the Amendment were adopted, receive notice of the dangerous character of a meeting until it was too late to prohibit it. But suppose the dangerous character of the meeting was only made known to the Lord Lieutenant within the three days specified in the Amendment, he would still have power to stop the meeting. The difficulty was that, if the Bill were passed in its present form, the Government would be able to give six months' imprisonment to anyone who attended the meeting, although he might have had no notice whatever that it had been proclaimed. Irish Members stood on that point. They said, unless sufficient notice was given to the people that the meeting was prohibited, the Government had no right to punish them with six months' imprisonment for attending.

MR. SEXTON said, the case suggested by the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) was one which could scarcely ever arise. He had often seen placards giving two months' notice in advance of meetings to be held, and they almost invariably gave a fortnight's notice. As his hon. Friend the Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Marum) had pointed out, notices were given Sunday after Sunday at the chapels in the various districts. Even if the case put by the hon. and learned Gentleman were to arise, the Lord Lieutenant would still have power to prohibit the meeting. He pressed upon the Government the reasonableness of the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork.

MR. TREVELYAN said, in listening to the arguments of hon. Members opposite, the Government were aware that they spoke with a knowledge of the situation. But the two reasons urged by the Attorney General and himself stood in the way of the adoption of the Amendment put forward by the hon. Member for the City of Cork. They were willing to insert words to the effect that the proclamation of the prohibition should be published at the earliest possible moment; but further than that they could not go.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he regretted that the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant did not see his way to accept the Amendment before the Committee. It must be remembered that the hon. Member for the City of Cork had made a concession upon the original Amendment. The first proposal was that the Government should be bound to give three days' notice of prohibition in any case; but when it was shown that the Government might not have any information with regard to the meeting, his hon. Friend consented that notice should be given at the nearest police-station. His hon. Friend now instructed him to say that he went farther than that, and was willing to agree that notice of the meeting should be given 10 days in advance at the nearest police station. According to that arrangement, the Government would have sufficient notice of what was going to be done, and plenty of time to make up their minds on the subject of the meeting. He trusted the Government would be able to make this small concession. With regard to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny (Mr. P. Martin,) he believed, if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had had as large an experience of public meetings as he had, he would know that the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny, which he had signified his readiness to adopt, was of the most illusory character. Anyone who was acquainted with the character of public meetings in Ireland would know that in the majority of cases they were so large that a man with stentorian lungs would probably fail in making his voice reach to the circumference of these enormous gatherings. The presence of the magistrates, then, who, as proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny, were to read the proclamation of the Lord Lieutenant, would probably have the effect of exasperating the people, and producing the disorder which it was desired to avoid. He trusted the Government would give and take, so to speak, in dealing with this matter. The only object of Irish Members was that innocent people should not be caught without a fair warning, and subjected to the penalty prescribed in the Bill for the venial offence of attending a meeting.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not see that the proposal of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was a very practicable one, because, were 10 days' notice of the intention to hold any meeting always required, great inconvenience might result. Such a machinery as that would, he thought, be more adverse to the general right of public meeting than almost anything else. It seemed to him that his right hon. Colleague the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had stated the case very reasonably. Her Majesty's Government could not bind themselves to any particular number of days within which the notice of prohibition should be given, because it was possible that circumstances which would render the meeting dangerous to public peace or public safety might arise within a very brief period of the meeting taking place. The Government were willing that the Lord Lieutenant should give notice, at the earliest possible moment, when the knowledge of danger to the public peace presented itself to him; that, in fact, he should lose no time in communicating with the parties concerned.

MR. PARNELL thought the Government refusals to admit Amendments of the most reasonable character were standing very much in the way of their own progress.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: We have just accepted three Amendments.

MR. PARNELL said, these were of a very subordinate kind. He had simply asked that persons attending meetings of which 10 days' notice had been given should be exempt from the penal consequence of being liable to six months' imprisonment with hard labour, unless the Lord Lieutenant prohibited the meeting three days beforehand. The Committee would bear in mind that the Lord Lieutenant would still have power to prohibit and disperse a meeting irrespective of the three days' notice. As to the dangerous consequences of the speeches delivered which the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) anticipated would arise, owing to the meeting being held without prohibition, he pointed out that at the last moment the Lord Lieutenant had always power to prohibit a meeting; and, as had been proved during the last 12 months, he could send police and soldiers on the very morning of the meeting to stop it, when, as had always been the case, the people would be ready to obey and retire. The Government had not attempted to show the necessity either for refusing this Amendment, or for bringing forward the clause. He had asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman, last night, whether he could give any instance in the course of the land agitation of a prohibited meeting being held, and he declined to reply. The right hon. and learned Gentleman gave no instance of any case where the people refused to disperse and abstain from holding a meeting when called upon to do so by the magistrates, and yet he preserved a cast-iron front and unbending attitude in reference to this reasonable Amendment.

MR. MACFARLANE said, he thought the Government might very well accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, which did not in any way militate against their professed intention to prevent the possibility of danger to the public peace or public safety. It had been pointed out that all this could be secured by the dispersion of the meeting at the last moment; and he was, therefore, quite at a loss to understand why the Government assumed such an attitude towards the Amendment before the Committee. Every concession in a Bill of this kind was a satisfaction to the Irish people; and the attitude of Irish Members was that the Bill was so oppressive and virulent that it was their duty to amend it, if possible. He had never spoken a word in that House in defence of crime and outrage; but he maintained that it was the duty of the House to take care that in hunting down criminals they did not injure innocent men. The Government contended, as a reason for introducing this Bill, that the criminal minority were "Boycotting" the innocent majority. He quite understood the Government giving the innocent majority power to "Boycott" criminals, and nothing of that kind would meet with any opposition from him; but he contended that the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork would have the effect of protecting innocent people, while it did not in any way interfere with the object of the Government.

Mr. RYLANDS said, he had a strong objection to the clause, even though it was necessary, inasmuch as it might lead to the punishment of men who were innocent of any offence whatever. Still, he thought it right to say that the course taken by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary and the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant was fairly adopted with the view of mitigating the clause. Her Majesty's Government were willing that every possible notice should be given, and that as early as possible, of the prohibition of a public meeting. But he hoped they would introduce a provision that no person attending a proclaimed meeting should be punished unless he knew when he attended it that the meeting had been proclaimed. It seemed to him only fair that words of this kind should be added, so that persons innocently attending the meeting should not be liable to the penalties of the Bill. He thought the Government were alive to the objections to the clause; and he hoped they would see their way to a further modification of it. Mr. O'DONNELL said, he would suppose the case of the conveners of a prohibited meeting becoming acquainted with the circumstance that the object of the meeting was distasteful to the Lord Lieutenant, and changing it to the petitioning of Parliament against a certain grievance existing in the country. He asked whether the prohibition of the Lord Lieutenant would hold good both against the illegal and the legal purpose; and whether any guarantee would be introduced into the Bill as a means of preventing the magistrates punishing persons for the changed purpose, just as if the meeting were held on the prohibited ground?

Mr. SEXTON said, it was difficult to see what object the Government had in resisting this Amendment. The hon. Member for the City of Cork desired that public notice should be given in the locality of the unlawful character of the meeting prohibited. He was willing that 10 days' notice of the intention to hold the meeting should be given. On the other hand, he wanted only three days' notice of prohibition on the part of the Lord Lieutenant. The Government, under this arrangement, would have a week to consider their determination. There was direct communication by telegraph and post between Dublin Castle and every police station throughout the country. It would only take one day to give notice of prohibition, and on the third day it would be in every part of Ireland. Then, although the Police Force were most unfortunate in their endeavours to detect crime, they were known to be very efficient for the purpose of gathering up every scrap of information and submitting it to Dublin Castle, so that there would be no difficulty in the way of the notice of the intended meeting reaching the Lord Lieutenant. He was obliged to point out that the offer of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was delusive, inasmuch as the promise that notice should be given at the earliest possible moment was of the vaguest possible character. The official mind in Ireland was fond of dramatic surprises, and of pouncing down suddenly on the people; and, as a rule, the less notice the people had the better the Executive would be pleased. It was against those dramatic surprises that the hon. Member for the City of Cork wished to guard the people. Again, although the police would be quick enough to communicate the prohibition of the meeting, there would not be the same alacrity to communicate that full and elaborate information to Dublin Castle which would enable a prompt decision to be arrived at; and the result would probably be that a proclamation would arrive on Saturday night or Sunday morning of a meeting to be held on the next day, in which case it would be impossible that the people in the district could be properly notified. He said that this system was neither honest nor fair; and he regarded it as an arrangement for entrapping the people. He was sorry to say, with regard to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny (Mr. P. Martin), that it would not meet the case; because the two Resident Magistrates whom he proposed should be sent to announce the prohibition of the meeting would have nothing to distinguish them; they would present themselves suddenly in the midst of 5,000 or 10,000 people, who had, perhaps, travelled 10 or 20 miles to hear what was to be said at the meeting; and they would mumble out something which to those in the immediate vicinity of the platform might be understood as a prohibition of the meeting. But, further, in those parts of Ireland in which rack-renting most prevailed, and where evictions were most keenly felt, knowledge of the English language was by no means universal; and he assured the Committee that the bulk of the people might remain ignorant of the fact that the prohibition of the meeting had been announced by the magistrates; and the consequence would be that great amount of confusion would follow. There could be no more effective way of disturbing the public peace in Ireland than to bring together a large number of unlettered people from various districts, and when they had assembled with a set purpose to introduce two persons in mufti to put an end to the proceedings. If the clause were carried out in the spirit notified by the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, the gaols would become choked in six months, and the failure of the Act established.

MR. METGE said, he could not understand what possible reason the Government had for not accepting this very reasonable Amendment, unless it was that they desired to mark the Act from beginning to end with the impress of vindictiveness. He could only understand their policy on the ground that they wished to sweep into the net of the law as large a number of persons as possible. Her Majesty's Government did not appear to understand the proposal of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). His hon. Friend did not seek, in any way, to limit the power of the Government to prohibit meetings by notice given; all he said was, that in cases where people brought themselves within the letter of the law, by giving 10 days' previous notice of an intended meeting, they should be safeguarded by receiving three days' notice from the Government of the prohibition of the meeting. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant said these meetings could be got up at very short notice; but, from his own experience, he could positively deny that that was the case. It was a very difficult matter to get up a meeting of an extensive character in Ireland under a fortnight or three weeks. Meetings got up at short notice were, as a rule, complete failures; on the other hand, he had seen a meeting, of which there had been two months' notice, dispersed at one day's notice by the Government. As he had said, he could not see what object the Government had in not accepting this Amendment, unless it was to drive people into the meshes of the law, and sweep them within the powers of this Act; and he hoped the Chief Secretary would find some means of meeting the view now expressed.

MR. T. FRY said, he thought the Amendment was of such importance that some Members on the Liberal side might ask the Government to meet the objections to the clause half way. The contention of the hon. Member for the City of Cork was that the Government should at least give three days' notice when they wished to proscribe a meeting; and some hon. Members thought that if three days' notice could not be given, no penalty should follow where the people could not have known that the meeting was proscribed. It would be unfair to subject people under these circumstances to six months' imprisonment.

MR. GILL said, he believed that if the Government rejected this Amendment that course would have the worst effect of anything it had done since this unfortunate Bill came before the House. The people of Ireland would think that the release of the "suspects" now was all a sham, and was only intended to empty the prisons in order that the Government might put another set of people in their places as quickly as possible; and that, instead of imprisoning people who were suspected of crime, they wanted to imprison people who were absolutely free from any crime. If the Government wanted to carry out any kind of policy that would conciliate the people of Ireland, they might give way on some small thing such as this; and it was only to protect the people from wrongful imprisonment that he and his hon. Friends were enforcing this Amendment. The Government had full powers for stopping meetings without this clause; and the Irish Members wished to prevent this severe punishment being inflicted on innocent people, who had no knowledge that they were bringing themselves within the law.

Mr. SHEIL said, it had often happened, as on this occasion, that when an Amendment was not printed, and was only read from the Chair, it was misunderstood; and in this case it appeared to him that not only did the Government misunderstand the Amendment, but even the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. T. Fry), who had spoken in favour of it, did not understand it. The object of the Amendment was, that should the promoters of any meeting give 10 days' notice, then the Government should have seven days in which to consider whether to prohibit the meeting or not. What objection could there be to that? The Government would have seven days in which to consider the matter; they would know the object of the meeting; and all that was asked for was that they should not allow thousands of people to come from all parts of the country without their knowing that the meeting was proscribed. It seemed to him that the Amendment was so fair that it ought to be insisted on to the fullest extent, and he regretted that there was no more responsible Member of the Government in the House at that moment. He could not think that the Prime Minister or the Home Secretary would resist the Amendment, and he regretted that some more responsible Member of the Government had been prevented hearing the object of the Amendment. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have spoken upon it.] The Home Secretary was always opposed to Amendments; but he did not think the Prime Minister had appreciated this Amendment, and therefore he hoped there would be a strong opposition to the clause as it stood.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PORTER) said, the Home Secretary had indicated the real desire of the Government to meet the wishes of hon. Members opposite as far as possible; and he asked the Committee to observe in what respect the clause had already been modified. In the first place, the Home Secretary had agreed that the notice which the clause provided must be given at the earliest possible moment; in the second place, the notice was to be served on the promoters; and, in the third place, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had agreed to the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny (Mr. P. Martin), that two magistrates should attend the meeting and give ample notice of its prohibition. Under these circumstances, it appeared to him that no one could claim that the people attending a meeting were in ignorance; but, in order that there might be no mistake about that, and no penalty imposed upon persons who innocently attended a meeting, the Home Secretary had consented to accept an Amendment inserting the word "knowingly," which would prevent a penalty being imposed upon any person not present with an active knowledge. But there was a practical difficulty in the way of adopting this present Amendment, which, he thought, even the hon. Member who proposed it would see. Any limit of time was open to one great objection—the hon. Member himself had pointed out that the Lord Lieutenant might still prohibit the meeting and prevent persons attending it; but the object of this Amendment was that persons should not be liable to prosecution for attending a meeting. If a distinct limit of time, within which notice must be given, was laid down in the Bill, it would be open to this great danger—there would be two classes of prohibition, one to be acted upon at the time if necessary, which would remain untouched by the Bill; and, secondly, a restriction as to time. What would be the consequence of that? Persons who were not by any means ignorant would know that two or three days' notice would be necessary in order to bring a meeting under the Act, and they would inevitably think that such notice was requisite to make a meeting illegal; and if that notice was not given the prohibition of a meeting would be certain to lead to a collision between the authorities and the people, because the people would think that, inasmuch as the preliminaries under the Act had not been complied with, they were in their right, and that the authorities were acting outside their right. It seemed to him that the requirements of the Bill should be as stringent as possible to meet the circumstances of particular cases, and it would be most dangerous to have two classes of prohibition; and, therefore, while it was desirable that the earliest possible notice should be given, and no one should be liable unjustly, yet it would be impossible to accept the Amendment as now suggested.

MR. PARNELL said, that the danger pointed out by the hon. and learned Gentleman would not arise. The proclamation of the Lord Lieutenant would render a meeting illegal, no matter when it was issued, and the people could be legally dispersed; but persons attending a meeting without a notice of three days, or whatever period the Government agreed to, would not be liable to penalties for being present. That would be a difficulty; and he thought, as the Government were now for the first time imposing this penalty upon people attending meetings without the right to appeal or of the protection of a jury, the distinction he had proposed was fair, and before the division was taken he wished the Committee to see exactly what it was he wanted. If the Government would agree to carry out the views of the Irish Members, he would withdraw his Amendment until the Report. What he wanted was, that there should be notice given at some definite period before the holding of the meeting, in order to entitle the Crown to punish persons attending that meeting where notice had been given by the promoters at the police station nearest to the place where the meeting was to be held. He did not wish to take from the Government the power of proclaiming a meeting, but he did wish to take away the power of punishing persons who had not received the notice of prohibition.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the hon. Member had now brought the matter to a clear point, and had said that whether the meeting was to be prohibited within a fixed time or not, in either case the people would be acting illegally. That being quite clear, if a meeting was illegal, why should not any persons refusing to disperse, knowing the meeting to be illegal, be treated as acting illegally? At one meeting they would be liable to penalties for refusing to disperse; at another they would not; but in both cases the meeting was illegal. This seemed to him to be a difficulty in the case; and if the hon. Member should bear in mind one of the main reasons for desiring this penalty was that the Government believed the knowledge of this penalty would cause the people to disperse without force. That reason was equally applicable to both cases; and the Solicitor General for Ireland had pointed out, if at one class of meetings the people would not be liable to penalties, it would clearly be a greater inducement to refuse to disperse and to resist force. That seemed undesirable; and he would ask the hon. Member to consider this point. The only object now being contended about was founded on the supposition that the Government, having a knowledge of the circumstances which induced them to prohibit a meeting, would have some cause or other for withholding that knowledge deliberately from the people whom they ought to notify. Why should they do that? It was obvious that if the Government wanted to prevent a meeting they would take every possible means of preventing that meeting being held. It seemed to him a matter of common sense that they would take every precaution to let a prohibition be known. They were perfectly prepared to put in words where the notice was required at a point which had been passed and could not be dealt with now, declaring that it should be the duty of the Government to give notice at the earliest possible moment when the circumstances came to their knowledge. That seemed to him to meet the whole justice of the case. Then, when the meeting was held and the people were properly notified under the condition to be inserted in the Bill, and it came to the knowledge of the people that the meeting was prohibited, those persons deliberately refusing to disperse should be subject to the penalties of the Bill. That was a reasonable proposition; and he hoped the hon. Member would be willing, under the circumstances, not to press the Amendment, but to see whether, at some point hereafter, they could come to a satisfactory conclusion.

MR. DILLON said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman was misrepresenting the issue in a very extraordinary way. What the Irish Members wanted was, not that men were to be punished because they refused to disperse, but because they were present at a meeting. That was an exceedingly difficult matter. The essence of the clause was that attendance at a meeting was to be a crime, and not the refusal to disperse. If that was what the right hon. and learned Gentleman wanted, he could have the Riot Act read, and call on the people to disperse, and then hold them liable if they refused.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny (Mr. P. Martin) would meet exactly what was asked, because two magistrates would notify to the meeting that it had been prohibited; and if the people refused to disperse, after such notification, they would be liable to the penalties. That, he thought, met the objection of the hon. Member, for the people would receive an authoritative notice before being called upon to disperse.

MR. PARNELL said, that the Amendment he had desired to see introduced would act as a stimulant to the local authorities to inform the Lord Lieutenant in time, and not withhold the communication to the last moment when the people would be assembled and would have incurred the danger of penalties. It had been seen that the police and the local authorities had left the dispersing of a meeting to the last moment, and refrained from giving due notice to Dublin Castle, so that the people were put to the trouble of coming long distances at the risk of coming into collision with the police and becoming liable to punishment.

MR. DILLON wished to know what the Home Secretary assented to? He understood that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had said he would insert "knowingly;" but the Amendment which he was ready to insert left out all the words from "who" to "shall." Therefore, he did not see how the word "knowingly" was to be inserted.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that "knowingly" would be put in at the top to govern the whole of the clause. What he meant was that "knowingly" should govern that clause, and with the Amendment he proposed to accept the clause would run thus—

"In case such meeting be so prohibited, two or more justices of the peace shall attend at the place where they have reason to believe such meeting is to be held, and then and there notify and repeat aloud, to the persons attending, the order prohibiting such meeting, and direct such persons to disperse; and in case any of the persons so met or assembled together shall not disperse within the space of one half-hour, such persons shall thereupon be guilty of an offence against the Act."

The word "knowingly" did not arise at this point, because the persons present would necessarily know, as the proclamation would be made in their presence.

MR. DILLON said, he mentioned this matter because the Home Secretary said he intended to insert "knowingly" before the word "who," and he understood that that would preserve the mere presence at a meeting as an offence. Now, the right hon. Gentleman said presence was to be no offence, and only a refusal to disperse would be an offence. That altered the matter very much.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he was willing to credit the Government with a desire to work out this clause as humanely and justly as possible. They had pledged themselves that the Lord Lieutenant should give notice of prohibition at the earliest possible moment after he received the information necessary for the formation of his opinion; but should not the Government, in their own interest and in the interests of good government, insert some provision in the clause which would make it incumbent on the local authorities to give the Lord Lieutenant that information at the earliest possible moment? That really was the point. The Irish Members were quite prepared to believe the Lord Lieutenant would give notice at the earliest possible moment from his point of view; but for the harmonious working of the clause, and to prevent ill-will, would not the Government insert some words making it incumbent on the local authorities and magistrates to inform the Lord Lieutenant at the earliest possible moment? That was of the greatest importance, because it might happen that the local police were on bad terms with the people, or there might be magistrates who had not sufficient knowledge of how to act in a difficult crisis; and so they might delay the notice to such a date that, although the Lord Lieutenant would give notice at the earliest possible moment from his point of view, his prohibition would be accompanied by a maximum of discomfort to the local population. If the Government would introduce words simply making it incumbent on the local police to give the earliest possible notice to the Lord Lieutenant, nine-tenths of the objections formulated in the Amendment would be fairly met.

MR. P. MARTIN said, unquestionably there was considerable force in what had been said by some hon. Members opposite as to the possibility of the magistrates notification not being heard by some of those present. Probably it would meet those views to carry into effect what it was stated had been intimated by the Home Secretary to the hon. Member for Tipperary, if the words suggested were added so as to make the sentence read—

“And in case the people do not disperse in the space of one half-hour such persons thereupon who shall knowingly remain present at the said meeting and shall not have had previous notice that the meeting has been prohibited shall thereupon,” &c.

He did not see what objection there could be to this addition to the Amendment. Surely, they were now superadding statutory rights to the rights enjoyed by the Lord Lieutenant; and it should not be the intention of the Government that a person, who was not aware that a meeting had been prohibited, and who had not had reasonable notice, either from the proclamation or the magistrates, or from previous information, should be made an offender against the provisions of the Act, and be subject to six months' imprisonment. He thought the words he suggested reasonable, and those adopted by the Government ought, and he conceived would, have the desirable effect of terminating this discussion.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was a little disappointed to find that when he had accepted an Amendment the hon. and learned Member was not satisfied with his own Amendment. He was in as great a difficulty by accepting the Amendment as if he had refused to do so. It was certainly very discouraging, and he would like to point out the difficulty in which they were landed. If this power was to be used it must be in consequence of a magistrate making the declaration. When the Riot Act was read the consequences followed. Was it reasonable to suppose that it was necessary that every man in the crowd should hear the Act read. The people in the crowd perfectly well knew what the whole thing meant—it meant the declaration of the illegality of the meeting, and what it was necessary to prove was that the Riot Act had been read. It was exactly the same thing whether a man heard it read or not, and he did hope that the hon. Member would not press this Amendment.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that if Her Majesty's Government did not give notice of the prohibition of a meeting until the very last moment a great deal of expense would have been incurred—a great deal of popular feeling would have been excited, and all to no purpose. Without the slightest necessity the Government would have incurred a lot of unnecessary unpopularity. That was the logical position, and he thought it would be well if Her Majesty's Government would make it incumbent on the local magistracy and police not to cause any delay in their giving the information to the Lord Lieutenant as to meetings which were about to be held.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 49; Noes 176: Majority 127.—(Div. List, No. 142.)

MR. SEXTON said, that the next Amendment which stood in his name opened up a very important question with regard to the responsibility of those who promoted public meetings, and as the House had now been sitting for a very considerable time, he hoped that the Government would now consent to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.”—(Mr. Sexton.)

MR. CAUSTON said, that early in the evening the Prime Minister announced the intention of the Government to take a Morning Sitting to-morrow; but the right hon. Gentleman was not at all sanguine that any very satisfactory result was likely to follow. Now, this Prevention of Crime Bill was either urgent, or it was unnecessary. The Government said that it was urgent. The Irish people—the terror-stricken people of Ireland—considered it was necessary. ["No, no!"] He maintained the terror-stricken people said it was necessary, and he and a vast majority of the Members of the House of Commons were of opinion that the measure was required. He, therefore, rose to make an appeal and a suggestion to Her Majesty's Government. His appeal was that the Government should take immediate steps to bring the discussion on this Bill to a close. The sooner the Government recognized the fact the better it would be for the country, that the supporters and followers of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) were almost irreconcilably opposed to this measure, and were using every means in their power to defeat it. He did not wish to say anything unkind of the hon. Gentlemen below the opposite Gangway. If they were irreconcilably opposed to this measure, they were, perhaps, justified in using the immense powers they possessed under the existing Rules of the House to resist its progress; but, on the other hand, public opinion in the country was at the back of Her Majesty's Government, and if hon. Members opposite chose to use the means they had at their disposal to obstruct the progress of the measure, the Government and the House of Commons generally were in duty bound to use the powers they possessed to secure the passing of the Bill. Under the existing Rules he knew it would be madness to attempt to vote Urgency. Morning Sittings were absolutely useless, for they had been taken over and over again, and the result had been nil. He, therefore, ventured to suggest to the Government that the only course open to them under the existing Rules was to have a continuous Sitting, and he believed that the adoption of such a course would meet with the approval of a large number of Members on the Ministerial side of the House. The Government were in a very large majority, and they must recognize that fact. He did not pretend to say that they must use their majority unfairly; but it must be remembered that the interests of the country—[An hon. MEMBER: Which country?]—the interests of England and Ireland demanded that this measure should be passed. There was no one more anxious than himself to see remedial measures passed for Ireland, and when the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill came before the Committee he should do all he could to assist its progress. He simply threw out this suggestion, and he hoped that the Government would not, at this early hour of the night (1.10), consent to report Progress.

MR. PARNELL said, he must deny that there was any ground for the statement of the hon. Gentleman who had last spoken, that he (Mr. Parnell) had in any way used the Forms of the House to oppose this Bill, or that he was in any way obstructing the progress of this Bill, or encouraging anybody else to do so. The hon. Gentleman must recollect that, after all, he was an Englishman or a Scotchman—he was not quite sure which he was—and he could not be expected to sympathize as much with them and their exertions to preserve the Constitutional liberties of their country as they sympathized with themselves and their own people. He could, therefore, understand, to some extent, the impatience with which he had viewed the attempts of the Irish Members to alter the character of this Bill. The hon. Gentleman must recollect that this Bill consisted of many clauses, a considerable number of which involved principles of the greatest importance and the most far-reaching consequences, taking away, one after the other, those Constitutional rights, which, up to last year, had been enjoyed in Ireland; and he (Mr. Parnell) would recommend the hon. Gentleman to hesitate before he desired to precipitate a conflict between the Irish people and the Government.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the Government were sensible that the progress of this Bill had not been what the House of Commons had a right to expect. When a question of this kind was raised, he thought, a week ago, the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), speaking of the length at which these debates had been continued, said that the Government must consider that they had practically got the main part of the Bill when they had got to the 4th clause, and the Committee hoped and expected that in the subsequent clauses the progress of the Bill would have been more rapid. The hon. Gentleman said—"You have got the main part of your Bill, and you have only been a week or 10 days in discussing all these clauses." "That was not an unreasonable time," said the hon. Gentleman, "because you have got the main part of your Bill." Well, but almost as much time had been expended upon the next three clauses; therefore, the expectation held out by the hon. Member for Wexford had not been at all fulfilled. Just let them observe what had taken place to-night. He could not help pointing out, with regard to the manner in which the Business of the House was conducted, that two hours were spent on what he must call an inordinate abuse of Questions. To-day, for the first time, there were upon the Paper of the House of Commons 68 Questions, a number, he believed, unparalleled before. Day after day, and Session after Session, the abuse grew; and, as he had said, two hours were spent upon Questions to-day, some of which, no doubt, were important, but many of which, he thought, the House might very well have dispensed with. Since Question time, seven hours and a-half had been taken up in the discussion of Amendments, which nobody could call of first-rate importance. They commenced the clause yesterday; they had spent the whole of to-day upon it, and they had not yet come to its conclusion. It was perfectly impossible, in his opinion, that the Business of the House, upon this or any other Bill, could be conducted upon such a footing as that. He had no desire whatever, if they could avoid it, to go to anything that could be called extreme measures; but what had occurred must have satisfied everybody that things could not go on in the future as they had gone on in the past. He would rather reserve the consideration of future proceedings to the Prime Minister; and he hoped that, at all events, the Committee would show its desire to deal practically with a matter of this kind by finishing the discussion of this clause to-night.

Mr. HEALY said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had personally alluded to him. What he had said on a former occasion he would now repeat. He pointed out on Friday night last, in reply to something that was said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), that the Government had got four clauses of the Bill in a little more than a week, whereas the Tory Party had taken up five nights upon the three first lines of the Land Bill of last year. As this Bill was of great importance to the population of Ireland, of much greater importance than the miserable Free Sale Clause of the Land Act, he considered the conduct of the Irish Members had been far more pardonable than the action of the Tory Party last year. He pointed out last week that the Government had got the main clauses of the Bill. He added nothing to that except that he hoped the Government would not accept the advice given them by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon. The Government had now reached the 7th clause; in fact, they had proceeded two or three times as rapidly in the last two or three days as they did in the 10 previous days. He considered that the contention he put forward on Friday night last had been maintained to the letter. He made no complaint of the speech of the Home Secretary; but he did not think, after all, that the right hon. Gentleman ought to blame the Irish Members for what had occurred earlier in the evening. Everyone knew that a considerable portion of the Question time was occupied in an animated dialogue between the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs and the hon. Member for Greenwich (Baron De Worms); in fact, he thought that the House never presented an appearance so much like a Punch and Judy show before, for the hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich was continually jumping up and down badgering the unfortunate Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. In the whole course of their acquaintance with the late Chief Secretary there was never anything so much in the shape of baiting as had happened this afternoon in the case of the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. With reference to the proposal to finish this clause to-night, he thought that if the Government would not take a Morning Sitting to-day the clause might very fairly be finished; but if the Government wanted to bring them down at 2 o'clock, he hoped his hon. Friend would insist upon reporting Progress. The Home Secretary must know that whenever concessions had been given during this Bill progress had been very largely accelerated. Nothing had astonished the House more than the manner in which they got through the 5th clause. It went through with a run. A substantial concession was made to hon. Gentlemen on that (the Opposition) side of the House, and through went the clause. Hon. Gentlemen of the Irish Party, during the progress of the Bill, had received support to their Amendments from hon. Members sitting on the Ministerial side of the House. The Irish Members had been encouraged to go on with their Amendments by the Radical Members of the House; and the inference they were to draw from that was that their arguments had produced a substantial impression on the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and it could not be maintained that they were arguing now in vain. It was a source of considerable satisfaction to them to find that, instead now of having minorities of 20 or 30, which were the minorities when they started the discussion of this Bill, those minorities had doubled, and now the supporters of Amendments were dividing 50 or 60 strong. He would suggest that the Government should make a statement that they would abandon the Morning Sitting and go on with the Bill now until they came to some point upon which there was a very material difference of opinion. It was proposed that they should meet at 2 o'clock. When they met, Questions would occupy the time until half-past 2, and that would only give them four hours and a-half; and then, when they met again at 7 o'clock, or at 10 minutes past—for the Speaker did not come in until one of the Whips informed him that 40 Members were present—[“No, no!”] The noble Lord opposite, one of the Government Whips, shook his head; but hon. Members knew very well how this was done. On the grounds he had stated, and also on the ground of the inconvenience to which Members might be put, he would recommend the Government to drop the Morning Sitting, and see how they went on with the Bill to-night.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he only rose for the purpose of suggesting that as it seemed to be understood that it would be possible, without sitting very late, to finish the 7th clause—which would be a very reasonable thing for the Committee to contemplate—they had better try to avoid too much talking. If they went on with this discussion, they would only be losing time, which could be advantageously employed in considering the Amendments to the clause. They had been discussing the clause all the evening, and their minds were now properly set to it, and if they went on quietly and perseveringly, he did not think it need take them long to pass it.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) had stated that he would suggest to his Friends the desirability of going on with the 7th clause, and concluding its consideration to-night, if the Motion for a Morning Sitting to-day was withdrawn. He (Mr. Labouchere) would point out two things—first, that, as the hon. Member for Wexford had said, there had been more Liberals with the Movers of Amendments opposite on this clause than on any other Amendments to the Bill; and, in the next place, this clause was in itself a Bill. It would have the effect of putting a stop to public meetings, and he would put it to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary himself, how long would it be likely to take to pass a clause or a Bill doing away with the right of public meeting for three years in England?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that with reference to the suggestion that the arrangement as to a Morning Sitting should be altered, he did not think that, under the circumstances, that could be done, for the reason that when an announcement was made by the Prime Minister early in the evening, people went away with the impression that that announcement would be adhered to. It would not be fair to alter the arrangement at this time of the evening. Hon. Members would see the difficulty the Government were involved in, in having made a promise of this description. Hon. Members opposite had the support of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere); and, no doubt, as the hon. Member for Wexford had said, that support was a very potent and valuable element in their resistance to this Bill. He thought, at all events, they ought to see what the opinion of the House was as to whether or not they should insist upon going on with the clause before a new arrangement was entered into. He must resist the Motion.

MR. PARNELL said, he was sorry the Home Secretary had not been able to see his way to accepting the suggestion of the hon. Member for Wexford to go on for two or three hours to-night, and finish the clause, so as not to be under the necessity of coming down to a Morning Sitting.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I would consent to forego a Morning Sitting if I could; but it is impossible.

MR. PARNELL said, he was sorry for that, because he thought if the right hon. and learned Gentleman had been able to accede to the Motion, it would have contributed very much to the harmony and despatch of Public Business. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary and the Committee would see that as they would be obliged to meet there again in 12 hours' time, it would not be reasonable for the Government to require them to stop here another two hours till they finished the clause. If they finished the clause, after deducting the time which would be spent in getting home and getting back again, they would only be left with something like 10 hours for sleep and transacting any private business they might have to perform. Then, again, it must not be forgotten that the number of hon. Members who were opposing this Bill, and endeavouring to amend it in the interests of a whole people, was very limited. Though they would have been willing to have given two hours to the further consideration of the clause to-night, if the arrangement had been for them to meet at 4 o'clock to-morrow, he did not think that, under the circumstances, they should be asked to give any further time to the Bill at present. It was not reasonable to ask them to go on any longer; therefore, he trusted the Government would give way.

MR. O'DONNELL said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had drawn attention to a statement which had been made by the hon. Member for Wexford, to the effect that when they had obtained the 4th clause of the Bill they really had secured the most important part of it. The right hon. and learned Gentleman from this had drawn the conclusion that as they had got the most important part of the Bill through, the rest should be allowed to pass as quickly as possible. To him

(Mr. O'Donnell) it appeared the legitimate conclusion was that as the Government had got the "Boycotting" Clause and the clause for the suspension of trial by jury, they might have seen their way to offering less resistance than they seem inclined to do to reasonable Amendments to the remaining portion of the Bill. [Cries of "Divide!"] The clamour arising from the Liberal Benches opposite was a conclusive proof of the incapacity of the Committee to continue the consideration of the Bill in a calm frame of mind to-night.

MR. MONK said, there was a very general opinion amongst many of his Friends sitting on that—the Ministerial—side of the House, that it was desirable that Progress should be reported. If the Home Secretary hoped to get through this clause to-night, there could be no doubt that he was under a mistake. Considering the lateness of the hour, and that they were to meet again at 2 o'clock, the right hon. and learned Gentleman would do well to agree that Progress should be reported.

MR. T. E. SMITH said, that, as one who had a strong feeling that the Government of the country ought to be supported in the measures they thought necessary for the purpose of preserving law and order in Ireland, he had always kept clear of anything like interfering with the Government in the conduct of their Bill. But he thought the time had come when an independent Member might be excused for saying that, so far as his feeling and that of others sitting near him was concerned, the opinion was gaining ground, both in the House and out of it, that it was the duty of Her Majesty's Ministers to take such steps as they might deem desirable to expedite and enforce the carrying out of the policy which they had thought it their duty to recommend. He was not bringing accusations against hon. Gentlemen opposite, who had felt it to be their duty, in the interests of the country from which they came, to oppose the Bill, line by line, and word by word; but the Committee must look at this matter as practical men. They must be aware that, under such difficulties as the House was placed in at present, it was quite impossible for Parliament to pass a perfect measure. If it was to be subjected to verbal criticism, it would be impossible to make it what was called a perfect measure, or, if they did, they would not have time to pass it this Session. They must proceed, to a certain extent, by rough-and-ready means. [Ironical cheers by the Irish Members.]

Yes, rough-and-ready means; but, of course, he meant in crucial circumstances. Rough-and-ready means were sometimes necessary, and it was time for Her Majesty's Government to consider what measures they could take to bring this legislation to a termination. The conduct of hon. Gentlemen opposite, leading as it did to the eviction of somewhere about 20 families a-week, was likely to produce a strong feeling in the country that it was far from being patriotic. He would also venture to suggest that a feeling was growing throughout the country that the time had come when the Government must put their foot down and take some steps to secure the practical realization of that policy which they had taken upon themselves the responsibility of recommending to Parliament.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he should not have risen to keep the Committee from the division they were anxious for, had it not been for the remarks of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. The hon. Member charged hon. Gentlemen from Ireland with a policy the tendency of which was to increase evictions in Ireland; but it was not the Irish Party, but the Government, who were responsible for what was taking place in Ireland. They were following the precedent of last year by making their policy of conciliation follow that of coercion. This Bill was a Bill for increasing evictions in Ireland. It was a Bill for taking away from the Irish people that power of combination which, when the Government had deserted them, had been for the last two years the only means they possessed for stopping evictions. This was a Bill for putting the Irish tenants at the mercy of the Irish landlords; and yet, in full view of this fact, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. E. Smith), after his long experience, had the face to get up and accuse the Irish Members of increasing the number of evictions in Ireland. The Government, from their own point of view, had already obtained as much of the Bill as was necessary to enable them to preserve peace and order in Ireland. Then let them drop the rest of it. They had made themselves possessed of far too much power. They had taken means for putting down "Boycotting," and when this clause had passed they would have taken means for putting down public meetings. They had possessed themselves of power to bring murderers before what they conceived to be an impartial tribunal. On the heads of the Government rested responsibility for all the evictions that were taking place by the delay they had allowed to take place in the passing of the Arrears Bill. It was monstrous that hon. Gentlemen like the hon. Member opposite (Mr. T. E. Smith) should try in this matter to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds.

MR. CALLAN said, the feeling was increasing from day to day that the Arrears Bill should be brought forward, and that these sentences of death, which, in the form of evictions, were being passed upon the people from day to day, should be put an end to. The Government should give precedence to the Arrears Bill. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. T. E. Smith), who had something of an Irish constituency, and others, had given the right hon. and learned Gentleman the opportunity for which, with malice prepense, he had been waiting, when, some time ago, he said there was some force in the suggestion that they should have Urgency for this Bill. It was quite evident to anyone who knew the right hon. and learned Gentleman's antecedents that he would only be too glad of any excuse which would enable him to avail himself of that continuous Sitting to hurry the Bill through, for which he had all along been so very anxious.

MR. METGE said, they were not averse to proceeding with the discussion on this Bill if they were allowed to do so without being obliged to come down here to-day to a Morning Sitting. The answer the Home Secretary had given was that it was now too late to alter the decision of the Prime Minister; but that was the answer the Home Secretary invariably gave the House. This was the third or fourth time that a similar reply had been tendered. Why did he not think of it beforehand? The Government, no doubt, had intended to discuss this Bill until 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning. If they had made up their minds to do that, why had the Prime Minister brought forward his Motion; and if, on the other hand, they had not made up their minds to do that, why should they not now give way? If this sort of thing went on, hon. Members would have coercion on the brain.

[Twelfth Night.]

MR. PARNELL: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman wish to take a division? It will only lead to further loss of time.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I should like to know what the feeling of the Committee is upon this question.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 26; Noes 142: Majority 116.—(Div. List, No. 143.)

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Parnell.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 24; Noes 137: Majority 113.—(Div. List, No. 144.)

MR. DILLON moved that Progress be reported. He was surprised at the action the Government were taking. He had understood the Home Secretary to say that he desired to obtain the opinion of the Committee, and not that he intended to continue to divide. Therefore, he supposed that when the next Motion was made the Government would acquiesce, as a matter of course, and that the Home Secretary was only making a demonstration of force against the Irish Members. They were taken by surprise by the second division; but he hoped the Government would now consent to report Progress, seeing that the appeal came not alone from the Irish Members, but also from influential supporters of the Government, who emphasized their appeal by leaving the House when the Home Secretary desired to take the opinion of the Committee. He saw several leave the House because they would not vote for the Government, and would not vote against the Government. It was thus plain that there existed outside the Irish Party a feeling that the right time had now come for reporting Progress; and, therefore, it was absurd to place the Irish Members in this position at 2 o'clock in the morning—that they were to be looked upon as Obstructionists. They were asking the Government to consent to report Progress—an hour later than usual—because they were threatened with a Morning Sitting. They objected to a Morning Sitting, and had stated that if there was to be no Morning Sitting they would go on till 3 o'clock; but in spite of their objections a Morning Sitting was fixed.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Dillon.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was quite true that he desired to ascertain the opinion of the Committee, and that opinion he had ascertained. He did not think the divisions that had taken place justified the boasts made as to the amount of support received from Gentlemen on the opposite Benches, for he believed that when the Division Lists came to be examined they would not show that the recruits from these Benches were numerous. The position in which the Committee was now placed illustrated what had long been the opinion of the Government—that a majority in the House was impotent in the face of a small minority. The hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) asked why he did not assent to the last Motion? The last Motion was one which would have defeated the Bill; therefore, it was natural that he should not assent to it. But he did not think to-night was the proper time to determine what course should be taken to facilitate the progress of Public Business. That question must be reserved for future consideration.

MR. R. POWER said, he was glad to see that the Home Secretary had displayed an unusual amount of common sense; and when the right hon. and learned Gentleman spoke of his great majority, he would ask him to remember that in the first division 25 Irish Members voted for the adjournment, and only 10 against it.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he considered these divisions no test whatever of the sense of the Committee. There were Members on the Government side of the House in favour of an adjournment who yet voted for a continuance of the debate. The hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) strongly urged the Government to consent to the Motion, yet he supported the Government in the division. What, therefore, was the value of this division while it was perfectly well known that men voted in that House, not because they objected to the Motion, but because they must support the Government? But it should be remembered that the Irish Members had the heaviest part of the work to do upon this Bill, and that the matter concerned them the most closely. They had to be in the House more than any other section of the House, and as they had to be back again at 2 o'clock, they had a right to ask the House to consider their physical requirements.

MR. WARTON said, that as the Government were about to consider what steps they would take in the present position, he wished to make a practical suggestion, which was, that as murderers were stalking about the land, and evictions had not been suspended, they should let the Executive in Ireland act as if this Bill had been passed, and bring in a Bill of Indemnity.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS (MONEY) BILL.—[BILL 176.]

(Mr. Courtney, Lord Richard Grosvenor.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. COURTNEY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he regretted having to make this Motion at such an advanced hour; but it appeared that the Motion must be made late, or at a later period of the Session, when it might be more inconvenient. He was encouraged to move the second reading because there was, practically, nothing new in the scope of the Bill. It was conceived on the lines of previous Bills, and contained no principle different from that in its predecessors. There were, no doubt, new loans sanctioned; but they had been already authorized by Parliament. A great part of those loans was necessary to carry out schemes which had been approved in the main this Session. The total sum contained in the Bill was £1,500,000, made up of loans for the Metropolitan District (City Lines) Railway, the management of Asylums, School Board management, and other undertakings. When the Bill was before the House last Session, in the last week in July, the question was raised of referring it to a Select Committee. His Predecessor (Lord Frederick Cavendish) expressed the opinion that the matter was one which might be favourably considered by a Select Committee, and promised this year to introduce the Bill at such a period that it could be referred to a Select Committee. The House could now consider whether that course should be adopted; and the next stage of the Bill he (Mr. Courtney) proposed to defer till Monday next, so that the question could be considered. During the interval he should be happy to confer upon the most convenient course with hon. Members. At the present moment, however, it seemed to him that it would be impossible to refer the whole subject to a Committee, because that would be nothing less than referring the whole of the financial action of the Metropolitan Board to a Committee, and such a reference would overtax any Committee that could be appointed. A Committee this Session could only consider a small part of the functions of the Metropolitan Board. This question, however, could not be very well considered at that hour of the night; but he should be happy to confer privately with hon. Members, and if they could come to any agreement hereafter, they could probably devise plans for working out what was a large and complicated question.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Courtney.)

MR. WARTON said, he was not about to raise again a question which Mr. Speaker decided last year; but it seemed to him an abuse of the Standing Orders that a Bill which was really promoted by the Metropolitan Board of Works should be held technically to be promoted by the Government. He should not enter into that question; but it was a hardship upon other parties that the Board of Works should come in under the shelter of the Government and avail themselves of this technicality, against which he had protested last year. This Bill was nothing more than the annual budget of the Board of Works; and he wished to take the opinion of Mr. Speaker on the question whether the Board had a right, in this Money Bill, to introduce the 10th clause, which had nothing to do with money.

MR. COURTNEY, on the point of Order, observed that this clause was included in last year's Bill, and sanctioned by Parliament and the highest authorities.

MR. SPEAKER: It appears to me the clause in question is, in fact, part of the financial arrangements of the Bill, and I see no reason why the House should not agree to it, if the House thinks proper to do so.

MR. MONK said, he thought it was much to be regretted that the Bill had been brought on at so late an hour, though the Secretary to the Treasury had made the best excuse he could for adopting that course. It was a Bill of great importance, for it was to enable the Board of Works to raise, by taxing the Metropolis, an additional sum of £3,217,000; but he would not examine into that now. He rose to say that last year he moved that a similar Bill to this should be referred to a Select Committee; and his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury was not quite correct in his statement of what took place. He (Mr. Monk) withdrew his Motion, on the distinct understanding that the Bill this year should be referred to a Select Committee. The late Secretary to the Treasury said—

"He hoped his hon. Friend would not press the Motion to a division, although he was very much inclined to agree with the object of it. It seemed very desirable that this Bill should be considered by a Select Committee."

And he went on to say—

"He hoped the Bill would be introduced next year at such a period that it might be referred to a Select Committee."—[3 Hansard, cclxiii. 1726.]

Then the hon. Member for Chelsea expressed a hope that he (Mr. Monk) would withdraw his Amendment, on the distinct undertaking to refer the Bill to a Select Committee the next year, and on that distinct understanding he (Mr. Monk) then withdrew his Motion. Well, he really did not understand from the Secretary to the Treasury what were the objections to taking that course. He felt indebted to him for having brought in the Bill at a much earlier period than usual this Session, when there was plenty of time to have it so considered; and he thought that the hon. Baronet the Member for Truro (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg) would agree with him that it was not right that the Board of Works, which came for powers for raising a sum of £28,000,000 in the shape of taxes on the ratepayers of the Metropolis, should refuse to submit to Parliamentary control the raising and expenditure of such money. He would only say that he intended that evening to put down a Notice for a Select Committee, as well as an Amendment for the omission of Clause 10, to which the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) had taken objection. He also objected to Clause 8, which gave power to the Treasury to authorize a further expenditure of £300,000 without the consent of Parliament. If such a power was to be granted, he should object to the passing of the Bill without the examination of a Select Committee.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG said, he did not think the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) quite represented the facts of the case. He must be aware that these Bills year by year simply embodied the powers that had been given by Parliament, over and over again in recent years, for the expenditure of money. If, as he gathered, his hon. Friend did not intend, on the present occasion, to divide against the second reading, but intended to take the view of the House as to a Select Committee, he would not at that hour discuss the Bill, beyond saying that it was a Bill which had been over and over again confirmed by Parliament; and there was not a single power in it that had not previously received Parliamentary sanction. He would point out to the House that the Board of Works were now in the midst of great and important contracts, and arrangements for improvements in streets, in drainage, and other matters, which would be hindered and delayed if they were to be submitted over and over again to a Committee of the House. Then the hon. Member talked of the increased powers given to the Treasury; but the hon. Member was paying no attention—

MR. MONK said, he had heard all the hon. Baronet's observations.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG said, the reason for asking these powers from the Treasury was this. The Board of Works, in their Bill, had confined their demands to the smallest limits; but if, in the course of their street improvements, bridges, and other matters, they should find it necessary to go beyond the powers given them, it was left to the Treasury to consent, should it think proper, and allow the Board to expend a small sum beyond that asked for by the Board.

MR. FIRTH said, it was well understood last year, when his hon. Friend withdrew his Motion for a Select Committee, that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee this year. It was a matter upon which not much was said by himself; but it was entered into, and he did ask his hon. Friend to withdraw his Motion on the understanding referred to. That was the best course to pursue before the House voted these large sums of money, which the people of London would provide, and in the disposal of which they had no voice. There was a sum of £100,000 for the Metropolitan Asylums Board, and he supposed if the people of London were consulted nine-tenths of them would vote against such a proposition. It was an extraordinary proposal that all this money should be voted without anyone knowing the reasons for it; but if the suggestion for a Select Committee were accepted, then that was a course that would result in the proposals becoming more public, and to the expression of representative views upon them.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday 26th June.

MOTIONS.

SURREY TRIAL OF CAUSES BILL.

On Motion of Mr. WARTON, Bill to provide for the Trial of Causes in the county of Surrey, ordered to be brought in by Mr. WARTON and Mr. HENRY H. FOWLER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 204.]

REAL AND PERSONAL ESTATE (ACCUMULATION OF INCOME) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. DAVEY, Bill to amend the Law relating to the accumulation of the income of real and personal estate, ordered to be brought in by Mr. DAVEY, Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD, and Mr. HENRY H. FOWLER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 205.]

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. ANDERSON, Bill to amend the Acts 12 and 13 Vic. c. 92, and 13 and 14 Vic. c. 92, for prevention of Cruelty to Animals, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. SAMUEL MORLEY, Mr. JACOB BRIGHT, Mr. PASSMORE EDWARDS, and Mr. BUCHANAN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 206.]

ANCIENT MONUMENTS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, Bill for the better protection of Ancient Monuments, ordered to be brought in by Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE and Mr. COURTNEY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 207.]

House adjourned at Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 16th June, 1882.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Poor Rates (113); Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders (No. 2)* (123); Artillery Ranges* (119).

Report—Places of Worship Sites Amendment* (77).

Third Reading—Municipal Corporations (Unreformed)* (140); Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Act (1874) Amendment* (120), and passed.

ARMY (INDIA)—CAPTAIN J. B. CHATTERTON, BENGAL STAFF CORPS.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY moved—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to approve of Captain J. B. Chatterton, removed compulsorily to the Half-pay List on 26th April 1869, being reinstated in the Bengal Staff Corps from that date in consequence of its now having been admitted, on further investigation into his case, that the grounds upon which he was thus compulsorily removed to half-pay, viz., the terms of the despatch from the Government of India, dated 6th January 1869, adverting to this officer having reported himself ‘unfit for duty whilst medical opinion was against him’ upon this point, have now been completely disproved by the whole medical evidence as reported in the despatch from the Government of India of 21st February 1881, which substantiates the fact that in lieu of any conduct on his part calling for animadversion, Captain Chatterton was acting under the special general order of the late Lord Sandhurst when Commander-in-Chief of Her Majesty’s Forces in India, 1236

No. — dated 15th March 1869, conveyed to C., him through the usual military channel.”

The noble Earl said that nothing was more distasteful to himself than bringing before their Lordships a case of individual grievance; but this case had been the result of medical misapprehension, and it was right that it should be mentioned to the House. The reason why he had brought it forward was because Captain Chatterton was attached to the regiment in which he had served. The case would have been brought on in the other House of Parliament in the presence of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India; but there were sufficient reasons for knowing that a private Member could not bring forward any subject in that House. The case against Captain Chatterton appeared to be that he put forward complaints of illness, and that the Medical Boards in India did not agree in opinion in regard to those complaints, and then, when a request was sent home asking what was to be done in consequence, a summary order was issued compulsorily removing him to the Half-pay List. It did appear from the Papers that Captain Chatterton was ill at Calcutta, and that he was in the hospital there. The case had been before successive Secretaries of State, and they thought it should not be re-opened, but why he did not know, as it seemed to be a hard one.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, his noble and gallant Friend was quite right in saying that this case had occupied the attention of successive Secretaries of State for India and of the Indian Government; but he could not agree with him in thinking that there had been any misapprehension in the matter, nor did he think that Captain Chatterton had been treated otherwise than with patience, consideration, and strict justice. If, after hearing the remarks he had to make, their Lordships should be of the same opinion, he would ask them to say "Not Content" to the Motion. Lieutenant Chatterton entered the Service in 1856; he was placed on half-pay in April, 1869, after somewhat less than 14 years' service. During that period he was absent from India on medical certificates for six years and a-half. In 1868, having rejoined after a lengthened absence, much unpleasantness ensued between Lieutenant Chatterton and his superior officers, owing either to his inability or unwillingness to perform certain military duties, on the one hand the officer in question pleading physical inability to do his duty, on the other hand the medical evidence not bearing out these grounds for non-compliance with the orders the officer from time to time received. As a matter of fact, the Government of India accepted Lieutenant Chatterton's own version of his case, and, instead of bringing him to trial for alleged disobedience of orders and neglect of duty, they acted on his own asseverations, and considering that he had passed so much time on leave, and yet asked for another extension, they thought it best to place him upon half-pay. They could have done no more and no less in the case of any other officer similarly circumstanced as regarded the amount of previous leave that he might have had and the present doubtful state of his health. He could not understand how his noble and gallant Friend could look upon the despatch of February 21, 1881, in the way he had described it in the terms of his Motion, and in the remarks he had made in his speech. What were the facts? Towards the end of 1868 a Court of Inquiry was held as to why Lieutenant Chatterton failed to perform certain military duties; the officer's excuse was physical inability, owing to "a contraction of the left 'tendon Achilles.'" The Report of this Court was sent to head-quarters; the Commander-in-Chief addressed the Government as to the expediency of taking Lieutenant Chatterton at his own word with reference to his physical incapacity to serve, and removing him from the effective branch of the Service, as being totally unfit for the active duties of his Profession. Before the Government of India could take any action in the matter further difficulties arose with respect to Lieutenant Chatterton's non-performance of duty, the reason given by him being "palpitation of the heart." This further Report was sent on to the Government of India, and it was decided to recommend that Lieutenant Chatterton should be placed on half-pay. This officer was thereupon, in December, 1868, released from temporary arrest, under which he had been placed, and suspended from the performance of all military duties, pending the final official decision of the Government at home. Subsequently to these events, in March, 1869, Lieutenant Chatterton addressed a request direct to head-quarters, requesting to be allowed to choose his own medical attendant. To this the Adjutant General replied that—

"Pending the orders of Government in his case he might consider himself on leave in Calcutta, and might consult any medical officer he pleased."

This permission, however, did not in any way affect the recommendation of the Commander-in-Chief made two months previously, that this officer should be placed on half-pay owing to ill-health. Lieutenant Chatterton, therefore, remained in Calcutta, availing himself of the Officers' Hospital in that city, and nominally still on the roll of his regiment, pending the final decision of the Government in his case. There was a medical and surgical Report of this officer's case made in the hospital at Calcutta, confirming the existence of weakness in the left ankle joint, but not confirming the presence of heart disease. Towards the end of the month of April the decision of the Secretary of State to place Lieutenant Chatterton upon half-pay was communicated to him, and he thereupon left hospital and returned to England. Since that time he had been in receipt of retired half-pay of £127 15s. yearly, the actual service performed by him falling short of eight years. Assuming that the conduct of this officer was irreproachable, that his services had been distinguished, and that he had become unfitted for work through devotion to his duty, he could have occupied no better position financially than he did now. Had the authorities in India granted him a third furlough, he would on his return to England have been placed on half-pay on precisely the same conditions as he was now. He did not wish in any way to reflect injuriously upon this officer's professional character; but he must maintain that there were no exceptional circumstances in this case to warrant such an act of Royal grace as the noble and gallant Lord in his Motion would suggest. He hoped, after what he had said, their Lordships would consider that Lieutenant Chatterton had not been treated harshly, with unkindness, or with injustice, and, therefore, that they would not consent to the Motion.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, he was very anxious that it should not be supposed that there was any malin-gering in the case. After what he had heard from the noble Viscount he would not press his Motion to a division.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH said, Lieutenant Chatterton was clearly entitled to his passage, or the amount of it; and if the statements of the Under Secretary of State for India were correct, under all the circumstances this further grant might meet the justice of the case.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

POOR RATES BILL.

(The Lord Carrington.)

(No. 113.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD CARRINGTON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was to remedy a defect of the law in reference to the payment of poor rates. In some cases occupiers paid rates for half-a-year in advance, and though they might leave their houses at the immediate quarter, and the premises remained empty, they were obliged to pay the full half-year's rates; but this Bill would make the occupier liable for only a proportionate part of the rates, and he might add that nothing would be recoverable from the landlord.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Carrington.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—SEARCH FOR ARMS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD FORBES asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether any organized search is being made for arms in the disturbed districts in Ireland; and, if so, with what results? The noble Lord said, he did not put the Question in any Party spirit, nor did he wish to import into it any controversial matter. All he wished was that, as arms were being largely carried in Ireland at the present time, as besides the murders and outrages of which they had heard lately, there had been, according to the official Returns, 396 cases of agrarian outrages during the month of May, the Statute enabling the Government to institute a search for arms should be put in force as generally as possible. Outrage, disorder, and terrorism were hanging like an unwholesome mist over that unhappy land; and although the Government were taking measures in "another place" to bring about a more satisfactory state of things, it might be some time before those measures were completed; and, in the meantime, it was desirable that the Executive should avail themselves of all the powers now at their disposal. They might be availing themselves of the powers conferred on them last year to some extent; and it was to ascertain the exact manner in which they were putting them in force that he brought forward his Question. It was quite plain that all the outrages which had been committed in Ireland had been committed with guns and revolvers, save and except the horrible murders in the Phoenix Park. Landlords, magistrates, ladies, land agents, and farmers had been shot in all places and at all seasons. On the moors and in the coverts of England and Scotland there was close time for game; but in Ireland for the landlords and their agents there was nothing of the kind. These fearful outrages were committed on all days of the week—Sundays included. Nor, in this war against the landlords, were the landlords or their agents the only persons who suffered. Sometimes it was a car-driver; and only recently a poor corporal had met with his death, not on the field of battle, but at the hands of skulking assassins, who fired at him from behind a wall. The worst feature of these outrages was that they were now of frequent occurrence, and in daylight. There had been an elevation in rank in connection with these distressing occurrences. "Captain Moonlight" having been raised now into "General Daylight." He would suggest that the Government should fix a certain day and a certain time for a general search for arms throughout Ireland. It might be said that he, as a Scotch Peer, had no connection with Ireland. It was true that he had no very direct connection with the country; but he felt very keenly with the loyal and respectable classes there; and, as a matter of fact, one of the noble houses in Ireland had descended from his own ancestors. If the question agitating Ireland were simply one of land, he should not have come forward in any way. They were all, of course, interested in seeing that the laws affecting the land in England, Ireland, and Scotland were not relaxed; but this was a question of blood, and he, as a Member of the House of Lords, felt himself impelled to take his present course, in order to clear himself from all complicity in the horrible outrages that were occurring in Ireland.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRIVY SEAL): I am afraid the noble Lord over-rates the effect of searches for arms in Ireland upon the horrible assassinations which have from time to time taken place there. I am afraid that under no possible system of searching for arms, or an Arms Act, however strict it may be, is it possible so to denude a district of firearms as to prevent the possibility of assassination. At the same time, I entirely agree with the noble Lord that the stringent enforcement of the Arms Act, or whatever form of that Act may be in force, is absolutely necessary, and that searching for arms is one of the proceedings which the Irish Executive is bound to take in disturbed districts. I know that the Lord Lieutenant is using all the powers at present at his command for the purpose of suppressing crime in these districts; and I know from the Irish Government that searches for arms have taken place, and do take place, though the result, I am informed, has not come to much as to the number of weapons discovered. But, as the noble Lord has said, the Bill which is now passing through the other House contains a more stringent, and, indeed, a much more efficient, provision with respect to the possession of unlicensed arms and searches for them. We are anticipating the arrival of the Bill containing these provisions in this House, and I only hope that it may reach us before long.

ENTAILS (SCOTLAND).

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF MINTO asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether they are disposed to supplement the information proposed to be obtained from the Returns moved for in this House on Tuesday last on the subject of Scottish Entails by ascertaining the value of the lands under entail in Scotland under the several categories of the proposed Returns, the names of the existing heirs in possession thereof, and in what districts such lands are situated? The noble Earl observed that the Returns moved for a few days ago would be, no doubt, extremely valuable, and he desired to express his satisfaction that a promise had been obtained that they would be given. He believed the Returns might, with great advantage to the public of Scotland, be made fuller, especially in the direction he indicated in his Question. A grievance had been made out of this subject on behalf of the occupying tenantry, the statement being that on entailed land there was less prosperity than on unentailed land; but he thought it would be found that if they had the means of ascertaining what lands were entailed and not entailed, the prosperity of the former class of land was as high as the other. He did not wish to throw cold water on the Bill before the House; but he thought it was very desirable that further facilities should be given to ascertain the real facts of the case, and they should know whether the operation of this legislation would be felt over a small or a large portion of Scotland. He wished to know if the Government would produce information of the kind he had mentioned?

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: I quite agree with my noble Friend that the Returns which he asks for would be useful; but I think he will not be disposed to hinder the publication of the Returns which were moved for by the noble Earl (the Earl of Camperdown), who I do not see in his place. I telegraphed as soon as I read my noble Friend's Notice to Edinburgh, and I find that the furnishing of these Returns he asks for would be attended with considerable delay. I therefore cannot promise them; but if he will be satisfied with my assurance that I will make inquiry into the matter at once, and see if they can be furnished in time to be of any use, and, if so, I shall do my best to furnish them.

House adjourned at half past Five o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 16th June, 1882.

The House met at Two of the clock.

MINUTES.] — PRIVATE BILLS (by Order)—Considered as amended—London Street Tramways Extensions*.

Third Reading—London and South Western Railway*, and passed.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Imprisonment for Contumacy* [208].

Committee—Prevention of Crime (Ireland) [157]—R.P. [Thirteenth Night].

Report—Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (No. 5)* [175].

Considered as amended—Local Government Provisional Order (No. 11)* [186].

QUESTIONS.

VACCINATION ACT—CALF LYMPH.

DR. CAMERON asked the President of the Local Government Board, What has been done in fulfilment of his promise to provide a public supply of calf lymph for the vaccination of those who preferred it; if he would state at what date the Government calf lymph establishment was opened; how many points and tubes of preserved lymph have been distributed from it; what arrangements have been made for its distribution to public vaccinators and medical practitioners; what arrangements, if any, have been made for calf-to-arm vaccination at a public station or stations; and, how many children have been vaccinated by public vaccinators direct from calf to arm?

MR. DODSON: A permanent vaccine station has been established at Lamb's Conduit Street, under the management of Dr. Cory, providing regular calf-to-arm vaccination, and giving opportunity for the vaccination of children direct from the calf twice a-week. In the first instance great difficulties were experienced in obtaining suitable premises; but temporary accommodation was obtained at Notting Hill, and lymph began to be distributed last summer from calves vaccinated there. Since July last lymph has been obtained to the amount of 2,106 points and 78 tubes, of which 1,672 points and 51 tubes have been distributed. It is supplied to public vaccinators, and to other registered medical practitioners on application, free of charge. Since the Lamb's Conduit Street station was opened in March, 37 children have been vaccinated there direct from the calf.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (SCOTLAND)—THE ISLAND OF LEWIS.

DR. CAMERON asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether his attention has been called to a notice in Gaelic and English, dated Chamberlain's Office, Stornoway, March 8th, and circulated among the crofters of the Island of Lewis, to the effect

"That children who do not regularly attend school and make up the requisite number of attendances, and be present at the examination of the school, put the ratepayers and the School Board of the parish to the loss of the Government grant;"

and that therefore

"Children once entered on the admission register of the school, who fail to make up the requisite number of attendances, or who are not present at the examination of the school this year, their parents will have to pay with their first rent the sum of 18s. for each child who may thus fail in attendance;"

and, whether the same gentleman who is Chamberlain of Lewis is also Chairman of all the School Boards in the island; and, if so, whether the Education Department will take any steps in the matter?

MR. MUNDELLA: I have seen the notice to which the hon. Member refers, and as it is a question between landlord and tenant, and not between the Department and the school board, I have no right to interfere. I understand that the Chamberlain has been re-elected Chairman of the four school boards since the issue of this notice, and that his sole object in issuing it was to insure regularity of attendance, and to prevent loss to the ratepayers through absence of children on the day of inspection. I understand that any fines inflicted will be paid into the school fund; but I hope the local authorities (who have been very remiss hitherto) will so discharge their functions as to render such fines unnecessary.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PRISONERS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the case in which James M'Govern, Thomas M'Govern, and Owen Maguire, who were arrested on the 7th instant, and charged with being "Accessory to a crime punishable by law, that is to say, shooting at and wounding a certain person with intent to murder him," is the one in which an attack was made on one William Trimble, on the 31st ultimo; and, whether he is aware that the prisoners declare they are able to prove their entire innocence of the crime, and if he will give the prisoners an opportunity of proving their innocence?

MR. TREVELYAN: The grounds stated for the arrest of these men in the warrants under which they are detained will be laid before the House in due course, as provided by the Act, and I cannot give the hon. Member the supplemental information he asks for. I have received a letter from James M'Govern, making the allegation contained in the last paragraph of the Question, and have forwarded it to His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant.

MR. O'SHEA asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the cases of all suspects from the county Clare have now been reconsidered; and, if so, how many of those suspects His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant has decided to retain for the present in custody?

MR. TREVELYAN: In reply to this Question, the Lord Lieutenant authorizes me to say that he has been, and still is, considering the cases of all the prisoners arrested in the County Clare, and in any case in which he considers he can do so with safety to the peace of the district he orders the prisoner's release.

MR. O'SHEA asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has received testimonials from gentlemen of position in the county, as to the high character borne by Mr. Daniel O'Loughlin, of Lisdoonvarna, late master of the Ballyvaughan (county Clare) Workhouse, who, together with Mr. Denis Hogan, of Ballyvaughan, was on the 17th ultimo sent to Galway gaol for six months by Mr. Wilfred Lloyd, R.M. under a Statute of Edw. III.; and, whether those prisoners may hope for release or for a mitigation of their punishment?

MR. TREVELYAN: I have received through the hon. Member testimonials as to the character of Mr. O'Loughlin. In his case, and that of Mr. Denis Hogan, there were appeals to the Queen's Bench, which were dismissed and the committals upheld, and His Excellency has not considered the cases with a view to any mitigation of the sentences.

MR. O'SHEA asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, having regard to the present peaceful state of the neighbourhood, His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant will withdraw the warrant, if any, against Mr. J. Malone, of Tomgraney, county Clare?

MR. TREVELYAN: If the hon. Member refers to a warrant under the Protection Act, I can promise him that such warrant will not be executed if Mr. Malone does not commit any further act calling for its execution. Mr. Malone is at present in custody on remand under the ordinary law, charged with writing a threatening letter.

MR. O'SHEA asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in view of the high testimony to character, and the recommendations (including that of his employer, Captain O'Callaghan, a magistrate and deputy lieutenant of the county), in the case of Mr. Whelan, of Ballinahinch, County Clare, His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant finds himself in a position to order Mr. Whelan's release?

MR. TREVELYAN: His Excellency yesterday considered all the facts of this case, and decided that he could not at present order Mr. Whelan's release.

MR. O'SHEA asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant has considered the strong recommendations in favour of Mr. T. M'Kenna, of Ogonelloe, which have been submitted at various times; and, whether His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant is in a position to comply with them, and to order his release?

MR. TREVELYAN: His Excellency has this day ordered Thomas M'Kenna's release.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If there is any reason for the continued detention of Mr. John Ladrigan in Kilkenny Gaol, who was arrested at Rockchapel, county Cork, on the 17th February; and if it is not the fact that his district is quite peaceable; and, if John M'Namara, of Tulla, county Clare, is still confined in Kilmainham Gaol, and if the Lord Lieutenant has re-considered his case?

MR. TREVELYAN: The case of Mr. John Ladrigan is now under the Lord Lieutenant's consideration. John M'Namara was released on the 8th instant.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)— ADJUTANTS.

MR. MAC IVER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Adjutants of the Auxiliary Forces, who do not draw an allowance in kind from any mess, may be exempted from the reduction of commuted allowances for fuel and light, and receive that granted to

Staff and Departmental officers; whether the mess allowance, at the rates granted to individual officers of the Royal Engineers away from their mess, on duty, may be extended to Adjutants of Auxiliary Forces; why Adjutants of Auxiliary Forces receive smaller commuted allowances than Departmental officers of the same relative rank, being similarly situated to them as regards deprivation of mess, quarters, servant, fuel, and light; and, why Adjutants of Volunteer Artillery, who draw no extra pay, and draw only the same forage allowance as Adjutants of Engineer and Rifle Volunteers, are called upon to provide themselves with horse appointments of Cavalry pattern, which are much more costly than Infantry pattern, while all other Artillery Captains and Subalterns who have to use horse appointments (without extra pay) are provided therewith from the public stores?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to the hon. Gentleman, I have to say that the emoluments of the Adjutants of Auxiliary Forces have been increased lately, after full consideration; and I am not prepared to change the particular allowances enumerated in the Question on the mere ground that Staff or Engineer officers draw higher rates. Adjutants of Volunteer Artillery have to provide themselves with horse appointments of Artillery, not Cavalry, pattern. They are not supplied from public stores, because the Adjutants are appointed for five years. Officers of Artillery, who are so supplied, are liable, at short notice, to go to dismounted duty.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—INTIMIDATION AT MILTOWN MALBAY.

MR. O'SHEA asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has received information that, notwithstanding a well known feud in the neighbourhood, and recent evictions of leaseholders, all intimidation has been abolished at Miltown Malbay, county Clare; and, whether His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant can, therefore, see his way to the release of the suspects from that place who are confined on suspicion of connivance in intimidation?

MR. TREVELYAN: His Excellency is glad to learn that the state of affairs at Miltown Malbay has much improved, and he has been able favourably to consider the cases of several prisoners from that locality, and is still considering others. There are a few, however, whose discharge he cannot consistently with his duty at present order.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—KILDYSART UNION—ELECTION OF CHAIRMAN OF BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. O'SHEA asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Local Government Board has received a second protest from the majority of the Kildysart (county Clare) Board of Guardians as to the unusual punctuality of the meeting at which a minority consisting, according to one version, of three, and according to another of two, guardians, recently elected a chairman of the board; and, if so, whether the Local Government Board has considered the protest worthy of notice?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Local Government Board did receive protests from certain of the Guardians of the Kildysart Union in reference to the subject of this Question, and, having considered the matter, sent their reply to the clerk of the Union on the 15th of April.

THE FACTORY ACTS—LEAD POISONING.

MR. BURT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has any objection to instruct the Inspectors of Factories and Workshops to attend coroners' inquests held on persons who lose their lives from lead poisoning, in the same way as the Inspectors of Mines watch inquests into deaths from accidents in mines; also, if the inquiry into the question of lead poisoning, promised some time ago, has yet been completed; whether he can state the result of the investigation; and, if he will lay any Papers relating to the subject upon the Table of the House?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that the Factory Inspectors did attend inquests on persons killed in factories, when they received sufficient notice. He thought it would be well to issue a Circular to Coroners, asking them on every such occasion to communicate with the Factory Inspector. There would be no objection to the production of the Papers mentioned in the Question.

STATE OF IRELAND—ALLEGED RIOTS BY SOLDIERS IN BELTURBET.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to riots by soldiers in Beltrubet on the 3rd instant, in which they, to the number of about thirty, armed with stable forks, fireirons, &c., attacked and dangerously wounded several peaceable citizens; how did these men get out of barracks; what steps, if any, were taken by the officer in charge to quell the riot; whether an inquiry into the whole case has been made by the military authorities; and, if so, what punishment was awarded; whether the Constabulary authorities considered the affair of such consequence as to demand the presence of additional police force in the town on the following day, with the view of protecting the inhabitants, as the soldiers in question once before threatened to wreck the town; whether on Sunday the 4th, the magistrates who had taken the depositions of one of the injured men refused to deliver up to the custody of the Constabulary the soldiers sworn to have been participators of the riots; and, whether the police entered their protest against the conduct of the magistrates in thus departing from the usual custom in cases of aggravated assault?

MR. CHILDERS: As the Question refers to the conduct of the military, I will answer it. The reports of the disturbance at Beltrubet are so conflicting that a special Report has been called for as to the whole facts of the case. As cross-summonses in the matter appear to have been issued, it would not be at present for the public interest to give any further information as to the action of the military and civil authorities.

NAVY—INSPECTOR OF MACHINERY IN THE CHANNEL SQUADRON.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Why the appointment of Inspector of Machinery in the Channel Squadron has been done away with, and by whose advice?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: There has been no reduction in the establishment of Inspectors of Machinery.

Mr. Trevelyan

The officer who held that position in the Channel Squadron has been transferred to Bermuda, taking the place of the chief engineer at that station, whose time had expired; the reason being that it had been found from experience that there is more need for the services of an officer of that rank at Bermuda than in the Channel Squadron.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS) — THE RIOTS AT ALEXANDRIA.

MR. ONSLOW, in whose name the following Questions stood on the Paper — namely, To ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that the officers and men of Her Majesty's ship "Superb," who were killed in the recent émeute at Alexandria, were buried at sea; and why it was that they were not buried at Alexandria; whether Her Majesty's Government has warned English subjects at Cairo that their safety is dependent on Arabi Bey; and, what arrangements have been made by Her Majesty's Government for receiving on board any ships the large number of European refugees now endeavouring to leave Egypt; said, that before he put his Questions he rose to a point of Order. He gave Notice yesterday of three Questions, the manuscript of which he now held in his hand. The second Question, as he gave Notice of it, was in these words:—Whether Her Majesty's Government has warned English subjects in Cairo that, considering that their safety is dependent upon Arabi Pasha, the safest course for them would be to leave Egypt? The point of Order he wished to raise was whether, having given Notice of that Question, and the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs not having challenged its form, and the Speaker not having told him that it was not in Order, it was competent for the Clerk at the Table, without the cognizance of the Member giving such Notice, to alter the language of the Question. He made this inquiry, because he found that his Question, as it now appeared on the Paper, had been materially altered.

MR. SPEAKER: It is quite impossible for the Speaker to say at once when Notice is given of a Question that every phrase of that Notice is in Order. The Questions of the hon. Member were brought to the Table, and were subjected to revision in accordance with the Rules of the House; and no doubt an expression was struck out of the Question on the ground that it was an expression involving matter of controversy. I have no hesitation in saying that, if an opportunity had been afforded to the Clerk at the Table to communicate with the hon. Member, he would have done so. It is the practice of the Clerk at the Table, whenever an alteration is made in a Question by my authority, to communicate the grounds of the alteration to the hon. Member who had given the Notice.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked whether, when the Clerk at the Table found that a Question was not, as he thought, within the Rules of Order, it would not be more consistent with the practice and the dignity of the House that the Question should be altogether omitted from the Paper?

MR. SPEAKER: I scarcely think that this Question is one of Order; but it strikes me that if that course were taken it would produce much more dissatisfaction than the present practice.

MR. HEALY: Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, when there is so much divergence of opinion among hon. Members on this subject, you will inform them where the Rules of the House as to the putting of Questions are to be found?

[No answer was given to the Question.]

MR. ONSLOW said, that, of course, he bowed to the Speaker's ruling; but he might observe that he had not put the Question down as a matter of controversy at all. He now put the Question as it stood on the Paper.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: With reference to the burials at sea, the Foreign Office have heard of the fact from the Admiralty, to which Department I must refer the hon. Member for a reply to that portion of his Question. Sufficient vessels are chartered, and at the disposal of Sir Beauchamp Seymour, to provide for the removal of all British subjects who wish to leave.

MR. ONSLOW: Are the boats of the Fleet employed, or to be employed, in carrying away European refugees?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I cannot say. That is a matter which is left to the discretion of Sir Beauchamp Seymour. Transports have been engaged for the purpose of conveying from Alexandria any British subjects who may desire to leave. The last vessel engaged will arrive there to-day, and the transports will afford accommodation for 4,500 persons. We have received a telegram from Sir Beauchamp Seymour, saying that the accommodation thus provided is, in his opinion, sufficient for what is required.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Where are the refugees to be conveyed to? To Malta, or Cyprus, or where?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: That I do not know, and cannot say. It depends on the nationality, or rather the origin, of the refugees, and that matter also is in the hands of Sir Beauchamp Seymour. [Sir DRUMMOND WOLFF: Hear, hear!] Well, I do not how it would be possible for the Admiralty to know where the British subjects in Alexandria wished to be taken. It is our duty to provide transports where they are required, and that has been done to an extent, I believe, somewhat in excess of the actual requirements of the case. As to the Question of the burial of those who, unfortunately, were killed, that is a matter of which we have merely learned the fact. We have received no Report from Sir Beauchamp Seymour; and, in fact, there has not been time to receive any despatch stating the reasons for that course being taken. It would be very easy to give hypothetical reasons; but, because they are hypothetical, I do not think it would be desirable to state them.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish to ask a Question arising out of the answer given just now by the Under Secretary in connection with the Notice I gave him yesterday. I wish to ask him what arrangements have been made, or whether any arrangements have been made, for the security of British subjects in Cairo, and, I would add, in other parts of Egypt; and, whether there is anyone connected with the Government at Cairo with whom they could communicate in case of necessity?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) has given Notice of a Question similar to the last Question put by the right hon. Baronet; and, as a matter of courtesy to him, perhaps I should defer answering it until his Question comes on. As regards the first Question of the right hon. Baronet, he must be aware that as Cairo is not a seaport, and we are not in military occupation of the country, we cannot give immediate protection at Cairo; but this would not diminish the responsibility of the de facto authority in Egypt if outrages on British subjects were committed.

MR. ONSLOW: Are the refugees put on board ship to pay for their board and lodging?

[The Question not having been answered,]

MR. ONSLOW: I beg to give Notice that on Monday I will repeat the Question.

MR. CHAPLIN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he can state the date when the earthworks were first commenced at Alexandria, and how long a period elapsed, after the commencement of those works, before the guns were mounted; what communications the Government received from the Admiral in command of the Fleet with respect to those works during that interval; and, whether he will lay those communications upon the Table?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The construction of earthworks appears to have begun at daylight on the 29th ultimo. On the 4th of June, the Admiral reported by telegraph that two guns had been mounted that morning. Very brief telegraphic communications on the subject of the earthworks were received between these two dates. I should see no personal objection to the despatches from the Admiral upon this subject being included in the Papers; but the question is one for the Admiralty to decide.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is a Diplomatic or Consular Agent of Her Majesty now at Cairo to protect British subjects there; and, whether, if so, he is instructed to hold official communications with Arabi Pasha?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Yes, Sir. There is a Consular Agent at Cairo. He has not received any instructions from the Foreign Office with regard to his official communications, and the instructions which Sir Edward Malet may have given him are not yet in our hands.

MR. O'KELLY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs,

Whether the list of killed which he read to the House includes the names of all Her Majesty's subjects killed during the riot at Alexandria?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The list telegraphed and read by me was one of British-born subjects killed. To prevent any possibility of omission, we have telegraphed to know whether, under that title, all subjects of Her Majesty were included?

MR. M'COAN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in sending the troops now said to have been telegraphed for by the Khedive and Dervish Pasha, the Sultan will do so as Sovereign of Egypt or as mandatory of the European Powers; and, whether any, and what guarantee has been taken by the Powers that the intervention thus made by the Porte shall be strictly limited to, and cease with, the suppression of the present revolutionary movement?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I already informed my hon. Friend yesterday that I should be unable to answer this Question. I may say, however, that it has been a matter of discussion among the Powers.

LAW AND POLICE—PROCESSIONS OF THE SALVATION ARMY.

MR. M'LAREN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, having regard to his letter of last year, addressed to magistrates, directing them to restrain the processions of the "Salvation Army," and having regard to the recent decision of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court, in the case of Beatty v. Gillbanks, declaring the processions of the "Salvation Army" to be "perfectly legal," what steps he proposes to take towards undoing the effect of that letter?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: This Question is put under some misapprehension. I have frequently explained that the Home Office does not issue directions to the magistrates. I often hear of Circulars from the Home Office. The Home Office never issues Circulars, except when it is asked for information. What it does when magistrates consult it is to give them the best advice in its power in the particular cases with regard to which it is consulted. Papers on the subject are already on the Table of the House; and the hon. Member will see from them that for the last 20 years the Home Office has given the same advice to magistrates who have consulted it, that advice being founded on the opinion of successive Law Officers of the Crown. I have not, as my hon. Friend knows, in consequence of the pressure of Business, had an opportunity of particularly examining the legal decision to which he refers, as to whether it does or does not conflict in any way with the opinion which has been given by the Law Officers to which I have referred. From a cursory view, I should say no; but I have directed the matter to be referred to the Law Officers for their opinion. All I can say is, that I should extremely regret if it should turn out to be the law that magistrates have not the power to prevent by anticipation collision between party processions; because, although in some places there might be an overwhelming force of police to prevent disorder, in places where the police force was weak that state of things would inevitably lead to confusion and disorder. When I have had the advantage of the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown on the subject, I shall be able to give some information with regard to it.

MR. HEALY asked whether the Statute of Edward III., which was now being applied in Ireland for the maintenance of the peace, would apply to England also?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had not had an opportunity of considering the Question.

MR. M'LAREN said, that next week he should put another Question on this subject.

MR. R. H. PAGET asked whether the Home Secretary would communicate the opinion of the Law Officers to the House.

[No reply was given.]

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND)—LORD CLONCURRY'S TENANTS—ERECTION OF HUTS.

MR. PARNELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to a paragraph in the "Standard" and "Freeman's Journal," of yesterday, by which it would appear that the permission granted by the Lord Lieutenant to erect huts for Lord Cloncurry's evicted tenants has been revoked; and, whether there is any truth in the paragraph?

MR. TREVELYAN: No, Sir. The permission has not been revoked.

MR. PARNELL: Then there is no foundation for the rumour that the erection of the huts has been interfered with?

MR. TREVELYAN: There is no foundation for the rumour.

Subsequently,

MR. TREVELYAN said: I do not know whether I should be in Order if I took this opportunity to amplify the answer which I have given to the hon. Member for the City of Cork. I wish to add that one of the most able special magistrates in Ireland—one who has succeeded as well as any special magistrate in the management of his district—gave the Lord Lieutenant the advice that in the case of these huts for sheltering evicted tenants he himself acted on the principle that, wherever there was any reason to apprehend they would be used for purposes of intimidation, a police hut should be erected with them. The Lord Lieutenant, after consultation with the special magistrates, had directed that that system should be adopted.

MR. GIBSON asked if these huts would be erected on the same spot as those erected for the purpose of intimidation would have been had that been allowed?

MR. TREVELYAN said, that was an was an important Question, to which he could not then give a reply. He would answer on Monday, and he hoped that would be sufficient for the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. J. LOWTHER asked whether, since the Lord Lieutenant had come to the decision referred to by the right hon. Gentleman, huts might now be erected under all conditions for evicted tenants, provided that protection was afforded against intimidation?

MR. TREVELYAN: It is difficult to explain without raising a debate; but I may say that the reports of the special Resident Magistrates prove very clearly that there has been a divergence of opinion on the subject. One set of magistrates stated that all huts were intended for purposes of intimidation, and others stated that that was not so. The Lord Lieutenant has decided that, where the special Resident Magistrate of the district held out any apprehension of intimidation, the best way would be to have police huts also erected. In the present state of Ireland, I feel myself justified in saying that that decision was received with satisfaction by eminent officials whose names, were I to give them, would carry conviction.

MR. O'DONNELL asked whether these magistrates, among whom there was such a divergence of opinion, would be chosen to exercise summary powers under the Coercion Act?

[No reply was given.]

NEWSPAPERS—INCITING LANGUAGE —THE "GLASGOW HERALD."

MR. HEALY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the fact that the editor of the "Freiheit" was prosecuted and convicted for general incitement to assassination; if his attention has been called to the following from the "Glasgow Herald":—

"To govern an Irishman you must get him down, then you must kick him till he can't get up, then you must sit on him in case he comes to;"

and, whether the Government will consider the advisability of prosecuting that journal for recommending the murder and ill-treatment of Irishmen?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have no knowledge of the paragraph except what I have in this Question. If the hon. Member wishes for my opinion upon it, I will say I object very much to strong language being employed to any class of Her Majesty's subjects, including Irishmen as well as others; but then the hon. Member must take it that I include in that statement all classes of Irishmen, including even magistrates and constables. No strong language should be employed; but when the hon. Member asks me to compare it with the language of The Freiheit, all I can say is that the two things do not seem to be at all parallel.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—RELEASE OF PERSONS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, as there are still in prison in Ireland ninety-one "suspects" who are not suspected of association with crime, and considering the length of time that has elapsed since the decision of the Government to set such "suspects" at liberty was announced, he can say that the releases of these ninety-one persons will now be steadily proceeded with in every case in which it appears to the Lord Lieutenant that the release of any particular "suspect" will not prejudice the condition of his district?

Mr. Parnell

MR. TREVELYAN: This Question only appeared this morning, and I have consequently been unable to consult the Lord Lieutenant in reference to it. I can, however, state that the cases of all the persons in the category mentioned in the Question are being considered by His Excellency; and from time to time he orders the release of those in respect of whom he is satisfied that such order may be made without danger to the peace of the district.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that Patrick Kelly, of Geevagh, County Sligo, was arrested on Sunday last, conveyed to Galway Gaol, and imprisoned there under a warrant of the Lord Lieutenant dated thirteen months ago; whether this arrest was made with the concurrence of the heads of the Irish Executive; and, whether, in view of the adoption and development of the policy of release, it is the intention of the Irish Executive to hold Mr. Kelly in custody?

MR. TREVELYAN: Patrick Kelly has been arrested as stated in the Question. The arrest was made without communicating with the Government, and His Excellency is now making inquiry as to the necessity for Kelly's detention.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that Mr. J. P. Quinn, imprisoned under the warrant of the Lord Lieutenant, was removed some time ago from the prison of Kilmainham to the prison at Enniskillen, and has now been again removed from Enniskillen to Kilmainham, or that an order for such second removal has been made; and, if so, what is the reason?

MR. TREVELYAN: Mr. Quinn was removed last March from Kilmainham to Enniskillen for certain reasons which no longer exist, and His Excellency has thought it right now to remove him back to Kilmainham.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND)—DEATH FROM EXPOSURE AFTER EVICTION AT RHODE, KING'S CO.

MR. MOLLOY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that Mr. Gowing, coroner, attended at Rhode, King's County, on Wednesday last, to open an inquest upon the body of a child, aged twelve months, who died from exposure after an eviction; that if, at the time of the eviction, the infant was suffering from measles, and in a dangerous state; whether the Sub-Inspector, Mr. Caulfield, wrote to the coroner stating he had not time to summon a jury, although he had received the coroner's warrant at 8 a.m. on the previous Tuesday; if the coroner had ordered the exhumation of the infant's body, and had stated that he must now leave the matter in the hands of the Government; whether, at the time of the eviction above alluded to, the resident magistrate prevented the erection of temporary buildings to shelter the evicted; and, what steps the Government will take as against the neglect of the Sub-Inspector, and as to the prevention to erect some shelter for these evicted persons?

MR. SEXTON had a Question on the Paper to the same effect.

MR. TREVELYAN: This Question and that of the hon. Member for Sligo following relate to the same subject, and both appeared for the first time this morning. I have called for immediate Reports, but cannot possibly reply to the Questions to-day.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS).

MR. BOURKE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether His Majesty the Sultan has shown any indisposition to take those measures which the Governments of England and France have suggested to him for the restoration of order in Egypt, and the maintenance of the authority of the present Khedive; whether he will state the reasons which have induced Her Majesty's Government to press upon the Sultan his assent to a Conference; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will join in any demand which the Powers may make upon the Sultan to act as their mandatory instead of as Sovereign of Egypt?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: Before the Question is answered, I should like to ask when it is likely that the measures which the Governments of England and France have suggested for the restoration of law and order in Egypt will be before the House?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, with respect to the last Question, I do not know quite what is the meaning of it. The measures that have been taken by the Governments of England and France, or by England or France, will appear, of course, in the Papers that are in preparation. If the noble Lord means to ask whether the measures which the Government will recommend to the Conference will be in possession of the House, it would be premature for me at the present time, when the date for the Conference has not even been fixed, to make a statement on the matter. With respect to the Question of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bourke), I thank him for calling my attention to the subject last evening. With respect to the first part of the Question, the Government has never at any time made a complaint of the indisposition of the Porte to take the measures which have been suggested to it by the Governments of England and France. I stated on Tuesday very emphatically, that at the present moment our relations with Turkey were very satisfactory, and that there was a strong spirit of co-operation between the Government and the Sultan. With respect to the second portion of the Question, I am sorry to say, Sir, that I cannot state the reasons which have influenced the Government in pressing upon the Sultan his assent to the Conference, because to do that at the present moment, although it would be a proper subject for future investigation, would be decidedly impolitic, beyond saying that they are reasons in which there has been, according to the latest advices in my possession, a general concurrence among the whole of the Powers of Europe. With regard to the third part of the Question, Her Majesty's Government had stated explicitly that, in their opinion, the Sultan has not parted with the Sovereignty of Egypt, and they believe that opinion to be shared by the rest of the Powers.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: Are we to have an opportunity of knowing the nature of the measures to be taken before the Conference meets; and will there not be any possibility of a discussion in this House upon those measures? I do not specify the measures, because I do not know what they are.

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not think it would be possible for us—and it would not be wise if possible—to undertake to predict or speculate upon what the Conference may determine. When you enter into joint council, either among individuals or Powers, you reserve to a certain extent your final decision, whilst you may lay your first opinions before those with whom you are going to take counsel. Evidently that is the nature of the Conference; and nothing could more tend to defeat the purposes of the Conference than for the separate Powers, each of them individually, to make known the views with which they would commence the Conference.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT: I should like to ask who is the de facto Governor of Egypt at the present moment? Considering the grave state of Egypt, not only at Alexandria, but at Cairo and elsewhere, and the danger in which the European subjects are placed, can the Government state whether Turkish troops are now on their way to Egypt; and, if so, what is their number? Yesterday the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs hardly gave us an answer to that question. I should also like to ask the Prime Minister if he will state whether a sufficient force is now ready to land, so as to ensure that protection, which is naturally looked for, considering our paramount interests in Egypt?

MR. O'KELLY: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman can also state whether there is any truth in the statement that the French Government are preparing to send 20,000 men to Egypt?

MR. GLADSTONE: With regard to the last Question, I have never heard of the statement, and have no reason to believe that it is true. With regard to the Questions of the hon. and gallant Baronet, it is extremely difficult, without Notice, to answer with accuracy a long series of Questions put across the Table. I am not, aware, Sir, whether Turkish troops are on their way to Egypt from Constantinople. As to whether a sufficient force was ready to land for the purpose of protecting British life and property, I do not think it would be expedient—considering the risks that are run, and that we know are run, by the prevalence of unauthorized rumours with respect to the landing of a foreign force in Egypt—I do not think it would be expedient in me to enter in any manner into that subject. We have committed to most competent hands the disposal of the means which we have placed at their command. With regard to the Question who is de facto Ruler of Egypt, Her Majesty's Government have no further information than that which has been made known to the House. The Khedive is the de facto Ruler of Egypt, and the Khedive has, under pressure, consented to receive back Arabi Pasha in the capacity of Minister of War. These facts are well known to the House, and I do not think there is anything that it is in our power to add.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I wish to ask whether any news has been received as to the present state of affairs in Egypt?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Of course, the hon. Gentleman does not mean political news; but news with regard to the security of the people. The news received since yesterday is, on the whole, of a re-assuring nature. There has been no fresh outbreak or disturbance of any kind, and we have no reason to apprehend any.

MR. BOURKE: I beg to give Notice that on Monday, if it is convenient to the Prime Minister, I shall ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether, before the proposed Conference takes place, Parliament will be informed what the bases agreed upon are; and, what are the limits within which discussions are to be confined?

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to give Notice that on Monday I will ask the Prime Minister, Whether he will give an assurance to Parliament that, in the event of a Conference upon Egyptian Affairs, Her Majesty's Government will assent to the neutralization of the Suez Canal in time of war?

MR. O'DONNELL gave Notice that on Monday he would ask the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he had seen the correspondence in the "Cologne Gazette" giving the views of the German colony in Egypt, and stating that the real and serious danger to peace arose from the anti-Mahomedan attitude of the English and French Governments; whether it was true that the Consuls for Germany, Austria, and Italy, in order to obviate the peril arising from such a policy, waited on Arabi Pasha and induced him to become responsible for peace and order; whether, in consequence of their representations, which Arabi received with much dignity and intelligence, he agreed with his comrades to preserve order?

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT: I quite admit the difficulty of answering Questions not on the Paper; but these Questions arise day by day, so that it is impossible to put them down beforehand. The right hon. Gentleman has stated that Turkish troops are not being sent—

MR. GLADSTONE: I never said so.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT: He said that he was not aware that Turkish troops were being sent.

MR. GLADSTONE: Were on their way.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT: Well, the Question I wish to ask is—and I ask it because a satisfactory answer will go far to allay public feeling—Can the Government give us an assurance that they will not shrink from taking any step which is necessary to protect European life and property in Egypt?

MR. GLADSTONE: The Government are aware that they are responsible for using, to the best of their ability, all the means at their command for that purpose.

MR. ONSLOW: In consequence of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, might I be allowed to ask what are the means at their command which the Government are using at the present time at Cairo?

[No reply was given to the Question.]

ARREARS OF RENT (IRELAND)—LORD ROSSMORE'S ESTATE.

MR. DILLON wished to put a Question to the Prime Minister, of which he had sent him private Notice.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have not received it.

MR. DILLON said, he hoped the Prime Minister would be able to answer it without Notice. It was, Whether the right hon. Gentleman had been informed that several writs for arrears of rent had been served on the estates of Lord Rossmore and the Rev. Mr. Aitcheson, in county Monaghan; that three of those writs had been executed on the estate of the Rev. Mr. Aitcheson, the tenants' interests being purchased on behalf of the landlord by his bailiff, so as to debar those tenants from all rights under the Arrears Bill? Also, whether his attention had been called to a letter from the Rev. Mr. Donnelly, of June 12th, in which he stated that writs were being served all over the Rossmore estate for rents which the tenants had no means of paying—a proceeding which meant the utter destruction and annihilation of the tenants; and, whether, when that same system was being pursued in many parts of Ireland, he, with a view of putting a stop to such a state of things, would not at once introduce a short Bill to put a stay—say for six months—to all evictions in Ireland?

MR. GLADSTONE: The Question is very voluminous and important; and, as the matters to which it refers have not before come to my notice, I am not in a position at this instant to give any answer, except in regard to the last clause—legislation—in respect to which I can only refer the hon. Member, however disappointing it may be, to the answer I have already given—namely, that, in my opinion, it would only make confusion worse confounded if the Government were to attempt to introduce any Bill for the object suggested.

EGYPT AND ITALY—CESSION OF ASSAB BAY.—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I wish to ask the leave of the House to make a short personal explanation with reference to a Notice which I quoted yesterday, and which was publicly given last Friday by the hon. Member for Greenwich. The hon. Member for Greenwich yesterday said that the words of his Notice on Friday last were—"Also, in view of the recent cession of Assab Bay to Italy"—not "by Her Majesty's Government." I have refreshed my memory of the Notice as he gave it publicly before the objectionable words were struck out by the Clerk at the Table as being argumentative. They spoke of "the further danger caused," in respect of the security of the Suez Canal, "by the recent cession, with the full concurrence of Her Majesty's Government, of Assab Bay to Italy." It was on these words that I severely commented at the time.

Mr. Dillon

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I am anticipated, to some extent, by the action taken by the hon. Member for Chelsea; but I think, Sir, the explanation which the hon. Member has given fully shows how correct I was in the statement which I made yesterday, and how utterly incorrect were the words which he attributed to me. I should have thought that with the experience which the hon. Member has had, or ought to have had, of foreign affairs, he would have recognized the vast difference between the words "by Her Majesty's Government" and the words "with the full concurrence of Her Majesty's Government."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I objected to the whole statement of a cession. There has been no cession of any kind, either with or without the concurrence of Her Majesty's Government.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: That is a question which does not arise. The hon. Member said yesterday that in my Question occurred the words, "the cession of Assab Bay to Italy by Her Majesty's Government." I ventured then to get up and deny that. The hon. Gentleman did not accept my denial, but repeated his statement, and added these words—"I will place the Question as originally printed before the hon. Member." In order to satisfy myself on a point as to which I was more or less certain—that I could not have put into a Question such an absurdity as the cession of a part of one country to another by a third country to which it did not belong—I went to the Record Office of the House, and there I found the manuscript of my original Question. It stands as follows:—

"With respect to the recent cession of Assab Bay, with the full concurrence of Her Majesty's Government."

And here, again, I must ask permission of the House to make a remark. The hon. Member said that these words had been struck out by the Clerk at the Table. I hold in my hand the original manuscript of my Question, and these words are not struck out.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: There is no difference of opinion on the mere point of fact. The words did not appear in the Notice as printed in the Questions on the Paper next morning; and they were not put in the Question which was really asked.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I quite accept that explanation; but I should be glad to know how the hon. Member knows that the words he read had been struck out?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I have already informed the hon. Member that I was present at the time when he gave his Notice; and I have refreshed my memory this morning by referring to no less than four newspapers, in which it appears at full length; and perhaps I may be allowed to add that one of the greatest difficulties in answering Questions on foreign affairs is that Notices which are given here publicly, with a certain set of words, appear in the newspapers with that set of words; but words which are argumentative being struck out by the Clerk at the Table, Questions have to be answered in an altogether different form.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: On that point I may be allowed to say that this Question was given publicly, and, moreover, it was read over by me to the Clerk at the Table, and no objection was taken by him to the words. I therefore reasonably assumed that those words would be inserted in the Question. But when the hon. Gentleman stated so positively that those words had been expunged at the Table, he led the House to the impression that when I gave my Question to the Clerk the words were expunged, and that I was aware of it. Moreover, he said that he regretted that they had been expunged, as otherwise they would have met with an indignant reply from the Prime Minister. I can, of course, accept that indignation by proxy from the hon. Gentleman; but, at the same time, I do not think it affects the question at all. I think it is very much to be regretted that an hon. Gentleman in the responsible position of the hon. Member for Chelsea should have attributed openly in this House to another Member words for which there is not the slightest foundation.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE CORONER OF THE QUEEN'S COUNTY.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that Mr. William Clarke, of Rathleague, the coroner for the Queen's County, dropped dead in his residence on the 11th instant; who was the proper official to hold an inquest, if necessary, upon the body; whether Baron Dowse refused to fiat the presentment, at the Queen's County Assizes at Maryborough, for the salary of Dr. Robert O'Kelly, late of Ballyroan, Queen's County, but now residing at Ballyragget, in Kilkenny; whether there is any coroner for the Queen's County at present; and, whether there will be two writs de coronatore eligendo issued to the sheriff, as on the death of one coroner and the ouster of another?

MR. TREVELYAN: I telegraphed for information, but have not yet received it.

COMMISSIONERS OF PUBLIC WORKS (IRELAND)—THE ANNUAL REPORT.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, When the Annual Report of the Commissioners of Public Works (Ireland) will be laid upon the Table?

MR. COURTNEY: Next week.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—"QUESTIONS."

MR. HEALY asked the Prime Minister, Whether, seeing the great amount of time now occupied by the asking of Questions in the House with regard to Foreign Affairs, he would not consider the advisability of commencing the proceedings on the Prevention of Crime Bill at once on the meeting of the House, and take the Questions after Progress was reported—after 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning?

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked, Whether it was not a fact that three or four times as many unimportant Questions were asked on Irish affairs as were put on other subjects?

[No reply was given to the Questions.]

ORDER OF THE DAY.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 157.]

(Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 15th June.]

[THIRTEENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

[Thirteenth Night.]

PART II.

OFFENCES AGAINST THIS ACT.

Clause 7 (Illegal meetings).

MR. P. MARTIN moved, in page 4, line 17, to leave out from "any" to "shall," in line 18, and insert—

"And, in case such meeting be so prohibited, two or more justices of the peace shall attend at the place where they have reason to believe such meeting is to be held, and then and there notify and repeat aloud, to the persons attending, the order prohibiting such meeting, and direct such persons to disperse; and in case any of the persons so met or assembled together shall not disperse within the space of one half-hour, such persons thereupon."

The hon. and learned Member said he understood the Home Secretary to state that there was only one portion of this Amendment which he substantially objected to—namely, the latter part, which allowed persons attending the prohibited meeting half-an-hour for enabling them to disperse. Now, in reference to that objection, and to that alone, he wished to say that he had put the Amendment on the Paper with a twofold object—first, that any force which might be sent to disperse a meeting should be under the check, control, and guidance on all occasions of magistrates; and, in the next place, to secure that the persons present at the meeting should receive a notification from the magistrates that the meeting was illegal, and thus have notice and warning before they became subject to the severe consequences which would be entailed upon them by remaining. Under the circumstances, and with the object he had stated, he trusted the Amendment would be accepted in its entirety. In the Act of 1833 a quarter of an hour was allowed for a notification to the people that a meeting was unlawful. He had added to that a further quarter of an hour for this reason—they all knew that in cases of a much more serious character than those which were likely to occur under this Bill, where a riot attended with danger to life and property was likely to happen, the rioters got an hour after the reading of the Riot Act for the purpose of enabling them to disperse. If the Lord Lieutenant sent down Justices of the Peace to declare unexpectedly that a meeting was an unlawful one, it was not unreasonable to ask that the persons present should be allowed half-an-hour after the notification made to them, for the purpose of going quietly away. It must be recollected that some of the persons might be present at a distant part of the place where the meeting was held, and might only hear of its prohibition from conversations with others some time after the notification had been made. He hoped the Government, having regard to these circumstances, would not diminish the effect of the concession they had made by insisting on the omission from the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 17, leave out from "Any" to "shall," in line 18, and insert "and, in case such meeting be so prohibited, two or more justices of the peace shall attend at the place where they have reason to believe such meeting is to be held, and then and there notify and repeat aloud, to the persons attending, the order prohibiting such meeting, and direct such persons to disperse; and in case any of the persons so met or assembled together shall not disperse within the space of one half-hour, such persons thereupon."—(Mr. Patrick Martin.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. TREVELYAN said, the Government were perfectly willing to accept the Amendment; but they must accept with it the addition of the word "forthwith," in substitution of the words "within the space of one half-hour." If the clause were fettered by any specified time, it would be clearly giving to the persons present at the meeting a period within which they might practically disobey the law; and the Government were of opinion that the word "forthwith," instead of the stated time given by the hon. and learned Member, would be sufficient to meet the requirements of the case. He would, therefore, move to amend the Amendment by striking out the words "within the space of one-half hour," and substituting the word "forthwith."

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to leave out the words, "within the space of one half-hour," in order that the word "forthwith" be there inserted.—(Mr. Trevelyan.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be struck out stand part of the proposed Amendment."

MR. HEALY asked, if it was not necessary that the Amendment itself should be carried, before any Amendment could be inserted in it?

THE CHAIRMAN intimated that that was not necessary.

MR. HEALY said, that in reference to the remark of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary that the law might be disobeyed if a period were allowed within which the people were to disperse, he might remind the right hon. Gentleman that, under Lord Grey's Act, the people got a quarter of an hour, and why the Prime Minister should now require a more stringent measure he could not understand. The law might be broken in a quarter of an hour as well as in half-an-hour. It was quite evident that the Chief Secretary had had no experience in regard to dispersing public meetings in Ireland, and he could not know how that operation was carried out. He (Mr. Healy) had seen a meeting dispersed. He had seen Mr. Clifford Lloyd come up at Drogheda and order his police, with drawn swords, and with loaded guns pointed at the people, to clear the meeting. That was a very summary process, and if the same course were to be taken under this Bill, he could not see how the power of the Government would be by any means impaired. At Drogheda, when the people were actually dispersing, Mr. Clifford Lloyd told them, while they were going away, that if they did not clear out more quickly he would fire upon them. That was the kind of power exercised by Mr. Clifford Lloyd on the 1st of January, 1881; and if the Government allowed this interval of half-an-hour in order to enable the people to disperse, they would still possess all the power they could desire in the event of a breach of the peace. The statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary that the people attending a meeting would be likely to break the law if a space of half-an-hour were conceded to enable them to disperse quietly was evidently made under an entire misapprehension of the facts. It must have been based upon some idea of a softness of character pervading the breasts of the Irish magistrates, which, in reality, did not belong to them. He (Mr. Healy), therefore, thought the Government might safely assent to this proposition, seeing that in the time of Lord Grey a quarter of an hour was actually given for this purpose. If the Government would not give half-an-hour, or even a quarter of an hour, he would take ten minutes, or, to split the difference, even seven minutes and a-half.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL supported the Amendment. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Kilkenny (Mr. P. Martin) proposed half-an-hour. The Government proposed "forthwith," and his right hon. Friend interpreted forthwith to mean a reasonable time. He would suggest that if half-an-hour could not be allowed, a quarter of an hour, or the words, "within a reasonable time thereafter," would be more satisfactory than the Government proposition. As the law now stood, the Riot Act provided a period of one hour, and the Peace Preservation Act passed by Lord Grey in 1833 gave a quarter of an hour. Why would not the Government say "thereafter within a reasonable time should disperse?"

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the Government felt a difficulty in accepting the Amendment. The view of his right hon. Friend was that, if they fixed an arbitrary time, it might tell both ways. For instance, it might inform a man that he might take a certain time in order to break the law. If they said "forthwith," then the legal meaning of that term was that it should be within a reasonable time. Of course, it could not be intended that a meeting which it was considered desirable to prohibit under these circumstances should be instantaneously dispersed.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he was at a loss to understand why the words were inserted in the Amendment requiring two or more Justices of the Peace to attend at the place where there was reason to believe an unlawful meeting was to be held, in order to notify its prohibition.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that that was altogether another point. He thought it would be better to dispose of the matter now before the Committee first.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he did not understand exactly what it was the hon. and learned Gentleman wanted to dispose of. The words "two or more Justices of the Peace" came in the Amendment before those they were now discussing.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the point referred to by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowther) was not at present before the Committee; but it would come on immediately the point now under discussion was disposed of.

MR. HEALY asked whether the two Justices of the Peace mentioned in the Amendment would, under any circumstances, be allowed to sit on the Bench and dispose of the case afterwards? He thought some guarantee ought to be given that the two magistrates who ordered the dispersion of the people should not be allowed to sit in judgment upon any offender.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that matter would come on directly the present Amendment was disposed of. At the present moment, the Committee were considering whether the word "forthwith" should be substituted for "within the space of one half-hour."

MR. NEWDEGATE said, it so happened that he had had experience in dispersing unlawful assemblies in England, and he knew from experience that the magistrates ought to be intrusted with a discretion in judging whether their order was being complied with from the first. He had known a case in which the mob removed to a distance of 100 yards and then assembled again. That evidently was an evasion of the order; and, if any time had been specified for the dispersion of a meeting, the magistrates would have been unable to discharge their duties. He must also say that, in his opinion, the magistrates intrusted with the duty of dispersing unlawful assemblies were those best qualified to judge of the conduct of those who were present on such occasions.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment," put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That the words 'forthwith within a reasonable time,' be there inserted."

MR. J. LOWTHER said, what he wanted to draw attention to was the very unnecessary provision that the attendance of two Justices of the Peace should be necessary for the prohibition of a meeting.

THE CHAIRMAN remarked that the Committee had not yet reached that point. It would come on immediately after the present Amendment was disposed of.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he should certainly like to know what was meant by the words "forthwith within a reasonable time?" He understood that it might be necessary to perform an act "forthwith," or that it might be necessary to perform an Act within a reasonable time; but he had never heard of the two being brought into conjunction together. If persons were to be dispersed "forthwith" it was usually understood that they were to be dispersed within a reasonable time; but if they said "within a reasonable time," they allowed the persons present at the meeting to constitute themselves the judges of what was and what was not a reasonable time. In a matter of this kind, it was most desirable that there should be no ambiguity of expression. He did not wonder at the cheers with which the proposed Amendment had been received by the Irish Members; it could only be received with complete support by those who had no very great desire for the success of the Act. ["Hear, hear!"] He thought hon. Members below the Gangway who derisively cheered would admit the justice of his remark; and he asked the hon. and learned Attorney General for England to state what he believed to be the real meaning of this extraordinary expression.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the meaning of the word "forthwith," if it stood alone without any further addition, would be "within a reasonable time;" but the addition of words making the clause run "forthwith within a reasonable time" made the matter perfectly plain. By using that expression, it became clear that an instantaneous dispersion was not contemplated.

MR. HEALY complained of the manner in which the time of the Committee was being consumed on small points by Members of the Tory Party. If the Irish Members were guilty of the same thing, they were immediately accused of Obstruction.

MR. J. LOWTHER, in consequence of the remarks of the previous speaker, desired to point out that the expression to which he had called attention was a novel phrase which had never, so far as he knew, occurred before in an Act of Parliament. He thought it was by no means a waste of time, to ask the responsible Legal Advisers of the Government for an explanation.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he had certainly meant, in proposing the word

"forthwith," to say "within a reasonable time;" but he had no objection to add the words suggested by his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, if by so doing it became impossible for a lawyer to raise a difficulty.

Question, "That the words 'forthwith within a reasonable time' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Question, "That the Amendment, as amended, be added to the Clause," put, and agreed to.

MR. PARNELL suggested that the original Amendment proposed by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Kilkenny (Mr. P. Martin) had not yet been put from the Chair. He wished himself to move an addition to that Amendment if he were not too late.

THE CHAIRMAN said, any Amendment to be proposed by the hon. Member must come after the words "forthwith within a reasonable time."

MR. PARNELL intimated that his Amendment would come after those words.

THE CHAIRMAN: Then it would be quite regular.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he had already stated that he wished to take exception to the words in the early part of the Amendment, "two or more justices." He had understood the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair to rule that the exception was taken too soon, but that it would be regular to take it afterwards.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly correct; but he had already put the Question that the Amendment, as amended, be inserted, and it had been agreed to.

MR. J. LOWTHER remarked that he had been listening as closely as he could to the proceedings of the Committee, and he certainly had not understood that the Amendment moved by the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny (Mr. P. Martin) had been put.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had put two Questions—first, that the Amendment be amended, and when that was passed by the Committee he put the Question that the Amendment, as amended, be inserted, and as there was no dissent, he declared that the "Ayes" had it.

MR. PARNELL wished to add the words—

"Provided they shall knowingly refuse to disperse after such intimation, or shall previously have received such intimation that such meeting had been prohibited."

The Amendment had been framed with the object of meeting the intention expressed by the Home Secretary on the previous evening, when he admitted the desirability of inserting some words to make it clear that a man should not be convicted unless he had knowingly committed the offence of attending a proclaimed meeting. It appeared to him (Mr. Parnell) that this was the best way of carrying out that desire of the Home Secretary, and it would meet the requirement which he had sought to obtain by the Amendment which he had moved last night, which specified that notice should be given by the Lord Lieutenant of his intention to prohibit a meeting. The adoption of this Amendment would render it necessary that in order to obtain a conviction against any persons it should be necessary to show that after having received an intimation that the meeting had been forbidden they should knowingly have refused to disperse.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, after the word "thereupon," to insert—"In case they shall knowingly refuse to disperse after such intimation, or shall previously have received such intimation that such meeting had been prohibited."
—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was sure the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) would feel that there was every desire on the part of the Government to consider his Amendment in the fairest spirit. The hon. Member said that last night the Home Secretary admitted the desirability of inserting some words of this kind. When his right hon. and learned Friend said that, he wished to protect persons against being convicted on account of an act of ignorance, and he said that the safeguards contained in the Bill would be retained. He (the Attorney General) thought the Committee would see that proper safeguards had been taken in the Amendment by the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny (Mr. P. Martin). By the previous part of the clause, it was required that the Lord Lieutenant should publish a prohibition of the meeting. It then became necessary that notice should be given to the promoters of the meeting that it was prohibited; and, thirdly, by the acceptance of the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Kilkenny, it was required that two Justices of the Peace should appear at the meeting and notify the order prohibiting the meeting and directing all persons present to disperse. What the hon. Member for the City of Cork asked was, that it should be proved to demonstration that a knowledge of the prohibition of the meeting had been brought home to different persons at it, after the proclamation was made, so as to prove that they were knowingly refusing to disperse. Now, he (the Attorney General) thought that the publication of the prohibition of the meeting, either in writing or by notice to the promoters of the meeting, and the proclamation of its prohibition, were quite sufficient without proving to demonstration that the persons present were made aware of the circumstances, and had knowingly refused to disperse. He could assure the hon. Member that there would have been every desire to accept his Amendment if the clause had remained as it was. The hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) had an Amendment upon the Paper for the insertion of the word "knowingly;" but the Amendment now adopted would get rid of all difficulty, and was the best substitute that could be provided.

[Thirteenth Night.]

MR. SEXTON regretted that the Government did not see their way to give a more favourable reception to this Amendment. The Attorney General had stated three reasons why, in the view of the Government, it was not considered necessary. In the first place, the Lord Lieutenant would be obliged to give public notice of the prohibition of the meeting. Now, what was a public notice? It simply meant that the Lord Lieutenant should issue a proclamation in The Dublin Gazette; but was it meant to assert that such a proclamation in Ireland was a public notice, sufficient to make known anything to the Irish people? An advertisement in The Dublin Gazette would be about as effectual as if it were written on the walls of the Roman Capitol. The Irish people knew just as much about the one as of the other. In the next place, the Attorney General said that notice was to be given to the promoters of the meeting; but the promoters, acting upon a sense of the urgent necessity of the meeting, after receiving a notification from the Lord Lieutenant, might not convey it to the public. The promoters might determine to go on with the meeting and encounter all the hazards and penalties of the Bill, and the people all the time might know nothing about it. In the third place, the Attorney General said that two Justices were to attend the meeting and notify its prohibition to the persons present. But the Irish magistrates wore no uniform, and had no distinguishing mark; they would be dressed like any other persons, and entering a meeting suddenly they would make an announcement which might not reach the ears of the majority of the persons present. There was the utmost necessity that there should be some protection for the public generally, because some time might elapse after an announcement was made before it became generally known. The Attorney General said that before they could bring it home to the knowledge of the persons present it would be necessary to probe the minds of the people, and that there was no provision in the English law for probing the minds of the people. But the Attorney General knew very well what was meant by circumstantial evidence. If the surrounding circumstances showed that the people present at a meeting knew that it was proclaimed it would only be necessary to apply to them the ordinary rules of circumstantial evidence. He thought that two things were necessary before persons should be convicted under the clause—first, that they should have got previous notice of the prohibition of the meeting; and, secondly, it should be proved that they were knowingly contravening the law. He thought the reasons given by the Attorney General were quite insufficient to justify the rejection of the Amendment.

The Attorney General

MR. HEALY asked if the Justices mentioned were to sit on the Bench and try any of the persons accused of breaking the law? Would the two Justices exercise both Judicial and Executive functions?

MR. TREVELYAN regretted that the Government could not give way. They could not consent to insert the word "knowingly." With respect to what the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had said, he found the usual method of advertising public meetings in Ireland had become so anomalous as to be a public scandal; but he did not think that hon. Members opposite would have reason to complain of the Government on that point. The real object of the Government would be to give full publicity to the fact that a meeting was prohibited. Then, in regard to the question of the two Justices not being the same Justices who might sit afterwards to try the case of persons who had refused to disperse, he might say that all these questions of the division of Executive and Judicial functions would be regarded by the Lord Lieutenant as administrative questions; and the Lord Lieutenant would prescribe the functions of the Justices, partly by a general Order contained in a Circular, and partly by the proceeding always adopted by the Castle, of directing certain Justices to go down to particular districts with administrative functions. The Government would be very unwilling to increase the size of the Bill, or to hamper the action of the Executive by saying positively that certain Justices in certain events should exercise certain functions. That would not appear in the Bill; but everything would be carefully considered, and would be dealt with in the Orders and Circulars issued by the Executive, and the whole matter would be conducted administratively and executively.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he was sorry now that he had not had an opportunity of putting the Committee on their guard against the introduction of the words "two or more Justices of the Peace," because he believed they would be found to be a source of much inconvenience. He had demurred altogether to the part of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny (Mr. P. Martin), which required the attendance of two or more Justices. [MR. HEALY: Order, order!] He did not think that the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) was exactly the authority entitled to interrupt him on a point of Order. With all respect to the Committee, he would submit that the observations which had fallen from the Chief Secretary necessitated a reply from him (Mr. Lowther). The question had been asked the right hon. Gentleman whether it was the intention of the Irish Government to prevent the Justices who, under the provisions of this section, would have to act in putting down or prohibiting a meeting from acting judicially in any proceedings which might arise in consequence of a disobedience of their orders?

MR. PARNELL rose to Order. He wished to submit to the Chairman that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Lowther) was not in Order in discussing the clause as a whole. It would be much better and more convenient if the Committee were allowed to go on with the discussion of the points involved in the Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that was quite true; but the hon. Member for Wexford had raised a distinct question as to the functions of the Justices of the Peace. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had answered the remarks of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) at some length; and it was only fair that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther) should be allowed to speak on a question which had already engaged the attention of the Committee.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that hon. gentlemen below the Gangway were not slow to avail themselves of the utmost freedom of debate—he would not use a stronger expression—and he thought it would be well if they would allow the proceedings of the Committee to go on without offering to the Chairman their unsolicited assistance. He must point out that one difficulty which the Irish Government had hitherto had to contend against was that a large number of meetings were often simultaneously announced to take place within a comparatively limited area on the same day. He found that the case in the early stage of the proceedings of the Land League, which the hon. Member who had now assumed the office of Chairman, pro hac vice, would, no doubt, remember. The difficulty was that several meetings were announced on the same day within what was termed the same district. The Government, following the example often set in that House, where two or more persons were accustomed to talk at the same time, proposed to send down to every meeting two or more Justices to notify aloud that it was prohibited. He feared that if certain things laid down in the clause were insisted upon, it would become the practice for the persons convening meetings to ascertain, from sources already at their command, what particular meeting it was which the authorities were prepared to deal with, and they would then hold another meeting at a place where there would not be two or more Justices in attendance. He would not now dwell upon some of the points he had intended to dwell upon, and which he had intended to ask the Committee to avoid, if he had not been precluded by a circumstance for which he could not accept any share of responsibility. He had risen for the purpose of drawing attention to the words "two or more Justices;" but he was informed that he was not at that moment in Order in doing so, although an opportunity would present itself later on. He had resumed his seat in obedience to the suggestion of the Chairman; but although he was listening very attentively to the proceedings, the point was passed without any intimation being conveyed to him that he would be in Order in continuing his observations. He had, no doubt, been properly prevented by the Chairman from interposing when the point had been passed over; but he had conveyed to the Committee his desire to call attention to a special point, and without wishing to blame any other person, he did not credit himself with any responsibility for having failed to keep the engagement he had made to the Committee in the matter. He regretted, therefore, that the Prime Minister should make audible observations which could not possibly tend to advance the discussion. He had no wish to use discourteous language; but up to this point did the right hon. Gentleman consider that the great difficulties of the task the Executive had to perform had been increased by the course pursued by that (the Opposition) side of the House? He would repeat that, knowing as he did from experience that a great number of meetings were frequently announced within a short distance from each other on the same day, he regretted that it should be seriously contemplated to hamper the administration of the law by providing that the same Justices of the Peace were never to exercise both Executive and Judicial functions.

[Thirteenth Night.]

Mr. J. Lowther

THE CHAIRMAN: As this discussion has not been terminated, I must recall the attention of the Committee to the Amendment now before them.

MR. PARNELL said, he thought there should be some words inserted in the Amendment proposed by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Kilkenny (Mr. P. Martin) to make it necessary that there should be knowledge on the part of the persons attending a meeting before they became liable to punishment. It was true that the words he had suggested might seem to be rather cumbrous; but he thought they would fit in with the clause very well, and he would read it as it would stand with the adoption of the Amendment—

"And, in case such meeting be so prohibited, two or more justices of the peace shall attend at the place where they have reason to believe such meeting is to be held, and then and there notify and repeat aloud, to the persons attending, the order prohibiting such meeting, and direct such persons to disperse; and in case any of the persons so met or assembled together shall not disperse within the space of one half-hour, such persons thereupon in case they shall knowingly refuse to disperse after such intimation, or shall previously have received such information that such meeting had been prohibited."

The Home Secretary specially stated, at one period of the discussion of his (Mr. Parnell's) Amendment last night, that he would introduce words making it necessary that there should be knowledge on the part of the persons charged with an offence, so that no person who had not actual knowledge that he was committing an offence should be liable to the penalty imposed by the Act; and the right hon. and learned Gentleman also stated that he would provide that a fair notice should be given without defining the exact length to which that notice should go. Now, this Amendment did not provide what the Home Secretary certainly, at one period of the discussion, expressed himself willing to provide. He, therefore, trusted the Attorney General would see his way to carry out the object of the Amendment, and if he would submit other words to that effect, he (Mr. Parnell) would be perfectly willing to withdraw his own proposal.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was perfectly aware of what his right hon. and learned Friend had stated yesterday; but the view of the Government was that the safeguards now imposed were sufficient to prevent any person from placing himself unintentionally in a position in which he might be punished. If on the Report it was found that these words did not carry out the intention of the Government, then he was sure that either by an additional Amendment, or by some further action, the object sought to be accomplished would be attained. He hoped that that explanation would satisfy the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). There was no desire that an innocent person attending a prohibited meeting should be affected by the clause.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL would suggest to his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) that he should accept the offer made by his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General. He thought there was no difference between his hon. Friend and the Attorney General as to the object both of them desired—namely, that no person should be brought within the criminal category included in the section to whom a guilty knowledge had not been brought home. Under these circumstances, he would suggest that the offer of the Attorney General should be accepted, and that the matter should be left open for future consideration.

MR. PARNELL said, he would accept the suggestion of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell), but he would not ask leave to withdraw the Amendment. He would prefer that it should be negatived.

MR. METGE wished to call attention to one point which had been raised by his Friend the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), and that was that the notice given to the promoters that the meeting had been prohibited might possibly be withheld from the public, and might lead persons into the commission of crime who would otherwise have avoided it. There was a large portion of the people of Ireland who never looked into the newspapers at all; and however carefully a matter of this kind might be advertised, it would not be brought home to the knowledge of everybody. He would, therefore, suggest that it might be expedient to amend the clause in such a way as to secure that the notification might, to some extent, be given by the use of placards.

MR. SEXTON said, he had heard the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary in regard to advertisements, but he thought the Government would see that a notification in The Dublin Gazette only would not be sufficient to meet the requirements of the case. It also ought to be advertised in the local papers.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he did not wish the hon. Member to infer anything from his statement, except that the prohibition of these meetings would be duly advertised. It must be borne in mind that within the last 12 months something like 1,200 meetings had been prohibited under the discretionary power of the Lord Lieutenant, and he believed that very little practical inconvenience had resulted from the course which had been taken by the Executive in making the announcement of the prohibition public. He was certainly under the impression that, as new legislative conditions were laid down by the present Bill, the mode proposed to be adopted would be found to work satisfactory.

MR. METGE said, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan) seemed to forget that the arguments all through in support of this clause was that the clause itself was intended to meet some extraordinary circumstance. The Irish Members had contended all along that there was sufficient power in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant already to repress these meetings. He was quite willing to leave the clause as it stood; but he hoped the Government would not allow anything to slip through that would prevent a fair knowledge of the prohibition of these unlawful assemblies being made thoroughly public.

Question put, and negatived.

THE CHAIRMAN called upon Mr. STOREY to move the next Amendment.

MR. SEXTON said, that after the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny (Mr. P. Martin) had been disposed of there were several Amendments on the Paper before that proposed by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey). There was one in his (Mr. Sexton's) name, and he wished to know if it would be possible for him to move it after the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) had been disposed of?

THE CHAIRMAN said, it was absolutely necessary, in inserting the last Amendment that had been agreed to, to cut out certain words, and the Amendments which stood on the Paper and affected the words which had been cut out could not be put.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that the words of Sub-section 2 of Clause 7 had already been struck out, and they included the words affected by the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton).

MR. HEALY moved, at the end of the Clause, to add the following sub-section:—

“A copy of every such order, and of the information upon which the same was founded, shall be laid before Parliament within fourteen days after the day on which such order was made, if Parliament be then sitting, and if not, then within fourteen days after the next meeting of Parliament.”

This, he thought, was a very important point, and one which the Government might reasonably accept. It was very desirable that there should be precise information on the part of the House, in case a renewal of this legislation was attempted; and the House should thoroughly understand what had been the nature of the meeting which had been prohibited. All he asked in this Amendment was, that a copy of the order, and of the information upon which it was founded, should be laid before Parliament. It was found, during the recent agitation, that meetings were constantly proclaimed on the affidavits of bailiffs, grooms, and stable-boys employed by the local magistrates. He thought, if a magistrate desired a meeting to be proclaimed, it was not sufficient that he should get his bailiff, groom, or stable-boy to make an affidavit that, in his opinion, a breach of the peace was likely to arise. The Government would see that that was a most undesirable thing; and that if any information was laid at all, it should be an information from an officer responsible for the preservation of the peace.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, add the following sub-section:—“A copy of every such order, and of the information upon which the same was founded, shall be laid before Parliament within fourteen days after the day on which such order was made, if Parliament be then sitting, and if not, then within fourteen days after the next meeting of Parliament.”—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

MR. TREVELYAN said, the Committee had already decided in the negative the question of requiring sworn information for the prohibition of meetings. The question was raised 13 days ago, and he had then stated his objections to the use of the word “information” in the Bill, and he would not repeat them. He believed that he stated those objections at considerable length, so that they could not have been misunderstood. The Government, however, were quite ready to accept the Amendment if that part of it relating to the “information” was struck out. He would, therefore, move to omit the words “and of the information upon which the same was founded.”

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to omit “and of the information upon which the same was founded.”—(Mr. Trevelyan.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment.”

MR. LEAMY remarked, that if these words were left out, they would be in this position—that they would get just as much information as they were enabled to get under the Act from the Irish newspapers, and they would gain nothing by carrying the Amendment as it stood. What they wanted was this—they desired to know the information upon which the Lord Lieutenant was to exercise his exceptional powers? The Committee must bear in mind that the Lord Lieutenant, under this clause, got power to prohibit perfectly legal and lawful assemblies; and he would submit, that if the Committee gave the Lord Lieutenant that power, the least they could do was to ask him to give the grounds upon which he exercised it. It must not be forgotten that these assemblies could not be called unlawful until such time as the prohibition of the Lord Lieutenant was proclaimed. As a matter of fact, men might attend a meeting and the meeting would be quite lawful until such time as it was proclaimed. If, therefore, Parliament proposed to give to the Lord Lieutenant power to put down assemblies that were perfectly lawful, the least they could do was to provide that the grounds and the information upon which they were prohibited should be given to Parliament.

MR. HEALY said, the Government admitted that the Lord Lieutenant must act on some information or other. Of course, he knew the Chief Secretary was not very well acquainted with the nature of the meetings that had hitherto been proclaimed. It was not unfrequently the case that a meeting in the North of Ireland was proclaimed because an Orangeman objected to it; and a sworn information was laid before an Orange magistrate, which was quite sufficient to stop the meeting. Under this Bill, if a landlord or anybody else laid an information against the holding of a meeting, that should not be sufficient to justify the action of the stipendiary magistrate in putting it down, except it was considered to be unlawful upon adequate information by the responsibility of the Government themselves.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, the Committee had been told last evening that the reason why the functions of the Privy Council were not exercised in prohibiting these meetings was, that the Lord Lieutenant was to be wholly responsible. He had endeavoured to explain that he thought that would be a futile course; but, as the clause now stood, the Government would prevent any Member of the House of Commons by any possibility introducing a Motion to show the motives by which the Lord Lieutenant or anybody else might have been moved in prohibiting a meeting. He did not think, if the clause were passed as it at present stood, that either the Lord Lieutenant or the Government could be held to be responsible to anyone for any proclamation that was issued.

MR. TREVELYAN said, the pledge which the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) asked for was one which the Government had given already more than once, and he was unwilling to repeat that nothing could exceed the care with which the Government of Ireland collected and weighed opinions before they proceeded to take any step of an arbitrary character, and those which were taken were not of very great frequency. [MR. HEALY: Not now.] He could only speak for the existing Government of Ireland. His own experience was not sufficient to enable him to criticize the conduct of his Predecessors, or to make any engagements for his Successors; but as far as the present Government were concerned, he knew the methods by which their administration was carried on, and he could assure the Committee that it was their sole desire not to take any arbitrary step.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. CALLAN moved, in page 4, line 18, at end, add—

"Provided always. That it shall not be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant to order, under the provisions of this Act, any such prohibition of a meeting, nor shall any person be guilty of an offence under this Act who may be present at a meeting so prohibited, unless the Lord Lieutenant shall, by proclamation previously made, declare the county, or the district of county in which the meeting is to be held is in such a state of disturbance as to require the application of the provisions and powers in this Clause enacted."

The hon. Member stated that he had taken this Proviso ipsisima verba from a clause of the Act of 1833, to which the Home Secretary referred the day before yesterday. In an ordinary state of affairs in Ireland the power of the Lord Lieutenant to prohibit a meeting was quite sufficient, and he might corroborate the reference which had already been made to the prohibition of a meeting which occurred at Drogheda, on the 1st of January, 1881, to show that up to the present moment the Government had fully exercised their power of prohibiting meetings in Ireland. On that day—namely, January 1, 1881—the twin brother or foster son of the Home Secretary, Mr. Clifford Lloyd, suppressed a meeting in Drogheda even without a proclamation of the Lord Lieutenant, and without the consent of the late ungracious Chief Secretary, the lamentable Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster). There had been no meeting in Ireland for the last six months of any kind whatever; and, therefore, it was not asking too much to restrict the power of the Lord Lieutenant. The Lord Lieutenant, under the Common Law, had power to suppress meetings; but, as he had stated, there had been no meetings in Ireland under this Act. It so happened that the county of Louth was wedged between two or three other Irish counties, and he entertained a strong objection to the prohibition of meetings in that county because in some of the adjoining counties certain unlawful meetings might be held. He did not think the Lord Lieutenant would attempt to prohibit a meeting in the Province of Ulster, no matter what he might do in the Province of Leinster; and the object of the Proviso was to prevent the Lord Lieutenant from being egged on by irresponsible advisers to stop public meetings. If the Lord Lieutenant wanted to stop a meeting, he must previously complain that the state of the county was such as to require the application of the Act. The stringent provisions of this Bill should not be applied where the ordinary law was sufficient. He therefore begged to move the Proviso of which he had given Notice at the end of the clause.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided always, That it shall not be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant to order, under the provisions of this Act, any such prohibition of a meeting, nor shall any person be guilty of an offence under this Act who may be present at a meeting so prohibited, unless the Lord Lieutenant shall, by proclamation previously made, declare the county, or the district of county in which the meeting is to be held in in such a state of disturbance as to require the application of the provisions and powers in this Clause enacted."—(Mr. Callan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had stated the other day that the Irish Government were exceedingly anxious, as far as they could, to apply the various clauses of the Bill, where they could apply them, to the principle that they should not operate universally in Ireland, but only in the proclaimed districts. The advantages of that object would be to give great encouragement to districts not to come under the proclamation, and to give great encouragement to other districts which were under proclamation to get rid of the proclamation. Practically speaking, it gave to the Lord Lieutenant the power of suspending the operation of the Act at any time by withdrawing the proclamation. That was the general advantage of adopting the principle of proclaiming districts, and the Government had desired to extend this power as far as possible, especially in the case of the extraordinary provisions given by Clause 5 and Clause 11, which were provisions that did not exist before. These they regarded as the most inquisitorial provisions of the Bill; but they did not see their way to the application of this principle to the present clause. It had not been contested that it should not apply to Clause 6, which dealt with unlawful associations, and the Government had applied it to that clause because it was in the very nature of secret societies that they should be dealt with wherever they could be found. With regard to the present clause, it was considered desirable not to apply the principle of a proclaimed district, because it was the view of the Government that meetings might have the effect, not only of increasing the existing few disturbances, but of creating a tendency to disturbance even where it had not previously existed; thus, not only increasing an existing conflagration, but of spreading a conflagration to districts already quiet. That was the experience of the Irish Government, and it was a reason why Lord Spencer and the Irish Government, while they desired to extend, as far as they could, the principle of proclaimed districts, had arrived at the conclusion that they could not apply it to the provisions of the present clause.

Mr. Callan

MR. SEXTON felt bound to say that no more reasonable Amendment than this had been brought under the notice of the Committee. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had given no reason why the proposed provision should not be applied to Clause 7, except that in regard to secret societies it might be desirable to take the same course that was applicable to public meetings. This clause did not apply to secret societies, and it was somewhat singular that the same considerations that were held to apply in one instance to secret societies should, in the other case, be held to apply to open public meetings. Then, as to the arguments as to stopping the spread of a conflagration, surely it would be in the power of the Lord Lieutenant to make his proclamation as wide as the district over which the conflagration was extending. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had referred to other clauses of the Bill which required the application of the proclamation. Take the Curfew Clause, the 8th, which enacted—

"That, in a proclaimed district, if a person is out of his place of abode at any time after one hour later than sunset and before sunrise under suspicious circumstances, any constable may arrest that person and bring him forthwith before a justice of the peace, and such justice, after inquiring into the circumstances of the case, may either discharge him or take the necessary steps, by committing him to prison, or taking bail, to bring him before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction acting under this Act, and if such person, on appearing before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction acting under this Act, fails to satisfy the Court that he was out of his place of abode upon some lawful occasion or business, he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act."

But it must be borne in mind that, under that clause, no person prowling about after sunset could be arrested, however suspicious his appearance might be, unless the district had been previously proclaimed. He might wear a conical hat, be an entire stranger to the local Constabulary, have square-toed boots, but he could not be touched unless the district had been previously proclaimed. And even the Trans-Atlantic stranger, who was so horrible a bugbear to Her Majesty's Government, could not be arrested unless he made his appearance in a proclaimed district. Then Clause 11 provided that searches for arms and illegal documents should be made. The police might have positive information that a certain house contained muskets, masks, and all the paraphernalia for murder, but they were not able to enter it unless the district was proclaimed. In these cases the Government had guarded the rights of individuals with great tenderness; but when they came to deal with the right of public meetings—that right which had so long been the safeguard of the liberty of the country, and which was the safety-valve for the feelings of the country—they arrived at the conclusion that such meetings ought to be stopped, whether they had been proclaimed or not. He contended that this was a great inconsistency. If a search for arms could not be made unless the district had been proclaimed, that was an infinitely stronger and more powerful case for the intervention of the Lord Lieutenant than the simple right to prohibit a public meeting; and, under these circumstances, he should support the Amendment.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, his hon. Friend (Mr. Sexton) had pointed out the inconsistency of this clause so far as proclaimed districts were concerned. At the same time, it was hardly consistent to discuss that clause now, seeing that the question of the proclamation of districts was not raised by it. He, for one, did not think that the Amendment was in the right direction. He was strongly of opinion that there ought to be no such clause in the Bill at all; but the Amendment must be argued on the assumption that the clause was in the Bill, and on that assumption he wished to point out how the Amendment would operate in a wrong direction. In the first place, the Government or the Lord Lieutenant must have the power according to their judgment of proclaiming a meeting in any part of the country, and they would only have to throw what he might call the proclamation-net wide enough in order to obtain that power universally; and he was afraid the effect of passing this Amendment would be to induce the Lord Lieutenant, under certain circumstances, to do that which he would not be prepared to do unless the absolute necessity for it were shown. Again, assuming that some such clause as the present was desirable, and must be contained in the Bill, it was perfectly obvious that there might be meetings in districts not proclaimed which, in the interest of the public safety, it might be desirable to suppress.

MR. O'DONNELL confessed that he was unable to follow the reasoning of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. O. Russell) in this matter. The hon. and learned Member said he must proceed on the assumption that this clause was in the Bill; but then he saw special objections to requiring that the provision of the right of holding a public meeting should only be exercised in a proclaimed district. But why was this clause in the Bill at all? The excuse of the Government was that this clause was in the Bill because there were exceptionally disturbed districts in Ireland. Why should not those districts be proclaimed by way of example to the public outside those disturbed districts, and by way of warning to people within them? The only argument the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk brought forward in support of his objection to the Amendment was the extraordinary argument that the liberties of Ireland were to be placed in the power of the Lord Lieutenant, in order that he might have in his hands the power of suppressing public meetings and proclaiming districts that ought not to be proclaimed. No graver charge could be brought against any public officer than the charge which was applied in the argument of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk. It was based on the supposed readiness of the Lord Lieutenant to proclaim districts that ought not to be proclaimed, for the mere purpose of having power to put down public expression of opinion. He would only say that if that was an argument accepted by Her Majesty's Government, the Government entertained an opinion of the Lord Lieutenant infinitely worse than had yet been expressed by the Irish Party. He must do justice to the Home Secretary, and say that his arguments did not imply quite so low an opinion of the general unsatisfactory condition of the Irish Executive. The Home Secretary stated as his reason for objecting to this most acceptable Amendment, that the experience of the Irish Government went to show that public meetings might create a tendency towards disturbance. Now, taking the declaration of the Home Secretary for what it was worth, and for the light it threw upon the Lord Lieutenant, it was absolutely necessary that they should introduce some Amendment to limit that power. In the opinion of the Home Secretary, public meetings had a tendency to excite disturbances. They were not to be prohibited because they were unlawful in themselves, and contemplated unlawful acts, but because they might excite a tendency towards subversive sentiment, which might result in criminal acts next year or the year after; so that an unlimited extension were sought to be given to the reasons which might induce the Lord Lieutenant to suppress public meetings in Ireland. He listened with all due gravity to the Home Secretary's exposition of his experience in connection with the Irish Government, because he was not aware until that statement was made that the Home Secretary had been particularly distinguished for any experience of Irish affairs whatever. But, doubtless, the Home Secretary possessed the rare power of acclimatization; and, having already been in charge of a Coercion Bill for Ireland, he felt himself qualified to be "Sir Oracle" on all the details of the Irish Government, and all the results of Irish experience. What he (Mr. O'Donnell) wished to know was, if it was the experience of the Irish Government that public meetings and disturbing outrages were at all connected? If they were at all connected, it was in a way that was by no means favourable to the argument of the Home Secretary. When they suppressed public meetings they had disturbances and outrage, and not when they had public meetings. Since the meeting at Wexford, when the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) criticized somewhat severely the speech of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, at Leeds, there had been practically no public meetings in Ireland, and yet disturbance and outrage had most lamentably increased in that country. The experience of the Irish Administration distinctly went to show that the more public meetings were suppressed the more they promoted private outrages; and he was afraid there would be a further confirmation of that view if the peculiar Irish experience of the Home Secretary, who had never had any Irish experience at all, was to be taken into account, and the opinion of the Irish Members, who were well qualified to speak on the subject, was to be neglected and ignored by the Government.

MR. GIVAN said, he had listened to all the arguments which had been adduced in the course of the discussion; but he saw no necessity for applying to every district in Ireland the same repressive measures in regard to the holding of public meetings. Reference had been made to the Province of Ulster, but in that Province, so far as he was aware, no public meetings had been held which were conducive to crime and disorder. If it could be shown that such meetings did take place there, it would be the duty of the Executive to prohibit them, on the ground that they were likely to endanger the public safety; but if it were absolutely necessary to proclaim districts in which public meetings were prohibited, the consequence might be that the whole of Ulster, and the most peaceable portions of Ireland, would come not only under the operation of this section, but also of the 8th—the Curfew Clause—and several other clauses which were regarded as stringent and objectionable. He entirely objected to the suggestion that the power to be conferred upon the Lord Lieutenant of putting a stop to meetings in Ulster, should involve the necessity of proclaiming that Province, or any district within it.

MR. O'SULLIVAN supported the Amendment. He believed that if Ulster were brought under the stringent provisions of the clause, some day or other the people of that Province would join with the rest of the Irish people in asking for the restoration of the rights of the country generally. He supported the Amendment because he considered it to be a fair and reasonable one. He failed to see what reason there was for prohibiting a meeting in a district which was not disturbed. If a district was not disturbed, and there was no reason to proclaim it, why should they prevent any legal meeting being held? If it were found that meetings which were being held were intended to disturb the neighbourhood, it would be easy to proclaim them; but to prohibit a meeting, and to say that it should not be held in a district which was not disturbed, was not only unfair, but most unjust. He saw no reasonable ground why the Government should object to this addition to the clause. He failed to see that it would put them in a worse condition than they were at present. It would not deprive them of any power they now possessed in the slightest degree, and if a district was not in a disturbed state the Lord Lieutenant ought not to be invested with any special powers beyond those he already possessed, which would enable him to interfere with the right of free meeting.

MR. LEAMY said, the hon. Members who had criticized the Amendment in a hostile spirit had evidently not paid attention to the words of the Amendment. The Amendment was to the effect that the clause should have effect only in districts which had been previously proclaimed, and in which there was such disturbance as to require the application of the provisions and powers of the clause. Some hon. Members appeared to think that if the Amendment were adopted counties would be proclaimed, so as to subject every person residing in them to the consequences of being resident in a proclaimed district. That was a mistake. If the Amendment of his hon. Friend were accepted, it would simply give the Lord Lieutenant the power of proclaiming a district for a special purpose—namely, that he might be able to put down a meeting. It was proposed that if a man happened to be out after sunset, or was a stranger in the district, he should be liable to arrest; but this could only be done in a proclaimed district. Yet the present clause proposed to give power to the Lord Lieutenant to prohibit a meeting in a district which was not proclaimed. He did not see, if the Amendment were adopted, how the Executive would be in a worse position than they were at present, because the Lord Lieutenant had already power to suspend any meeting whatever. He supported the Amendment, because he believed it would unquestionably tend to limit the power of the Lord Lieutenant. The hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Givan) said there would be inducements, if the Amendment were adopted, to bring Ulster under the operation of the Bill. So far as he (Mr. Leamy) was concerned, he should be glad to see that inducement given effect to. He stood up for the right of free speech and liberty in Ireland; but he thought there ought to be liberty of speech all over Ireland, and if these restrictions were to be applied to the whole country, instead of finding a certain section of the Irish Members supporting the Government, they would be found in active opposition to the Bill. It certainly was an extraordinary thing to him how this clause could meet with any support at all from hon. Members opposite.

MR. GIVAN said, he wished to correct a misapprehension into which the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Leamy) had fallen. So far as he (Mr. Givan) was personally concerned, he objected to the clause altogether.

MR. MARUM desired to mention why he felt himself bound to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan). It appeared to him that the fact of the Bill being of a general character, extending over the whole of Ireland, had been forgotten, and that no public meeting could be held to which this section would not apply. It must also be remembered that there was a very stringent clause applied to acts done or words spoken, so that that clause, taken with the present, placed liberty of speech at a very low ebb in deed. He thought the provision in regard to words spoken ought to operate sufficiently, and he was of opinion that unless the Amendment were accepted the right of public meeting in Ireland would be put a stop to altogether.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he hoped that the Government would not accept the Amendment, which would render the clause nugatory. If a proclamation were necessary to make a meeting illegal, the expedient would be resorted to of holding meetings in districts which were not proclaimed. He was old enough to remember the time when prize fights were of constant occurrence. They were considered illegal, and when it was known that one was about to take place a Justice of the Peace, attended by constables, went out to prevent it from taking place; but when they got to the spot, the whole assembly had migrated into an adjoining county in which the authorities, who had come to interrupt the proceedings, had no power, and thus an evasion of the law took place. So it would be if the prohibition of public meetings were confined to proclaimed districts. A meeting would be held in a district which had not been proclaimed by the Lord Lieutenant, and, therefore, the clause would be rendered nugatory by the acceptance of the Amendment.

MR. REDMOND said, the hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot) was entirely under a misapprehension in regard to the case he had put. It would be impossible in Ireland for a meeting, after having been prohibited, to migrate to an unproclaimed district, because the Lord Lieutenant would still have the power of suppressing it. The only difference would be that it would be impossible to inflict a penalty of six months' imprisonment on the persons attending the meeting at the present moment. Without any proclamation at all the Lord Lieutenant had ample power for dispersing illegal meetings held in any district. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) had fallen into the same error as the hon. Member for Warwickshire (Sir Eardley Wilmot). The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk said the Lord Lieutenant might be tempted, if the Amendment were accepted, to proclaim districts.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL: To obtain the power given by the clause.

Mr. Marum

MR. REDMOND said, that meant the power of inflicting a penalty of six months' imprisonment. The hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Givan) had also fallen into an error in asserting that the object of the Amendment was to extend the powers of the Bill to Ulster. That was entirely contrary to the real facts of the case. Their object was to keep it away from places which were not disturbed; and if the Amendment were adopted, Ulster, not being a disturbed district, would be exempted from the operation of the provisions. He was sorry that the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Givan) had mistaken the attitude of the Irish Members towards Ulster. The hon. Member had accused them of a desire to extend the provisions of the Bill to Ulster. They had opposed throughout its application to any part of Ireland; and if any hon. Member had helped Her Majesty's Government to pass this legislation, it was the hon. Member himself and his Friends, who had voted for the second reading of the Bill.

MR. WARTON suggested that the Irish Members might attain their object by moving to amend the clause on Report by prefixing to it the words "in proclaimed districts."

MR. METGE said, the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) was acting under the same misapprehension as the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Givan). The words of the Amendment did not seek to proclaim the district, but they were to the effect—

"That it shall not be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant to order, under the provisions of this Act, any such prohibition of a meeting, nor shall any person be guilty of an offence under this Act who may be present at a meeting so prohibited, unless the Lord Lieutenant shall, by proclamation previously made, declare the county, or the district of county in which the meeting is to be held is in such a state of disturbance as to require the application of the provisions and powers in this Clause."

He did not think that the speech which had been made by the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Givan) would tend to foster that kindly feeling between the Members for Ulster and the rest of the Irish Members, which some hon. Members seemed to think ought to exist.

MR. GILL said, he hoped the Government would accept the clause. From their point of view there were two things required in Ireland. They had already full power to prevent meetings, whether they were proposed to be held in proclaimed districts or not, if they considered that they might lead to disorder. He himself thought that in those parts of Ireland which it was not necessary to proclaim, and which were, therefore, supposed to be inhabited by people who did nothing to injure the public safety, it was quite sufficient to have the power of stopping a meeting when it was convened, without subjecting the people who attended it to punishment. By accepting the Amendment, the Government would not put themselves in a worse position than they were now occupying, except that they would not have the power of subjecting people in the quiet parts of the country, such as Ulster, to severe punishment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, he did not think that the Amendment would effect the object of its supporters. Districts only could be proclaimed when crime and outrage were prevalent in them, and it was, therefore, desirable that the proclaimed districts should be as few as possible. The Government did not wish to bring down on a whole district a sentence which it did not deserve; they only wished by the clause to be able to stop meetings, the holding of which would be dangerous in an unhealthy condition of things.

MR. CALLAN said, the 20th clause of the Bill, which had just been alluded to, was not at all pertinent to his Amendment.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, there were some Members who, although they did not intend to vote for the Amendment, would vote against the clause. For his own part, he thought the Amendment would make the clause logically worse than it was at present, and, therefore, he should not vote for it. The Amendment was introduced by the hon. Member for Louth, on the distinct ground that meetings should not be prohibited except in proclaimed districts, and several hon. Members opposite had also spoken in the same sense.

MR. CALLAN: I said nothing of the kind.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, in the Province of Ulster the Government of the Lord Lieutenant had repeatedly and with good effect proclaimed meetings announced to be held on the 12th of July. That power had always been exercised with the approbation of the majority of Irish Members. But if this Amendment were accepted, the Lord Lieutenant must previously proclaim the Province of Ulster, or some portion of it in which the meetings were to be held. For these reasons he felt it his duty to vote against the Amendment.

DR. COMMINS said, he should vote in favour of the Amendment and against the clause; but, in saying that, he wished to guard himself against being supposed to endorse the opinions of the hon. Member who had just sat down. The hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Givan) and the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had spoken of the Amendment as if the adoption of it would draw down upon a district all the penalties of the general proclamation under the 20th clause of the Bill. But in that they were entirely mistaken; and had they read the clause attentively they would have arrived at a different opinion, at the same time saving themselves from the strictures of the hon. Member for Louth. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Louth was—

“That it shall not be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant to order, under the provisions of this Act, any such prohibition of a meeting, nor shall any person be guilty of an offence under this Act who may be present at a meeting so prohibited, unless the Lord Lieutenant shall, by proclamation previously made, declare the county, or the district of the county in which the meeting is to be held is in such a state of disturbance as to require the application of the provisions and powers of this Clause enacted.”

It would be seen from this that the Amendment made a provision for special proclamation in the case of prohibition of meetings. According to the Bill as it stood, the Lord Lieutenant had neither political, legal, nor Constitutional responsibility, and it depended entirely upon himself whether or no he had any moral responsibility. Irish Members did not yield in matters which affected the liberties of the people of Ireland to the conscience of any man, although he would not deny that the Lord Lieutenant had as much conscientiousness as anybody else. But this clause was conferring an utterly irresponsible power, and the only way of preventing that power being abused was to surround it with restrictions. This was the well-known Constitutional method of preventing the abuse of such powers. Therefore, as the Lord Lieutenant would still retain the power of prohibition in the case of public meetings, he saw no harm in the adoption of the Amendment, and should vote for it accordingly.

MR. BIGGAR said, he thought the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had scarcely grasped the meaning of the Amendment before the Committee. The hon. Member said the Government had from time to time, with beneficial effect, proclaimed Orange meetings in Ulster, and he had argued as if that power would in future be interfered with. But that was not at all the effect of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Louth. The power of prohibition, referred to by the hon. Member for Galway as having existed before, would continue to exist if the Amendment were adopted. The clause proposed to inflict a special punishment upon persons who did not stay away from a meeting that was likely to lead to an infringement of order; and the Amendment of the hon. Member for Louth did not affect the principle of the clause, directly or indirectly. But the Government had no pretence whatever for asking for the powers under the clause unless there was disturbance in the district. When any part of Ireland was peaceable, the reasons which the Government might otherwise have for the prohibition of public meetings was taken away, and they had no excuse for interference by means of a Bill of this kind. As the hon. Member for Louth had pointed out, the special proclamation to which he referred had only reference to this particular clause, and to no other part of the Bill whatever; and he said that the sole object of the Amendment was to throw another obstacle in the way of arbitrary action on the part of the Government. Irish Members complained not only of the arbitrary but the sudden action of the Government in Ireland—they complained of the power which the clause would give of springing notices of prohibition on the people, and so bringing about conflicts between the people and the authorities. If a district were in a disturbed condition, there was, perhaps, reason for suppressing meetings; but when it was peaceable there was no necessity or justification for such a course, unless, as some were inclined to do, the object was to destroy the right of public meeting in Ireland altogether. He regarded the Amendment as extremely fair and reasonable; and he did not see how the hon. Members for Monaghan (Mr. Givan) and Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) could object to it on the grounds stated by them, because the clause would still make it competent to the Lord Lieutenant to prohibit meetings of Orangemen on the 12th of July, for which great preparations might have been made, and these Orangemen, having made arrangements for their meeting, would be liable to be put in prison for insisting on exercising their Common Law right to hold a meeting which was prohibited simply by the will of the Lord Lieutenant. He and his hon. Friends had always insisted on the right of public meeting in the case of Orangemen; and he had himself been a supporter of Mr. Johnson, the former Member for County Down, when he was prosecuted for having taken part in an Orange procession. Not only did he sympathize with him, but he became a subscriber to the fund created for the purpose of indemnifying him for the inconvenience suffered in his endeavours to insist on the right of public meeting in Ireland. He repeated that he and his hon. Friends were always in favour of the right of public meeting, either in Ulster or anywhere else, although they were not in favour of bands and banners, and things calculated to irritate the feelings of persons who held different views from those which the meetings in question represented. He maintained that the arguments of the hon. Members opposite to whom he had referred were quite inapplicable to the Amendment, which he should feel it his duty to support.

MR. CALLAN said, notwithstanding the argument of the Attorney General, his Amendment had no reference whatever to the 20th clause of the Bill. The 20th clause did not authorize the Lord Lieutenant to act of his own motion, but with the advice of the Privy Council in Ireland; whereas his Amendment reserved action to the Lord Lieutenant without the intervention of the Privy Council. That was a most material point. But there was a still more material difference. The 20th clause said that—

"The Lord Lieutenant, by and with the advice of the Privy Council in Ireland, may from time to time, when it appears to him necessary for the prevention of crime and outrage, by proclamation declare the provisions of this Act which relate to proclaimed districts to be in force."

But his Amendment was specific and not general in its terms, for it did not authorize the Lord Lieutenant to proclaim a district; it only authorized him to suppress meetings within it when, by previous proclamation, he had declared the district to be in such a state of disturbance as to require the application of the provisions and powers in the clause enacted. It would be seen from this that his Amendment did not authorize the Lord Lieutenant to proclaim a district for the purposes of this Act, but for the purpose of enabling him to suppress illegal meetings within it.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE said, he should feel it his duty to vote both against the clause and the Amendment.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 27; Noes 266: Majority 239.—(Div. List, No. 145.)

On Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill?"

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he rose for the purpose of moving the rejection of the clause. He believed the Committee would agree with him that there ought not to be any increase of the power of the Executive in Ireland, or the creation of any new offence, unless on the clearly proved necessities of the case. That opinion, he believed, would be accepted by hon. Members on both sides of the House. Now, he asked, did that proved necessity exist for the present clause? The clause enabled the Lord Lieutenant, in such cases where he came to the conclusion, on the information supplied to him, that any meeting was likely to prove dangerous to the public peace or the public safety, peremptorily, arbitrarily, and summarily to prohibit that meeting. But the clause did more than that; it made it an offence for a person knowingly to attend any such meeting. There was no such offence known to the law at the present time. It was important to consider the state of things in which this proposal was brought forward, and the state of things to which it was supposed that the clause would be applied. He asked hon. Members, in any part of the House, what were the meetings in Ireland which the existing powers of the law had been found insufficient in the interest of peace and safety in Ireland to cope with? Had any such occasion arisen, or in what place had it been found that the powers with which the Executive were already armed were inadequate to the purpose of the clause? He ventured to say, whatever hon. Members might think or express to the contrary of the conduct of the Irish people in particular districts, that there was one remarkable feature in the whole behaviour of the people of Ireland with regard to this question of public meeting, and that was, that whenever the Executive had thought it right to intervene and prevent a meeting up to the present time, on the sworn information that it was dangerous to the public peace, the greatest alacrity had been shown in yielding obedience to the law. Again, he asked, where was the proved necessity for that extraordinary power proposed by the clause to be conferred on the Lord Lieutenant? He said there was none. He would now inquire what was the existing law on this subject, and in doing so anything he might say would, of course, be subject to correction. The law, as he understood, was that a meeting, however peaceable it might be in itself, and however little it might tend to disturb the public peace, was in itself unlawful if the object it aimed at, or the means by which it sought to attain them, were unlawful; and the Lord Lieutenant had the right to invoke to the aid of the Executive the power of the law to put it down. Further, if the meeting, perfectly legal in itself, having a legal object, and professing to carry out that object by legal means, were held under circumstances which were shown upon sworn information to be dangerous to the public peace, the Lord Lieutenant had power to interfere and disperse the meeting. And the law further provided that if, upon a proclamation of that kind being made, there was reason to apprehend a breach of the peace, and the people did not disperse, then, by the reading of the Riot Act—which, by the way, gave larger powers than was proposed in this clause—any person who continued to take part in the meeting, would be subject to the penalty of the law, and could be dealt with accordingly. He was anxious to know how the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home

Secretary would meet these arguments. Where, he asked, was there a case in which it had been found that these provisions of the law, as they existed, were not adequate to the necessities of the case, or where had it been found that the penalty attached by the existing law was inadequate to the offences committed? He said, if such things had occurred, they should be proved to have taken place. But no instance was forthcoming; and, therefore, he affirmed that the only basis on which the clause could safely rest, and the sanction of the Committee be given to it, could not be made out to exist. It would be said that the powers which the Executive possessed were rather vague and undefined. He met that by saying that, in his opinion, there was no harm in leaving undefined the powers of the Executive for dealing with the great Constitutional right of public meeting; and he appealed to hon. Members representing other than Irish Constituencies, to ask themselves how they would like to have applied in England this clause, and what the people of England would say if it were attempted by hon. Members opposite to effect this grave alteration of the right of public meeting in this country? The consequences of a clause of this kind were far-reaching and dangerous. These were not only the mere act of putting down public meetings, but the effect which the clause would have upon the public mind in making men afraid to discuss what they felt to be their grievances in the light of day. He feared it would be found that by preventing men in the open, deliberate, and full expression of their views, a greater evil would be created, because the matters so removed from open discussion would find their expression in the baneful organizations which it was now sought to put down. He asked the Committee to reject the clause, because it was unnecessary, because no case had been made out for it, and because it was likely to be dangerous in its consequences.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, he yielded to no Member of the House in the desire to support Her Majesty's Government in legislation—severe and stringent legislation—for the purpose of putting down crime, outrage, and intimidation in Ireland. But he could not find, and he had not heard, in the whole course of this discussion, any reason drawn, either from principle or expediency, which could justify him in voting for a clause which practically suppressed the right of public meeting in Ireland. In times of great political excitement, whether in Ireland, in England, or on the Continent, there was always a certain amount of what he might call political gas generated, and there were two ways of dealing with it. They might allow it to escape when the pressure was harmless, or they could confine it until the pressure became irresistible, and resulted, as was generally the case, in a dangerous explosion. The people of England were in the habit of saying to Continental Governments that it was the wisest and safest thing to allow the freest possible expression of public opinion, and to allow the acts of the Executive Government to be openly criticized. He held there was less danger in doing that now than in proceeding by the measures which this clause contemplated, and which, he believed, would have the result which his hon. and learned Friend had pointed out. The strength of a political principle was like the seaworthiness of a ship—it was to be tested by the way it would stand bad weather. Any ship would behave well in fine weather; but a political principle which would not bear the test of grave political crises was not a sound political principle. They had always contended that Constitutional government, so far from being endangered, was rather strengthened by the free expression of public opinion. He looked upon this matter from a political point of view, because he regarded the clause as opposing political agitation in one of Her Majesty's Three Kingdoms. It had been said by the Prime Minister that "crime dogged the steps of the public meetings of the Land League." He would admit, for the sake of argument, that outrage had followed public meetings of the Land League in Ireland. But by this Bill it was provided that if a man by speech incited to the commission of outrage, he could be brought before the magistrates and sentenced to six months' imprisonment. He said the Government could not have a better means of dealing with intimidation that might be attempted by public meeting. There was not a single consequence which either the Chief Secretary or the Secretary for the Home Department had pointed out as likely to follow from inflammatory public meetings which could not be fully and completely dealt with under the other clauses of the Bill. But the Chief Secretary said that this measure would be wisely administered. He laid great stress on the administration of the Act. Now, he (Mr. Fowler) had as much confidence as any man in the fair and impartial administration of Lord Spencer and his right hon. Friend. He did not know where at that moment two more competent persons could be found to fill the posts which they occupied; but he could not accept it as any justification of a bad law that it would be wisely or temperately administered. But he could perceive another danger resulting from the actual administration of this Bill. The Committee would remember that they had a far stronger power than was now proposed in the Riot Act for dealing with these meetings. Assuming this clause to be put in force, the men who were the real promoters of the meetings, who went there to say the things which the Government deprecated, were not the persons who would come within the sweep of the Bill. It was always those unfortunate persons who were innocently attending the meetings who became the victims and sufferers. The result of this would be that the very people who now supported the enactment of the clause would be most indignant with the natural results of their own legislation. What had happened in this country? It was almost half-a-century since what was described as the Peterloo massacre took place in this country, an event which Manchester had never forgotten nor forgiven. To put this clause in force would be to land the Government in Ireland in greater difficulty than it was in at present. They were engaged in passing a measure which would enable the Irish Executive to deal with every development of crime, and he contended that there was no necessity to deal also with the right of public meeting in Ireland, which was the safety valve for the expression of the political opinions of an excited people. By all means let the people of Ireland criticize the action of the Government. No doubt, they would not do that very pleasantly. Strong language would be applied, no doubt, to the policy of the Government; but this would do no harm in itself, nor would it do harm to the Government of Lord Spencer. On the contrary, he thought that this criticism would do the Government some good, even though it were expressed in unwise, objectionable, or intemperate words. He felt it his duty to vote against the clause, because he believed that the suppression of the right of public meeting would produce far greater evils than it was intended to prevent.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was with very great regret that the Government felt bound to dissent from the view taken by his hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton. With every respect for his hon. Friend, he thought the views he had expressed were somewhat to be regretted at that moment, because, as had been stated by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), it was support of this character which encouraged hon. Members opposite to go back to the principles of the Bill. Now, he contended that this question could not be solved by general argument upon the value of public meetings. Everyone knew the value of public meetings, just as they knew the value of trial by jury; but the Committee, by passing the 1st clause of the Bill, had suspended trial by jury in Ireland, so far as the offences named in the Bill were concerned. The same kind of common-places could always be uttered, both on the value of trial by jury, and on the value of public meetings. They were, however, common-places against the second reading of the Bill, and did not affect the question at issue; and although the hon. Member for Wolverhampton had directed his remarks against the clause itself, his speech was really against every kind of legislation for the suppression of public meetings. He had been struck particularly by one remark of his hon. Friend, who said for the sake of argument he would admit that these public meetings had led to outrage and intimidation in the past, but that there was no necessity for further interference, inasmuch as the Government already possessed machinery for putting down outrage and intimidation. The position taken up by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton was very like that of a man who supplied himself with an excellent fire-engine, and then concluded there was no use in taking any further precaution against his house being set on fire. That was exactly the case with regard to the hon. Member's objection to this clause. Because the Government could put down intimidation, therefore they were not to interfere with public meetings which were likely to lead to intimidation, and it was upon that ground that the Committee were asked to reject the clause. His hon. Friend had referred to the evils which might arise from putting down public meetings by force, and had alluded to Peterloo by way of illustration; but it was the Peterloo system which was in force in Ireland under the existing law. It was because the Government could now suppress meetings dangerous to the public peace only by an exhibition of force that the present clause was proposed. The object of the clause was, by inflicting penalties, to prevent such disasters as his hon. Friend had referred to. Thus the clause would supply the means of putting down meetings avowedly held for the purpose of "Boycotting" and punishing those who persisted in attending them in spite of their prohibition; and, therefore, he desired it to be understood that any Gentleman voting against the clause would vote against giving the Government the power of putting down "Boycotting." The hon. Member for Wolverhampton had referred to Whig principles. He trusted he had as much respect for those principles as his hon. Friend. He confessed that he was a Whig, and he was ready to act as the great Whigs had done in old times, who never allowed themselves to be seduced by commonplace phrases when great political dangers were to be dealt with. The first fruit of the Reform Bill was the bringing in of the Act of 1833. That Act was brought in by men who fought for their principles, and for 50 years sacrificed every hope of political advantage. They did not consider themselves for one moment when they found the country in danger, but applied the remedies which they and everyone else knew to be necessary. These were the reasons which induced Her Majesty's Government to take such steps as they believed would be sufficient for the safety of the country. These were the reasons which induced the Irish Government under Lord Spencer to declare that, in their opinion, the country would not be safe without this clause, and to state that, in their opinion, this unlimited right of public meeting had been one of the main causes of the present condition of Ireland, and of the crime and outrage which prevailed there. It was for these reasons, and for these reasons alone, that the Government now asked the House of Commons to support them in this clause. They were told that this Act of Coercion would not produce the results which the Government expected from it. Yes—the Government having proposed a Bill which they considered likely to achieve the results they desired, the endeavour was then made to weaken it and cut it down, so as to bring about the failure that was prophesied. He appealed to hon. Members to allow the clause to pass.

[Thirteenth Night.]

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that, notwithstanding the great ability with which views opposite to his own had been supported, he was still of opinion that, without this clause, very great difficulties would be thrown in the way of the Executive Government in Ireland. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had spoken of outrages being caused by the language used at public meetings in Ireland; nevertheless, he did not seem to think that the Government should be placed in possession of powers sufficient for the prevention of public meetings in the manner proposed by the clause. The hon. Gentleman, however, got to somewhat safer ground when he said that the advice which was tendered to Foreign Governments with regard to matters kindred to the subject now before the Committee, would be inconsistent when the Government of the country became a party to the clause under discussion. But he (Mr. Lowther) thought the best way to avoid such inconsistency was very easily discoverable—it was to discontinue giving advice unsought to Foreign Governments, who were certainly as competent as our own to manage their affairs. It was to be regretted that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, who, he was bound to say, had, up to the present time, discharged his duty with great firmness, should have been called away for a moment upon public business, because, during his absence, an Amendment of importance had been under discussion, and was afterwards accepted by one of his Colleagues. He believed that Amendment would prove very injurious to the clause itself, inasmuch as it provided that two or more Justices should attend at the place where they had reason to believe a meeting was to be held.

Sir William Harcourt

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: That Amendment was accepted at my special instance.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he had not stated that the right hon. and learned Gentleman disapproved the Amendment accepted by his Colleague; he had simply expressed his regret at the absence of the right hon. and learned Gentleman when the Amendment was under discussion, which fact precluded the right hon. and learned Gentleman from hearing the strong arguments which were forthcoming against the change introduced into the Bill. He (Mr. J. Lowther) thought that what had taken place was illustrative of the great disadvantage of a measure of this kind being in the hands of a Member of the Government, who could not possibly have an opportunity of making himself acquainted with the opinions of the authorities in Ireland with regard to particular Amendments proposed to the Bill. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman had had the experience which it was his (Mr. J. Lowther's) misfortune to have of the difficulty of contending with a movement of the kind now going on in Ireland, he would have known that the Amendment that had been accepted by his Colleague would make the clause practically unworkable. The Amendment made it necessary, as he had already pointed out, for two or more Justices to attend at the place appointed for the meeting. The general practice would be found to be that a large number of meetings would be simultaneously called in the same district. That was the practice when he was a Member of the Irish Executive, and he had known several instances of the kind. The plan would be to call meetings in almost every village throughout the district for one particular day. The persons who promoted these meetings would have a pretty good idea which meeting or meetings the authorities took especial precautions to deal with, and they would probably select a rendezvous not immediately under the eyes of the authorities. The effect of this was that, while the Justices were engaged elsewhere, the promoters of the meeting took the precaution to repair to a spot not far off, and there the meeting took place. His objection to the Amendment was founded upon experience, and the circumstances he had referred to were not unlikely to occur in the future. At the risk of detaining the Committee, he felt it his duty to call attention to this subject, in the hope that, between that time and the Report, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary would consult some practical authority on Irish affairs, who had had experience of the way in which public meetings in Ireland were conducted, and that he would consent either to the omission of the Amendment, or to so far modifying it as to remove some of the practical objections he had indicated.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, the Home Secretary had complained of the length of the discussion on the clause before the Committee, and, at the same time, had congratulated himself that he was an old Whig. If that was so, he ought to have recollected that the founders of the modern Whig Party—Mr. Fox, Mr. Whitbread, and others—spent a very much longer time in discussing a similar clause in a Bill that applied to England. They fought against the suspension of the right of public meeting with more persistency than the hon. Gentlemen opposite had fought against that clause, and their fighting was accounted by their Party as an honour. The Home Secretary had twitted the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) with having indulged in Liberal common-places. It might be retorted upon him that he had indulged in despotic common-places, for the substance and the spirit of his speech were just such as would have been fitting in the mouth of the Minister of an unchecked Tyrant. It was the sort of speech that any Minister of Louis Bonaparte would have made when trampling out the liberties of the people by a military force. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had referred to Lord Grey and to the Government of 1833. It was an unhappy reference. Lord Grey came into power upon a wave of popular enthusiasm and with a large majority at his back. He carried an Irish Coercion Bill, which was described by the late Lord Lytton as consisting of two sections—a whiff of grape-shot, and the suspension of trial by jury. The Bill was as complete, as disastrous, as hideous a failure as the Coercion Bill of last year had been. Lord Grey and his Colleagues—as the present Administration were now doing—attempted a second Coercion Bill; but Lord Althorp, a statesman that the Home Secretary had often quoted during these debates, objected to the measure. The negotiations that took place between him, Mr. Littleton, and Mr. O'Connell, ended in the defeat of the Government and the abandonment of the Bill. It was not at all improbable that as Irish coercion had killed Lord Grey's Government—with all its popularity and its power—Irish coercion would kill the present Administration also. After the retirement of Lord Grey, Lord Melbourne initiated a better policy, and, under his mild administration and without coercion, Ireland enjoyed a period of peace and prosperity such as had seldom fallen to her lot since the Union. This much for the Home Secretary's historical allusions. As for the clause before the House, his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Sir Charles Russell) and his Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had stated clearly, ably, and eloquently all that was necessary to be said. It only remained for him to say "ditto" to their speeches. Their contention was unanswerable. No one denied that the Government ought to have the power to suppress meetings that were likely to be dangerous to the peace of the country and the stability of the State. Everyone admitted that all Governments ought to have such a power, and to suppose that any Government had not such a power would be to suppose that it could not justify its existence. The most loosely-organized Republic in South America possessed the right of putting down riotous and tumultuous assemblies that threatened its existence. And our Government had exercised a like power in Ireland repeatedly. More than 100 public meetings had been suppressed within the last 12 months by the Lord Lieutenant, and the strongest argument against the clause was the fact that the suppression of not one of these meetings had led to the slightest disorder. No one had been arrested, the peace had not been broken, and the people had quietly and promptly obeyed even the arbitrary and, in some instances, uncalculated-for exercise of authority by the Viceroy. The clause, therefore, was useless. But while the Government did not want the power they were now getting, the fact of their getting it would be a source of exasperation and annoyance. The Home Secretary had said that these meetings generated steam. That was quite true; but the material for making the steam existed, or it could not be generated, and the meetings afforded an opportunity for its evaporation. But the Government, instead of adopting the natural and reasonable process of getting quit of the steam, were going to bottle it up and await the results, however serious they might be. English Members complained of the length of the discussion; but he would like to know how they would have argued against, and how strenuously they would have resisted, any attempt to deprive them of the right of public meeting. There was no Party in the State that utilized public meetings more than the Liberal Party did. They were the breath of their political nostrils. And yet the idolizers of public meetings in this country were now about to suppress them in Ireland. It was to the lasting discredit of the present Administration that they were bringing in a Bill that struck at the foundations of all the principles their Party professed. They had suspended the Habeas Corpus Act, and they were now abolishing trial by jury. They were suppressing the right of public meeting, and they meant to take away the liberty of the Press. And they would have men who valued principles more than Party to sit still and allow these things to be done quietly, and without protest. If they conceived that they would be permitted to enforce their high-handed authority in Ireland without resistance, they were mistaken. He knew, of course, the clause would be carried. Only an insignificant minority would vote against it. But the necessity for its opponents making their protest was none the less urgent because they were few.

[Thirteenth Night.]

MR. SEXTON said, the Home Secretary had told them a hundred times of the position in which the Government were placed. But in what position were the Government placed during the delivery of the speech in which the right hon. and learned Gentleman made attacks on the sacred principle of popular liberty? The speech of the right hon.

Mr. Joseph Cowen

and learned Gentleman had been met by cheers; but these came only from the Tory quarter of the House. It appeared to him a most curious circumstance that a man who described himself as a Whig of the old times should be placed by the Government in charge of a Bill for the suppression of the liberties of the Irish people. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had quoted the case of Earl Grey, and when he desired to remind the Committee of the achievements of the Whig Party, he spoke of the infamous Coercion Bill of 1833, a Bill which was not only a failure, but a blunder, and which was the cause of the expulsion of Earl Grey from power. He could not congratulate the right hon. and learned Gentleman on the happiness of his metaphors. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that those who were opposed to this clause were in the position of a person who thought it was no longer necessary to take precautions against fire because he was in the possession of a fire-engine; but he would point out that the right hon. and learned Gentleman's method of dealing with Irish affairs was that, so to speak, of bringing up the fire-engine amidst hurry and noise to a house that was not on fire at all. Nor could he congratulate the right hon. and learned Gentleman on his reply to what he designated the commonplaces of his hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), who was opposed to the clause before the Committee. He did not think that the treatment accorded to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton would have been approved of by the Prime Minister; and he would only observe upon this point that the conduct of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was likely to lead to the very opposite results to those which he desired. There was no law which struck so large, so wide, so fatal, and so dangerous a blow at the great principle of public freedom as this law would. He had said that the right of public meeting was a sacred link between the convictions of the private individual and the opinions and acts of the Legislature. If the right of public meeting in England was so sacred that no Ministry dare propose to abolish it, was it not ten times more valuable and more essential in the case of Ireland? No country so much needed the right of public meeting as a country without a Parliament of its own. The people of England had a Parliament of their own, and even if the right of public meeting were taken away, the English people would still have in that House some protection against acts of despotism; but what protection had the Irish people? They had no Parliament of their own, and the voices of their Representatives in that House were disregarded, and their votes had no influence whatever upon the course of legislation. It was now proposed to take away the last safeguard they possessed—the right of public meeting. What case had been made out by the Government for this clause? The Home Secretary once more returned to the futile statement that this clause was necessary to prevent “Boycotting” meetings. Let him (Mr. Sexton) emphasize the undeniable fact that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, during the past year, had prohibited about 100 meetings in various parts of Ireland, meetings called for various purposes, some of them for the mere discussion of the agrarian questions. In not one single case had a meeting been held when it had been prohibited; but the leaders of the people had invariably advised the crowds to disperse; there had never been any occasion to resort to brute force, and in no case had public inconvenience ensued. Why, in the face of such a state of facts, had this most wanton and oppressive clause been inserted in the Bill? What was the theory of the Government in Ireland in respect to “Boycotting”? They had heard from the late Chief Secretary (Mr. W. E. Forster) that “Boycotting” never received an effective sanction except by means of outrage. If that were so, why were not the present powers of the Lord Lieutenant sufficient? He had prohibited meetings upon two grounds; he had either apprehended a breach of the peace, or he had apprehended danger to some person living in the neighbourhood. If the Government were of opinion that “Boycotting” necessarily led to outrage, a theory which he rejected, if they considered that “Boycotting” meetings were dangerous to the public peace, why not prohibit them under their present powers? He believed they could prohibit a “Boycotting” meeting under the powers which now existed. There never was a time in the history of Ireland when the right of public meeting was so essential to the people. They had many great questions to consider; but he did not imagine that, under this Bill, it would be possible to hold any public meeting for the discussion of any political question. Could a meeting be held to consider the question of county government? Certainly not; it would excite ill-feeling amongst the Grand Juries of the country, and it would be considered as dangerous to the public safety. Could the Irish people hold a meeting in favour of the further development of the franchise? Certainly not, for such a meeting would create ill-feeling and hatred in the minds of those people who thought that the representation of Ireland in that House should be upon a much larger principle than it was at present. If the people held meetings to consider the proceedings of the Land Commissioners, they would be held liable to punishment under this clause, because the meeting would be considered dangerous to the public peace. Could the people hold meetings to discuss a question which, before very long, would have to be settled in that Parliament—the question of the inalienable right of the Irish people to their legislative independence? No political meetings would be possible under the extreme and extravagant powers which it was now proposed to give to the Lord Lieutenant. His Excellency might prohibit any meeting merely upon bare suspicion; in fact, all the liberties of the Irish people were to be placed in the hands of a single man. Of all the deplorable mistakes and blunders which had been made in that House in regard to Ireland, the deplorable blunder contained in this Bill was the greatest. In the Preamble of the Bill it was stated that—

“By reason of the action of secret societies and combinations for illegal purposes in Ireland the operation of the ordinary law has become insufficient for the repression and prevention of crime.”

He maintained that the ordinary law was quite sufficient, if wisely and properly used, for the suppression and prevention of crime. This Bill would not touch crime; at least, this clause would certainly not touch crime; it would let criminals go, and its only effect would be to gag honest men and suppress public opinion.

Mr. Sexton

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 208;
Noes 65: Majority 143.

AYES.

Acland, C. T. D.	Egerton, Adm. hon. F.
Acland, Sir T. D.	Evans, T. W.
Alexander, Colonel	Ewing, A. O.
Allen, H. G.	Fairbairn, Sir A.
Allsopp, C.	Farquharson, Dr. B.
Armitage, B.	Feilden, Maj.-Gen. R. J.
Armitstead, G.	Ferguson, R.
Asher, A.	Filmer, Sir E.
Ashley, hon. E. M.	Finch, G. H.
Bailey, Sir J. B.	Fletcher, Sir H.
Balfour, J. B.	Foljambe, C. G. S.
Balfour, J. S.	Folkestone, Viscount
Barttelot, Sir W. B.	Forster, Sir C.
Bass, Sir A.	Forster, rt. hon. W. E.
Baxter, rt. hon. W. E.	Fort, R.
Beach, W. W. B.	Fowler, R. N.
Beaumont, W. B.	Gibson, rt. hon. E.
Blackburne, Col. J. I.	Gladstone, rt. hon. W. E.
Borlase, W. C.	Gooch, Sir D.
Brassev, Sir T.	Gordon, Sir A.
Brett, R. B.	Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.
Bright, rt. hon. J.	Gower, hon. E. F. L.
Brinton, J.	Grafton, F. W.
Brooks, W. C.	Grant, Sir G. M.
Brown, A. H.	Grantham, W.
Bruce, rt. hon. Lord C.	Greene, E.
Bruce, Sir H. H.	Hamilton, Lord C. J.
Bruce, hon. R. P.	Hamilton, right hon.
Bruce, hon. T.	Lord G.
Burrell, Sir W. W.	Hamilton, J. G. C.
Buxton, F. W.	Harcourt, rt. hon. Sir
Campbell, J. A.	W. G. V. V.
Campbell, Sir G.	Hardcastle, J. A.
Campbell, R. F. F.	Harvey, Sir lt. B.
Campbell-Bannerman,	Hastings, G. W.
H.	Hayter, Sir A. D.
Carden, Sir R. W.	Heneage, E.
Carington, hon. Col.	Hibbert, J. T.
W. H. P.	Hicks, E.
Chaine, J.	Hildyard, T. B. T.
Chamberlain, rt. hn. J.	Hill, T. R.
Childers, rt. hn. H. C. E.	Holland, Sir H. T.
Clifford, C. C.	Holms, J.
Colebrooke, Sir T. E.	Holms, W.
Corry, J. P.	Home, Lt.-Col. D. M.
Cotes, C. O.	Hope, rt. hn. A. J. B. B.
Cotton, W. J. R.	Howard, E. S.
Courtney, L. H.	Howard, G. J.
Cowan, J.	James, Sir H.
Cowper, hon. H. F.	Jardine, R.
Creyke, R.	Jerningham, H. E. H.
Crichton, Viscount	Johnson, rt. hon. W. M.
Cropper, J.	Kennaway, Sir J. H.
Cross, rt. hon. Sir R. A.	Kingscote, Col. R. N. F.
Cunliffe, Sir R. A.	Lacon, Sir E. H. K.
Currie, Sir D.	Lawrance, J. C.
Davenport, H. T.	Lawrence, Sir J. C.
Davey, H.	Leatham, E. A.
Davies, R.	Leatham, W. H.
Dickson, Major A. G.	Lechmere, Sir E. A. H.
Digby, Col. hon. E.	Legh, W. J.
Dilke, Sir C. W.	Loder, R.
Dodds, J.	Long, W. H.
Dodson, rt. hon. J. G.	Lowther, rt. hon. J.
Douglas, A. Akers-	Lusk, Sir A.
Dundas, hon. J. C.	Lymington, Viscount

M'Arthur, A.
 M'Garel-Hogg, Sir J.
 Mackie, R. B.
 Mackintosh, C. F.
 Macnaghten, E.
 Mappin, F. T.
 Maskelyne, M. H. Story-
 Matheson, Sir A.
 Milbank, Sir F. A.
 Miles, Sir P. J. W.
 Mills, Sir C. H.
 Monk, C. J.
 Morgan, rt. hn. G. O.
 Morley, S.
 Mundella, rt. hon. A. J.
 Muntz, P. H.
 Murray, C. J.
 Noel, E.
 Noel, rt. hon. G. J.
 Northcote, H. S.
 Northcote, rt. hn. Sir
 S. H.
 O'Donoghue, The
 Paget, T. T.
 Parker, C. S.
 Pease, A.
 Peel, A. W.
 Percy, Lord A.
 Philips, R. N.
 Plunket, rt. hon. D. R.
 Porter, A. M.
 Powell, W. R. H.
 Pulley, J.
 Raikes, rt. hon. H. C.
 Ramsay, J.
 Ramsden, Sir J.
 Rankin, J.
 Rathbone, W.
 Reid, R. T.
 Repton, G. W.
 Richardson, T.
 Rogers, J. E. T.
 Round, J.

NOES.

Anderson, G.
 Arnold, A.
 Barran, J.
 Biggar, J. G.
 Blake, J. A.
 Bright, J. (Manchester)
 Bryce, J.
 Burt, T.
 Byrne, G. M.
 Caine, W. S.
 Callan, P.
 Colthurst, Col. D. La T.
 Commins, A.
 Corbet, W. J.
 Cowen, J.
 Dickson, T. A.
 Dillon, J.
 Dillwyn, L. L.
 Errington, G.
 Findlater, W.
 Fowler, H. H.
 Fry, T.
 Gill, H. J.
 Givan, J.
 Grant, A.
 Henry, M.
 Lalor, R.

St. Aubyn, Sir J.
 St. Aubyn, W. M.
 Schreiber, C.
 Scott, M. D.
 Selwin - Ibbetson, Sir
 H. J.
 Shield, H.
 Simon, Serjeant J.
 Smith, A.
 Smith, E.
 Smith, rt. hon. W. H.
 Stanhope, hon. E.
 Stanley, rt. hn. Col. F.
 Stewart, J.
 Talbot, C. R. M.
 Tavistock, Marquess of
 Taylor, rt. hn. Col. T. E.
 Tennant, C.
 Thomson, H.
 Thornhill, T.
 Trevelyan, rt. hn. G. O.
 Villiers, rt. hon. C. P.
 Vivian, A. P.
 Vivian, Sir H. H.
 Wallace, Sir R.
 Warton, C. N.
 Watkin, Sir E. W.
 Waugh, E.
 Whitbread, S.
 Whitley, E.
 Wiggan, H.
 Wilmot, Sir H.
 Wilmot, Sir J. E.
 Wilson, C. H.
 Wilson, I.
 Wilson, Sir M.
 Wodehouse, E. R.
 Woodall, W.
 Wortley, C. B. Stuart-

TELLERS.

Grosvenor, Lord R.
 Kensington, Lord

Rylands, P.
 Samuelson, H.
 Sexton, T.
 Shaw, W.
 Sheil, E.
 Smithwick, J. F.
 Sullivan, T. D.
 Synan, E. J.

Thomasson, J. P.
 Webster, J.
 Wedderburn, Sir D.
 Williams, S. C. E.

TELLERS.

Labouchere, H.
 Russell, O.

And it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, Committee report Progress; to sit again this day.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

Clause 8 (Arrest of persons found at night under suspicious circumstances).

COLONEL NOLAN moved, in page 4, line 19, after "person," to insert "other than a magistrate or duly qualified medical practitioner or a clergyman." He said that this Amendment was a very simple one. His chief object was to exempt a medical practitioner and clergyman from the odious provisions of this clause. Medical gentlemen and clergymen—especially clergymen of the Catholic Church—had very often to visit sick people at night. Other clergymen, of course, than those belonging to the Catholic Church also visited sick people at night; but more importance was attached to the fact of the clergymen of the Catholic Church being with a sick man at his last moments than was possible the case with many other Churches. The Amendment, however, would apply to clergymen of every denomination. The Committee would be told that this clause would be administered by police officers, who, as a rule, had very great respect for the doctor and the clergyman. It must, however, be remembered that police constables were generally anxious to assert their authority; and he had no doubt that, in their wish to show their zeal, they would not scruple to arrest a doctor or a priest, no matter what business might have called him out at night. There were very fair grounds for exempting these persons from the operation of this clause; and, therefore, he moved the Amendment that stood in his name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 19, after the word "person," to insert the words "other than a magistrate or duly qualified medical practitioner or a clergyman."—(Colonel Nolan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that it was not intended that this Act should apply to any such persons as the hon. and gallant Gentleman had mentioned, nor would such persons come under the words of the clause. A doctor was not out at night under suspicious circumstances at all, neither was a clergyman. He might add that the words "duly qualified practitioner" were words that might cause some difficulty. An homœopathist might be out at night, and he might claim to be a duly qualified practitioner and claim exemption. He hoped the hon. and gallant Member would not press the Amendment, which pointed to a class of people who, more than any other, were exempt from suspicion.

MR. HEALY said, that the people of Ireland knew what suspicious circumstances were considered to be, and they had good reason to know the character of the men who were to suspect the people. The policemen of Ireland had not been particular who they had arrested under the Coercion Bill now in force. Three solicitors and the mayor of one city had been arrested. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary seemed to think that the persons mentioned in the Amendment were the class least likely to be suspected; but no one could possibly know who the Irish Constabulary would regard as suspicious people. The whole purpose of the Irish Constabulary seemed to be to harass and annoy the people of the country as much as they possibly could. Hon. Members who lived in England, and who had got their ideas of the Irish policeman from The Illustrated London News, could have no conception of the courses to which the Irish police resorted to harass and annoy every person who came in their way. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright) knew something about the Irish police, for, eight or nine years ago, he denounced them as a body. The right hon. Gentleman then said that at all times the Irish police were found with their arms, and guns, and sabres, as if Ireland was a foreign country taken by assault. He could not see what earthly reason the Home Secretary could have for refusing to insert these words. What contention need there be between the Government and Gentlemen on that side of the House on this point. If the Amendment was not accepted by the Government, it would only exemplify the unyielding character of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, he thought it would be an insult to the clergymen and medical practitioners to put in this special exemption on their behalf. He entirely disagreed with the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) in his ideas as to the police of Ireland, for he knew that if there was any class of society for whom the police had more respect than another, they were the clergymen, the doctors, and the magistrates; and it was really absurd that these classes should be specially exempted from this clause. He hoped that the Committee would not accept the Amendment, but leave the administration of the clause to the good sense of the police.

MR. DILLON said, it was a strange thing, if the contention of the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Dickson) was correct, that there were priests and doctors arrested under the Coercion Act of last Session. He believed that one doctor was imprisoned at the present moment.

MR. BIGGAR said, it was evident the Government wished to have power to harass every class of the people. Nothing could be more easy than for a policeman to say that a particular doctor was a suspicious character. If a policeman took it into his head to haul a doctor before a magistrate, he would be entitled to do so, and not the smallest censure would be cast upon him for so doing, as the clause gave him special authority for that purpose. It was perfectly proper that this Amendment should be agreed to. Their experience under the Coercion Act of last Session was that the Government and the late Chief Secretary had as much respect for doctors and clergymen as they had for any other class of society in Ireland. They knew, too, that the Attorney General for Ireland defended instead of prosecuting a policeman against whom a coroner's jury had returned a verdict of "Wilful murder." In fact, the Government and their thick-and-thin supporters, of whom the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Dickson) was one, never seemed to consider that a policeman could do wrong.

MR. T. A. DICKSON remarked, that the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had called him a thick-and-thin supporter of the Government. He believed that in the last division he voted with the hon. Member opposite against the 7th clause of the Bill. In this matter, however, he could not see why, if clergymen and doctors were to be exempted, the same consideration should not be extended to merchants and Members of Parliament.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY said, he thought it would be unreasonable to arrest men on the spot who were perfectly well known to the police in the district. He could not see why men well known to the police, and living in the neighbourhood, could not be brought up for examination the day afterwards, instead of being subjected to the ignominy of summary arrest.

MR. SEXTON said, that the suggestion of the hon. Member (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) would simply destroy the whole of the clause. This clause was evidently intended to relate to the people of the district, for the next clause dealt with strangers. He should certainly claim the vote of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) against the clause.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he attached some importance to the Amendment. Clergymen and medical practitioners were bound to be out at night, and it would be a most unpleasant and undignified thing if, on account of his Amendment being rejected, any of them were subjected to the indignity of arrest at the hands of a common policeman. The Amendment to be proposed by the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) would be, he admitted, far preferable to his own; and if the Government would accept the Amendment of his hon. Friend he should be glad to withdraw his. In the event of his hon. Friend's Amendment not being acceptable to the Government, he thought his own might reasonably be adopted. He had had experience of the exercise of similar arbitrary powers in Warsaw, and he was sure the Government had no intention of resorting to such despotism as prevailed in Poland.

MR. TREVELYAN said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman spoke of his experiences in Warsaw; but this was a clause which was proposed on account of his experiences very much nearer home than Poland. They had now come to the end of the clauses on which there must be a very great amount of doubt as to whether they were directed against crime; and they had now come to the beginning of those clauses on which the Irish Government relied in order to repress those terrible murders which were directed against all classes in the country, and especially against the hard-working and respectable classes. These clauses were clauses, the effect of which had already been tried, and had proved to be efficient. They had not only proved to be efficient against crime, but they had also been proved to be without terror to respectable persons. A similar clause to the one upon which they were now entering was in force between 1870 and 1875. In the year 1870, 142 persons were arrested under the clause, and 18 were punished. In the year 1871, 90 were arrested; in the next year, 81; then the number fell down to 44 and 36, and in the year 1875, by which time the clause had ceased to be needed, because it had done its work, and during all that time no clergyman or doctor, as far as had been brought to his knowledge, complained of his having been arrested. There was only one test for exemption from the operation of this clause, and that was the test that people should be respectable, hard-working citizens, who were out at night on their lawful business. The Government trusted the constables and magistrates to attend to the peace and order of the country. They did rely on the constables and magistrates, and it was on account of that reliance—a reliance which was well-founded—that they introduced this clause in the Bill. They believed that the constables and magistrates now, as in the time from 1870 to 1875, would be the very last people who would interfere with a man who was out of his house at night on his legitimate business.

MR. MARUM said, he had some experience of the Act of 1870, and, as the constables were in a very peculiar position, and had an absolute discretion as to the arrest of persons under this clause, he thought that some direction or instruction should be given to them to guide them in the arrests they made.

He had an Amendment on the Paper to that effect, and he saw there several Amendments in the same direction. He hoped the Home Secretary and the Chief Secretary would examine those Amendments, and see whether it would not be expedient to adopt some instructions or other to the constables. The power of absolute arrest was too great a one to confide to a man like an ordinary Irish constable.

MR. DILLON said, he did not think the Committee had taken a sufficiently serious view of this Amendment. The Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had just cited an instance which did not apply to this case at all. The Act passed in 1870 was only directed against a certain class; and in no case was a man of professional standing implicated or in any way connected with the movement on foot at that time. That was not the case at the present moment, for, as he had already stated, three priests had been arrested under the Coercion Act of last year. Men who had held positions of trust under the Local Government Board in Ireland had been cast into Kilmainham under the Coercion Act, and five or six solicitors, practising in the Irish Courts, had also been imprisoned under the Act of last year. It was manifestly absurd to quote, as an instance, an Act under which no man of standing was arrested. The Chief Secretary made use of an argument upon which he (Mr. Dillon) was perfectly prepared to meet him. The right hon. Gentleman had said that if they could not trust the magistrates and police in this matter, they could not trust the police or magistrates at all. He would like to ask the Chief Secretary whether, in view of the working of this clause, he would place on the Table of the House a list of the men who had been denounced by the Irish Constabulary? He had received some private information as to the number of men of standing who were denounced by the constables and magistrates to Dublin Castle under the Coercion Act, and whom even the late Chief Secretary had refused to arrest. It must be said to the credit of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) that he had refused to arrest 500 or 600 people who were denounced by the police and magistrates of Ireland.

Mr. Marum

THE CHAIRMAN: We are not now engaged on the clause as a whole. The question is, whether magistrates, and medical men, and clergymen shall be exempted from the operation of the clause.

MR. DILLON said, he was replying to an argument which had been used by the Chief Secretary himself. He had said he was prepared to trust to the discretion of the constables. He (Mr. Dillon) was endeavouring to show that that discretion was tried last year, with the result that a long list of men, in every class of life—professional men and others—had been returned to the Castle for arrest, on grounds which even the late Chief Secretary deemed to be insufficient. There were long lists of names of men denounced now on record in Dublin Castle, and which could be produced if the Chief Secretary chose to do so. He knew that the names of many men were to be found in such lists, and to whom arrest would be utter ruin. His point was this—that if this clause had been law, these men, instead of having their names sent up to Dublin Castle, would have been absolutely arrested. They would have been arrested, brought before the Court of Summary Jurisdiction, and kept in prison for some days, with all the disgrace which attached to ordinary imprisonment in the case of professional men. No one could imagine the nature of the injury that even temporary imprisonment would inflict upon a medical practitioner. He might have upon his books people in a most critical condition; people whose lives might be depending upon his attendance, and yet such a man could be struck down through the indiscretion or petty judgment of a simple policeman, who might be prompted, through malice, to arrest him. His argument in favour of the clause was really a fair and reasonable one. Two of the classes which were desired to be exempted were well-defined classes—doctors and clergymen were notoriously well known to the constables of their district. They were, as a rule, resident in the district; and even supposing they were out at night under suspicious circumstances, surely it would be sufficient for them to be summoned in the ordinary way. These men were notoriously persons of influence; and in a country district of Ireland there would be no difficulty in any constable recognizing whether he had got hold of a doctor or a priest. If this Amendment were accepted, a constable would know that he was not to arrest a medical practitioner or a priest under this clause; but if he had reason to suppose they were out at night under suspicious circumstances, he must serve a summons upon them to appear before the Court of Summary Jurisdiction, and not subject them to the injury and loss which might result from summary arrest.

MR. HEALY said, it would, perhaps, be as well if his hon. and gallant Friend would withdraw his Amendment. Formerly, Acts of Parliament had been always directed against the poor; but this Act would operate against the poor and rich alike. He had not put down an Amendment exempting any respectable class of people from the operation of the clause, because he considered that the more they caused the respectable classes of Ireland to regard with contempt the present system of government the better it would be for all parties and purposes. He would, therefore, suggest that they should not amend this clause in any particular, but content themselves by simply entering their protest against it. It happened in Ireland that outside of the castles and mansions of the aristocracy and the barracks of the police and soldiers, the British Government had not got a single friend in the country. He thought it would be well to make these clauses as oppressive upon all classes of the country alike, so that the whole country might unite against the detestable alien rule to which they were subjected.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he thought the suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) was a very good one from his point of view; but he must differ from his hon. Friend, because his object was to make the Act as little irksome as possible. Anyone who would read the Amendments which he (Colonel Nolan) had placed upon the Paper would see that they were all directed towards the improvement of the Act. He was decidedly of opinion that the classes of persons mentioned in his Amendment should be exempted; and, therefore, he thought it would be his duty to press his Amendment to a division. Of course, he was quite willing to withdraw it if the Government would hold out any hope that they would adopt the suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon).

MR. SEXTON said, he wished to say that what his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) had said with regard to the denunciation of the people under the Coercion Act of last year was quite correct. He knew that the Head Constable from the West of Ireland went up to the Castle and produced a list of 70 names, desiring that warrants should be issued in every case. Quite a sensation was caused at the Castle, and Lord Cowper himself thought that the list might be very reasonably reduced. The Head Constable replied that he could not reduce the list, whereupon he was dismissed, Lord Cowper saying it was quite impossible for him to arrest any of the persons. The Chief Secretary had said that the clause they had now before them was intended for the suppression of murder, and he proposed to justify this clause by the fact that a similar clause was contained in the Act of 1870. The right hon. Gentleman told the Committee that under this clause in the Act of 1870 142 persons were arrested in that year, and that 18 persons were punished. What did those figures amount to? Why, that 124 persons were arrested, upon whom no punishment was inflicted; in other words, that seven out of every eight arrests were quite unjustifiable. In 124 cases out of 142 the police were unable to substantiate their suspicion, or in seven out of every eight cases the police had absolutely misused their power of arrest. In the year 1871 there were 90 persons arrested; in 1872, 81; in 1873, 44; in 1874, 36; but it was very interesting and instructive to notice that the Government for these latter years did not make any comparison between the number of persons arrested and the number punished. The power of deciding what were suspicious circumstances would rest, not with the Lord Lieutenant or a superior officer, but with 12,000 men of the Irish Constabulary, who were of an uneducated and of a rather humble class. To confide any such power as was given by this clause to such men was a matter of great gravity. If either of two things could be proved he should offer no objection to the clause. If it could be proved that the police, under former clauses of this kind, had ever been able to intercept men—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is now discussing the clause.

MR. SEXTON said he begged the Chairman's pardon; the question was one of suspicious circumstances.

THE CHAIRMAN: There are several Amendments upon the words "suspicious circumstances." The question now is, whether magistrates, or medical men, or clergymen shall not be arrested.

MR. SEXTON said, he was only making a few observations with the object of showing that the police were not a body of men to whom the power of deciding what were suspicious circumstances should be entrusted; and he was saying that if it could be proved that the police had ever intercepted a body of men on their way to commit a crime, or had ever been able to arrest a body of men who had committed a crime and were on their way home, much of his opposition to this clause would disappear.

MR. SYNAN said, there were many other classes of people besides medical practitioners and clergymen who were called out on lawful business at night. For instance, lawyers might be called out on business at night; and, indeed, many other professional men and respectable citizens. He was averse to drawing these distinctions between classes, and he would either make the exemption more comprehensive or leave it out altogether.

COLONEL NOLAN said, that he should be very glad indeed to extend the exemption; and if he could he would include the class suggested by the hon. Member.

MR. R. POWER said, that, on the contrary, he was rather inclined to restrict the proposed Amendment by leaving out one of the classes—namely, the magistrates. The hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) had spoken about lawyers being out at night; but it was well known that such men were not called out at night like doctors and clergymen. He should certainly vote with his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan).

MR. O'DONNELL said, he hoped the hon. and gallant Gentleman would not persist in this Amendment. As regarded the magistrates, it went without saying that they were quite safe from arrest by constables, who looked to the magistrates for speedy promotion; and with regard to clergymen and members of the learned Professions, he did not see why they should be subjected to the same risk of arrest as other people. He should be extremely pleased if the operation of this clause could only add to the odium and detestation in which this Bill should be held. If the hon. and gallant Gentleman would withdraw his Amendment they might introduce an exception to save women, at least, from the impertinent prying of the Constabulary Force of Her Majesty's Government. It would be enough to have men subject to this arrest—to let the constables take the chances of encounter with individuals capable of protecting themselves—and to have women exempted from this more than Neapolitan clause. He (Mr. O'Donnell), knowing the good intentions of the hon. and gallant Member, should be sorry to vote against any Amendment he proposed; therefore he sincerely trusted that this proposal would not be pressed.

MR. HEALY said, that if the hon. and gallant Member went to a division he (Mr. Healy) would be obliged to vote for the Government. He should do so in the hope that the Bill might spread the dismay of the Irish people, and the disgust they felt with Her Majesty's Ministers and the entire British connection.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 24; Noes 82: Majority 58.—(Div. List, No. 147.)

DR. COMMINS said, the next Amendment which was in his name was a small one, but one which would tend very considerably to mitigate the acerbity of this clause. It would limit the power of arrest to persons who belonged to the district in which they were arrested. Under the 9th clause, complete power was given to arrest strangers; therefore, it was not necessary for the 8th clause to be so wide. He took it that the intention was to confine it to persons living in the neighbourhoods in which the arrests were made. In addition to the fact that the case of strangers was provided for in the 9th clause, there were other reasons why the police should not arrest persons who did not live in the neighbourhoods in which the arrests were made. It was well known that in Ireland people often had to drive 15 or 20 miles to fairs and markets, and that not infrequently they were obliged to start from home at 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning, or did not return until after midnight. It would be hard for such people, because they might have to travel through a proclaimed district, to be arrested, taken from their business, brought before a magistrate and detained, probably, a week—as they might be under this clause—before they had an opportunity of establishing the fact that they were peaceable and orderly citizens, and had only been going about their ordinary avocations when taken by the police. If the clause passed in an unamended form, it would render any such thing as railway travelling in Ireland impossible. A number of districts would be proclaimed, railways would run through those districts, and a person travelling in a train running over those railways would be liable to be questioned by a policeman at a roadside station, arrested, taken before a magistrate, detained for a week, and, perhaps, put to the trouble and inconvenience of sending to the other end of the Island, or to England, for evidence as to his identity and respectability, for the sake of satisfying the scruples of the intelligent policeman, or the equally intelligent magistrate or official who sent that officer out. In Ireland, as in England, commercial travelling was an extensive business, and if this clause were passed, this profession might be seriously interfered with—trade intercourse would be interrupted. Moreover, in view of the powers contained in the section, a person would not dare to visit, say, a dying relative, because the moment he crossed the border of a proclaimed district he would be liable to arrest at the hands of the first policeman he happened to meet. The Chief Secretary had told them that he trusted absolutely the discretion of the policeman; and, in order to show how baseless was that trust, it would not be necessary to go into the general character of the police. Granted that they were generally very decent fellows, it could not be denied that many of them thoroughly deserved the worst character that had been given to them in the House, and how could it be otherwise? He believed that in this year's Estimates there was £180,000 given to the policemen of Ireland, because—as the official document put it—they had been “active and intelligent” busybodies. This money was given to them over and above their pay, because they had made themselves a nuisance in their neighbourhoods, and had prepared and sent up to Dublin Castle a great many Reports as to the suspicious cases they had rooted out, and the number of arrests they had made. The payment of this extra money did not depend on the mere performance of duty. The police were expected to do a great deal more than their duty. This Protection of Person and Property Act which was expiring—and which, he trusted, would be allowed to expire—gave the Lord Lieutenant and his Chief Secretary power to issue a warrant for arrest on suspicion, provided it were “reasonable suspicion;” but there was no such section in this Bill. The phrase used was “suspicious circumstances.”—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Member cannot discuss the words “under suspicious circumstances,” because they are not yet before the Committee. They will come on afterwards.

DR. COMMINS said, he would leave the discussion of that matter until later on, and would merely say, in answer to the Chief Secretary, that it all depended upon the question of “suspicious circumstances,” and that he (the Chief Secretary) had absolute confidence in the discretion of the police. Let the Committee, however, restrict that discretion; let them say that no person should be arrested out of his own district, so as to confine the power of the police to the making arrests amongst a class of people as to whose suspicious character they were more likely to know something. The clause, unless amended, would put an end to all freedom of locomotion in Ireland, and introduce a block to all friendly intercourse between man and man, and enable the police to harass and annoy peaceable and well-disposed persons. His Amendment would remedy some of these defects in the section; and he, therefore, hoped the Committee would give it a favourable reception.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 19, after “person,” insert “whose usual or only residence is in such district.”—(Dr. Commins.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had, no doubt,

[Thirteenth Night.]

the Committee followed the hon. and learned Member in the objects he had in view in bringing forward his Amendment; but the proposal was one which, if accepted, would render the whole clause nugatory. This was a statutory power—no power was given to a constable to arrest except under this section, and to exercise it the police constable must show that he had fulfilled all the obligations of the section. If the Amendment were accepted, he could only arrest a man whom he was satisfied was a person "whose usual or only residence was in such district," so that if he met a man walking abroad under suspicious circumstances, with a crape mask on his face, he would have to examine him, and find whether he lived in the neighbourhood, and if he could not satisfy himself that he did reside there, he would have to let him go on his way. The constable would say to the man—"I don't know you; perhaps you don't belong to this district; I must take the risk and let you go."

DR. COMMINS: A stranger could be arrested under the 9th clause.

MR. HEALY said, he wished to know whether the simple fact of a man travelling through the country by railway, and arriving at his destination late in the evening, would render him liable to arrest?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that such a case would not fall within the words "suspicious circumstances."

MR. SEXTON said, he was unable to follow the Attorney General's interpretation of the clause. Under the 9th section "the arrest of strangers found under suspicious circumstances" was provided for. Under it strangers could be arrested at any time—there was no limit of any kind to the power of arrest. Clause 8 should, in equally precise terms, apply to persons who were not strangers.

MR. HEALY said, hon. Members were entitled to have some statement from the Home Secretary on this question.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the main distinction between the two clauses was that Clause 8 applied to the night time, whereas Clause 9 applied to any time, whether day or night. They must have regard to the terrible facts with which they had to deal—to the fact, for instance, that last year was one characterized by as great a number of murders as had ever been committed in any year since murders had been classified as "agrarian;" and his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary reminded him that, as far as they had gone this year, the murders were still more numerous than last year. That was the state of things they had to deal with. They had to deal with persons who were out at night under suspicious circumstances, who were the class they believed these murders were committed by. With regard to persons out at night, there was no distinction as to whether they were persons resident in a certain district, or whether they were strangers. It must be observed that as his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had said, if a man was found wearing a crape mask, or under suspicious circumstances, it would be absurd to ask him whether or not he was a resident in the district. When they came to deal with the daytime, of course they would not interfere with residents, and the clause would only be applicable to strangers. He would remind hon. Members that this clause was only an extension of the law as it existed in England. In this country a constable had a right to arrest a man whom he had reasonable ground to suspect either had committed or was about to commit a crime. Of course it might be said, "The constable may make a mistake;" but so he might in England, and for the sake of the protection of life and property very large powers were vested in him. But in Ireland where those terrible midnight murders had increased, and were increasing month by month, it was necessary to give constables large powers in the dark—to give them authority to arrest persons found prowling about under suspicious circumstances, and to require discrimination in such cases was out of the question.

MR. SYNAN said, he could understand an exception broadly in favour of travellers; but he confessed he was at a loss to understand the distinction between persons residing in a district, large or small, and persons residing outside it. Supposing a farmer living in a certain district went to a fair outside that district—possibly only just over the boundary—he could be arrested on one side of that boundary and not on the other, according to his hon. and learned Friend's Amendment. In enacting this Amendment they were going back nearly 60 years, to the Insurrection Act, which was condemned by the Report of the Committee in 1825. Lord John Russell, a witness before that Committee, showed the monstrous character of the clauses in the Insurrection Act, which enabled policemen to arrest persons because they remained out after 8 or 9 o'clock at night. Persons might, as Lord John Russell said—

“Remain too late and drink too much in a neighbouring inn, and then going from the inn to their own homes they may be arrested.”

That showed the monstrous character of this Bill, that they were retrograding, going back 60 years to the line condemned by the Whigs of 1825 and 1839, and making these enactments against liberty in Ireland. This, however, did not justify his hon. and learned Friend's Amendment, which he considered would only render the clause twenty times worse.

Mr. DILLON said, the Home Secretary had not stated the point as it suggested itself to him (Mr. Dillon). The right hon. and learned Gentleman had correctly pointed out that the 9th clause enabled a constable to seize on suspicion strangers by day or by night. At night a policeman could seize a person under either the 8th or 9th clause, as the provisions overlapped. He (Mr. Dillon) would like to ask, therefore, when a stranger was arrested and “brought forthwith before a Justice of the Peace,” which clause would he be convicted under?

THE CHAIRMAN said, that that was not the Question at present under discussion.

DR. COMMINS said, he would call the attention of the Home Secretary to the desirability of obviating a great mischief in the clause. In line 22, only “a Justice of the Peace” was mentioned, so that a policeman might take the person he had arrested 20 or 25 miles, or even more than that, to a Justice of the Peace. The words, clearly, should be “the nearest Justice of the Peace.”

Mr. SEXTON said, hon. Members were waiting for a reply from the Home Secretary.

THE CHAIRMAN: I hope the right hon. and learned Gentleman will not answer with reference to the 9th clause, as that would altogether interfere with the order of discussion.

Mr. LEAMY said, he understood the question put to the Home Secretary to be this. Suppose a man were arrested in a district by a policeman, under suspicious circumstances, under what clause of the Act was he to be taken before a magistrate? There were two clauses, one after the other, each giving power to arrest a man. His hon. Friend said that, suppose a man travelled in a district he did not reside in, would he be treated as a stranger and brought up under the 9th clause, or would he be brought up under the 8th clause?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he wished to give a clear answer to the question, and he hoped hon. Gentlemen would not think he was not doing that. This clause was really a condensed form of the clause relating to persons out at night in the Act of 1870. The hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) said that all this had been condemned in the years 1825 and 1839; but if that were so, it was found absolutely necessary to adopt it in 1870, and he would point out that the murders at that time had been much less numerous in Ireland than they had, unfortunately, been of late. As he understood it, Clause 8 applied to everyone, strangers or non-strangers, and it was the only clause dealing with these matters that had any punishment in it. If he might refer, incidentally, to Clause 9, he would point out that that was only a binding-over clause. Clause 8 was meant to deal with “Captain Moonlight” and his troop—this was the Moonlight Clause, and it would be absurd to exclude from it strangers or persons who did not reside in the district. If “Captain Moonlight” resided in the district, if the Amendment were adopted, all he would have to do would be to cross a road or a hedge—to change his residence. When once outside the district he would be exempt from arrest under the clause. In fact, the Amendment, with all respect to the hon. and learned Member, was one of those intended to destroy the clause. He hoped he had now answered hon. Members plainly—whether a man was a neighbour in a district, or a stranger, the clause would apply to him the words “person out of his place of abode,” simply referring to his house, his garden, or field. As was said in the discussion on the Act of 1870, outrages in the day; and cautious persons, who chose hours when the roads were lonely, probably between 9 and 10 at night and 5 or 6 in the morning. He thought the Amendment afforded very good ground for reasonable compromise, and he hoped the Government would not throw this opportunity away.

MR. PARNELL said, one of the results of a clause like this, with which the Bill was so thickly studded, would be that the powers given would be very much abused. They were open to be abused. The Chief Secretary stated that no complaints had been made of the abuse of the powers in 1870 and the following year; but it must be remembered that Ireland had not then the same Representatives as it had now, and the right hon. Gentleman would certainly find, as the result of a clause of this kind, that his position would not be an enviable one, for, although cases of abuse might not have been brought before the House by the Members who represented Ireland in 1870, the case now would be entirely different. As an example of the way in which Ireland was represented in 1870, he would mention that under the Act of that year one man was arrested and kept in prison without trial and entirely forgotten for two years, and his case was only discovered after the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) had formed an Irish Party in 1875, and after 60 Irish Members had been returned as supporters of that Gentleman's policy. Therefore, if the right hon. Gentleman desired to argue from the experience under the Act of 1870, which lasted until 1875, he would be very much disappointed by the result. Why could not freedom to be out be extended under this clause? The Government might, at all events, give the limit of daylight, and so make the clause as little objectionable as possible; but it seemed to him the Government were pursuing the same policy with regard to this Amendment as they had pursued with regard to other clauses in the Bill—obstinately refusing every concession calculated to make the Bill less rough and less objectionable to the people. He did not think that was a prudent course for them to pursue. It should be the object of the Chief Secretary to reconcile the people of Ireland to this Bill as much as possible; but, instead of that, by putting a clause of this kind into the hands of the local police, he was giving the police an engine of petty tyranny and irritation which would undoubtedly make English rule still more hated than it now was.

Mr. Sexton

MR. GIBSON observed, that this clause was for the arrest of persons found out at night under suspicious circumstances. The hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) practically admitted the necessity for this clause; but he proposed to cut the night in two, and during half he would allow the clause to operate, while during the other half he would leave "Moonlighters" free to do what they liked. He could understand the hon. Member objecting to the whole clause, but he could not understand his present action. The description given to this clause was historically sound, for if anyone looked at the Act of 1870 he would find there every ingredient which this clause contained. What alterations there were were merely formal. It was said the clause might be abused; but, as the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had shown, the similar clause in the Act of 1870 had been administered judiciously. He himself should regret if wherever there was an arrest there was a conviction, and should prefer to find that the magistrate before whom the arrested person was first brought had looked into the question temperately and, whenever he could, had allowed the arrested person to go free. The history of that clause showed that there was only a very small number of cases in which the magistrates deemed it their duty not to accept explanations and set arrested persons free; and he ventured to say that if this clause was passed, what would happen was this—the people who desired to abuse their liberty, such as "Moonlighters," would know perfectly well that such a clause had been passed. There was not an item of this Bill which was not weighed and understood by the criminal classes in Ireland, and when they knew that such a clause as this was passed they would take great care to keep out of its operation.

MR. DILLON contended that there was no comparison between this clause and the clause in the Act of 1870, and that such a Bill as that of 1870 would now be grossly abused. One thing which the Home Secretary had said, and which the Chief Secretary had repeated, they found abroad before 5 o'clock in morning, and drag them before a magistrate. It was well known that over a great part of Ireland the houses of the peasantry were so poor — consisting mostly of but one apartment—that the people were loth to shut themselves up in them, and remained outside as long as they could, so that it was necessary that the scope of this clause should be made as limited as possible. At any rate, there was no ground for subjecting women to the horrors of this law. The Government had the Statute of Edward III. to make use of against women, and they might very well avoid the odium of including them under this clause, and of allowing them to be arrested and dragged before some magistrate on suspicion only existing, probably, in the mind of a tipsy constable. If the Government had any respect whatever for the Irish women, they would do well to avoid exposing those of the peasant class to annoyance at the hands of drunken constables. If they did not, riots and disturbances might be the consequence. Nothing could be gained by including women within the clause, and a great many dangers might be avoided by leaving them out.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 19, after "person," insert "being a male."—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought it was obvious that this Amendment could not be accepted, otherwise any persons wishing to commit an outrage would only have to array themselves in female attire to escape arrest. That was the method adopted in Wales amongst the "Rebeccaites," and adopted in the society called the "Molly Maguires," which the Americans put down so successfully some eight years ago. Murders had been committed in hundreds in Pennsylvania by members of the "Ancient Order of Hibernians," who called themselves "Molly Maguires." When they gave power to the English constable to arrest on suspicion they did not say to him he was not to arrest women. They allowed the English constable to arrest English women when there was a suspicion that they had been engaged in burglary, murder, or anything of that kind, and he did not see why they should make an exception to the general practice in the present instance.

MR. O'DONNELL: You have the same power of arresting women on suspicion of felony in Ireland.

MR. DILLON said, he could not allow a statement which had just been made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary to pass without contradiction; and if the right hon. and learned Gentleman chose to wander off to America and the Thug Associations of that country, and misrepresent the facts, he could not blame him (Mr. Dillon) if he followed him, and corrected what he had said. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had led the Committee to believe that the "Ancient Order of Hibernians" was an Association for assassination and murder. He (Mr. Dillon) knew many members of that Society; and he could assure the Committee that they were as peaceable, quiet, and respectable as the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself. So far from being a murder Association, the "Ancient Order of Hibernians" was a Catholic Association, under the patronage of the Catholic Bishops and clergy.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, the Home Secretary had brought all this on himself, having said that the clause was directed against "Captain Moonlight" and his "men." He (Mr. Labouchere) would point out that dress did not make a distinction of sex. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had told them that the police of Ireland would not be able to distinguish between a man dressed as a woman and a woman; and, if that were so, he must say it was extremely likely that under this Bill the Irish police would make some very extraordinary and some very improper arrests.

Question put, and negatived.

COLONEL NOLAN said, the next Amendment was in his name. He was sorry that on his last Amendment he had the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) against him; but now he hoped to have not only his moral support, but his support in the Lobby. The object of the present Amendment was to allow a man to be out at night on his own holding without fear of arrest. There were 20,000 or 30,000 people in his (Colonel Nolan's) constituency, and, no doubt, other constituencies were as large; and it was surely very unreasonable that all these should be liable to arrest if they went out on their own properties or holdings after a certain hour at night. As long as a man was on his own holding he should not only be free from arrest, but free from the threat of arrest. In some cases the police were pretty popular and on good terms with the people; but in other cases they quarrelled with the people, and interfered with them in a manner that was very objectionable, using such threats as this—"Be careful; you had better look out, or you will be arrested." His Amendment appeared to him to be a very reasonable one; and he believed that even the ingenuity of the Home Secretary would find it difficult to put a case where a man, whilst on his own holding, could be said to be out under suspicious circumstances. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, he knew, was good in putting cases; but he believed he would have a difficulty in putting one in the present instance.

[Thirteenth Night.]

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 20, after "abode," insert "his curtilage, demesne, holding, or property, or the abode, curtilage, demesne, holding, or property of his bonâ fide master or employer."
—(Colonel Nolan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman was quite right when he suggested that the circumstances must be peculiar when they could arrest a man on his own holding. Such a man had sufficient protection in the words "suspicious circumstances." He could not be arrested unless he was out under suspicious circumstances; and if he was out merely attending to his cattle, or the ordinary work of his farm or holding, there would be an absence of suspicious circumstances. But, at the same time, a man might be found lurking behind a wall on his own holding with the apparent object of committing a crime. The hon. and gallant Member, moreover, had so drawn the Amendment that a man could not be arrested if he were on the property of his master. Why, he might have gone there for the purpose of murdering his master.

Colonel Nolan

COLONEL NOLAN said, he used the word "employer" in his Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the words in the Amendment were "his bonâ fide master or employer." The property the man might be on, therefore, might be quite distinct from his own—it might be miles away from his own house.

MR. HEALY said, the worst murders were committed in broad daylight; for instance, the lamentable occurrence in the Phoenix Park occurred in daylight. And why was this? Why, it was because the murderers could make more sure of their victims—it was because, where firearms were used, a man could not take aim in the dark. The Home Secretary suggested that a man would lurk behind his own wall or that of his employer in the dark for the purpose of committing a murder. The Home Secretary, he believed, was great at grouse shooting—did he go out to shoot grouse late at night? Certainly not; because in the dark he would not be able to tell a grouse from a water wag-tail. The murderer, in the same way, would not be able to distinguish his enemy from his greatest friend in the dark. Under this clause, he (Mr. Healy) was very much inclined to think it would be only the decent and respectable people who would come to harm. The murderers, or would-be murderers, would not be affected, for they would not be caught. Like the poachers in England, when there was any danger of their being arrested, they would fire at their assailants. ["No, no!"] Hon. Gentlemen denied that English poachers shot the gamekeepers and police; but cases of that kind were of every day occurrence. He heard of them every week, and almost every day. Under this clause only the decent people going quietly along the road would be interfered with, because they would be the only people who would have an honest intention, and would not mean to do harm. A man who was lurking behind a hedge or a stone wall with the intention of committing a murder would as soon murder the patrol, if he was in danger of arrest, as his victim. The clause would not effect the object the Government had in view.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he wished to point out that the position the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) was now taking up was thoroughly inconsistent with the position he had taken up on a previous clause. The hon. Member had objected, a short time ago, to extending a privilege to a certain class of persons; but now he desired to extend that privilege to several classes. He seemed inclined to extend it to those who held land or those who owned it, and to the servants of those who held or owned it.

MR. HEALY denied that, so far as he could see, there was the smallest amount of inconsistency in the course he had taken.

MR. DILLON said, he rose for the purpose of asking the hon. and gallant Gentleman to withdraw the Amendment. He should vote against it, not that he did not approve of it to a certain extent, but because he disapproved of the whole Act and clause. He did not see how they could expect the Government to accept the latter part of the Amendment.

COLONEL NOLAN said, that, to meet the views of the hon. Member, he would withdraw the latter part of the Amendment—namely, the words—

“Or the abode, curtilage, demesne, holding, or property of his bonâ fide master or employer.”

He thought that the words would have been of great value to a very large class; but the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) seemed to object to classes being privileged. He would point out, however, that the Amendment he had prepared included such a large class that it applied abstractedly to the whole of the people of Ireland. He did not intend to divide the Committee on the Amendment unless he got some support.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. DILLON said, he had an Amendment to propose which he trusted the Government would accept; and, if they did not accept it, he hoped they would be prepared to propose some compromise. The clause said—he should be liable to arrest. Well, that was calculated to paralyze the whole of the business of the country—it showed the dreadful and sweeping character of the clause. Everyone who understood the method of carrying on business in Ireland knew that during the winter months the poorer classes must be out of their place of abode in the hours specified in the clause more than once a-week. The local fairs or markets were held in the large towns twice, and in the smaller towns once a-week, and the people having to attend these were very frequently unable to reach home until long after sunset. Under the clause, almost every man, woman, and child in Ireland would, at some time or other, be liable to arrest at the hands of the police. Very often some of the Irish farmers were not teetotallers. He did not mean to say that there was an extravagant amount of drinking going on amongst the people; but the circumstances under which they attended the fairs, and the hardships which they had to bear, were such that many of them were driven to take something. The result would be, when this clause came into operation, that when they went home a little later than usual, a constable—particularly if he had a grudge against them—to show what a zealous and active man he was, would see something suspicious about them, and take them into custody. The clause was a very serious matter, because it put a reason for arrest in the mind of the constable. He had himself very often seen farmers, peaceable and inoffensive men, coming home from fairs, singing, perhaps, a song composed by one of the bards of Ireland; or, in the fullness of their spirits, shouting for the Leaders of the Land League, or giving utterance to some one of the cries that were now so common that one could hardly walk along a road without meeting a person who would hail him with one of the passwords of the Land League. In this case, these men might be regarded as out under suspicious circumstances. If a man was found walking along a road in a state of exaltation, and shouting cries that proved him to belong to a political association, he might be arrested under this clause. The case he wanted to make out was that, in this way, thousands of people, and, indeed, the whole of the population, would twice a-week be subject to arrest through being obliged to be out upon their business. That would be a frightful state of things for the people, and the remaining portion of the clause would throw on the tenants the unparalleled necessity of proving a negative in their own behalf to escape punishment. It might be said that these arrests would not be made unless people were out under suspicious circumstances. Then, why fix an hour at which the populace, according to their ordinary habits, would be out? What was the use of fixing a number of hours during which people might be out under suspicious circumstances, and calling that night, when the whole population was abroad, either going from market at night or going to the fair before daybreak. The Amendment he proposed would, at least, secure the people who were attending market, and who could not be in their homes during the forbidden hours every Thursday. He proposed to make the forbidden hours between midnight and 6 a.m. in the winter, and between midnight and sunrise in the summer—that was, from the 1st of May to the 20th of September. If the Government could not agree to fixing the time from midnight to 6 a.m., would they adopt 10 o'clock? He knew that the people were found out on the roads as late as 12 o'clock at night; but he would be willing to accept a compromise.

“In a proclaimed district, if a person is out of his place of abode at any time after one hour later than sunset and before sunrise,” &c.

[Thirteenth Night.]

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 20, to leave out from the word "after," to the word "sunrise," and insert the words "between the hours of midnight and six o'clock a.m. in winter, and between the hours of midnight and sunrise in summer, that is, from the first day of May to the thirtieth day of September."—(Mr. Dillon.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was true that a great number of people of innocent character would be out between sunset and sunrise attending markets or fairs; but he was sure the disguised people spoken of were not the people disguised in liquor. On the whole, he should say that people in that condition of exaltation, such as the hon. Member had described, singing Land League songs, would be the last persons to be regarded as suspicious. That, he thought, would verify the old saying, "In vino veritas." But although the hon. Member said every man, woman, and child would be arrested, he would appeal to the experience of the Act of 1870, in which the same powers existed and the same hours were fixed. In the first year, under that Act, the number of arrests was 147, and in succeeding years the number diminished; therefore, it had not operated in seizing on the men, women, and children. Suppose the hon. Member's limitation of either 10 or 12 o'clock was adopted for the winter, what would be the result? The whole clause would be utterly ineffectual. This clause was directed against "Captain Moonlight" and his gang, and those men would start from home at 9 o'clock on a winter's evening and shoot people or maim cattle; and could it be said that if a policeman saw a man whom he suspected of being out on such an errand he was not to have the power to arrest that man before 10 or 12 o'clock? What was the real meaning of being out after dark? The same definition was inserted in the Night Poaching Act. The definition after dark was the same, and what was really meant was an offence which took place in the dark hours. In all Acts of Parliament which distinguished between day and night offences, the same terms had been introduced as in this clause. The Amendment would defeat the whole object of the Bill, and it would be impossible to accept it.

MR. SYNAN concurred in the principle of the Amendment, but not altogether in the hours proposed to be fixed, as he considered them entirely too late, whether in winter or summer. The Home Secretary had justified this clause on the ground of the moderation with which it would be enforced by the police in Ireland; but he begged to refer the right hon. and learned Gentleman to the Reports of the Committee of 1825. Sergeant Lloyd, who was the administrator of that Act, was examined, and he said that great injustice was perpetrated on account of the hours being too early. He said hundreds of innocent people were being arrested by the police under the Curfew Clause. In the Act of 1870 the Curfew hours were the same as in the previous Act. To say that one hour after sunset was dark in summer was going very much too far in one case; but his hon. Friend went, he thought, too far in the other direction, and he thought it would be reasonable to fix 10 o'clock in summer and 8 o'clock in winter. To fix the time at one hour after sunset, and one hour before sunrise, was, according to the evidence before the Committee of 1825, a limit which caused great injustice to the people; and the police of the present day could not be regarded as likely to act more leniently than those who arrested people from 1817 to 1824. If the Home Secretary and his legal Colleagues would look at the Report of that Committee they would be easily persuaded to change the hours and to moderate them in such a way that injustice would not be done to people who were out at reasonable times. People might be out on their lawful business and without any suspicious circumstances, but who was to judge the circumstances? But the same thing occurred under the Insurrection Act, and, according to Sergeant Lloyd and Lord John Russell, great injustice was done. He hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman would moderate his proposal, and, although he could not go as far as his hon. Friend went, he should vote for the principle of the Amendment, unless the Home Secretary altered his limit.

MR. LABOUCHERE suggested that 12 o'clock, as proposed by the hon. Member opposite, was too late an hour, because by that time the crimes would have been committed. But, on the other hand, an hour after sunset was a little too early. That would be about 5 o'clock in winter, and at that time many people in rural districts would still be going about their work, and it could not be supposed that crimes would take place at that hour. He would advise the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary to make a compromise, and fix the limit at, say, 9 in winter, and 10 or 11 in summer. The present proposal would seriously interfere with a great many people engaged in their ordinary avocations.

MR. HEALY said, the Home Secretary seemed to think that the "Moonlighters" had no clear-sightedness or ability; but they were as intelligent as the constables looking after them, and if the constables knew how to lay traps, the "Moonlighters" knew how to escape the traps. If the "Moonlighters" wished to avoid suspicious circumstances, it was easy to arrange their purposes for some occasion when they might be out after dark without incurring suspicion — there might be a wake or a wedding in the neighbourhood, and the "Moonlighters" could take advantage of that. On the second reading of this Bill, the Home Secretary gave the House to understand that he would agree to a particular scale in this Bill, and he (Mr. Healy) had suggested that an almanack should be attached to the provisions, and put into the Act, in order to regulate the hours. But since then the Home Secretary had not shown the slightest sign of yielding to objections. In winter it was sunset about 4 o'clock, occasionally earlier, and the Home Secretary actually proposed that a man should get six months' imprisonment for being out at 5 o'clock. Suppose it was on Christmas Day; any person out then after 5 o'clock would be liable to six months' imprisonment. It was precisely nights of festivities, or other special occasions, which the "Moonlighters" would select for going out on their work. Did the right hon. and learned Gentleman suppose that because a man was a murderer he had no common-sense? He appealed to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, whether the entire comfort and happiness of thousands and hundreds of thousands of people was to be sacrificed; and he urged that there should be a little more liberality displayed in the Bill.

DR. COMMINS said, he thought the Bill had been drawn in utter ignorance of the habits of the people of Ireland. Of course, their habits were not much taken into account, but they might have been consulted with regard to this proposal. Anybody who knew Ireland, knew that nobody in any circumstances was in bed before 10 o'clock or 11 at night. During the evenings they visited each other, and at that time they were probably more abroad than in the daytime, when they were engaged at their work. Between sunset and 10 o'clock, when the work was all done, they were likely to be about the roads much more than in the daytime, and would be more likely to be aware of any mischief being done. Nearly the whole of the "Moonlight" offences had been committed between 10 at night and 6 in the morning; and he thought it would be the best plan to adopt, as the limit, from 10 to 5 o'clock. That was the limitation in the Night Poaching Act and the Insurrection Act of 1817, and other Acts; and he would advise the Government to to mitigate the annoyance which might be experienced under the Act by the liability of respectable people to arrest on suspicion.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 21, after the word "circumstances," to insert the words "such person may be summoned before a magistrate, and if such person be unknown."—(Mr. Lyulph Stanley.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not exactly see what his hon. Friend would summon a man for under this clause. Suppose a constable met a person under suspicious circumstances, at night, armed, and, as the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) had said, with disguises upon him, was he, because he happened to know that he lived in a certain place, to allow him to go on his way and content himself with summoning him to appear before the magistrates on the following day? He did not exactly see for what purpose the hon. Member would summon the man.

DR. COMMINS said, he was surprised the right hon. and learned Gentleman could not see the force of the Amendment. In the case where a man was out under suspicious circumstances, if he was summoned before a magistrate, the magistrate would judge as to those suspicious circumstances, and, if necessary, commit the man for trial. If the man were found guilty of being out under suspicious circumstances, he would be liable to imprisonment for six months. Some questions might be too plain for people to see, or they might be too minute for a mind of such stupendous character as that of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary. These points might be beneath the consideration of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, but they were not beneath the consideration of those who might have to suffer the pains and penalties of this legislation. Surely, if suspicious circumstances existed, it would be enough for the policeman to describe them to the magistrate. He might be unable to do that; and surely it would be better in such a case that the policeman, who could not make out a satisfactory charge of suspicious circumstances, should not have the power of arresting, but should be obliged to summon the man before the magistrates. A man might be perfectly respectable, and his respectability might be so clearly established, that the first magistrate he was brought before might discharge him immediately. If the clause passed as it stood, the police would have the power to take such a man away from his business, and perhaps do him material injury. If the object was to put down crime and not subject individuals to embarrassment, if it was only desired to enable the police to put down crime and not to irritate people and disturb society, then this clause, as it at present stood, was unnecessary.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James) said, that the Bill had two objects. One was the power of preventing crime, and the other the power of detecting it when committed. If they took away the power of arresting, and only gave the power of summoning in night cases, they were not likely to find a man in the act of committing a crime, or with the evidences of crime upon him. The clause might be wrong, but if it was wrong the objection to it could only be met by striking it out altogether. They first said in the clause that the policeman should say that he suspected the man was about to commit an offence, and now by this Amendment they proposed to say that it was sufficient to take his name and to summon him instead of arresting him.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY said, that if a policeman saw a man whom he suspected of murder, he would have power to arrest him at once; if he saw a man with a crape mask, and whom he believed to be about to commit a felony, he could arrest him. The Amendment was only to meet a case where a policeman only suspected that the man was going to commit a trivial offence.

MR. PARNELL said, he understood the alternative was to give the policeman the power of summoning, and he thought that was a thing which the Government might be reasonably expected to agree to. The clause, if amended, would run in this way—

"In a proclaimed district, if a person is out of his place of abode at any time after one hour later than sunset, or before sunrise, under suspicious circumstances, such person may be summoned before a magistrate, and if such person be unknown, any constable may arrest such person," &c.

It appeared to him that it would be better to say that any constable could arrest or summon the person, and if the Amendment before the Committee were withdrawn, it might be amended as he suggested.

Mr. Lyulph Stanley

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL said, he wished to move to insert, after "arrests," the words "or summon," with the object of afterwards moving, if the Government agreed to the Amendment, "and if he arrests him may bring him before a justice of the peace." This would give the alternative power of summoning.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 21, after the word "arrest," insert the words "or summon."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. SEXTON said, that surely the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, who had such confidence in the discretion of the police, would not refuse to allow him the option of arresting or summoning—would not decline to trust to his discretion in this matter. There were two classes of men who might come under the clause—one would be unknown, and the other known, and of respectable position. Surely, if individuals belonging to the latter class were found abroad during the prescribed hours, the right hon. and learned Gentleman would not hesitate to allow them to be summoned instead of arrested and imprisoned. Their position in society would be such that they would be sure to answer the summons.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that after what the Attorney General had said, it was not for him (Sir William Harcourt) to say anything more. He would point out, however, that this clause would have nothing to do with summonses—it was a clause for prevention. But summonses were not for prevention, they were for punishment. They did not summon a man because he should not commit an offence, but because he had committed it.

MR. O'DONNELL said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman said the Amendment was no preventive; but he (Mr. O'Donnell) did not agree with that view of the matter. The knowledge that he would be summoned, if found out, would be a distinct preventive to a person—it would decidedly induce him not to do anything likely to bring him within the reach of this clause. The argument of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) still remained unanswered. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had dwelt over and over again upon the discretion of the police, and the reasonableness of intrusting them with all sorts of power; and yet when they offered to give him the power of either arresting a man or summoning him, as he thought proper, the Home Secretary, all of a sudden, refused to allow any discretion to his remarkable police. If the police were at all deserving of the trust reposed in them, they certainly might be intrusted with that much discretionary power.

DR. COMMINS said, the Home Secretary forgot the fact that this clause created an offence. It would be a different thing if all it did was to secure a person who committed an offence and locked him up for a night; but so far from that being the case, it created an offence punishable by six months' imprisonment. There was not a single case of such powers of summary arrest being given to policemen when they knew the offenders and could summon them without any danger or risk. Did any one imagine that a man who was going to hough cattle, or set fire to a house, or a haystack, would proceed with his design if he was intercepted, and his name was taken down by a policeman? It was ridiculous to suppose that, and if the object of the Bill was to prevent crime and to warn men in time, that would be best done in the manner now suggested, and at the same time innocent people would be protected.

Question put, and negatived.

DR. COMMINS said, he had an Amendment to propose, which, though small, was very important. If despotic powers were to be intrusted to the police within certain limits, steps ought to be taken to prevent abuse. One form of abusing these powers would be to allow a policeman, instead of taking a person arrested to the nearest magistrate, to take him several miles away to a magistrate. His Amendment was intended to prevent a proceeding so vexatious.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he would introduce the words "nearest available."

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 22, to leave out "a," and insert "the nearest available."—(Dr. Commins.)

Question proposed, "That 'a' stand part of the Clause."

MR. GIBSON said, the principle mentioned by the hon. and learned Member was sound, and it was right that a person arrested should have his case taken as speedily as possible before the nearest magistrate available; but if that was distinctly put in the Bill, there must be some safeguard to that proceeding. If it was provided that the nearest magistrate was to be gone to, and it should turn out that there had been a mistake, and that the case had not been taken to the nearest magistrate, what would then be the legal position?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, the Government hardly thought it necessary to do more than guard the clause with these words. It was a common thing in Statutes to provide that a person arrested should be taken before the nearest magistrate, and the nearest magistrate meant the magistrate who could be most easily got at.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. SEXTON (for Mr. DILLON) moved to omit from the clause the words "committing him to prison or," the effect of which would be to take from the magistrate before whom a person arrested should be first taken the right to commit him to prison, and to leave to the magistrate three courses—to discharge the prisoner, or take bail for him, or send him immediately before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. The Committee, he observed, would see that the unfortunate person who was arrested would be subject to a series of elaborate powers. In the first place, there was the power of the policeman to arrest him on mere suspicion; then there was the power of the magistrate to send him to prison for an indefinite term; and, in the third place, there was the power of the Court of Summary Jurisdiction to send him to prison for six months. When a policeman arrested a man, he was bound to take the prisoner before a Justice of the Peace; but if the man was arrested at 10 o'clock at night, probably no magistrate could be found, and the case would have to wait till the next day. On the following day the prisoner might be committed to prison by the magistrate for an indefinite term, and what security was there against the arrested person being kept in prison for a week or a fortnight on the order of a preliminary Justice? The Government had added a number of Resident Magistrates to the list, and it would be easy to arrange that there should be two Resident Magistrates in each county continually available. It was evidently very unjust that persons arrested could be committed for an indefinite period by a preliminary Justice, before a competent tribunal could deal with the case.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 24, to leave out the words "committing him to prison or."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, this was an ordinary Petty Sessions jurisdiction, and was exercised every day. The condition was that the prisoner should be brought before a magistrate, and if he gave a satisfactory explanation, should be discharged. If he could not, then he should be made amenable to answer before the Resident Magistrate, and he must either procure bail or not; and if he could not, then he must be committed to prison until he could be brought before the Resident Magistrate.

MR. DILLON inquired whether it was to be understood that the magistrate was to commit a man to prison only if he could not provide bail?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) replied, that that was so unless the circumstances were such that the men ought not to be left at large.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, supposing a man was arrested on suspicion of having committed the Phoenix Park murder, could it be supposed that he could be set at large? There were circumstances in which it would be highly improper to set a man at liberty. But, in any case, if a man could not find bail he must take the alternative of going to prison. In either case these words could not be omitted.

MR. DILLON said, he thought the Government were under an extraordinary misapprehension. In regard to the illustration of the Phoenix Park murder, surely a man suspected of any murder would not be arrested under this clause. A magistrate could commit a man to gaol on any crime, whether it was a murder or not; but he wanted to point out that it had already been proved that in nine cases out of ten the men likely to be arrested under such a clause as this would be innocent men, who ought to be at once discharged. The figures quoted proved that; and it was an outrage that men arrested under this clause—for no man suspected of crime would be dealt with under this clause, but under the ordinary law—should be sent to prison for an indefinite term on the order of one magistrate, when they were well enough known to obtain bail. Some people might think this was not a point of importance, but it was one of great importance; because a large number of men might be arrested under suspicion of illegal action, and committed to prison. To a poor man it might be a trifle, but it would be a serious punishment to a man of a higher position to spend even one night in a cell. All he wanted was that a man who was arrested, if he could produce reasonable bail by a person who was known in the neighbourhood, should be released without the option to the magistrate of committing him to prison. If a man in such a case ran away, the Government would be well rid of him.

MR. SEXTON observed, that the Resident Magistrates could hold their Court as often as they chose, and asked whether the Government would give an assurance that in no case should a prisoner be detained beyond a certain period? It would be very hard for a man to be kept in gaol for a fortnight on a vague suspicion, and he thought the Home Secretary might name a maximum period of detention.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT replied, that if the hon. Member would give him time to consider the question, he would see what could be done, for he quite saw the hardship of a man being kept any considerable time in prison before being brought before a magistrate.

MR. PARSELL said, that under the ordinary law a prisoner could not be remanded for more than seven days at a time.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT promised to consider the point.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR suggested that the maximum should not be seven days, but 48 hours.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. DILLON said, the extraordinary character of this clause was entirely without precedent, and he hoped the Government would accept the Amendment he proposed to move. It was utterly contrary to the principles of law and justice that when a man was assumed to be guilty of an offence he should then be called upon to prove his innocence, or he would be held to be guilty. Suppose a man left his house for some perfectly innocent purpose, he might be charged with suspicious circumstances, and he would only have his own word to give as to having been on lawful business. No other evidence could be produced in four out of five cases. Would the magistrate believe the evidence of the policeman or of the prisoner? The prisoner might make a plausible statement as to whether he was a "Moonlighter" or not; but very likely a "Moonlighter" would make a more plausible statement than the innocent man. The accused would simply have his own word against the word of the policeman to prove that he was out on lawful business. The words of the clause were, "facts to satisfy the Court;" and, instead of these words, he (Mr. Dillon) proposed—

"And if such court is satisfied, on evidence produced, that such person was out under suspicious circumstances, and not on some lawful occasion or business, such person shall be held to be guilty of an offence under this Act."

He could not understand why the Government should refuse to accept that portion of his Amendment; but if they did, he should be driven to the conclusion that they had an intent which he had supposed lay beneath the wording of their own clause—namely, that it should be within the power of the magistrate, in interpreting the clause, to call upon the prisoner to produce evidence that he was innocent, failing which he would be held guilty. The alteration he now proposed would give the fullest discretion to the Court to consider a case. Finally, he suggested these words—

"But an offence under this section shall not be punished by more than one month's imprisonment."

[Thirteenth Night.]

innocent persons out of a grand total of 89. That was what would take place under this Act—only one in 100, or one in 1,000 of the arrested people would be really guilty of any connection with criminal acts; but he supposed it was vain to argue with the Home Secretary or the Chief Secretary, because Constitutional principles were not to be mentioned to the Liberal Ministry now in power. Of the 12 persons convicted out of 89, three got three months' imprisonment, three got one month, and the largest number of them only got one week. He supposed that part of the Return would commend itself to the approval of the Home Secretary. A man was to be put into prison and convicted under this clause with the result of one week's imprisonment. If a man only got one week's imprisonment, he could not be one of those "Moonlighters" who maimed cattle and shot men; and he maintained that this clause would be thoroughly inoperative against the persons for whom it was intended. If a man, taken up in the prohibited hours, was only deemed deserving of one week's imprisonment, he could not be a deep-dyed murderer, or a maimer of cattle.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT rose to speak. [Cries of "No, no!" and "Do not answer!"] The right hon. and learned Gentleman resumed his seat.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, if the right hon. and learned Gentleman persisted in refusing to give him any answer, in obedience, not to any cries from the Opposition side of the House, but in obedience to a majority of Members sitting behind him, he should consider that such conduct showed that the object of this Bill was plain, and that any argument in defence of the liberties of the people was unnecessary, and he should, therefore, feel it his duty to move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. T. P. O'Connor.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not think this was a reasonable proceeding. The hon. Member not having been in the House, and not having heard the arguments which had been used in justification of the course the Government were pursuing in this matter, came down now and delivered a speech which had been delivered over and over again, and said that if he did not get an answer—an answer which, by the way, had been repeated a dozen times—he would move to report Progress. It happened just as much in England as in Ireland that persons were arrested on suspicion; and it was held that a man's imprisonment, under such circumstances, was a totally rational proceeding. It happened every day in London that men were brought up on suspicion of an offence of which it was afterwards found they were not guilty; yet it was actually made a ground of complaint that these men were not sent to prison.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he begged to withdraw the Motion. It was not in reference to anything the Home Secretary did that he was prompted to make it; but it was because the Home Secretary was interrupted very unfairly and very discourteously by hon. Gentlemen behind him, when he was proceeding to give the answer asked of him.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 196; Noes 29: Majority 167.—(Div. List, No. 148.)

MR. LABOUCHERE said, his hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) had asked him to move the Amendment which stood in his name. It was to substitute a definition for the words "under suspicious circumstances." There had been a great deal of discussion as to whether there should be any definition or not, and it was now sought to introduce one in the Bill. His hon. Friend, however, had now arrived, and he had no doubt he would more clearly explain what he wanted than he (Mr. Labouchere) could do for him.

MR. DILLWYN said, he hoped the Government would assent to this Amendment. It was simply this. The clause, as it stood, gave power to the police to arrest persons whom they might consider to be out at night under suspicious circumstances. He did not think the power granted by that clause ought to be intrusted to the police. He did not want to say a word against the Irish police. He thought they were a good military body, but did not consider they ought to have these large discre-offence which the vagrant was charged with. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that the Act was occasionally administered with severity and injustice. He must remember that nine out of every ten arrested for vagrancy were persons who were known to the police as pickpockets, who were watched continually, and who were rarely arrested even as vagrants until the police had satisfied themselves that the people were in the habit of making their living by pilfering. The illustration which the right hon. and learned Gentleman gave was a proof of how fallacious his analogy was. He gave the case of gipsies. Everyone who knew anything at all about the matter knew that, in the vast majority of cases, pilfering was until recently one of the means of livelihood the gipsies had. To give a magistrate power, under the Vagrancy Act, to arrest persons who were distinctly marked, and to give a magistrate power to arrest any other part of the population, were two different things. He had thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman would do the common sense of the Committee the satisfaction of changing his fallacies as he went along. The very ingenious mind of the right hon. and learned Gentleman would have no difficulty in evoking any number of fallacies to support the propositions he might put before the Committee. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had argued that because a policeman had certain power to arrest a person on suspicion in England, the Committee were justified in giving the right of suspicion, under the terms of this clause, in Ireland, the right hon. and learned Gentleman knowing that there was this main difference between the clause now proposed and the law in England—that a person in England could not get six months' imprisonment for being guilty of an offence under the Vagrancy Act. The right hon. and learned Gentleman might freshen up his memory and give the Committee a better answer than the one he had given.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

MR. PUGH said, that, in the case of an arrest under the Vagrancy Act, it must be proved that the accused had no visible means of subsistence before there could be a conviction. It seemed to him (Mr. Pugh) that, under this clause, something ought to be proved before a conviction was obtained because a man was arrested upon the ground that he was out under suspicious circumstances. In order to follow the analogy of the Vagrancy Act, the constable making an arrest under this clause ought to be called upon to prove before the magistrate that the circumstances under which he arrested the man were sufficiently suspicious to justify him in making the arrest. He was persuaded that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would see that in this direction the clause really did require some amendment. He (Mr. Pugh) could not altogether agree with the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon); but, before entering upon a consideration of the Amendment, he must point out that, under the clause, not only was there no necessity to prove the suspicious circumstances which were relied upon in making the arrest, but the man was called upon to prove a great deal more than he ought to be. According to the Preamble, this Bill was intended for the prevention and repression of crime, and, no doubt, it was directed against crime of a certain character. The accused was not only called upon to prove that he was not out for the purpose of committing a crime, or that he was out for some purpose other than the commission of crime, but he was called upon to prove affirmatively that he was out on some lawful occasion and business. Suppose he was out poaching. That would not be a lawful occasion, but he apprehended that it was an occasion that this Act was not intended to meet. A man might be out for some purpose which was forbidden by some law or other, but not by this Act; therefore, it ought to be sufficient for him to show that he was not out for the purpose of the commission of crime as defined in this Act. He was not sure whether it would not be held that a young man was out for an unlawful purpose if he were found loitering about premises in which his ladylove lived, but entrance to which might possibly have been forbidden him by the father, the owner of the premises. Let them see what the Amendment proposed to do. He should say nothing with regard to the last part of the Amendment, for it dealt with punishment, which was a separate matter, and it ought to be discussed separately. He would deal with the question as to what ought to be proved against the man arrested, and with what the man ought to be called upon to prove. It seemed to him that the Court ought, first of all, to be satisfied that the accused was out under circumstances indicating the intention to commit a crime, and words to that effect he understood the Home Secretary was prepared to introduce. If the words—or some to that effect, were inserted, then, he thought, the accused ought fairly to be called upon to prove something, and he should be liable to conviction if he failed to satisfy the Court that he was out for some purpose other than the commission of crime.

“If the Court is satisfied that he is out under circumstances indicating an intention to commit crime,”

MR. PARNELL wished to ask why the Government wanted to have this clause more severe than the clause of the Act of 1870, which was found, according to the statement of the Chief Secretary, to have been sufficient for its purpose? The Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon), practically speaking, would make this part of the clause similar to the corresponding part of the clause dealing with the same subject in the Act of 1870. This clause practically threw the onus of proving his innocence upon the person arrested; but the 23rd section of the Act of 1870 obliged the Justices to believe that a person was not out of the house upon some lawful occasion or business, and then they might commit him to gaol for six months with hard labour. He certainly thought the Government ought to accept the Amendment of his hon. Friend so far as it made the clause similar to the one in the corresponding section of the Act of 1870. This clause said—

“And if such person, on appearing before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction acting under this Act fails to satisfy the Court that he was out of his place of abode upon some lawful occasion or business he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act.”

He wished to ask why the Government could not accept the Amendment, or some similar Amendment, which would have the effect of reducing the stringency of the clause, and making it correspond with a like clause in the Act of 1870? He had intended to move an Amendment in the same spirit as that of his hon. Friend. His Amendment would have been to leave out the words from the word “if,” in line 26, to the word “out,” in line 28, and insert “the Court shall believe that such person was not.” That would have had the effect of making the clause read in this way—

Mr. Pugh

“To bring him before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction acting under this Act, and if the Court shall believe that such person was not out of his place of abode upon some lawful occasion or business, he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act.”

That would make it similar to the clause in the Act of 1870, and he did not think it was an unreasonable proposal to make to the Government. The Government said the Act of 1870 was effectual for its purpose, and, therefore, he thought they might fairly ask the Government to modify the clause in the direction indicated.

DR. COMMINS said, that, whether the exact words of the Amendment were adopted or not, some Amendment ought to be adopted which would carry out the idea embodied in the Amendment. The clause, as it stood, was open to very serious objection, for, being a clause that created a criminal offence, it seemed against the ordinary principles of the Criminal Law by substituting suspicion for proof.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) understood the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) to desire the adoption of the words of the Act of 1870. He had consulted with his right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, and he had to say that his right hon. and learned Friend would be willing to assent to the suggestion of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, if the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. DILLON said, he, of course, would withdraw his Amendment, although upon the question of punishment he had received no answer. He was strongly of opinion that the punishment for the offence ought not to be so severe as was proposed in the clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. DILLON presumed the Attorney General would move his own Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the matter would want some consideration. He would promise to take the words of the Act of 1870, and he would bring them up on Report.

MR. MARUM moved, in page 4, line 30, after "Act," insert—

"Provided, That any person whilst engaged in the fulfilment of any lawful public or private duty or business shall not be deemed to be out of his place of abode under extraordinary and suspicious circumstances, and the mere circumstance of any person being out of his place of abode during prohibited hours shall not of itself, and irrespective of any other circumstances, be deemed to justify such arrest as aforesaid."

He did not mean to say that the latter part of his Amendment was strictly necessary; but he had embodied it in his Amendment as a result of his own personal experience. In 1871, whilst the Peace Preservation Act was in operation, two persons were brought before him by the police, and, there being no specific charge against them, he discharged them. The occasion of the arrest was the men were out during prohibited hours; but they were not out at that time designedly. In this matter they were dealing with a class of men who were not very intelligent; and, therefore, he thought it was wise that there should be some such provision as he proposed to prevent the arrest of men who were simply out during prohibited hours. As he had said, he did not think the provision absolutely necessary; but, inasmuch as it might afford some safeguard against the abuse of the power of the police, he thought the Attorney General might assent to it.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 30, after the word "Act," to insert the words "Provided, That any person whilst engaged in the fulfilment of any lawful public or private duty or business shall not be deemed to be out of his place of abode under extraordinary and suspicious circumstances, and the mere circumstance of any person being out of his place of abode during prohibited hours, shall not of itself, and irrespective of any other circumstances, be deemed to justify such arrest as aforesaid."—(Mr. Marum.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the effect of adopting the Amendment would simply be the negating of the clause. If a man were not out under suspicious circumstances he would not be guilty of an offence. He did hope the hon. Member would not press the Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. LABOUCHERE moved, in page 4, line 30, after "Act," to insert—

But in case he shall so satisfy the Court, he shall be entitled to such sum as the Court shall deem to be sufficient indemnity for loss of time or any other damage caused by such arrest."

The object of the Amendment was that in case a person was unfairly or unjustly arrested, he should have some species of indemnity. The Home Secretary would say that compensation was not given in England when a person had been arrested on suspicion, and he had not been found guilty; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman must bear in mind that this was quite an exceptional case. A respectable man might be walking along the road, when any policeman, believing him to be on some suspicious errand, could arrest him, lock him up for the night, and bring him before a magistrate the next morning. The man might lose a certain amount of money by the arrest; in any case he would lose a certain amount of time; and he (Mr. Labouchere) would suggest that some little indemnity should be granted to the man wrongfully accused. He did not ask that the indemnity should be paid out of the Consolidated Fund, but out of the local rates, or out of the surplus revenue of the Irish Church Fund. It was a matter of perfect indifference to him from what source the money was obtained, provided compensation was paid whenever loss or damage had been sustained by the action of the police.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not entitled to move any Amendment which involves an expenditure from the Public Exchequer. This Amendment does not come at all within the scope of the clause.

MR. HEALY asked if the Amendment would not be in Order if it provided that the compensation should be paid out of the local rates?

THE CHAIRMAN: That can be done if the Committee so decides.

MR. HEALY submitted that the hon. Gentleman would be in Order in proposing that the indemnity should be paid out of the county rates.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member might make such a Motion.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he would move that the indemnity be paid out of the county rates, or the surplus of the Church Fund.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 30, after the word "Act," to insert the words "but in case he shall so satisfy the Court, he shall be entitled to such sum as the Court shall deem to be sufficient indemnity for loss of time or any other damage caused by such arrest out of the county rates."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was rather late for the hon. Member to propose this Amendment. The arrest of people might become to them, under such an Amendment, a very lucrative occupation. A man might make himself suspicious in order to be arrested at night, and get an indemnity the next morning.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, the object of the Amendment was to place some little check upon the overweening zeal of the Irish police, and some check was certainly necessary. It was all very well for the Home Secretary to imagine extreme cases from his point of view. Why not the Irish Members imagine extreme cases from their point of view? Why could not they imagine an over-zealous policeman having a desire to arrest a man, no matter whether he had good cause or not? It was not likely that a policeman would get into any trouble if he made an unjust arrest; but, on the contrary, he would get credit from his superior officer for being extremely zealous and active. Let them imagine another case. The Home Secretary had a way of giving wings and freedom to his imagination. Let them try something of the same style of argument, and let them suppose the case of a policeman or magistrate who had any spite against a particular individual. Under this clause, it would be in the power of these officials to arrest the man if he happened to be out at night, and bring him up next day only to send him about his business again. The police and magistrates could, under this clause, harass and annoy the people, although they might not always be able to inflict punishment upon them. He did not think that was a far-fetched supposition; indeed, it was more reasonable than the humorous idea which had been laid before the Committee by the Home Secretary.

MR. GIBSON said, no Amendment could possibly be more unpopular with the tenants; and he was sure that if the hon. Member knew that the money proposed to be given would neither come out of his own pocket, nor out of the pockets of the landlords, he would at once withdraw his proposal.

MR. SEXTON hailed with satisfaction the appearance of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) as champion of the tenants of Ireland.

MR. SYNAN said, the proposal would, if accepted, inflict a pecuniary loss upon those whose interests the hon. Member advocated. Why should innocent ratepayers suffer in having to provide compensation for wrongs thus inflicted upon other innocent ratepayers?

MR. GILL said, as there seemed to be an agreement that this expense should not fall on the ratepayers, he would suggest a less objectionable course, that would save the rates, and, at the same time, curb the excessive zeal of the Constabulary, and that was to make the money chargeable on the £180,000 about to be voted to the Irish Constabulary.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. MARUM moved to add, at the end of the clause—

"Provided, That if he decline to tender himself for examination as such witness, the ordinary presumption of innocence shall not be thereby rebutted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, it was impossible to accept the Amendment; it must be a matter left to the discretion of the magistrates and the Court to deal with. They could not tell the magistrate what he must think of the conduct of a person under such circumstances.

Amendment negatived.

MR. METGE said, he had an Amendment to propose which he thought the Government could accept. It was one of considerable importance to the poorer classes, because it was probable that among these a great number of arrests would be made, and the children and families of the person arrested might have to suffer considerable privation on account of the suspicion of crime upon which the arrest was made. There was nothing exceptional in the words he wished to add at the end of the clause; it was merely assimilating the Bill to the law as it stood in England under 12 & 13 Vict., where there was a clause extending the right of Poor Law relief to families of persons confined in gaol or other places of custody; whereas, in Ireland, Poor Law allowances could only be extended to families of persons incapacitated from mental or bodily infirmity. So, in the case of any person arrested under this Act, his family would be excluded from the benefit of outdoor relief. The persons likely to be arrested under this Act were of the labouring class, shop-assistants, and the lower class of artisans, just the classes whose families were least able to support themselves when the male head of the family was taken from them. For this reason he thought the Government should accept the Amendment. He moved similar words to the Act of last year, and after some hesitation the Government accepted them, and to his own knowledge they proved a considerable benefit to poor people. The chief reason which he would press upon the Government was this—that hardly as the Coercion Act bore upon the people of Ireland, one of its worst features was the fruit that it inevitably bore, and one of the most bitter feelings raised among the people was that not only were they liable to arbitrary arrest, but that arrest included misery and destitution to the members of their families.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, at end, to add “the family, if any, of any person detained under this Act, shall not thereby be incapacitated from receiving outdoor relief, if otherwise qualified to receive it, but shall in all cases be dealt with by the board of guardians of their respective unions in the same manner as if the person so detained under this Act had been suffering from mental or bodily infirmity.”—(Mr. Metge.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

MR. HEALY said, he thought the words were better as they were to be found in the Coercion Act of last year, and they would come at the end of the Bill. Those words were that the provisions of the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act of 1880, and as amended by the Act of the same year, should apply so far as outdoor relief was concerned. He would suggest, as regarded these provisions, that during the continuance of this Act they should be extended; but whether the Amendment should come here or at the end of the Bill was another matter. But he trusted the Government, if they did not accept the Amendment now, would not exclude it from their consideration later on. Then, perhaps, his hon. Friend would be induced to move the Amendment in the form of the Act of last year later on. The Committee had now reached a time when, perhaps, it was too late to consider the matter, unless the Government had made up their minds on the point.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, if the Amendment were accepted, its proper place would not be at the end of this clause. If the Amendment were brought up on Report it should receive every consideration meanwhile; but he could make no promise on it.

MR. METGE really thought the Government might make some promise. It was a matter of the greatest importance, and there was no possible reason urged against the Amendment. With the intention of raising it later on he would now withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SEXTON said, it would be admitted as a fact that the crimes and acts that this Bill was intended to repress were connected with rural life and occupations with which cities and towns had no connection. In towns people moved about upon their ordinary lawful business at a much later hour. Were the Government willing to accept some such provision as this—

“Provided, That no arrest shall be made under this clause at an earlier hour than ten o'clock at night in any city or town in Ireland.”

He begged to move an Amendment in those words.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, of course the Committee understood that this clause would only apply to proclaimed districts, and it was unlikely that towns would be proclaimed. And then it was very difficult at the moment to provide a definition of the term “town,” should it be municipal borough, or Parliamentary borough, or what else. If the Amendment were brought up on Report the Government would take it into consideration; but they could not accept it now. There was some force in the observations made by the hon. Member; but, in the absence of the Home Secretary, the only promise that could be made was that the Amendment should be considered.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 22, to leave out "a," and insert "the nearest available."—(Dr. Commins.)

Question proposed, "That 'a' stand part of the Clause."

MR. GIBSON said, the principle mentioned by the hon. and learned Member was sound, and it was right that a person arrested should have his case taken as speedily as possible before the nearest magistrate available; but if that was distinctly put in the Bill, there must be some safeguard to that proceeding. If it was provided that the nearest magistrate was to be gone to, and it should turn out that there had been a mistake, and that the case had not been taken to the nearest magistrate, what would then be the legal position?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, the Government hardly thought it necessary to do more than guard the clause with these words. It was a common thing in Statutes to provide that a person arrested should be taken before the nearest magistrate, and the nearest magistrate meant the magistrate who could be most easily got at.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. SEXTON (for Mr. DILLON) moved to omit from the clause the words "committing him to prison or," the effect of which would be to take from the magistrate before whom a person arrested should be first taken the right to commit him to prison, and to leave to the magistrate three courses—to discharge the prisoner, or take bail for him, or send him immediately before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. The Committee, he observed, would see that the unfortunate person who was arrested would be subject to a series of elaborate powers. In the first place, there was the power of the policeman to arrest him on mere suspicion; then there was the power of the magistrate to send him to prison for an indefinite term; and, in the third place, there was the power of the Court of Summary Jurisdiction to send him to prison for six months. When a policeman arrested a man, he was bound to take the prisoner before a Justice of the Peace; but if the man was arrested at 10 o'clock at night, probably no magistrate could be found, and the case would have to wait till the next day. On the following day the prisoner might be committed to prison by the magistrate for an indefinite term, and what security was there against the arrested person being kept in prison for a week or a fortnight on the order of a preliminary Justice? The Government had added a number of Resident Magistrates to the list, and it would be easy to arrange that there should be two Resident Magistrates in each county continually available. It was evidently very unjust that persons arrested could be committed for an indefinite period by a preliminary Justice, before a competent tribunal could deal with the case.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 24, to leave out the words "committing him to prison or."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, this was an ordinary Petty Sessions jurisdiction, and was exercised every day. The condition was that the prisoner should be brought before a magistrate, and if he gave a satisfactory explanation, should be discharged. If he could not, then he should be made amenable to answer before the Resident Magistrate, and he must either procure bail or not; and if he could not, then he must be committed to prison until he could be brought before the Resident Magistrate.

MR. DILLON inquired whether it was to be understood that the magistrate was to commit a man to prison only if he could not provide bail?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) replied, that that was so unless the circumstances were such that the men ought not to be left at large.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, supposing a man was arrested on suspicion of having committed the Phoenix Park murder, could it be supposed that he could be set at large? There were circumstances in which it would be highly improper to set a man at liberty. But, in any case, if a man could not find bail he must take the alternative of going to prison. In either case these words could not be omitted.

MR. DILLON said, he thought the Government were under an extraordinary misapprehension. In regard to the illustration of the Phoenix Park murder, surely a man suspected of any murder would not be arrested under this clause. A magistrate could commit a man to gaol on any crime, whether it was a murder or not; but he wanted to point out that it had already been proved that in nine cases out of ten the men likely to be arrested under such a clause as this would be innocent men, who ought to be at once discharged. The figures quoted proved that; and it was an outrage that men arrested under this clause—for no man suspected of crime would be dealt with under this clause, but under the ordinary law—should be sent to prison for an indefinite term on the order of one magistrate, when they were well enough known to obtain bail. Some people might think this was not a point of importance, but it was one of great importance; because a large number of men might be arrested under suspicion of illegal action, and committed to prison. To a poor man it might be a trifle, but it would be a serious punishment to a man of a higher position to spend even one night in a cell. All he wanted was that a man who was arrested, if he could produce reasonable bail by a person who was known in the neighbourhood, should be released without the option to the magistrate of committing him to prison. If a man in such a case ran away, the Government would be well rid of him.

MR. SEXTON observed, that the Resident Magistrates could hold their Court as often as they chose, and asked whether the Government would give an assurance that in no case should a prisoner be detained beyond a certain period? It would be very hard for a man to be kept in gaol for a fortnight on a vague suspicion, and he thought the Home Secretary might name a maximum period of detention.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT replied, that if the hon. Member would give him time to consider the question, he would see what could be done, for he quite saw the hardship of a man being kept any considerable time in prison before being brought before a magistrate.

MR. PARNEILL said, that under the ordinary law a prisoner could not be remanded for more than seven days at a time.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT promised to consider the point.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR suggested that the maximum should not be seven days, but 48 hours.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. DILLON said, the extraordinary character of this clause was entirely without precedent, and he hoped the Government would accept the Amendment he proposed to move. It was utterly contrary to the principles of law and justice that when a man was assumed to be guilty of an offence he should then be called upon to prove his innocence, or he would be held to be guilty. Suppose a man left his house for some perfectly innocent purpose, he might be charged with suspicious circumstances, and he would only have his own word to give as to having been on lawful business. No other evidence could be produced in four out of five cases. Would the magistrate believe the evidence of the policeman or of the prisoner? The prisoner might make a plausible statement as to whether he was a "Moonlighter" or not; but very likely a "Moonlighter" would make a more plausible statement than the innocent man. The accused would simply have his own word against the word of the policeman to prove that he was out on lawful business. The words of the clause were, "facts to satisfy the Court;" and, instead of these words, he (Mr. Dillon) proposed—

"And if such court is satisfied, on evidence produced, that such person was out under suspicious circumstances, and not on some lawful occasion or business, such person shall be held to be guilty of an offence under this Act."

He could not understand why the Government should refuse to accept that portion of his Amendment; but if they did, he should be driven to the conclusion that they had an intent which he had supposed lay beneath the wording of their own clause—namely, that it should be within the power of the magistrate, in interpreting the clause, to call upon the prisoner to produce evidence that he was innocent, failing which he would be held guilty. The alteration he now proposed would give the fullest discretion to the Court to consider a case. Finally, he suggested these words—

"But an offence under this section shall not be punished by more than one month's imprisonment."

[Thirteenth Night.]

He earnestly urged that portion of the Amendment on the attention of the Government, because, after all, the Government themselves would admit that of those who would be convicted under this section a large proportion must be, to say the least of it, excessively doubtful as to whether they were out with unlawful intent or not. When the Committee came to consider this in the light of what the Government had said as to what they thought would be suspicious circumstances, and the extremely vague character of this expression, they would see that many a man would find himself in suspicious circumstances, and would be held to be guilty, although he had no intent to do anything criminal at all. It was in the nature of the clause to catch a number of men who were absolutely ignorant of any criminal intent. That must be evident to any man of fair mind. If that was the case, what was the great crime of being out under suspicious circumstances, and what object had the Government in taking power to inflict such a punishment as was proposed? A month's imprisonment was fully sufficient to place in the hands of the magistrates; and if a man was found again under suspicious circumstances, he could be sentenced to another month. He took it that a man who had been committed for one month would be under the observation of the police, and, therefore, he did not see what motive, beyond pure vindictiveness, there could be in taking this power.

THE CHAIRMAN: Before I put this Amendment, I must point out that it will practically settle the Amendments which follow, except that of Mr. Leamy.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 26, to leave out from "and," to end of sub-section, and insert "and if such court is satisfied, on evidence produced, that such person was out under suspicious circumstances, and not on some lawful occasion or business, such person shall be held to be guilty of an offence under this Act. But an offence under this section shall not be punished by more than one month's imprisonment."—(Mr. Dillon.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the objection taken by the hon. Member upon this matter was one which would apply to many offences under the English Law, in regard to which it constantly happened that the onus of proof was thrown upon the accused. Under the Vagrancy Act, a man might be committed to prison as a rogue and vagabond, and the onus lay entirely upon him to deliver himself. That Act provided that every person found wandering abroad, or in a deserted or unoccupied building, or in a cart or waggon, not having any visible means of subsistence, and not giving a good account of himself, could be committed to prison. The essence of the offence was in not giving a good account of himself. [Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR: No.] In spite of the superior knowledge of the hon. Member, he would venture to say that a person who could not give a good account of himself, and not having any visible means of subsistence, would have to prove—first, what means of subsistence he had; and secondly, he would have to give some account of himself in order to go free. That was a common circumstance in England, and the punishment under the Act was three months' imprisonment. They were now dealing with a much more serious offence and a much greater evil than mere vagrancy. The Vagrancy Act was meant to apply to persons who, like gipsies, went about the country without any visible means of subsistence. If they omitted the word "suspicious," they would destroy the whole object of the clause. The moment they admitted the idea of suspicion, they did involve the proposition that the person was to clear himself from the suspicion. The hon. Member would see that the clause could not be subjected to the limitation proposed.

Mr. Dillon

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the words of the Vagrancy Act were—"having no visible means of subsistence, and being unable to give an account of himself." He had ventured to interrupt the right hon. and learned Gentleman when he was reading the Act, because the right hon. and learned Gentleman appeared to be incorrect in the statement that a man being unable to give a satisfactory account of himself was the main part of the offence. He was under the impression that the right hon. and learned Gentleman imagined that the word was "or," and not "and;" and he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) ventured to think still that having no visible means of subsistence was the main part of the offence which the vagrant was charged with. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that the Act was occasionally administered with severity and injustice. He must remember that nine out of every ten arrested for vagrancy were persons who were known to the police as pickpockets, who were watched continually, and who were rarely arrested even as vagrants until the police had satisfied themselves that the people were in the habit of making their living by pilfering. The illustration which the right hon. and learned Gentleman gave was a proof of how fallacious his analogy was. He gave the case of gipsies. Everyone who knew anything at all about the matter knew that, in the vast majority of cases, pilfering was until recently one of the means of livelihood the gipsies had. To give a magistrate power, under the Vagrancy Act, to arrest persons who were distinctly marked, and to give a magistrate power to arrest any other part of the population, were two different things. He had thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman would do the common sense of the Committee the satisfaction of changing his fallacies as he went along. The very ingenious mind of the right hon. and learned Gentleman would have no difficulty in evoking any number of fallacies to support the propositions he might put before the Committee. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had argued that because a policeman had certain power to arrest a person on suspicion in England, the Committee were justified in giving the right of suspicion, under the terms of this clause, in Ireland, the right hon. and learned Gentleman knowing that there was this main difference between the clause now proposed and the law in England—that a person in England could not get six months' imprisonment for being guilty of an offence under the Vagrancy Act. The right hon. and learned Gentleman might freshen up his memory and give the Committee a better answer than the one he had given.

MR. PUGH said, that, in the case of an arrest under the Vagrancy Act, it must be proved that the accused had no visible means of subsistence before there could be a conviction. It seemed to him (Mr. Pugh) that, under this clause, something ought to be proved before a conviction was obtained because a man was arrested upon the ground that he was out under suspicious circumstances. In order to follow the analogy of the Vagrancy Act, the constable making an arrest under this clause ought to be called upon to prove before the magistrate that the circumstances under which he arrested the man were sufficiently suspicious to justify him in making the arrest. He was persuaded that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would see that in this direction the clause really did require some amendment. He (Mr. Pugh) could not altogether agree with the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon); but, before entering upon a consideration of the Amendment, he must point out that, under the clause, not only was there no necessity to prove the suspicious circumstances which were relied upon in making the arrest, but the man was called upon to prove a great deal more than he ought to be. According to the Preamble, this Bill was intended for the prevention and repression of crime, and, no doubt, it was directed against crime of a certain character. The accused was not only called upon to prove that he was not out for the purpose of committing a crime, or that he was out for some purpose other than the commission of crime, but he was called upon to prove affirmatively that he was out on some lawful occasion and business. Suppose he was out poaching. That would not be a lawful occasion, but he apprehended that it was an occasion that this Act was not intended to meet. A man might be out for some purpose which was forbidden by some law or other, but not by this Act; therefore, it ought to be sufficient for him to show that he was not out for the purpose of the commission of crime as defined in this Act. He was not sure whether it would not be held that a young man was out for an unlawful purpose if he were found loitering about premises in which his ladylove lived, but entrance to which might possibly have been forbidden him by the father, the owner of the premises. Let them see what the Amendment proposed to do. He should say nothing with regard to the last part of the Amendment, for it dealt with punishment, which was a separate matter, and it ought to be discussed separately. He would deal with the question as to what ought to be proved against the man arrested, and with what the man ought to be called upon to prove. It seemed to him that the Court ought, first of all, to be satisfied that the accused was out under circumstances indicating the intention to commit a crime, and words to that effect he understood the Home Secretary was prepared to introduce. If the words—or some to that effect, were inserted, then, he thought, the accused ought fairly to be called upon to prove something, and he should be liable to conviction if he failed to satisfy the Court that he was out for some purpose other than the commission of crime.

“If the Court is satisfied that he is out under circumstances indicating an intention to commit crime,”

MR. PARNELL wished to ask why the Government wanted to have this clause more severe than the clause of the Act of 1870, which was found, according to the statement of the Chief Secretary, to have been sufficient for its purpose? The Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon), practically speaking, would make this part of the clause similar to the corresponding part of the clause dealing with the same subject in the Act of 1870. This clause practically threw the onus of proving his innocence upon the person arrested; but the 23rd section of the Act of 1870 obliged the Justices to believe that a person was not out of the house upon some lawful occasion or business, and then they might commit him to gaol for six months with hard labour. He certainly thought the Government ought to accept the Amendment of his hon. Friend so far as it made the clause similar to the one in the corresponding section of the Act of 1870. This clause said—

“And if such person, on appearing before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction acting under this Act fails to satisfy the Court that he was out of his place of abode upon some lawful occasion or business he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act.”

He wished to ask why the Government could not accept the Amendment, or some similar Amendment, which would have the effect of reducing the stringency of the clause, and making it correspond with a like clause in the Act of 1870? He had intended to move an Amendment in the same spirit as that of his hon. Friend. His Amendment would have been to leave out the words from the word “if,” in line 26, to the word “out,” in line 28, and insert “the Court shall believe that such person was not.” That would have had the effect of making the clause read in this way—

Mr. Pugh

“To bring him before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction acting under this Act, and if the Court shall believe that such person was not out of his place of abode upon some lawful occasion or business, he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act.”

That would make it similar to the clause in the Act of 1870, and he did not think it was an unreasonable proposal to make to the Government. The Government said the Act of 1870 was effectual for its purpose, and, therefore, he thought they might fairly ask the Government to modify the clause in the direction indicated.

DR. COMMINS said, that, whether the exact words of the Amendment were adopted or not, some Amendment ought to be adopted which would carry out the idea embodied in the Amendment. The clause, as it stood, was open to very serious objection, for, being a clause that created a criminal offence, it seemed against the ordinary principles of the Criminal Law by substituting suspicion for proof.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) understood the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) to desire the adoption of the words of the Act of 1870. He had consulted with his right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, and he had to say that his right hon. and learned Friend would be willing to assent to the suggestion of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, if the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. DILLON said, he, of course, would withdraw his Amendment, although upon the question of punishment he had received no answer. He was strongly of opinion that the punishment for the offence ought not to be so severe as was proposed in the clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. DILLON presumed the Attorney General would move his own Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the matter would want some consideration. He would promise to take the words of the Act of 1870, and he would bring them up on Report.

MR. MARUM moved, in page 4, line 30, after "Act," insert—

"Provided, That any person whilst engaged in the fulfilment of any lawful public or private duty or business shall not be deemed to be out of his place of abode under extraordinary and suspicious circumstances, and the mere circumstance of any person being out of his place of abode during prohibited hours shall not of itself, and irrespective of any other circumstances, be deemed to justify such arrest as aforesaid."

He did not mean to say that the latter part of his Amendment was strictly necessary; but he had embodied it in his Amendment as a result of his own personal experience. In 1871, whilst the Peace Preservation Act was in operation, two persons were brought before him by the police, and, there being no specific charge against them, he discharged them. The occasion of the arrest was the men were out during prohibited hours; but they were not out at that time designedly. In this matter they were dealing with a class of men who were not very intelligent; and, therefore, he thought it was wise that there should be some such provision as he proposed to prevent the arrest of men who were simply out during prohibited hours. As he had said, he did not think the provision absolutely necessary; but, inasmuch as it might afford some safeguard against the abuse of the power of the police, he thought the Attorney General might assent to it.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 30, after the word "Act," to inserted the words "Provided, That any person whilst engaged in the fulfilment of any lawful public or private duty or business shall not be deemed to be out of his place of abode under extraordinary and suspicious circumstances, and the mere circumstance of any person being out of his place of abode during prohibited hours, shall not of itself, and irrespective of any other circumstances, be deemed to justify such arrest as aforesaid."—(Mr. Marum.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the effect of adopting the Amendment would simply be the negating of the clause. If a man were not out under suspicious circumstances he would not be guilty of an offence. He did hope the hon. Member would not press the Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

VOL. CCLXX. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. LABOUCHERE moved, in page 4, line 30, after "Act," to insert—

But in case he shall so satisfy the Court, he shall be entitled to such sum as the Court shall deem to be sufficient indemnity for loss of time or any other damage caused by such arrest."

The object of the Amendment was that in case a person was unfairly or unjustly arrested, he should have some species of indemnity. The Home Secretary would say that compensation was not given in England when a person had been arrested on suspicion, and he had not been found guilty; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman must bear in mind that this was quite an exceptional case. A respectable man might be walking along the road, when any policeman, believing him to be on some suspicious errand, could arrest him, lock him up for the night, and bring him before a magistrate the next morning. The man might lose a certain amount of money by the arrest; in any case he would lose a certain amount of time; and he (Mr. Labouchere) would suggest that some little indemnity should be granted to the man wrongfully accused. He did not ask that the indemnity should be paid out of the Consolidated Fund, but out of the local rates, or out of the surplus revenue of the Irish Church Fund. It was a matter of perfect indifference to him from what source the money was obtained, provided compensation was paid whenever loss or damage had been sustained by the action of the police.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not entitled to move any Amendment which involves an expenditure from the Public Exchequer. This Amendment does not come at all within the scope of the clause.

MR. HEALY asked if the Amendment would not be in Order if it provided that the compensation should be paid out of the local rates?

THE CHAIRMAN: That can be done if the Committee so decides.

MR. HEALY submitted that the hon. Gentleman would be in Order in proposing that the indemnity should be paid out of the county rates.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member might make such a Motion.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he would move that the indemnity be paid out of the county rates, or the surplus of the Church Fund.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 30, after the word "Act," to insert the words "but in case he shall so satisfy the Court, he shall be entitled to such sum as the Court shall deem to be sufficient indemnity for loss of time or any other damage caused by such arrest out of the county rates."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was rather late for the hon. Member to propose this Amendment. The arrest of people might become to them, under such an Amendment, a very lucrative occupation. A man might make himself suspicious in order to be arrested at night, and get an indemnity the next morning.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, the object of the Amendment was to place some little check upon the overweening zeal of the Irish police, and some check was certainly necessary. It was all very well for the Home Secretary to imagine extreme cases from his point of view. Why not the Irish Members imagine extreme cases from their point of view? Why could not they imagine an over-zealous policeman having a desire to arrest a man, no matter whether he had good cause or not? It was not likely that a policeman would get into any trouble if he made an unjust arrest; but, on the contrary, he would get credit from his superior officer for being extremely zealous and active. Let them imagine another case. The Home Secretary had a way of giving wings and freedom to his imagination. Let them try something of the same style of argument, and let them suppose the case of a policeman or magistrate who had any spite against a particular individual. Under this clause, it would be in the power of these officials to arrest the man if he happened to be out at night, and bring him up next day only to send him about his business again. The police and magistrates could, under this clause, harass and annoy the people, although they might not always be able to inflict punishment upon them. He did not think that was a far-fetched supposition; indeed, it was more reasonable than the humorous idea which had been laid before the Committee by the Home Secretary.

MR. GIBSON said, no Amendment could possibly be more unpopular with the tenants; and he was sure that if the hon. Member knew that the money proposed to be given would neither come out of his own pocket, nor out of the pockets of the landlords, he would at once withdraw his proposal.

MR. SEXTON hailed with satisfaction the appearance of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) as champion of the tenants of Ireland.

MR. SYNAN said, the proposal would, if accepted, inflict a pecuniary loss upon those whose interests the hon. Member advocated. Why should innocent ratepayers suffer in having to provide compensation for wrongs thus inflicted upon other innocent ratepayers?

MR. GILL said, as there seemed to be an agreement that this expense should not fall on the ratepayers, he would suggest a less objectionable course, that would save the rates, and, at the same time, curb the excessive zeal of the Constabulary, and that was to make the money chargeable on the £180,000 about to be voted to the Irish Constabulary.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. MARUM moved to add, at the end of the clause—

"Provided, That if he decline to tender himself for examination as such witness, the ordinary presumption of innocence shall not be thereby rebutted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, it was impossible to accept the Amendment; it must be a matter left to the discretion of the magistrates and the Court to deal with. They could not tell the magistrate what he must think of the conduct of a person under such circumstances.

Amendment negatived.

MR. METGE said, he had an Amendment to propose which he thought the Government could accept. It was one of considerable importance to the poorer classes, because it was probable that among these a great number of arrests would be made, and the children and families of the person arrested might have to suffer considerable privation on account of the suspicion of crime upon which the arrest was made. There was nothing exceptional in the words he wished to add at the end of the clause; it was merely assimilating the Bill to the law as it stood in England under 12 & 13 Vict., where there was a clause extending the right of Poor Law relief to families of persons confined in gaol or other places of custody; whereas, in Ireland, Poor Law allowances could only be extended to families of persons incapacitated from mental or bodily infirmity. So, in the case of any person arrested under this Act, his family would be excluded from the benefit of outdoor relief. The persons likely to be arrested under this Act were of the labouring class, shop-assistants, and the lower class of artizans, just the classes whose families were least able to support themselves when the male head of the family was taken from them. For this reason he thought the Government should accept the Amendment. He moved similar words to the Act of last year, and after some hesitation the Government accepted them, and to his own knowledge they proved a considerable benefit to poor people. The chief reason which he would press upon the Government was this—that hardly as the Coercion Act bore upon the people of Ireland, one of its worst features was the fruit that it inevitably bore, and one of the most bitter feelings raised among the people was that not only were they liable to arbitrary arrest, but that arrest included misery and destitution to the members of their families.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, at end, to add "the family, if any, of any person detained under this Act, shall not thereby be incapacitated from receiving outdoor relief, if otherwise qualified to receive it, but shall in all cases be dealt with by the board of guardians of their respective unions in the same manner as if the person so detained under this Act had been suffering from mental or bodily infirmity."—(Mr. Metge.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. HEALY said, he thought the words were better as they were to be found in the Coercion Act of last year, and they would come at the end of the Bill. Those words were that the provisions of the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act of 1880, and as amended by the Act of the same year, should apply so far as outdoor relief was concerned. He would suggest, as regarded these provisions, that during the continuance of this Act they should be extended; but whether the Amendment should come here or at the end of the Bill was another matter. But he trusted the Government, if they did not accept the Amendment now, would not exclude it from their consideration later on. Then, perhaps, his hon. Friend would be induced to move the Amendment in the form of the Act of last year later on. The Committee had now reached a time when, perhaps, it was too late to consider the matter, unless the Government had made up their minds on the point.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, if the Amendment were accepted, its proper place would not be at the end of this clause. If the Amendment were brought up on Report it should receive every consideration meanwhile; but he could make no promise on it.

MR. METGE really thought the Government might make some promise. It was a matter of the greatest importance, and there was no possible reason urged against the Amendment. With the intention of raising it later on he would now withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SEXTON said, it would be admitted as a fact that the crimes and acts that this Bill was intended to repress were connected with rural life and occupations with which cities and towns had no connection. In towns people moved about upon their ordinary lawful business at a much later hour. Were the Government willing to accept some such provision as this—

"Provided, That no arrest shall be made under this clause at an earlier hour than ten o'clock at night in any city or town in Ireland."

He begged to move an Amendment in those words.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, of course the Committee understood that this clause would only apply to proclaimed districts, and it was unlikely that towns would be proclaimed. And then it was very difficult at the moment to provide a definition of the term "town," should it be municipal borough, or Parliamentary borough, or what else. If the Amendment were brought up on Report the Government would take it into consideration; but they could not accept it now. There was some force in the observations made by the hon. Member; but, in the absence of the Home Secretary, the only promise that could be made was that the Amendment should be considered.

MR. HEALY said, the contention all along had been that this clause was intended to deal with "Moonlight" outrages, and therefore there was every justification for the Amendment.

MR. LEAMY said, as to the remark of the Attorney General, that towns were not proclaimed, he would remind the Committee that the town he represented was proclaimed a few months after the Coercion Act was passed, and ever since. Against the evidence of Judges of Assize and the Judges of County Courts, that the town was perfectly free from agrarian crime, the town had remained proclaimed by the Lord Lieutenant. So he did not think that there was any reason to believe that towns would not be proclaimed under the Bill.

MR. SEXTON said, he would consent to withdraw the Amendment now, and if the Government did not put down a similar Amendment he would move it on Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill?"

MR. DILLON said, before the clause was passed, he would urge upon the Government that they should consider, between this and the next stage of the Bill, a reduction in the punishment to be inflicted under this clause. It was monstrous that a penalty of six months' imprisonment should be inflicted, and where, as he had succeeded in demonstrating, of necessity a great many innocent men must suffer. He did not know how the clause could be worked without dragging a number of innocent men to prison, and he thought the Government might be content with one month's imprisonment as the penalty.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, with a view to meeting the point raised, the Government would consider whether any modification could be made in the punishment.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 98; Noes 27: Majority 71.

AYES.

Acland, Sir T. D.	Alexander, Colonel
Agnew, W.	Allen, H. G.
Ainsworth, D.	Armitage, B.

Armitstead, G.	Hibbert, J. T.
Asher, A.	Holland, Sir H. T.
Ashmead-Bartlett, E.	Holms, J.
Balfour, J. B.	Howard, E. S.
Bass, Sir A.	Illingworth, A.
Borlase, W. C.	James, Sir H.
Brand, H. R.	Johnson, W. M.
Brassey, Sir T.	Lawrence, W.
Bright, rt. hon. J.	Lea, T.
Brise, Colonel R.	Leake, R.
Brooks, W. C.	Leatham, W. H.
Brown, A. H.	Lee, H.
Bruce, rt. hon. Lord C.	Lefevre, right hon. G.
Buxton, F. W.	J. S.
Campbell, Lord C.	Leigh, R.
Campbell, R. F. F.	Long, W. H.
Campbell-Bannerman, H.	Mackintosh, C. F.
Causton, R. K.	Macnaghten, E.
Chamberlain, rt. hn. J.	Monk, C. J.
Cohen, A.	Morley, A.
Cotes, C. C.	Mundella, rt. hn. A. J.
Courtney, L. H.	Onslow, D.
Dickson, T. A.	Paget, T. T.
Digby, Col. hon. E.	Parker, C. S.
Dilke, Sir C. W.	Percy, Lord A.
Dodds, J.	Plunket, rt. hon. D. R.
Dodson, rt. hon. J. G.	Porter, A. M.
Dundas, hon. J. C.	Powell, W. R. H.
Elliot, hon. A. R. D.	Pugh, L. P.
Farquharson, Dr. R.	Richardson, T.
Fenwick-Bisset, M.	Schreiber, C.
Foljambe, C. G. S.	Scott, M. D.
Forster, Sir C.	Severne, J. E.
Fort, R.	Simon, Serjeant J.
Fowler, R. N.	Stanley, hon. E. L.
Fry, L.	Stanton, W. J.
Gibson, rt. hon. E.	Stewart, J.
Givan, J.	Tavistock, Marquess of
Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.	Warton, C. N.
Grafton, F. W.	Wagh, E.
Grant, A.	Whitley, E.
Grey, A. H. G.	Williams, S. C. E.
Harcourt, rt. hon. Sir	Wilson, I.
W. G. V. V.	Wodehouse, E. R.
Hartington, Marq. of	Woodall, W.
Hayter, Sir A. D.	Wortley, C. B. Stuart-
Heneage, E.	TELLERS.
Herschell, Sir F.	Grosvenor, Lord R.
	Kensington, Lord

NOES.

Biggar, J. G.	Nolan, Colonel J. P.
Byrne, G. M.	O'Connor, T. P.
Callan, P.	O'Donnell, F. H.
Commings, A.	O'Gorman Mahon, Col.
Corbet, W. J.	The
Dillon, J.	O'Kelly, J.
Dillwyn, L. L.	Parnell, C. S.
Gill, H. J.	Sexton, T.
Healy, T. M.	Sheil, E.
Labouchere, H.	Smithwick, J. F.
Leamy, E.	Sullivan, T. D.
M'Carthy, J.	Synan, E. J.
Martin, P.
Marum, E. M.	TELLERS.
Metge, R. H.	Power, R.
Molloy, B. C.	Redmond, J. E.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter-after
Two o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 19th June, 1882.

MINUTES.]—Sat First in Parliament—The Lord Erskine, after the death of his father.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Local Government Provisional Order (No. 11)* (152); Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (No. 5)* (153).

Second Reading—Election of Representative Peers (Ireland)* (137); Public Health (Fruit-Pickers' Lodgings)* (127); Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 3)* (122); Local Government Provisional Order (Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings)* (121); Tramways Provisional Orders* (125); Tramways Provisional Orders (No. 2)* (126); Intermediate Education (Ireland) (138); County Courts (Ireland) (105); Somersham Rectory (116).

Second Reading—Referred to Select Committee—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment (60).

Committee—Report—Elementary Education Provisional Orders Confirmation (Finchley, &c.)* (63); Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders (No. 2)* (123).

Third Reading—Pluralities Acts Amendment* (139); Places of Worship Sites Amendment* (141), and passed.

Royal Assent—Documentary Evidence [45 Vict. c. 9]; Military Manœuvres [45 Vict. c. 10]; Public Health (Scotland) Act Amendment [45 Vict. c. 11]; Militia Storehouses [45 Vict. c. 12]; Commonable Rights [45 Vict. c. 15]; Arklow Harbour [45 Vict. c. 13]; Metropolis Management and Building Acts (Amendment) [45 Vict. c. 14]; Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Act (1874) Amendment [45 Vict. c. 16]; Local Government Provisional Order (Highways) [45 Vict. c. xxvi]; Commons Regulation Provisional Orders [45 Vict. c. xxvii]; Inclosure (Arkleside) Provisional Order [45 Vict. c. xxviii]; Inclosure (Bettws Disserth) Provisional Order [45 Vict. c. xxix]; Inclosure (Cefn Drawen) Provisional Order [45 Vict. c. xxx]; Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Order [45 Vict. c. xxxi]; Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Ballymena, &c.) [45 Vict. c. xxxii]; Local Government Provisional Orders [45 Vict. c. xxxiii]; Local Government Provisional Orders (Poor Law) [45 Vict. c. xxxiv].

BILLS OF SALE ACT (1878) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 60.)

(The Lord Coleridge.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD COLERIDGE, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the object it had in view was to do away with a great and serious evil, which was increasing yearly to a very large extent—namely, the oppression of poor and ignorant borrowers among the artizan or working classes by the lowest and most unscrupulous class of money-lenders. The latter usually obtained the power to seize at once the property and goods of the borrowers, and this power, created by Judge-made law, had been much extended by the Judges. As a rule, bills of sale had been interpreted by the Courts of this country to pass all property which came afterwards into the possession of the grantor, although it had not been made originally part of the grant in the bill of sale. That must necessarily be very hard upon honest traders; because the result was that a dishonest man who made a bill of sale and passed all his existing property to a money-lender, passed also to him goods which afterwards came to the grantor in the way of his trade, although they might not have been paid for. That operation of bills of sale was, to some extent, controlled by a section in the Bankruptcy Act of 1869, which had this effect—that all goods in the hands of a bankrupt, although he might have given a bill of sale, yet if they were in his order and disposition at the time of the bankruptcy, passed to the general body of creditors. In 1877 the number of bills of sale under £50 was 4,802 in England, and the amount secured by them was £125,597. In 1880, the number was 38,177, and the sum secured £715,000. The smaller bills of sale given to money-lenders were undoubtedly very oppressive, and the interest exacted was often outrageous. He held in his hand a copy of a bill of sale, which contained no less than 21 conditions of forfeiture. It was only with bills of sale of that kind that the measure was intended to interfere. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had sent circulars to the County Court Judges and other officials, asking for their views on the proposed legislation, and, speaking generally, the answers were in favour of it. About 82 answers were received, most of which were, on the whole, in favour of the measure he was now advocating. Last year a Bill similar to the present one was introduced in the House of Commons, and referred to a Select Committee, composed of Members of high character and great authority.

Among the witnesses examined before it was a money-lender, who, with singular frankness, admitted that it would be to the advantage of the poor if they were not able to borrow money on bills of sale. The measure, which had failed to pass in the House of Commons last year, in consequence of the pressure of other Business, had this year been read a third time in that House, with the unanimous approval of the Chambers of Commerce and of the persons interested in the question. Among the chief provisions of the Bill was a clause requiring that every bill of sale should, as a matter of course, be registered, and that to each a schedule must be attached, containing a clear description on its face of the property to which the document referred. Another provision was that property acquired by the grantor after the execution of the instrument should not pass under the bill of sale. By a third clause it was proposed to enact that every bill of sale must be properly attested, and must bear on its face proof that a competent person had explained its contents to the grantor. By another provision, bills of sale for sums under £50 were declared absolutely void. He hoped their Lordships, by passing this Bill, would prevent the granting of such bills of sale as he held in his hand, the conditions of which were oppressive, and the interest on which was excessive. The accommodation furnished by such bills was small, it was granted on ruinous terms, and consequently the whole of the property was often swept away. It was to distinguish such bills of sale as those from the bond fide ones granted in mercantile transactions that the Bill was introduced. A good deal of evidence was laid before the Select Committee, to which this matter was referred by the other House, as to the point at which bills of sale should not be allowed, and he would recommend their Lordships to read that evidence, from which they would see that most ruinous rates of interest were charged. There had also been considerable difference of opinion in the answers to the Lord Chancellor's circular, some persons thinking that bills of sale should not be granted for less than £50, and others thinking that the minimum should be higher; but, with a single exception, the House of Commons' Committee was unanimous in fixing £50 as the amount below which no bill of sale should be granted. He would now ask their Lordships to give a second reading to the Bill.

Lord Coleridge

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Coleridge.)

EARL CAIRNS said, he did not rise to offer any opposition to the second reading of the Bill, indeed he thought it was a measure that it would be as well to pass into law; but, at the same time, seeing how very much it touched the commerce of the country, he thought their Lordships would do well to give the details of the measure a good deal of consideration before they determined to do so. If the Bill was not to go before a Select Committee, it would be all the more necessary. He had received representations from various parts of the country, which satisfied him that there was much difference of opinion with regard to the Bill. He did not see on what principle it was, if a man was engaged in trade, that they should say—"You shall not borrow money on a bill of sale under £50, but you may on a bill above that amount." If there was any advantage at all in giving bills of sale, he could not see why the poor man should be prohibited from availing himself of the advantage, though he quite admitted that it was, no doubt, hard when a man found that articles which he had supplied on credit, perhaps, to a very considerable value, were swept away by means of a bill of sale; but as those instruments were registered documents, people in trade could protect themselves. He would suggest that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked whether there was no innovation in that part of the Bill which referred to giving a bill of sale on growing crops, and which seemed like an advertisement for money-lenders? He also thought growing crops required some definition. Would bills of sale date from the time seed was put into the ground, or from the time when it came up?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was glad no one was going to oppose the second reading of the Bill; but he must express his concurrence in the opinion of his noble and learned Friend opposite (Earl Cairns), that the details of the Bill would require their Lordships' careful consideration. If the Bill could be referred to a Select Committee, as his noble and learned Friend opposite had suggested, it might be advantageous for that purpose; but if the convenience of their Lordships would not admit of a Select Committee, it was all the more desirable that the Bill should be carefully considered in that House. With respect to the surprising increase alleged to have taken place in the number of bills of sale, particularly for small amounts, since the passing of the Act of 1878, there was, he thought, a simple explanation, which would prevent the inference being drawn which would attribute that increase to the Act of 1878. The law formerly was that a bill of sale must be registered within, he thought, 21 days, and it would be in force in the meantime. But there was nothing whatever to prevent the bill of sale from being re-granted from time to time before the 21 days had expired; and the consequence was, under the operation of that law, that a bill of sale might never be put upon the register at all. It was found, therefore, that numbers of bills of sale were renewed before the expiration of the 21 days, they being, in the meantime, perfectly valid. The Act of 1878, however, provided, very stringently, that a bill of sale must be registered within seven days, and that, if not registered within that time, no renewal of it should be valid. The consequence was that all, or almost all, the bills of sale actually granted were forced upon the register. Therefore, it was not that the Act of 1878 called a number of bills of sale into existence, but that, all being obliged to be registered, the true number and extent of the transactions was disclosed. He doubted whether the Act of 1878 gave any stimulus to that class of transactions. As for the proposal to abolish all bills of sale under £50, he admitted that, if practicable, it was desirable that the State should protect poor persons against the extortions of usurers; but it was a strong measure to compel such persons to go into bankruptcy, or to break up their business, instead of dealing with their property for the purpose of raising money. The evidence to which the noble and learned Lord (Lord Coleridge) had referred might probably justify the conclusions which he had drawn from it; but the provisions of the Bill unquestionably required very careful consideration. For instance, there was a clause enumerating several acts, all depending on the grantor of the bill of sale, which if the grantor did not do, the grantee could not take possession. Another clause dealt with the contingency of bankruptcy within 12 months after the granting of a bill of sale, and virtually provided that, unless, within that period, the grantee took possession, he must lose the benefit of his security, although, under the former clause, he could not take possession, except in certain circumstances which, as far as he was concerned, might never occur. The restrictions, indeed, were so numerous as to leave him (the Lord Chancellor) to doubt whether any persons would be willing to lend either a great or a small sum on such terms. He did not say that there were not proper and useful provisions in the Bill; but he thought, without expressing a final opinion on the subject, that the clauses he had mentioned might profitably be examined by a Select Committee.

LORD COLERIDGE said, he was quite willing, if it was the general wish of their Lordships, that the course recommended by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack should be adopted.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and referred to a Select Committee.

EGYPT—THE SUEZ CANAL.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

LORD LAMINGTON, in rising to call the attention of the House to the balance sheet of the Suez Canal, said, that he was anxious not to say one word that might embarrass the Government in the present serious state of Egyptian affairs; but the shareholders of the Suez Canal had recently held a meeting in Paris, and the Report submitted to them was so remarkable that it seemed to him desirable to bring it under the notice of their Lordships and the country, in order that the Government should state what amount of control they exercised over the Canal. As the House knew, the Canal was opened in 1869. In the following year 490 ships passed through it, with a gross tonnage of 486,000 tons. In 1879, 1,477 ships passed through, of a tonnage of 3,236,000 tons; in 1880, 2,026, of a tonnage of 4,344,000; in 1881, 2,727, with a tonnage of 5,794,000. The result of all this was that the net profit, after deducting 5 per cent for the reserve fund, amounted to about 14 or 15 per cent. The Report went on to say that last year's figures showed an increase on those of 1880 of 34 per cent in the number of vessels and the tonnage, and of 28½ per cent in the amount of the receipts, and he (Lord Lamington) supposed that altogether such a balance-sheet of such an undertaking was never presented before. Seven new permanent services for the Canal were inaugurated last year—the British India, the German, the Thames and Mersey, a French one to Mauritius and Réunion, a Dutch one to Java, an English one for the same destination, and a Chinese line, the China Merchants' Steam Navigation Company. The vessels bound direct for Australia numbered 98, as against 51 in the year 1880. This steady increase had been maintained in spite of the fact that freights to India and the East had been so low as hardly to yield the barest profit to the shippers. The Canal, in fact, tended more and more, year by year, to become the sole International highway between the East and the West, as well as between Europe and Australasia. Now, as 78 or 79 per cent of the total number of ships passing through the Canal in 1881 carried the British flag, that fact was sufficient to show the enormous importance of the Canal to the trade of Great Britain. There was, however, another reason which made it specially necessary at the present moment to draw the attention of the Government to this part of the Egyptian question, and it was this—half the Canal, the part connecting Ismailia with Port Said, depended for its water supply on the fresh-water canal which passed Ismailia, turned southward, and ended at Suez. This supply was both precarious and insufficient, and if it were interrupted would render Port Said uninhabitable, and would necessitate the abandonment of many stations on the Canal. That was exceedingly important, especially as he found that the officials of the water company that supplied Alexandria had given notice of the suspension of their works in consequence of the state of the country. It thus appeared that the water supply of Alexandria might be cut off at any moment, from which the most serious consequences must follow, to say nothing of the fact that the proposed new fresh-water canal, which, according to the Report, had become very desirable, and as to which measures had been taken for its construction, had now been suspended owing to the troubled state of the country. He had taken upon himself to point out, 15 years ago, that the Suez Canal would eventually become the high road between England and India, where we had 250,000,000 subjects, and the prediction had been fulfilled. Therefore, it was impossible to exaggerate the importance of this question, as regarded our interests in it; and in order to show what others thought of it, he would ask their Lordships' attention to a despatch of M. Barthélemy St. Hilaire, who said that England furnished nearly all the custom, and that the Canal was the indispensable route which placed her in communication with that incomparable Colony which she possessed in India. It was said that there was to be a European Conference, and he (Lord Lamington) believed that the assembling hereafter of all the Powers at a Conference, with Turkey sending her Representative, would be attended with beneficial results; but to hold one at the present moment would be like building a lifeboat whilst the vessel was hurrying to destruction, or constructing a fire-escape when the building was in flames. With or without allies we were bound to protect our interests, independent of any other country. The result, so far, of our interference seemed to be that all the Powers were afraid of each other. France was afraid of the Sultan, England would not act without France, Italy would not act without the other Powers—and, in fact, the only person who was not afraid was Arabi Pasha, who set everybody at defiance. There was no time for a Conference, because in one week the Suez Canal might be in jeopardy. He did not say there should be any interference in the internal affairs of Egypt, because he was not sure that it was within our right to do so; but trying to protect the Canal could in no way be said to be interfering with the general policy of the country at all; and when our own interests were at stake, together with the lives and property of Her Majesty's subjects, they were bound to interfere when necessary. If France had gone before us, so much the better; but, come what would, we were bound to protect the rights of our countrymen and the trade of our country. We ought to act in independence of other countries, stating that we did not wish to interfere with any internal arrangement. What had been done by the Government in sending ships to Alexandria without troops on board was of as much utility as—

Lord Lamington

“A painted ship Upon a painted ocean,” and like sending a body without a soul. What the Government ought to do was to take such measures as would prove effectual in the protection of the Canal, and not in this matter to rely on France or any other Power, but to see that the interests of England, which were paramount above all others, would be duly considered and conserved. In conclusion, he would ask Her Majesty's Government whether they possessed any control over the management and maintenance of the Canal?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I should be the very last person to charge the noble Lord opposite (Lord Lamington) with introducing Questions merely with a view of embarrassing Her Majesty's Government. The noble Lord puts Questions and discusses subjects in which he takes an interest always in the most courteous manner. I must say I can conceive no subject of greater interest than the one the noble Lord's Question is upon, none your Lordships take a deeper interest in, or to which Her Majesty's Government attach greater importance. At the same time, I must point out to my noble Friend that his Question hardly led me to anticipate the exact line he was going to take. The Notice on the Paper is—

“To call attention to the balance sheet of the Suez Canal, and to ask Her Majesty's Government whether they possess any control over the management and maintenance of the Canal.”

The noble Lord himself gave some figures—some very striking figures, and I believe he gave them quite accurately—as to the balance-sheet of the Canal. As to the control Her Majesty's Government have over the management and maintenance of the Canal, no doubt the noble Lord knows exactly how the matter stands. We receive no share of the earnings of the Canal until 1894; but we receive from the Khedive 5 per cent upon the purchase money of our shares. We have nominated three competent men as members of the Board of Directors, who represent the British Government on the Board—Colonel Stokes, Sir Rivers Wilson, and Mr. Stanley. The two former gentlemen watch all financial matters, and attend every monthly meeting of the Board, and the latter is the resident director in Paris, a member of the managing committee, and sends the Government information of everything that occurs there. In fact, they all three report constantly to Her Majesty's Government upon all matters affecting either the financial or the general interests of this country, and I am informed that they have great influence upon the Board, and are treated with great consideration by the French directors. The noble Lord went into a much larger question, one which very properly occupies the public mind to a great extent at the present moment. I can only say as to that question that it does not escape the attention of Her Majesty's Government, and we attach absolutely the same importance that the noble Lord does to the enormous interest England possesses in the Suez Canal.

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (IRELAND) BILL.—(No 138.)
(The Lord O'Hagan.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD O'HAGAN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was to alter to a large extent an existing Act of Parliament. Their Lordships would remember that in 1878 the noble and learned Earl, the then Lord Chancellor (Earl Cairns), introduced into their Lordships' House a Bill for the improvement of intermediate education in Ireland. That was a very wise, just, and impartial measure. Their Lordships accepted it unanimously, and it went through the House of Commons also with unanimity. The Act then passed was received in Ireland with uniform favour on all sides. It created great emulation, and, at the same time, it created new schools, improved the old schools, and gave a wonderful stimulus to the education of the country. The funds for carrying out the new system, which were taken from the Church Surplus Fund, proved, however, to be inadequate for the purpose, and when the Bill passed the House £1,000,000 was allocated by Vote to purposes of in-intermediate education in Ireland. But that arrangement regarded only the boys of Ireland, and it was not contemplated that the girls should come within the operations of the measure at all. The change, however, was proposed in the House of Commons, and it was unanimously agreed that the Bill should apply to girls as well as boys. As was pointed out at the time, the result of the change was likely to be that the £1,000,000, although it was believed that it would be adequate for the young males, would not be adequate when the addition of the girls was made. It was stated that a difficulty would arise, and the noble and learned Earl (Earl Cairns) pledged the Government that if there should be, as anticipated, a want of additional means for this great national purpose, the question of supplying these means would be considered by the Government. The figures showing the progress of the system were remarkable, and might be of interest to their Lordships. In the year 1879—the Bill having passed in 1878—there were 3,671 boys and 979 girls under the scheme—a total of 4,650. In 1880, there were 4,693 boys and 1,477 girls—a total of 6,170; in 1881, the boys were 5,714, and the girls, 2,033—a total of 7,747. That showed a marvellous progress and a very satisfactory state of things indeed. But the result was that the Commissioners of Intermediate Education, applying themselves to the changed circumstances which were created by the addition of the girls, found that their means were not sufficient to meet the demands for result fees, exhibitions, and prizes which it was necessary to give for the purpose of carrying on the system, and in the year 1881 there came a deficit. There was consequently at that moment, he (Lord O'Hagan) was sorry to say, a considerable deficit with reference to the existing operations of the system, and it would be necessary for the Government to look carefully into the matter, and to fulfil, in the case of this system of intermediate education, the promise made by their Predecessors. But in the meantime, in the year 1879-80, there was a considerable surplus—a surplus of some £8,000 or £10,000; in 1881 that surplus became a deficit. The Act of Parliament provided that the Commissioners could accumulate the surplus from year to year and capitalize it; but it deprived them of the power of applying the surplus that might be accumulated one year to supplying a deficit of another year. The object of the present Bill was to give the Commissioners power to apply the surplus of 1879-80 to the deficit of 1881, and would give them continuous powers hereafter to apply surpluses in the same way. He would ask them to give the Bill a second reading.

Lord O'Hagan

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord O'Hagan.)

On Question? Resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House Tomorrow.

In reply to a Question upon the subject,

LORD O'HAGAN said, that the Treasury had not been yet applied to, as it was only a power to use money already in hand; but if there were still a deficit, the small amount necessary to defray it would come out of the Disestablished Church Surplus.

COUNTY COURTS (IRELAND) BILL.

(The Lord O'Hagan.)

(NO. 105.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD O'HAGAN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that it would, if passed, facilitate and improve the means of obtaining appeals from the County Courts in Ireland. There were certain difficulties existing under the present law. Certain cases disposed of by the County Courts were not appealable; and the object of the Bill was to give an appeal in every case, except those which came within the late Acts of Parliament dealing with the equitable jurisdiction of the County Courts. The second object of this legislation was to give an opportunity of appealing, which at present could only be done whilst the County Court was sitting, after the sittings of the Court had terminated. If that were not done, there would be in many cases a defeat of justice. The Bill also provided that certain jurisdiction should be given to County Courts in Ireland which they did not at present possess—one of which was to allow executors to administer, within certain limits, the assets in the County Courts; and also to give County Courts jurisdiction in cases where there had been mistake or fraud, and where the County Courts had not, up to the present, been able to take action under the existing law. He believed, in both these cases, it was considered a matter of great hardship that people having to deal only with small cases should be compelled to go to the Courts of Chancery, and incur enormous expense, where the matter at issue was often of a trifling amount. He would conclude by moving the second reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord O'Hagan.)

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN said, he did not wish to oppose the Bill. It, however, gave an absolutely unlimited right of appeal; and it was not, in his opinion, always of advantage to a poor person that there should be a right of appeal in his case. Such a power might often have the effect of defeating the ends of justice, and he thought a person making an appeal should have to show good grounds for doing so. There should, moreover, be no right of appeal in actions of debt under a certain amount, otherwise it might be possible for a rich man to crush a poor man by insisting on his right of appeal. Then the appeal was to a Judge of Assize; and, unfortunately—or fortunately as some think—in Ireland the Assizes only took place twice a-year, and a considerable amount of time might thus elapse before an appeal could possibly be heard. There was a Winter Assize, and he would suggest that appeals should be heard before the Judges who went on those Assizes. He saw that the Bill made it unnecessary that an affidavit should be made by the appellant that the appeal was not made for the purpose of delay. That would be a bad provision, and he trusted the noble and learned Lord (Lord O'Hagan) would see the desirability of taking it out of the Bill.

On Question? Resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

SOMERSHAM RECTORY BILL.

(The Earl of Powis.)

(No. 116.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF POWIS, in moving that the Bill be now read 2^a, said, its object was to provide that four-sevenths of the income of the rectory should be enjoyed by the Regius Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, while three-sevenths should be allotted to the clergyman who was in charge of the parish, subject to the obligation to maintain two curates.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Powis.)

On Question? Resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read 2^a accordingly.

House adjourned at Six o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 19th June, 1882.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—Robert William Duff, esquire, for the County of Banff.

SELECT COMMITTEE—Report—Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings [No. 235].

PRIVATE BILLS (by Order)—Considered as amended—Accrington Improvement (changed from "Accrington Extension and Improvement"); Blackburn Improvement; Bolton Improvement; Chadderton Improvement*; Macclesfield Corporation*; Manchester Corporation; Newcastle-upon-Tyne Improvement*.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Highway Rate and Expenditure* [209].

Second Reading—Petty Sessions (Ireland) [203].

Committee—Prevention of Crime (Ireland) [157]
—R.P. [Fourteenth Night].

Committee—Report—Copyright (Musical Compositions) [161].

Third Reading—Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (No. 5)* [160]; Local ment Provisional Order (No. 11)* [186], and passed.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

BLACKBURN IMPROVEMENT

BILL (by Order).

CONSIDERATION, AS AMENDED.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be now considered."—(Sir Charles Forster.)

MR. HOPWOOD, in moving, as an Amendment—

"That it is inexpedient to proceed with the consideration of the Improvement Bills, or any of them, included in the reference to the Committee on Sanitary and Police Clauses of March 13th, 1882, unless such portions thereof as create local sanitary or police law, exceptional to the Law of the Realm, be omitted therefrom," said, he was quite sensible that his Amendment was somewhat ill-timed, considering the present block of the Business of the House; but he hoped that indulgence would be extended to him while he pointed out that this was a continuation of what he considered to be a useful protest in regard to legislation in this direction which he had made a few weeks ago. It would be in the recollection of the House that certain Bills which were connected with sanitary arrangements and police matters had been referred to a Select Committee; and the whole of those Bills now stood on the Paper for further consideration. He had objected to them when they were originally before the House, on the ground that a large number of provisions were contained in them which would, if they were passed, effect an alteration in the general law of the land; and that it was inexpedient to sanction such provisions in Private Bills.

ROYAL ASSENT.

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners;—

The House went;—and being returned:—

MR. SPEAKER reported the Royal Assent to several Bills.

BLACKBURN IMPROVEMENT BILL.

Question again proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be now considered."

MR. HOPWOOD, resuming, said, he had been explaining to the House the position of this matter. On the 13th March it was ordered by the House—

"That the Committee of Selection do appoint a Committee, not exceeding Seven in number, to whom shall be referred all private Bills promoted by Municipal and other local Authorities, by which it is proposed to create powers relating to Police or Sanitary Regulations which deviate from, or are in extension of, or repugnant to, the general Law; and that it be an Instruction to such Committee to make a Special Report to this House in respect of any such powers as the Committee may sanction, together with the reasons on which the grant of such powers are recommended and the recent precedents applicable to the case."

That Order was acted upon, and these Bills were referred to a Committee of hon. Members specially selected for the purpose; and, so far as he (Mr. Hopwood) was concerned, he would join in bearing his testimony to the able manner in which the Committee had discharged their duties, and had complied with the general directions of the Instruction they had received from the House. Nevertheless, he had still to call attention to some matters, although not in a sense of hostility, in these Private Bills which had not been reported upon by the Committee, in the hope that in future precautions would be taken to prevent the inconvenient course adopted in the present case from becoming a precedent. The House knew what the general mode was of introducing Improvement Bills of this sort. The Bill itself usually had in view some special wants of the town in connection with which it was introduced, such as gas, or water, or possibly highways. There might be some special demand which called for legislation, and for legislation which might be properly applied locally. But when the Bill was brought in due form before the Corporation, some member of the Corporation, who had some "fad" upon some other general subject—perhaps of health—availed himself of the opportunity of converting the measure into an Omnibus Bill, so as to include in it a number of other matters on which he thought legislation might be fairly and effectively introduced. The Corporation thereupon set to work to see how this was to be done. It was provided by the Legislature under Leeman's Act that due notice should be given to the town affected, that a meeting should be called to discuss the proposal, and that nothing whatever should be done without proper information having been conveyed to the people of the town who were interested in the project. But the way in which that provision of that Statute was carried out was to insert a sort of advertisement in the newspapers, intimating that a Bill was about to be promoted in Parliament, containing provisions respecting gas and water, and "for other purposes." Then, under the "other purposes," most important clauses were introduced, often infringing the personal liberty of the subject, and placing every sanitary and police regulation under the exclusive control of a certain class of persons who were, as a general rule, able to introduce such measures as "unopposed." He was sensible that the subject was one to which he could not induce the House to devote all the attention it deserved; but he, nevertheless, felt himself bound to call attention to the matter, and to show the evils which the existing system engendered. As he had already stated, a Select Committee had sat upon these various Bills, and it would probably interest the House to show the nature of the provisions which the Committee had considered it right to cut down. He would refer for an example to the Dundee Police Bill. That Bill contained clauses of this sort—that every person who committed, or attempted to commit, falsehood, fraud, or otherwise, in the course of an investigation before the magistrates, should be liable to imprisonment for 60 days; and that a pawnbroker or broker should, under certain circumstances, be punishable as the receiver of stolen goods. Then there were provisions in regard to disorderly houses, and powers enabling medical men to inspect and examine every house and premises, and every person residing in such house or premises, in order to ascertain if anyone was suffering from any infectious or dangerous disease. There were powers also to issue and enforce regulations in regard to the prevention of disease. A number of these powers were struck out by the Committee before whom the Bill was sent; but not only the Dundee Police Bill, but the Newcastle-on-Tyne Improvement Bill, and various others, contained a number of similar extravagant provisions. He could not say that such provisions were actually applied for by the Corporations interested, because he understood that when a town wanted an Improvement Act, it was the practice to send up general instructions to a Parliamentary agent, who thereupon set to work and included in the Bill every possible provision which any other town in a distant quarter had ever either obtained or sought for. The object of the Act was to try these propositions again before a Committee, who might feel that, in the event of the Bill being unopposed, they were to be passed without question, and in that way a Bill, containing provisions which the Legislature never intended, was passed by a Committee upstairs and became the law of the land. It was as well that the House should know that a Private Act was just as much an Act of Parliament as any public one. It was not generally supposed to be so; but, as a matter of fact, it certainly was so, and hence it was that they had an accumulation of provisions in Private Acts which were contrary to the generally received law of the land. Owing to the adoption, by means of such Private Acts, of peculiar legislation, the law had become as diverse in form in many localities as the numerous laws and jurisdictions which characterized France prior to the Revolution. He believed that, in the Resolutions they had arrived at, the Select Committee had done excellent service; but, although they had rendered excellent service in certain respects, they had thought it right to sanction two long series of sections in the Bill before them, which made a considerable addition to the Sanitary Code, and they had done so, in his (Mr. Hopwood's) opinion, without hearing the people who were interested on the other side. They had trusted altogether to the suggestions of the Local Government Board; and, in doing so, he submitted that they were entirely in error. He would admit that there was great value in having some Department of the State responsible to the House for what was passed in the shape of these Local Bills; but when he found that the Local Government Board were prepared to go in advance of the public mind in regard to sanitary legislation, he contended that a Committee of this kind ought to have exercised its own independent judgment in the matter. He would not go the length of saying that the Committee, in this instance, had not done their duty; but what he did say was that certain objectionable principles which had been pointed out by him had been left untouched, and that alterations of the general law ought not to be made in the shape of Private Statutes. The Committee, in their Report, stated that—

“Anomalies and irregularities have undoubtedly received the sanction without the full knowledge of Parliament; and it appears to the Committee that such provisions, whether punishable or otherwise, should not, as is too often the case, by the mere fact of being unopposed, escape the publicity which their importance demands.”

They then proceeded to say that they had examined the clauses of the Bills submitted to them, and had struck out a large number of clauses proposing to give powers which might be already obtained by means of bye-laws under general Acts. Their defence for sanctioning the two particular sets of clauses they had inserted was, in the first place, in regard to the sanitary regulations, that they were asked for mostly by the medical officers of the Corporations interested. Now, the medical officer of a corporate body might be one of the ablest of men, or he might be, as was too often the case, a practitioner subordinate to many others in the same town, quite inexperienced and unskilled, and yet it was proposed to give him these exceptional and extraordinary powers at his own request. He would give the House one quotation from the evidence to illustrate what he meant. It was the case of Bolton, and a medical officer was called before the Committee in support of a clause conferring exceptional powers in regard to infectious diseases. The clause provided that if any person had resided in a house, or any part of a house, in which there had been within six weeks previously a person suffering from an infectious disease, which house had not been disinfected to the satisfaction of the Corporation, &c., and no person residing in such house, or part of such house, should receive books, &c., on loan from any such house, any person offending being liable to a penalty of 40s. The witness was a Bolton practitioner, who was called in support of the Bolton Bill; and his evidence was to the effect that it was desirable to legislate to prevent the transmission of disease by means of books, letters, pamphlets, and so on. Being asked to give an instance in which a disease had been so transmitted, the witness stated that, about a month or six weeks previously, a case came before him which clearly established that small-pox had been transmitted by that means. The case was that of a young lady engaged in the distribution of tracts from house to house. She caught the disease, and subsequently died; and the witness thought it was quite possible that the work she was engaged in—of distributing tracts in the district—contributed towards the spread of the disease. This was the evidence of a gentleman who was to be charged with the administration of one of these Private Acts which sought to add to his power; and this was the way in which he was prepared to deal with these most important questions. A Member of the Committee asked the witness on what theory he submitted that the young lady had caught the infection from the tracts, and not from contact with any individual she might visited; and the answer was, that she might have done so, but she might also have taken it from the tracts; and he thought the distribution of tracts, under the circumstances, ought not to be allowed. The same Member of the Committee asked him if he had known, in the course of his experience, a case in which an infectious disease had been taken from a monthly magazine. The witness said he could not quite recollect a case in which such a thing had occurred. The question was repeated—“Did you ever know of a case where a disease or disorder was taken from a magazine?” and the answer was—“I do not know of one.” Yet, in the very district to which this evidence applied—namely, Bolton, it had transpired, within the last few days, that a medical gentleman had sent a patient whom he was attending to a small-pox hospital; and yet the patient turned out to be suffering only from measles. These were the men who clamoured for these violent and stringent Acts—persons with peculiar “fads,” at whose instance respectable people were to be conveyed from their residences to hospitals for the treatment of infectious diseases, often in a state in which they were totally unfit to be removed.

Mr. Hopwood

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he rose to Order. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Hopwood) was illustrating his case by quoting a series of clauses which had been disallowed by the Committee, and which were not, therefore, in any of the Bills now before the House. He would ask the Speaker if it was competent for the hon. and learned Gentleman, in moving his Amendment, to apply his argument to provisions which had been struck out of the Bills referred to the Select Committee?

MR. HOPWOOD hoped he might be allowed to explain the reasons which induced him to refer to these matters.

MR. SPEAKER said, the Question before the House was the consideration of the Blackburn Improvement Bill. He did not gather from the observations of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) that his remarks had any relation to that Bill; but he was bound to say that the conversation which was being carried on generally throughout the House prevented him from gathering accurately what the hon. and learned Member's statements exactly were.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he regretted, as much as the right hon. Gentleman, the indisposition of the House to listen to the discussion of these Bills; and he could assure the House that he had undertaken a task which was likely to be of very little profit to himself, and for which he expected to receive a very small modicum of thanks. He begged, however, that for a short time longer the House would extend their forbearance to him, because he felt himself bound to point out certain facts, although he was not in the least degree disposed to enter at length into matters which had been taken from the purview of the House by the very beneficial action of the Select Committee. His illustrations were only meant to show that the authority which had power given to it by one of these Bills to carry into operation very exceptional clauses was a power that was not fit to be entrusted, in an arbitrary manner, with such extraordinary provisions as were sought to be included in Acts of this kind. He only desired now to make one or two observations upon the sanitary regulations dealt with by the Committee. The Committee stated that—

“It must be noticed that the Local Government Board, who are the Department charged with the execution and supervision of the Public Health Acts, have been parties to similar enactments in Provisional Order Bills passed by their authority through Parliament, notably in the case of the Manchester Provisional Order Act, 1878.”

He (Mr. Hopwood) thought this paragraph afforded proof that Imperial legislation was demanded on the question; and that neither the Local Government Board nor any other Department should be allowed by Provisional Orders to sanction regulations deviating from the general law. He believed very few hon. Members knew what was contained in the body of a Bill for giving effect to a Provisional Order. A Bill for confirming a set of Provisional Orders was often addressed to half-a-dozen different centres of population; and in the instance referred to it had dealt with contested matters which were, at that moment, proposed to be dealt with by more than one general Public Bill. He might also point out that the Select Committee, in the conclusions they had arrived at, had not before them the judgment of the population with which these Bills dealt. The people of the localities had not been in the least degree consulted. He had already shown how these things were done; and he would submit that in none of the towns directly interested were the inhabitants generally made acquainted with the nature of the regulations sought to be imposed on them. The Local Government Board recently held an inquiry, with the view of adopting the notification of diseases at the request of the Office of Health, at Rochdale; and there the medical men of the locality, in a large majority, assembled and protested against the proposed action of the local authorities. In Liverpool, when it was attempted to enact similar provisions, 248 signatures against the proposal were immediately obtained representing the immense majority of the medical gentlemen of the town. In Nottingham and in Bolton clauses of this kind had been inserted into Local Bills; but in both places similar objections had been expressed by a numerous section of the inhabitants, and he was satisfied that the vast majority of the medical practitioners of London would resent any such attempt as this to impose exceptional sanitary and police regulations upon the people. A Return had been presented by the Local Government Board as to the effect of legislation in Private or Local Acts upon the question; but such a Return was asked for under circumstances which would insure a favourable answer. Therefore, the answers which had been returned were of a most favourable

13th 1882, unless such portions thereof as create local Sanitary or Police Law exceptional to the Law of the Realm be omitted therefrom."—
(Mr. Hopwood.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) complained that he had undertaken a thankless task in asking the House to reject these Bills; but the hon. and learned Member would remember that the House was much obliged to him three months ago, when he first raised this very important subject. At the hon. and learned Member's instance, the House relegated the whole of these Bills to a Select Committee appointed in a peculiar way. That Committee had taken evidence, and had considered the Bills with great care and attention, having perfect freedom to deal with them under the direction of the House. They had so dealt with them, and, according to the admission of the hon. and learned Member, they had done good service by striking out a great deal of objectionable matter. He thought the hon. and learned Gentleman would have done well if he had refrained from opposing these Bills on the present occasion, especially seeing the indisposition of the House to re-open the question. It was to be presumed that hon. Members interested in the subject had read the Report of the Committee. That Report was extremely clear, and it laid down propositions which he thought would be supported by the House; but if all the result of their labours was to be rejected, upon the floor of the House, after half-an-hour's discussion, it would be very difficult in future to get Committees to undertake these laborious duties. He submitted to the House that they should now allow these Bills to go forward. Considering that the attention of the House had been called to them, and that they had already been cut down from the shape in which they were originally presented, and that certain provisions, which had excited a good deal of observation and opposition, had been struck out of them, the Report of the Committee should receive the sanction of the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman had suggested that the Committee should advise the House as to the manner in which they had dealt with all the questions submitted to them. For his own part, he did not think that that was the duty of the Committee. The Committee had made certain recommendations, and he should be prepared—if no other hon. Member did it—after the close of the debate to give Notice of a Resolution, in the shape of a Standing Order, to carry out in future years the same policy which had been adopted this year in regard to the present Bills. He would suggest that the precedent Parliament had established in regard to the important Private Bills submitted to the Select Committee during the present Session should hereafter be adopted in regard to all similar measures. He was satisfied that great good had resulted from the labours of the Committee, although he did not expect that every hon. Member would be satisfied. Some hon. Members would think the Committee had done too much; while other hon. Members would think they had done too little. What he contended was that the House was not in a position to do justice to the important questions contained in the Report of the Committee. They ought, therefore, to allow the Bills to go forward, in order that they might be sent up to the House of Lords, where there would be another opportunity of re-examining them.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT said, his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) was scarcely reasonable in putting half-a-dozen Bills together, and asking the House to vote "Aye" or "No" upon the whole half-dozen. It was quite clear that many hon. Gentlemen might approve of one Bill and dissent altogether from another. It seemed to him that it was absolutely impossible to vote at one time upon half-a-dozen separate Bills. Personally, he had only one word to say in respect to the Manchester Bill. He understood that that Bill was objected to on account of clauses which dealt with the hours of labour of young children in the streets at night. There was a very strong feeling in Manchester on that point, and he believed the hon. and learned Member would admit that there was nothing in the Bill, as it stood originally, of an exceptional character in regard to the law of the Realm. There was nothing novel in it, and nothing that could not be perfectly well understood. He, therefore, thought seemed to have been thought necessary in that Act to establish some prohibition in regard to casual employment. But he submitted that, as the general law applied to all employments, there was no necessity for a special intervention in regard to casual employment. Then, in addition, there were several other clauses in the Act for England, and others in the Act for Scotland, which, to a certain extent, ameliorated the severity of this provision; and yet they had not been adopted by the Select Committee. The Select Committee had only selected that portion of the Scotch Act which imposed a restriction upon children under the age of 14 years, and provided that after the passing of the Act no child under that age, unless he had obtained a certificate of ability to read and write, and a knowledge of elementary arithmetic in terms of Section 5 of the Elementary Education Act, should be employed in any casual employment after 9 o'clock at night from the 1st day of April to the 1st day of October, and after 7 o'clock at night from the 1st day of October to the 1st day of April. The Committee, however, had left out an important part of the Act of 1876, and that was the provision which enabled a boy or girl to be employed, if he or she had completed the requisite number of attendances at a school under the Act of 1876. He did not know why that should have been done; but it illustrated the inconvenience of legislating in this manner. There were other parts of the English Act, equally important, which were excluded from the operation of the Manchester Local Bill; and altogether he thought it would be far more convenient to deal with such important questions by general legislation. He had now stated very shortly the points to which he desired to call attention, for he felt bound to enter a protest against some of the conclusions to which the Committee had arrived. No doubt, it was a very thankless task he had undertaken; but he should regret to see any other hon. Member, who had, from a sense of public duty, to undertake a similar task, received with so many interruptions by those in the House who took more interest in the questions which were to follow. The hon. and learned Member concluded by moving, as an Amendment—

“That it is inexpedient to proceed with the consideration of the Accrington Improvement Bill, or any of those included in the Reference to the Committee on Sanitary and Police Clauses of March 13th 1882, unless such portions thereof as create local Sanitary or Police Law exceptional to the Law of the Realm be omitted therefrom.”

MR. SPEAKER: I wish to point out to the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) that the House is now considering the Blackburn Improvement Bill, whereas he has been speaking of the Accrington Improvement Bill.

MR. BRIGGS wished to know if the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) was entitled to take a vote of the House upon the Blackburn Improvement Bill, seeing that the greater part of his remarks were not relevant to the Blackburn Bill at all?

MR. HOPWOOD said, the Amendment he proposed to move was a comprehensive one, and included all the Improvement Bills, of which the Blackburn was one, which stood for consideration upon the Paper. He had risen the moment these Bills were called on, and if the Accrington Bill had been passed, it was because his opposing voice had not reached the Chair, and he had understood that he was making his observations upon the Accrington Bill. He was certainly in his place before any Private Bills were taken at all; and he thought that the House generally, from the terms of his Amendment upon the Paper, was fully aware of what his intentions were. He would, however, if the Accrington Bill had already been disposed of, substitute the Blackburn Improvement Bill, which stood next on the list.

MR. SPEAKER: I do not understand, from the remarks of the hon. and learned Member, what Amendment it is, precisely, that he proposes to move.

MR. HOPWOOD referred to the Amendment itself upon the Paper, and he proposed to move that it was inexpedient to proceed with the consideration of the Blackburn Improvement Bill.

MR. SPEAKER said, he would put the Amendment accordingly.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That,” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “it is inexpedient to proceed with the consideration of the Improvement Bills, or any of them, included in the Reference to the Committee on Sanitary and Police Clauses of March

13th 1882, unless such portions thereof as create local Sanitary or Police Law exceptional to the Law of the Realm be omitted therefrom."—
(Mr. Hopwood.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) complained that he had undertaken a thankless task in asking the House to reject these Bills; but the hon. and learned Member would remember that the House was much obliged to him three months ago, when he first raised this very important subject. At the hon. and learned Member's instance, the House relegated the whole of these Bills to a Select Committee appointed in a peculiar way. That Committee had taken evidence, and had considered the Bills with great care and attention, having perfect freedom to deal with them under the direction of the House. They had so dealt with them, and, according to the admission of the hon. and learned Member, they had done good service by striking out a great deal of objectionable matter. He thought the hon. and learned Gentleman would have done well if he had refrained from opposing these Bills on the present occasion, especially seeing the indisposition of the House to re-open the question. It was to be presumed that hon. Members interested in the subject had read the Report of the Committee. That Report was extremely clear, and it laid down propositions which he thought would be supported by the House; but if all the result of their labours was to be rejected, upon the floor of the House, after half-an-hour's discussion, it would be very difficult in future to get Committees to undertake these laborious duties. He submitted to the House that they should now allow these Bills to go forward. Considering that the attention of the House had been called to them, and that they had already been cut down from the shape in which they were originally presented, and that certain provisions, which had excited a good deal of observation and opposition, had been struck out of them, the Report of the Committee should receive the sanction of the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman had suggested that the Committee should advise the House as to the manner in which they had dealt with all the questions submitted to them. For his own part, he did not think that that was the duty of the Committee. The Committee had made certain recommendations, and he should be prepared—if no other hon. Member did it—after the close of the debate to give Notice of a Resolution, in the shape of a Standing Order, to carry out in future years the same policy which had been adopted this year in regard to the present Bills. He would suggest that the precedent Parliament had established in regard to the important Private Bills submitted to the Select Committee during the present Session should hereafter be adopted in regard to all similar measures. He was satisfied that great good had resulted from the labours of the Committee, although he did not expect that every hon. Member would be satisfied. Some hon. Members would think the Committee had done too much; while other hon. Members would think they had done too little. What he contended was that the House was not in a position to do justice to the important questions contained in the Report of the Committee. They ought, therefore, to allow the Bills to go forward, in order that they might be sent up to the House of Lords, where there would be another opportunity of re-examining them.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT said, his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) was scarcely reasonable in putting half-a-dozen Bills together, and asking the House to vote "Aye" or "No" upon the whole half-dozen. It was quite clear that many hon. Gentlemen might approve of one Bill and dissent altogether from another. It seemed to him that it was absolutely impossible to vote at one time upon half-a-dozen separate Bills. Personally, he had only one word to say in respect to the Manchester Bill. He understood that that Bill was objected to on account of clauses which dealt with the hours of labour of young children in the streets at night. There was a very strong feeling in Manchester on that point, and he believed the hon. and learned Member would admit that there was nothing in the Bill, as it stood originally, of an exceptional character in regard to the law of the Realm. There was nothing novel in it, and nothing that could not be perfectly well understood. He, therefore, thought it was scarcely reasonable that a Bill of so much importance as the Manchester Corporation Bill should be rejected, because it limited the hours of labour of young children in the streets, and he trusted that the Bill would receive the support of the House.

MR. PUGH begged to move that the debate be now adjourned. It was quite clear, from the statement of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), who moved the Amendment, and from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Selater-Booth), that the questions involved in the consideration of the Bill were of the utmost importance, and it was also clear that there was an indisposition on the part of the House to enter into a debate of that kind at the present moment. He begged, therefore, to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Pugh.)

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, the House would recollect that when these Bills were referred to a Select Committee, of which his right hon. Friend (Mr. Selater-Booth) was Chairman, it knew that it was imposing upon that Committee a formidable and onerous task. He was quite sure the House would agree with him, when he added that the Committee had performed that task in an admirable manner, and that they were entitled to the thanks of the House. After the great labour of the Committee, he trusted the House would support the Committee, and that, without any attempt to adjourn the debate, they would proceed at once to a decision. All these Bills had received an unusually full and careful consideration. He knew of no Committee to which Private Bills had been referred, except, perhaps, the Committee upon the Electric Lighting Bill, which had given the matter referred to it so much exhaustive attention. He, therefore, trusted that his hon. Friend (Mr. Pugh) would not press the Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

MR. HIBBERT said, that, on the part of the Local Government Board, he thanked the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Selater-Booth) and the Committee for the labour they had bestowed upon these Bills; and, in doing so, he wished to point out that the objections raised by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) upon the clauses contained in the Bills would apply to similar clauses which now existed in Acts of Parliament relating to 23 of the largest towns of the country. He thought if his hon. and learned Friend had inquired, he would have found that the clauses, to which he so strongly objected, had given great satisfaction in the towns to which they had already been applied. He did not think that his hon. and learned Friend would find that a single Petition had been presented against the proposed clauses; on the contrary, he (Mr. Hibbert) held in his hand Reports from 23 towns, and, in almost every case, the strongest opinion was expressed as to the satisfactory working of these Acts. There was a general concurrence of opinion that they tended very much to prevent the spread of disease; and he knew, further, that it was from the knowledge gained of the working of these Acts in these 23 towns that other towns were anxious to have similar provisions. His hon. and learned Friend said they ought to wait until Parliament could pass some satisfactory general law; but they knew what the difficulty was of getting any legislation at all through that House; and he thought that after the trouble bestowed by the Select Committee, it would be most undesirable to throw the whole of their labours away by refusing to adopt their Report.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, he agreed with the spirit of the Amendment, although the town he represented was one of the places which had a Bill included in the Resolution. At the same time, he believed it would be very inconvenient to delay the passing of that Bill, which proposed to carry into effect very considerable local improvements in reference to parks and other matters. Nevertheless, he was in entire sympathy with the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend, that it was undesirable, under cover of Local Bills, to bring forward general legislation. But the point they had to consider here was, how they could possibly obtain a discussion of these Bills? He thought it would take as long as the discussion upon an Irish Coercion Bill. The Bills themselves raised all sorts of questions, and in a case of such importance, involving many details, he thought his hon. and learned Friend should be satisfied with lodging his protest against what had been done, and taking reasonable means in future to secure the end he had in view. It must be borne in mind that all parties concerned in these Bills would have an opportunity, in "another place," of raising the points in dispute, and probably they might be able to secure an alteration in regard to some of them.

MR. PUGH said, that under the circumstances, and trusting that the discussion would not be continued at any length, he would withdraw the Motion he had made.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he fully felt the force of the appeal which had been made to him, and he had no desire to waste the time of the House, although he knew very well that the subject was capable of a great deal more being said upon it than had already been said. As he had been allowed to make a protest against the provisions contained in most of these Bills, and as he knew that the House desired to proceed to other Business, he would now withdraw the Amendment.

MR. SPEAKER pointed out that the Motion for the adjournment of the debate must first be withdrawn.

MR. PUGH said, he had already intimated his willingness to withdraw it.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HOPWOOD: I will now withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered; to be read the third time.

MANCHESTER CORPORATION BILL (by Order).

CONSIDERATION, AS AMENDED.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Bill, as amended, be now considered," — (Sir Charles Forster,) — put, and agreed to.

MR. ARMITAGE moved, as an Amendment, in Clause 38, page 20, line 26, after the word "child," to insert the words—

Mr. Joseph Cowen

"Under the age of ten years shall be employed in any casual employment within the city and no child who is above the age of ten years but."

He was aware that it was an unusual course to seek to modify or add to the terms of a Bill after it had received the careful attention of a Select Committee; but he hoped it would be felt that he was justified in attempting to do so on the present occasion, when he reminded the right hon. Gentleman who presided over the Select Committee (Mr. Sclater-Booth) and his Colleagues, and the House itself, of the great interest taken in this question by the public of Manchester, and also the neighbouring Borough of Salford, which he (Mr. Armitage) represented, and of the disappointment which was felt on learning that certain words in a clause of this Bill, which were considered to be most essential, were in danger of being excluded. Among a great variety of questions which were included in this very comprehensive and useful Bill of the Manchester Corporation, there was one which dealt with the seriously growing evil of the employment in the streets of young children of what was commonly called the "Street Arab class." To make the House more fully familiar with the case, he might explain that children over 14 years of age would not be at all affected by the proposed Bill, for they were free from any obligation to attend school, and were not liable to any regulations in respect to the Factory Act. There remained, then, the children under 14 years of age, who were proposed by the Bill promoted by the Manchester Corporation to be divided into two classes, and dealt with as follows:—First, the children between 10 and 14 years of age were to be allowed to follow the employment referred to till 7 o'clock in the winter months—say, from October 1st until April 1st, and until 9 o'clock in the summer months—say, from April 1st until October 1st, without any conditions at all. But to entitle them to exceed these hours, and to work until any hour at night they pleased, it would be necessary that they should pass a certain educational test. This portion of the clause the Select Committee had agreed to. Secondly, it was sought to forbid children of more tender age—namely, of less than 10 years—from following this street employment altogether; and it was because the Select Committee had struck out this portion of the clause that he proposed to move an Amendment to reinstate the conditions in the Bill. The elimination of these words from the clause would allow these young children, who were often, as a matter of fact, as young as seven or eight years, to continue to follow this mischievous practice on precisely the same conditions as children of more advanced age. He took this to be a very great hardship upon children of tender age themselves. Perhaps it was considered that it would serve as a sufficient hindrance to the employment of the younger children if they were required to pass such an examination as applied to the elder ones; but, if even that were so, they were free to be so employed until 7 o'clock in the winter, and 9 o'clock in the summer months, under any circumstances. He rested his case, however, in respect to these younger children, not on the ground of their being able to pass an educational test, which he found some were able to do, but simply on the ground of their being so very young. He held that it was only right that they should be subject to the same beneficent regulations as applied to employment in factories and workshops. In reply to the argument that the earnings of the children might be required for the maintenance of themselves, or of other members of the family, he was able to state, on the authority of Dr. John Watts, the Chairman of the Industrial Schools Committee of the Manchester School Board, that, having investigated the circumstances of a large number of children who were following this street employment, it was found that only one-third of them belonged to families who were below the poverty scale of the School Board. That proved that two-thirds of the parents of these children were comparatively independent, and were, therefore, unnecessarily subjecting their children to this very great hardship. Rather than do this in instances where the family was exceedingly poor, he would prefer to relieve them out of the public rates. It should be remembered that the children were not learning any suitable and profitable employment that would be useful to them in later years; but, surrounded as they were by evil associations, they were acquiring habits which would, in all probability, bring them ultimately into the hands of the magistrate and the gaoler. Factory legislation was found to be necessary to guard children against the frequent cupidity and cruelty of parents. He was himself connected with a large manufacturing industry, and he could speak from his own personal knowledge of the number of cases which continually came under his notice, where the parents of the children represented them of an older age than they actually were, in order that they might pass the factory inspection, and be qualified to work in the mills. If legislation were necessary and needful for the protection of children who worked in the mills, where they were sheltered and cared for by Government inspection, how much more was it needful in the case of children who were exposed to the vicissitudes of the weather, and the degradation of street life and evil associations? The experience which had been gained by the various benevolent societies of the town during several years had so guided and matured public opinion, and the authorities had on several occasions addressed the late and present Government, both by memorials and deputations, on the subject, urging upon Her Majesty's Ministers that nothing less than legislation in the matter would suffice. The representations made were to the effect that the offence did not come within the province of any existing law, and, therefore, could not be prevented by any present means. In March, 1880, a deputation waited upon the then Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir R. Assheton Cross), and reminded him of the memorials which had been previously presented, asking for legislation. The deputation consisted of members of the Corporations of Manchester and Salford, and was supported by Magistrates, Guardians of the Poor, officers of the School Board, and persons connected with various benevolent societies. It had also the support and approval of the whole of the Members for Manchester and Salford, and no hon. Member had taken up the question more warmly than the hon. Member who sat on the other side of the House (Mr. Birley), who introduced the deputation to the late Secretary of State for the Home Department. He (Mr. Armitage) only mentioned this circumstance to show that there was no Party feeling in the matter, but an absolute agreement of opinion. Two years ago a town meeting was held to take into consideration the treatment of juvenile offenders, and there was an entire concurrence in the views expressed that the very mischievous practice of sending them to prison should, as far as possible, cease. A resolution to that effect was passed, because it was felt that Industrial Schools and Reformatories for the constantly growing crop of juvenile offenders were the only alternative. This, however, would not entirely stay the growth of the evil, which arose, in a great measure, from the prevalence of street hawking. It was shown that last year more than one-half of the young persons who were admitted into the Industrial Schools of the Manchester School Board had been so employed, and only 17 per cent had come from families of good repute. This proved clearly that the close connection between the employment now complained of and the increase of crime could not be ignored. It should be borne in mind that an Act of the same kind was at present in force in Glasgow, and they had a report from the police authorities of Glasgow of the beneficial results arising from its operation in that city. He would conclude by expressing his thanks for the attention and patience with which a large portion of the House had listened to his remarks, and by moving to reinstate the words in the clause as they originally stood in the Bill of the Manchester Corporation. He invited the approval and support of the House.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT, in seconding the Amendment, said, he had no wish to detain the House further than to corroborate the statement of his hon. Friend (Mr. Armitage) as to the overwhelming strength of opinion in Manchester in favour of the Amendment—namely, that young children under the age of 10 years should not be allowed to be employed in the streets. The hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) said that was the general law already. If it were the general law, it would not do much harm to introduce it into this Bill. Men of every creed and Party in Manchester were anxious to have the Amendment made, and the hon. Members who represented Manchester in that House would be glad if the House could see its way to accept the Amendment.

Mr. Armitage

Amendment proposed,

In Clause 38, page 20, line 26, after the word "child," to insert the words "under the age of ten years shall be employed in any casual employment within the city and no child who is above the age of ten years but."—(Mr. Armitage.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he was quite aware, and the Select Committee was equally aware, of the great desire which prevailed in certain quarters of Manchester that this clause, in its full integrity, should have been incorporated in the Bill. But he could assure his hon. Friend (Mr. Armitage) and the House that the Committee felt so strongly on the subject that they would have preferred to strike out the whole clause rather than sanction it in the form in which it was originally proposed to be inserted in the Bill. No doubt, the clause was copied from a Scotch Act; but if the House was of opinion that a further restriction should be placed upon juvenile labour to this extent, then let it be made applicable to the whole of England, as well as to Scotland; but let the provision be a general one. There did not appear to be any desire that this particular restriction on the labour of children under 10 years of age—children employed in selling newspapers in the streets—should be applied to London, or to the large towns generally. It was only in Manchester that there was any feeling in the matter. The Select Committee had supported the clause in so far as it dealt with children who ought to be at school; but they thought it was not desirable to assent to any further restriction. It was quite sufficient to provide that when children were under school age, they should not be allowed to engage in this casual employment after certain hours in the evening. As he had already stated, the clause, as originally proposed by the Corporation of Manchester, was taken from a Scotch Act; but he must say that the evidence adduced before the Committee as to the working of the provision in Scotland was of the most meagre description. The clause appeared to have been confined to Glasgow; and in regard to its working in Glasgow there was very little evidence indeed. He might remind the House that the whole of this matter could be reconsidered in "another place;" and he did not think the present was a proper time for going into it. A very strong objection was entertained against the clause, as it originally stood; and he believed the Bill, in its present form, contained all that could reasonably be demanded from Parliament. Indeed, as the clause now stood in the Bill, the Committee had felt a great deal of hesitation in passing it. What was now proposed would take away the means of livelihood from a large class. It would be better to strike out the whole clause than to accept the Amendment. He hoped, therefore, that the House would not assent to the Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

Bill to be read the third time.

NOTICES.

PARLIAMENT—RULES OF DEBATE.

MR. M'COAN, having given Notice that he would to-morrow ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Sir Edward Malet has been instructed to take any, and what, steps to exact punishment and reparation for the murder of the British subjects killed in Alexandria during the riot of the 11th instant; and whether any provision, beyond the stationing of a gun-boat at either end of the channel, has been made, or is contemplated, for the protection of the Suez Canal; and, also, whether Sir Edward Malet has been any party to the arrangement under which Ragheb Pasha has formed a new Egyptian Ministry, in which Arabi Pasha remains Minister of War; and, whether, in view of the recent Anglo-French Note demanding the removal of Arabi from Office, and his exile from Egypt, Her Majesty's Government will recognize any Ministry of which he still forms a part?

MR. O'DONNELL gave Notice that he would ask, with reference to the last Notice, What right Her Majesty's Government have to interfere with the Egyptian Ministry?

MR. O'KELLY gave Notice that he would to-morrow renew his previous Question to the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, unless the hon. Baronet could answer it then—namely, Whether the list of those killed in the disturbances at Alexandria was complete as regarded British subjects?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the hon. Member (Mr. O'Kelly) asks me a mere question of fact, and I will answer it now. The Question was asked previously, and, therefore, it is equivalent to Notice. In answer to it, I have stated that six British subjects have been killed. In addition to these, two Maltese, who were also British subjects, have been killed. I will take this opportunity of stating that I have tried to give the House the latest possible information by answering Questions of fact without Notice; but that course of procedure has produced so large an increase in the number of Questions put, and so much inconvenience and loss of time, that I propose in future, under no circumstances, to answer any Question whatever without full Notice.

QUESTIONS.

ARMY—DRUNKENNESS.

MR. CAINE asked the Judge Advocate General, The number of punishments for drunkenness, or for offences arising out of drunkenness, in the Army during the year 1881; and, if it is true that in the Recruiting Circular recently issued through the Post Office, four special advantages are offered to soldiers enlisting, one of which is that "Beer may be obtained from the Regimental Canteens at very low rates?"

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN), in reply, said, that the total number of punishments inflicted on soldiers for drunkenness by court martial and by commanding officers in 1881 was 43,606. The total number of individuals so punished during the same period was 23,255. That number, he was sorry to say, was somewhat in excess in each case of the numbers returned for the year 1880, though very considerably less than the average for the last 10 years. As to the number of punishments for crimes arising out of drunkenness in the Army during the same period, he regretted that he was quite unable to give it, as there was no separate record kept of such offences, and it would be exceedingly difficult to make out such a record; but he might say that, as in the case of civilians, a very large proportion of the crimes of violence and insubordination committed by soldiers were committed by them while under the influence of drink. As to the second part of the Question of his hon. Friend, it was quite true that the purchase of beer, tobacco, &c., from the regimental canteen at low rates, together with other privileges, such as the use of a library, recreation room, and gymnasium, were offered as inducements to recruits to enlist by the Post Office Circular referred to in the Question; but he might say that the beer so supplied was of a very wholesome quality, and cases of drunkenness arising from its consumption were most rare; in fact, almost unknown. He would add that no spirits were sold in canteens at all, and he thought he might say that the real cause of drunkenness in the Army was certainly not the beer sold in the canteens, but the abominable stuff which soldiers obtained, under the name of spirits, in the low public-houses in the neighbourhood of their barracks, and for which the beer was intended, as far as possible, to be a substitute.

STATE OF IRELAND—POLICE PROTECTION AT AMAGARRA (CO. CORK).

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that there have been six police stationed at a place called Amagarra, Ballylanders, county Cork, for a considerable time; and, whether there have been any outrages committed near the place; if not, what is the reason that the police continue to be stationed there, and upon whom their maintenance is charged?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, a protection post was formed a short time ago at Amagarra, County Cork, on account of certain outrages that had been committed in the neighbourhood. There are five police stationed there, but there is no extra expense occasioned thereby, as they are charged for as other men of the county force.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR.

H. A. BLAKE, R.M.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. H. A. Blake, R.M. is the same person as the Mr. Blake, who was charged with taking forcible possession of a house at Carrigbarahane; whether

Mr. Blake was summoned to the Petty Sessions at Stradbally therefor; whether it was alleged that a revolver was presented at the caretaker; and that he was also assaulted; if a copy of the evidence taken at the time can be laid before the House; and, whether Mr. Blake will have any special powers under the Crime Bill?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the matter to which the hon. Member refers related to a private and family affair, and is such as most certainly does not call for the cognizance of the House. I have frequently, in the course of the debates, stated the position which special Resident Magistrates will hold under the Prevention of Crime Bill. They will not have judicial authority.

MR. HEALY asked the right hon. Gentleman, If proceedings between landlord and tenant could be of a private character; and, whether a man who took forcible possession in the way indicated, and who presented a revolver at the head of the caretaker, was a proper person to occupy the position of Resident Magistrate under the Bill?

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, he would not enter into the question as to whether Mr. Blake did or did not take possession in the manner stated, and would merely state to the House that the circumstances of the case were not of a nature, as he thought the House would acknowledge, of which they could take cognizance.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he had received a letter from Mr. Blake, giving a total denial to the circumstance, as stated by the hon. Member, of the use of a revolver.

STATE OF IRELAND—POLICE SURVEILLANCE.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a statement in the "Belfast Morning News" of June 9th, to the effect that the police at Castleblayney have for some days past been perpetually watching a local contractor; that a constable remains at his side during his working hours, and afterwards hovers about his residence; and, if he can state the object of this surveillance, and by whom and for what object it has been directed?

Mr. Osborne Morgan

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, it is quite true that the police have been carefully watching the person referred to; but I must decline in the public interest to say upon what grounds they are doing so.

NEW ZEALAND—TE WHITI, THE MAORI CHIEF.

MR. CROPPER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Government have received any recent information as to the intentions of the New Zealand authorities with regard to Te Whiti, the Maori Chief, who has been lying in prison for several months past on a charge of sedition; and, whether they have considered the expediency of offering their good offices to the Colonial Government to settle the land disputes with the Natives of the West Coast?

MR. BROGDEN also asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he will furnish to the House the Papers relating to the late proceedings with the Native Maori Tribes at Parihaki, in New Zealand, and the arrest of Te Whiti and others; and, if the speech of the Governor, Sir Arthur Gordon, at the opening of the Assembly in May last, announced the fact that an Act would be applied for to enable the Government of New Zealand to continue to detain him without his being tried or convicted of any offence?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Sir, the Colonial Office has received no official information as to the dealings of the New Zealand Government with the Maori Chief, Te Whiti, later than the Report which informed them that he had been committed to gaol on a charge of sedition in last December. Her Majesty's Government do not think it advisable to offer any intervention in the land disputes with the Natives of the West Coast. Those questions lie entirely within the province of the Colonial Parliament and the Colonial Government. In reply to the Question of the hon. Member for Wednesbury (Mr. Brogden), I have to say that we have not received the text of the Governor's speech; but the Press telegram, which is all that has arrived, indicates that the course contemplated is not continued detention of Te Whiti in prison, but only prohibition to visit and agitate a particular district. Papers will be given, if the hon. Member presses for them; but there must be some delay till the arrival of the documents from New Zealand, which will make the action of the New Zealand Government fully understood, and the Government would rather wait until that information comes to hand.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT — ROMAN CATHOLIC SCHOOLS, OLDHAM.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he is aware of a communication having been addressed to the Education Department by the managers of St. Mary's Roman Catholic Schools, Oldham, setting forth objections to the erection of a School Board in close proximity to their schools; whether he is aware that the Department promised that these objections would be considered when the Oldham School Board applied for permission to erect such school; and, whether he is aware that the Department have since authorised the Board to purchase the site; and, if so, what are the reasons that induced the Department to give such authority in the face of the objections lodged by the managers of St. Mary's Schools?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, I am acquainted with the correspondence which has passed between the Education Department and the managers of St. Mary's Roman Catholic Schools at Oldham, and I can assure the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) that the remonstrances of the managers have had my careful consideration. The St. Mary's Roman Catholic School supplies the requirements, not only of its immediate neighbourhood, but of numbers of Roman Catholic children resident elsewhere. Of two schools quoted in the manager's letter, one provides no infant accommodation whatever, and the premises of the other are not such as can be recognized as efficient. Without reckoning these schools, there is an undoubted deficiency, and both Her Majesty's Inspector and the Board consider that a school is urgently required in this district.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PATRICK SLATTERY.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the attention of His Excellency has been directed to the case of Patrick Slattery, who has been in prison since the 25th of July last year, on suspicion of being concerned in an unlawful assembly at Bodyke, on the 1st of June preceding; whether Patrick Slattery is the witness who, at the investigation into the death of John Moloney at Bodyke, on the said 1st of June, identified a sub-constable named O'Grady as having struck the deceased man two blows on the head with the butt end of his rifle; whether the arrest of Patrick Slattery did not take place until after his evidence against the sub-constable; whether Patrick Slattery is an American citizen, and whether he was offered his liberty on the 24th of April last on condition of his at once leaving the Country and returning to the United States; and, whether any sufficient reason exists for his continued detention in prison on any charge?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the offence for which Patrick Slattery was arrested was that of being reasonably suspected of riot, and shooting with intent to murder. The riot, which took place on the 1st of June, was a most serious one; the police were fired on, and the County Inspector's horse was shot. The circumstances otherwise are as detailed in the Question. He is a naturalized American citizen, and has been offered his release upon condition of his leaving Ireland and returning at once to America; but that condition has been objected to, and His Excellency cannot at present permit him to be at large in Ireland.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he still wished to know if it was not a fact that Slattery's arrest did not take place until after he had identified a constable as having struck a man, who died, twice with the butt end of his gun?

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, that he had already answered the Question. Patrick Slattery was arrested because he was reasonably suspected of being a principal in a most dangerous riot.

MR. O'DONNELL gave Notice of his intention of asking the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant whether he was not arrested at the instance and upon the identification of the colleagues of the policeman?

Mr. O'Donnell

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881.

SECTION 21—"SULLIVAN v. BOWEN."

MR. HEALY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Sullivan v. Bowen, lately decided by Her Majesty's Court of Appeal in Ireland, in which that tribunal decided (reversing the judgment of the Irish Land Commission) that a tenant's application under the 21st section of the Irish Land Act, to break a lease forced on him by threat of eviction should be dismissed on the ground that, at the date when the lease was forced on the tenant, the notice to quit served on him as a preliminary to eviction had expired, and thus determined the yearly tenancy under which he had previously held, and that, therefore, one of the elements necessary for the success of a lease-breaking application, viz. the existence of a yearly tenancy at the date of the acceptance of the lease, did not exist in the case; whether, having regard to this further evidence of the failure of section 21 of the Land Act, he can state the intentions of the Government as regards the amendment of this section; and, whether he will have any objection to the granting of a Return setting forth the number of lease-breaking cases actually adjudicated upon by the Land Commission, the result of each case, and as regards cases in which the tenant's application was dismissed, showing in each case which of the three elements necessary for the success of such an application under the section as it stands, viz.: (a) existence of a yearly tenancy at date when lease was accepted; (b) threat of eviction or undue influence by landlord; and (c) existence in lease of unreasonable terms, was wanting, so as to cause the dismissal of the application?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, as I have obtained a Report from the Land Commissioners dealing with the matters of fact referred to in this Question, I may, perhaps, be permitted to answer it. With regard to the first paragraph of the Question, it is the case that a judgment of the Irish Land Commissioners was reversed by Her Majesty's Court of Appeal in Ireland as detailed by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy). With regard to the final paragraph of the Question, the Return could not be given. If it were granted, it would impose on the Judicial Commissioner the necessity for perusing the notes in every one of the 600 or 700 cases which have been heard. The duties which he has to discharge render his doing so a physical impossibility. I will, however, look into the question further, and see if the Return can be given in a somewhat different form. The second paragraph of the Question deals with a matter of policy, upon which I cannot give the hon. Member any information.

Mr. HEALY having subsequently repeated the Question, and addressed it again to the Prime Minister,

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, Sir. Probably I failed to make myself understood on a former day; but I may now state that the question of the Lease Clauses was one of those I had in view, when I said that, at a certain time, the Government would think it right to state their intentions with respect to various points of importance connected with the Land Act. These points are the Purchase Clauses, the Lease Clauses, and the Clauses with respect to Labourers. I do not, however, think it would be of any advantage to make a statement on the subject, until we see our way to the conclusion of the proceedings connected with the two Bills now before the House—namely, the Prevention of Crime Bill and the Bill dealing with Arrears of Rent.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether he will include emigration?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; I am not in a position to say whether the Government will make any statement with regard to emigration.

EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—DEATH FROM EXPOSURE AT AN EVICTION AT RHODE, KING'S COUNTY.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that the police, at Rhode, King's County, recently prevented by threats the erection of a hut, provided by the Ladies' Land League to shelter the family of an evicted labourer named Kavanagh; whether, in consequence of the conduct of the police, Kavanagh, his wife, and his children, who, as notified to the police, were ill of measles, had to avail themselves of the shelter of a shed or stable without door, window, or chimney, and have lived there for the last fortnight; whether the result has been that exposure has caused the death of one of the children, and that another is now lying at the point of death; whether the coroner of Queen's County, in accordance with the Law, issued his precept to the police directing them to provide a jury to inquire into the death of the child, and giving them twenty-eight hours' notice for the purpose; whether the police disregarded the precept, and failed to provide the jury, in consequence of which no inquest has yet been held; and, whether the Executive will take notice of the conduct of the police, and institute further action in the matter?

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, he had just received a voluminous telegram from Ireland in relation to the matter, and he was anxious to look over it carefully, as it touched the conduct of several Government officials. He would answer the hon. Member to-morrow.

MR. SEXTON said, he would repeat the Question to-morrow.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—VOTE OF COMPENSATION.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If a proportionate share of the moneys voted by Parliament to the Royal Irish Constabulary in compensation for loss and hardship in connection with special service since the year 1879, will be paid to those members of the force who served during the years 1879 and 1880, but who happened to have left the force previous to the introduction of the Compensation Vote in Parliament; and, whether it is not the fact that many members of the force who had to retire from various causes since January 1881 suffered severe pecuniary loss and injury to health in connection with the exceptional service in the years 1879 and 1880?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the grant of £180,000 referred to will be confined to members of the Force who were serving in the Force on the 24th of April last. It is probably the fact that many members of the Force who had retired prior to that date did suffer pecuniary loss and injury to health; but their cases have been disposed of when they retired on pension or gratuity, and cannot now be re-opened.

PARLIAMENT—RULES OF DEBATE—
QUESTIONS—RELEASE OF PERSONS DETAINED UNDER THE PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRE-LAND) ACT, 1881.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL, in whose name the following Notice appeared on the Paper :—

“To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether he has any information as to the movements, since their release, of those suspected of crimes of violence, which would show whether they had or had not gone to reside in those neighbourhoods in which murders have been committed since their release;”

said, that before he put his Question he wished to ask the Speaker's direction on a point of Order. That Question had undergone very severe expurgation at the Table. As originally handed in by him, it was in these terms. He proposed to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, How he reconciled the release from prison of John Ryan and Michael M'Sweeney, who had been arrested on suspicion of murder, with the assurance which he had given on the 8th of May that none of the “suspects” who had been charged with murder would be released? The point he desired to submit to the Speaker was, how an hon. Member was to proceed when he wished for information on a Question, an answer in reference to which given by the Representative of a Department in the House was at variance with a statement in the printed Papers published by that Department?

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, he thought the course taken by the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Herbert Maxwell) was rather an unfair one. The first form in which he (Mr. Trevelyan) had seen the Question was the form in which it appeared on the Paper. He thought the usual course in a case of the kind was first to inquire privately whether there was any alteration in the Question. [“No, no!”] He had not been a party to any alteration of the Question.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the right hon. Gentleman was not bound to answer any Question other than that on the Paper, unless he desired so to do. With regard to the point of Order, no doubt certain expressions might, and had been struck out of the Question by the Clerk at the Table, because they involved matter of controversy and might cause debate. If anything was imported into a Question which necessarily must lead to debate, or involved such debate, that part of the Question was properly struck out. He apprehended the hon. Member had been informed of it.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL: No, Sir.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member should have been informed of it.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether it would not be desirable to make an arrangement for some information to be given to hon. Members where they inadvertently and unwittingly offended against this unwritten law as regarded putting down Questions?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked whether there was any appeal from the decision of the Clerk at the Table?

MR. SPEAKER said, there was an appeal, no doubt, to the Chair.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL: Perhaps I may be allowed to say, in explanation to the right hon. Gentleman opposite, that I gave public Notice on Thursday last of the Question, in the terms in which I put it on the Table. I would now ask, whether I would be in Order, on a future occasion, in asking the right hon. Gentleman, if he adheres to the statement made in answer to a Question by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the late Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Gibson), that no men charged with murder were released during the month of May, in face of the fact that John Ryan and Michael M'Sweeney were so released?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Baronet puts a Question to me on a matter which has not yet arisen. I am bound to say that I can assure the hon. Baronet and the House that I have quite enough to do to answer Questions upon points of Order when they arise; and now the hon. Baronet puts to me a hypothetical Question, which I must decline to answer.

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I was not aware that the hon. Baronet had given me Notice. I have felt rather keenly the reflection implied by the Question of the hon. Baronet, as I always try to be accurate in answering Questions, and more so, as regards this one, as it is a somewhat serious one. With regard to the Question on the Paper, if I may assume that it is confined to the case of prisoners released by the present Lord Lieutenant since he assumed Office, my answer is simply that the murder of Mr. Bourke in the Gort district, County Galway, is the only murder that has taken place since His Excellency released any prisoner, and that no prisoner from that district suspected of a crime of violence has been released.

NAVY—THE MEDITERRANEAN SQUADRON.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Why the Mediterranean Squadron off Alexandria is not strengthened by such armour-clads as the "Audacious," "Defence," "Penelope," and "Resistance," whose draught of water will permit them to enter that harbour, in addition to or in place of the "Alexandra," "Inflexible," "Superb," and "Téméraire," which draw too much water to leave it with certainty or safety?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Sir, I regret that I can make no other answer to the Question of my right hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay) than this—that the Admiralty are taking the steps which they consider best for the disposition of Her Majesty's Naval Forces in the Mediterranean, including Alexandria, and I must ask the House to allow me to decline entering into any particulars on the subject.

NAVY—ENGINEER STUDENTS—H.M.S. "MARLBOROUGH."

MR. GORST asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether his attention has been called to the death of Robert Mills, an engineer student on board H.M.S. "Marlborough," at Portsmouth, from the results of a severe chill caught in the execution of his duty; and, whether it is intended to attach a medical officer to the "Marlborough," or to make any improved arrangement for the supervision of the health of the engineer students?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Sir, I regret to say that it is the case that Mr. Robert Mills, engineer student on board the Marlborough, died on the 24th of May, from acute and rapid congestion of the lungs, the result of a chill sustained on duty in the Sultan on the 22nd of May. Until the morning of the 24th, although showing some symptoms of illness, he had been going about as usual. He was then seen by a medical officer, who placed him on the sick list, although the illness was not believed to be serious. In the evening he became worse, and, notwithstanding all that the doctor in attendance could do, rapidly succumbed to the disease. As the death was unusually sudden, an inquest was held, and the facts were fully investigated, with the result that the jury expressed an opinion that he had received all possible care. It was with great regret that the Admiralty learnt the melancholy and premature termination of this young student's career; but they do not see in the facts of the case any reason for attaching a special medical officer to the Marlborough, the duty being efficiently performed by one of the medical officers of the Asia, and the medical officers of the Yard.

ARMY—LIEUTENANTS OF ARTILLERY.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Why the increase of pay to lieutenants after joining their regiments is postponed in the case of the Artillery till after a period of three years' service, whereas a similar increase was made to lieutenants of the Line after a period of two years only; and, whether the Government will consider the expediency of placing the Artillery in this respect on a footing of equal advantage with the Line?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, the reason is that before the 1st of July, 1881, a second lieutenant of the Line was entitled to his increase of pay after three years' service, or on promotion to the rank of lieutenant; whereas, in the Artillery, there were no second lieutenants, and the increase of pay to lieutenants was due after three years' service. The Warrant abolished second lieutenants, and made the rule for the Line the same as that for the Artillery; but, inasmuch as it was found that, on the average, promotions from second lieutenant to lieutenant took place in about two years, second lieutenants then serving in the Line were exceptionally granted this increase after two years. Lieutenants appointed on and after the 1st of July, 1881, will serve three years before their pay is increased.

ARMY—ORDNANCE ARTIFICERS CORPS.

MR. BOORD asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will state what progress has been made in the formation of the new Corps of Ordnance Artificers, for which a sum of £4,800 is taken, for pay, in this year's Estimates; and, also, the number of men who have qualified, in accordance with the Deputy Adjutant General's Circular, dated the 16th May 1878; the number at present actually enrolled; and when he expects the corps will reach its full intended strength?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that the arrangements made in 1878 for this corps were not entirely successful; indeed, only 12 men volunteered. A different system has now been adopted, and it is expected that the corps will be fully established during the current financial year.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PRO- PERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—AR- RESTS UNDER THE ACT.

MR. LEAMY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How many persons have been arrested under the Coercion Act of last year up to the fifteenth day of this month?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, 917 persons have been arrested under the Protection of Person and Property Act up to the 15th instant. Of these 23 were arrested a second time.

ARMY—SHOOTING AND DRIVING PRIZES, 1881.

COLONEL NOLAN asked the Secretary of State for War, If the shooting and driving prizes for 1881 have been paid to the Artillery; and, if he could manage that, for the future, these prizes should be paid when awarded?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, I have inquired into this matter, and I find that there has been this year a delay of an unusual character in issuing these prizes. The Order will appear in a few days, and I have given instructions that the prizes be in future years issued not later than in February.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PRO- PERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881— MICHAEL M'QUEENY.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What was the place of residence of Michael M'Queeny, who was lately confined in Enniskillen Prison on reasonable suspicion of murder, and has lately been released, and what was the name of the person he was reasonably suspected of having murdered; and, if there is any intention of putting M'Queeny upon his trial, according to Law, for the offence of which he was suspected?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, Michael M'Queeny's place of residence is Attygowlas, in the Boyle district, County Roscommon. I must decline to disclose the name of the person he was suspected of having murdered. As to the last paragraph of the Question, I must beg the noble Lord to put it to my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): I am not aware that any information has been laid before me respecting this case.

IRELAND—THE KILMAINHAM COM- PACT—MR. YATES THOMPSON.

MR. G. W. ELLIOT asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If Mr. Yates Thompson ever visited Kilmainham Prison during the incarceration of the suspects either in his own or an assumed name; and, if so, was he in any way in communication with the Member for Cork or any of the other suspects, and on what dates? He said it had been his intention to withdraw the Question, as he had been credibly informed that the gentleman referred to had nothing to do with the matter. It was, however, only just and courteous to the gentleman that he (Mr. Elliot) should put the Question to the right hon. Gentleman, in order that he might give it an explicit and official denial, as he (Mr. Elliot) understood he desired to do.

MR. TREVELYAN: I am obliged to my hon. Friend. It is very handsome of him to accede to my desire. Mr. Yates Thompson is one of the oldest friends I have in the world, and I am anxious to read a few lines from the following letter, which I have received from him, dated June 16 :—

"Dear Trevelyan.—I see in The Times that you are to be questioned again this afternoon about my famous visit to Kilmainham. I should be much obliged if you would say in your answer that you have my authority for stating that I have not been in Ireland for the last 18 months, nor had any communication, verbal or otherwise, with any members of the Land League, or the Member for the City of Cork."

PETROLEUM ACT (INDIA), 1881—STANDARD OF FLASHING POINT.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Secretary of State for India, If he is aware that the Petroleum Act of 1879 for the United Kingdom fixes the flashing point, for safety, at 73 degrees Fahrenheit, and that the same standard was adopted in the Indian Act of 1881; and if he intends to permit so low, or even, as is now proposed, a lower standard for a country where the mean temperature of the year is at least 25 degrees above that of this latitude, and the summer temperature for eight months often exceeded 100 degrees Fahrenheit?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, the standard of the Act of 1881 for the test of petroleum was fixed by the Indian Legislature after full consideration, and with the approval of the Secretary of State. There is not, and has never been, any proposal to permit that standard to be lowered.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—JOHN RYAN.

MR. TOTTENHAM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can state the place of residence of John Ryan, a suspect, recently confined in Dundalk Gaol on reasonable suspicion of murder; what is the name of the murdered person; and, whether the murder took place in the neighbourhood where Ryan now resides?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, John Ryan is reported to me to reside in the townland of Ballykeeran, parish of Lecker-rig, barony of Loughrea, county of Galway. Ryan was not confined, as stated in the Question, on reasonable suspicion of murder, but on reasonable suspicion of being accessory to murder. I must decline to give the further information asked for in the Question.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—CONSTABLE BYRNE.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether an investigation was recently held in New Ross into charges made against Constable Thomas Byrne; and, whether the finding of the Court of Inquiry was not that Constable Byrne was not guilty; and, if so, whether he will state the reason for his immediate transfer to Monaghan?

MR. TREVELYAN: Yes, Sir; there was such an investigation. The constable was charged with neglect of duty. The Court considered that his fault arose from an error of judgment, and found him "Not Guilty." The Inspector General considered it necessary, for disciplinary and other reasons, to transfer him to another county. He was given his choice between three counties, and has chosen Kildare, to which he has been removed.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES BILL.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Postmaster General, Whether, in view of the great importance to the working classes of the new scheme with reference to Government Annuities and Insurance, which is embodied in the Bill of which he has given notice, and of the serious delay which may arise in bringing the scheme into operation if the consideration of the Bill be much longer postponed, he is able to state whether the Government propose to afford any, and what, facilities for the early discussion of the measure?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, he need scarcely assure the House that he should be very glad if an opportunity could be found for consideration of the Bill. In the existing condition of Business, however, he feared he must look rather to facilities being afforded by private Members than by the Government. At any rate, he felt there would be very little use in asking the Prime Minister to give him a day for the consideration of the Bill, or any special facilities at the present time. He was, however, in some hope that the private Members who had given Notice of opposition to the second reading of the Bill might afford facilities, and he had given private Notice to those hon. Members on Friday that he should make an appeal to them on the subject; and, with the permission of the Speaker, he would ask their indulgence for a single moment while he made that appeal. He based his appeal on this ground—that the Bill affected a great number of people, in bringing facilities before them for obtaining life insurances and obtaining annuities. It was the result of the unanimous recommendation of a Select Committee; but the strongest ground of his appeal to the hon. Members who had to remove their blocking Notices was this—that the important change to be effected by the Bill was the linking of the annuity and the life insurance business with the Post Office Savings Bank. As he understood, that part of the Bill was unanimously accepted. The only point to which objection was taken was simply the limits of insurance and annuities, and he ventured to submit that that might be considered in Committee. One hon. Member who had given Notice of opposition to the Bill had most kindly said he would remove his Notice. He referred to his hon. Friend the Member for Lambeth (Mr. Alderman M'Arthur). He addressed a similar appeal to the hon. Members for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler), Wolverhampton (Mr. H. Fowler), and Bridport (Mr. Warton), and could say that if the second reading of the Bill were taken, he should spare no efforts to secure a proper discussion of the points to which they objected when the Bill should reach the Committee stage.

MR. W. FOWLER said, he had no objection to the Bill, so far as it related to the alteration of the machinery of the Savings Bank. His only objection to the Bill was in respect to the limits of insurance—[Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: It is only with the indulgence of the House that the hon. Member can speak.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—DETENTION OF PRISONERS UNDER THE ACT.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can quote any provision of "The Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act" under which suspects can be retained in prison without regard to their own guilt or innocence, but on account of the alleged state of the districts in which they were originally arrested?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, a person reasonably suspected of having committed a crime in a proscribed district may be legally arrested and legally detained under the Act until the 30th of September, 1882. In determining whether the period of arrest can be abridged, the main consideration of the Lord Lieutenant is, whether a release will have a prejudicial effect or otherwise on the state of the district, and its actual state must be a most material ingredient in coming to a determination.

INDIA (BENGAL) — THE DURBUNGHA RAJ.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether, since he stated that Mr. M. Finucane, Bengal Civil Service, "had never been manager of the Durbungha Raj," he has learned that Mr. Finucane appears in the India List for 1880 as assistant magistrate at Durbungha, in the India List for 1881 as "manager of the Durbungha Raj," and in the India List for 1882 as "manager of the Durbungha Raj;" whether he will inquire why the letter of resignation which Mr. Finucane addressed to the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, Sir Ashley Eden, declining to carry out enhancements of rent on the estates of the Maharajah of Durbungha, cannot now be produced; whether he will inquire if the salary of Mr. Finucane, while attached to the administration of the Durbungha Raj, was 1,500 rupees a month; whether he will inquire if the salary of the relative of Sir Ashley Eden, appointed to the administration of the Durbungha Raj, is 2,000 rupees a month; whether Sir Ashley Eden is now a member of the India Council in London; and, whether he will inform the House the name of the Indian official on whose authority he stated that Mr. Finucane was never manager of the Durbungha Raj?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, he had had the facts relating to these appointments before him; and was satisfied that the statements contained in the Question were inaccurate. He had all the particulars of the appointment of this gentleman; but he trusted the House would not consider it necessary for him to go into the details of dates and figures. If the hon. Member thought it worth while to raise the question on any fitting opportunity, he had no doubt he should be able to satisfy him that a former reply he had given the hon. Member on the subject was correct. As he had said before, nothing was known of the letter of resignation, and he could not undertake to make inquiries with regard to a letter of the existence of which he knew nothing. By referring to the Returns the hon. Member would see what the salaries were.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that he was prepared to accept the challenge of the noble Marquess on the very first opportunity he could give him.

EGYPT—THE POLITICAL CRISIS— BRITISH REFUGEES.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the refugees on board the ships provided by Her Majesty's Government are to be landed at any place they may select; and, whether, whilst on board, they are to pay for their own living?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Sir, we have no doubt that Sir Beauchamp Seymour, in communication with the Consular authorities, is taking all necessary steps, and making the necessary arrangements in this matter; but we have no detailed information on the subject.

MR. ONSLOW: I wish to ask what are those steps, particularly with regard to payments by refugees?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have already said that Sir Beauchamp Seymour, in communication with the Consular authorities, is the proper person to decide such questions, and although the hon. Member asked the same Question the other day, I cannot conceive that at this moment it would be desirable for us, when Sir Beauchamp Seymour is the responsible person, to trouble him with telegraphic inquiry on such a subject.

MR. ONSLOW: As this is to a certain extent a financial Question, I shall repeat it to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Thursday.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881— EDMUND STEWART.

MR. CORRY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If Edmund Stuart, a suspect confined in Clonmel Prison on the ground of shooting and hounding, has been lately released; and, if he is to be put on his trial for the offence with which he was charged?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, Edmund Stewart was released on the 30th of May by order of the Lord Lieutenant. For an answer to the last part of the Question, I must refer the hon. Member to my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): With respect to the latter part of the Question, I am unable to say whether this person was put upon his trial, because I cannot recollect whether the information was submitted to me or not. Until I have received intelligence respecting that, I cannot give an answer.

PUBLIC WORKS COMMISSIONERS (IRELAND)—LAND IMPROVEMENT LOANS.

MR. GIBSON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he will give instructions to the Office of Public Works in Ireland not to press landlords who have not received their rents to pay immediately their instalments due for land improvement in Ireland; and, whether he is aware that that Department is now threatening legal proceedings against several landlords who have not received their rents, in respect of instalments only due last April?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, the Board of Works have already been authorized to act in the sense indicated in the Question of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. I have no knowledge of any cases in which legal proceedings have been taken in contravention of this order.

MR. GIBSON said, he had seen letters threatening legal proceedings within the last few days.

MR. COURTNEY said, that if the right hon. and learned Gentleman would furnish him with details, he would make inquiries.

MR. GIBSON said, he should be glad to do so.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked, whether, in deciding in this matter, account would be taken of those landlords having oppressed their tenants?

[No reply.]

ARMY—INSTRUCTION IN MILITARY TACTICS.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Secretary of State for War, If the recent experiment in giving Volunteer Captains and Field Officers instruction in Military tactics was a success, what numbers in Scotland and England respectively attended, what proportion passed, and what proportion passed with honours; and, if there is to be another opportunity for those who did not attend, or who failed to pass?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to my hon. Friend, I have to say that the papers of the Volunteer candidates for examination in tactics are only now being received, and as between 600 and 700 officers were examined, it will be some weeks before the results can be known. There will be further periodical opportunities for examination afforded to officers of the Auxiliary Forces.

COOLIES (INDIAN)—EMIGRATION TO LA REUNION.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether Coolie immigration from India to Réunion has been stopped; and, if so, will he state at what date the order of the Indian Government to that effect took effect?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, emigration from India to Réunion has not yet been stopped. There is nothing to be added to the reply which I gave to the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Cropper) on the 23rd of May.

THE ASSASSINATIONS IN THE PHOENIX PARK, DUBLIN—WITHDRAWAL OF THE POLICE PATROLS.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, By whose orders the patrols were withdrawn from Phoenix Park on May 6th, and in what way the Government have noticed the conduct of the person responsible?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, there were no police patrols withdrawn from the Phoenix Park on the 6th of May. I have answered the general purport of this Question before, and I am sorry to have to revert to it again.

MR. HEALY said, he had listened with the greatest care to all the right hon. Gentleman's replies on this subject. His Question, to which he had not yet received a distinct answer, was, Whether there were ever, at any time, police patrols placed in Phoenix Park before the assassinations; whether those police patrols were withdrawn; and, if so, by whose authority they were withdrawn?

MR. TREVELYAN: This is a matter in which the feelings of others are involved. I thought I had answered it fully before. Practically, the protection was withdrawn at the time my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) left Ireland. The effective protection was withdrawn then. I am sorry to have to repeat that which, I think, I indicated in a longer answer.

MR. O'KELLY: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the question—Who was responsible?

MR. DILLON said, the subject was one which excited a good deal of interest in Dublin. It was not a question of general effective protection. But it was generally stated in Dublin that on the morning of that deplorable occurrence the police were removed from the Phoenix Park—that the Park was absolutely stripped of police to an extent previously unknown. What they wanted to know was, who ordered the police on that fatal morning to leave the Park?

MR. TREVELYAN: I have made a careful inquiry into that point, and such was not the case. The police who were withdrawn were the police for the protection of the late Chief Secretary, while my right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster) was in Dublin; and, as I explained to the House, my late lamented Predecessor had not sufficient protection taken for his safety. I gave two reasons, which weighed with the Lord Lieutenant in his consideration of this subject.

MR. PARNELL: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether the late Mr. Burke, late Under Secretary, was also under special protection, and whether his special protection was also withdrawn; and, if so, by whose orders was the special protection withdrawn which had been given to the right hon. Member for Bradford?

MR. TREVELYAN: The late lamented Mr. Burke was under special protection, or what he considered sufficient special protection, at the time of his death. I do not know what word to use; but he had escaped the protection of the police, who walked behind him, by his taking a car. The policeman who ought to have met him was diverted from his duty by a drunken person who came across his path. That drunken person has been traced, and it has been ascertained that he could not have been connected with the persons associated with the murder. Mr. Burke would have had a policeman walking behind him if he had not taken a car at the point he did. When at the Gough Memorial he got off, and joined Lord Frederick Cavendish.

EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—CAPTAIN G. HELY.

MR. MARUM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the action of Captain Gorges Hely, landlord of the townland of Ballyonskill, in the county of Kilkenny, who, having been paid his rents by the solvent tenantry, in a great measure through the intervention of the local clergy, and upon an understanding that he would forbear as to those unable to meet their engagements, until an Arrears of Rent measure should be passed, has nevertheless, during the past week, proceeded with evictions of those tenantry so unable to pay; whether the Military and Civil Forces have been employed on several occasions at these evictions, although even the Conservative local organ testifies to the peaceable and orderly demeanour of the people of the locality as well as the evicted tenantry under the irritating circumstances of being deprived of their homes and of the crops recently sown in their holdings; and, whether the Government can take any action in the matter?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I have received a telegram from the local Constabulary, stating that Captain Hely did not make any such undertaking as the Question states. On the 7th instant, he evicted nine tenants; but first offered liberal abatements—for example, in one case he offered to take six months' rent where four years' was due. Some of the evicted tenants have now paid, and have re-occupied their holdings. On the requisition of the Sub-Sheriff and Resident Magistrate, military and police protected the Sub-Sheriff and his bailiffs in the service of writ and eviction. The Government does not intend to take any action in the matter.

EGYPT—THE POLITICAL CRISIS.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he can state what steps were taken by Sir Beauchamp Seymour, and Her Majesty's ships under his command, last Sunday, for the protection of British life and property at Alexandria; and, whether Her Majesty's Government nourish the belief that the repetition of such steps will be sufficient to preserve British interests in that City in case of the renewal of hostilities?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the despatch of Sir Beauchamp Seymour, which will answer the first part of the Question, is on its way home. One preliminary despatch was received at the Admiralty this morning. With regard to the second, instructions have been sent, which, we believe, will meet the exigencies of the case. In the opinion of the Admiralty, however, it would not be right for me to state the purport of these instructions. Questions on this subject, strictly speaking, ought to be addressed to the Admiralty.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF gave Notice that he would repeat his Question to-morrow.

MR. MAC IVER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can, without inconvenience, state what particular object or purpose Her Majesty's Government had in view in ordering the Fleet to Alexandria; and, whether Her Majesty's Government were aware, when ordering the Fleet to Alexandria, that the depth of water on the bar was not such as would allow any other than the smaller vessels to enter the Port?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the object with which the Fleet was sent to Alexandria was stated by me on the 23rd ultimo. The second part of the Question should more properly be addressed to the Secretary to the Admiralty; but the replies which have already been given in the House on the subject show that the statement now made is not correct.

MR. MAC IVER wished to know whether he should be in Order in taking the earliest opportunity of calling attention to the inaccuracy of the replies on this subject of the hon. Baronet? [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. CHAPLIN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any communications have been addressed by Her Majesty's Ambassador in Rome to Her Majesty's Government in reference to the speech alleged to have been made in Rome by Signor Mancini on the 12th June, and in which the following passages occur:—

"The policy of the Government could be summarized thus: To absolutely refuse armed intervention on the part of certain Powers, to favour the meeting of a Conference with a definite object. To affirm the competence of the European Concert to share in the final settlement. . . . and, if armed intervention should become necessary, to give preference to that of Turkey as the lesser evil of the two. . . . That the Italian Government were firmly resolved to maintain the agreement that subsisted between them and the Three Powers with whom they had hitherto acted in perfect union. He regarded that union as a happy one for Italy, and he hoped it would bring forth good results;"

and, whether those communications, and any information with regard to the nature of that agreement, will be included in the Papers to be laid upon the Table?

MR. SALT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the British Representative at Rome has made any communications to Her Majesty's Government respecting the statements of Signor Mancini—

"The policy of the Government could be summarized thus: To absolutely refuse assent to armed intervention on the part of certain Powers;"

and again,

"The Italian Government were firmly resolved to maintain the agreement that subsisted between them and the Three Powers with whom they had acted hitherto in perfect union;"

and, if so, whether such communications will be printed with the Papers about to be laid upon the Table relating to Egypt?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, in reply to the Questions of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) and the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt), I must follow the usual course in declining to express any opinion with regard to statements made by the Ministers of foreign countries in foreign Assemblies. I may, however, state that both the hon. Members appear to quote from the same report, which is a very inaccurate one, of Signor Mancini's speech. We have an official report in Italian, of which an English summary will be included in the Papers to be laid before Parliament.

MR. BOURKE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, before the proposed Conference takes place, Parliament will be informed what the bases agreed upon are; and, what are the limits within which discussions are to be confined?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, with respect to the limits within which the discussions at the Conference ought to be confined when the Conference meets, they are limits marked out by the Egyptian Question. A great number of other questions have been suggested to be introduced to the Conference; but the condition of Egypt is the limit of discussion at the Conference. With regard to the bases, those bases are no further determined than is shown in the Correspondence of the Governments, and especially that between the Governments of England and France. They have frequently been described in this House as having for their object the maintenance of all established rights in Egypt, with a due regard to the reasonable development of the institutions of that country.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The Question we should be very glad to have answered is this, Whether the limits within which the discussions are to be confined will be the limits of the Egyptian Question proper—that is, the condition of Egypt—or whether they will include any question as to the Suez Canal?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; I think the purpose for which the Conference is summoned is undoubtedly limited to the Egyptian Question proper.

MR. ONSLOW asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he could state to the House what are the "best means" (as stated in the House on Friday last) which the Government are taking for protecting British subjects in Egypt; and, whether the Government will make a full disclosure of their policy on matters relating to safety of British subjects as the best means of allaying the present excited feeling in that country?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, I can only repeat that very full instructions have been sent to Sir Beauchamp Seymour within the last few days, which will, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, fully meet the exigencies of the case. I must also repeat that I believe it is the opinion of the Admiralty, who have sent these instructions, that it would not be proper to state their exact terms to the House just now.

MR. ONSLOW: When were the instructions sent?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The latest instructions to Sir Beauchamp Seymour were sent either on Friday or Saturday. I saw them myself on Saturday.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will give an assurance to Parliament that, in the event of a Conference upon Egyptian affairs, Her Majesty's Government will assent to the neutralization of the Suez Canal in time of war?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, there is no intention to deal with the question of the neutralization of the Suez Canal. It would be outside the purposes of the Conference.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he was anxious to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which he had given him private Notice. It related to the alleged separate action of the Consuls General of Germany and Austria in Egypt. He thought that, in view of that alleged separate action to which the newspaper accounts referred, it would be satisfactory if his hon. Friend could state, What was the attitude of the Governments of those two Consuls General?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in reply, said, his right hon. Friend had given sufficiently long Notice to enable him to answer without breaking through the rules which he had laid down earlier in the evening. The answer would be best put by saying that the German Government yesterday accepted the invitation of England and France to the Conference, and that the Austrian Government accepted that invitation to-day. The Russian Government had previously accepted, and Italy had previously declared that she was ready to go with the other Powers. So that substantially the invitation of England and France had been accepted by all the Powers.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I understood that the Question of the right

hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goschen) was, whether Germany and Austria had pressed a Minister on the Khedive without consultation with the other Powers? I think we are entitled to know how far that is true; whether those two Consuls General acted without reference to the other Powers; and, whether in the face of their action, the European Concert is still maintained.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I can give no further answer without Notice. ["Oh, oh!"] I have answered the Question of my right hon. Friend, it being strictly within the rule I laid down. ["No, no!"] Well, my right hon. Friend is of opinion that I have answered it. At any rate, his Question was, Whether, in face of the statements in the newspapers of the separate action of the Austrian and German Consuls General, I would give any information as to the attitude occupied by the Austrian and German Powers in Egypt? and I have stated, in answer, the acceptance of the Conference by those Powers.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I wish to ask the Prime Minister, with reference to the Question I lately asked him, whether the Great Powers have assented to the exclusion of the question of the neutralization of the Suez Canal in time of war from the subjects to be considered at the Conference?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, so far as the limited purpose of the Conference has entered into the preliminary declarations of the Great Powers, we believe it to be, and I think I may say we know it to be, undoubtedly as far as any positive evidence has gone, decided by all those Powers that the operation and the action of the Conference should be confined to the Egyptian Question, within the limits just now described by the right hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote).

EGYPT AND ITALY—CESSION OF ASSAB BAY.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, With reference to the Green Book issued by the Italian Government on the 12th instant, from which it appears that, on the 16th September last, the British Embassy in Rome communicated a Despatch from Lord Granville proposing a Convention, to be negotiated under the auspices of England, of which the first Clause contained the formal recognition by Egypt and Turkey of Italy's Sovereignty over Assab Bay, and to the Bill introduced in the Italian Parliament on the same day by Signor Mancini, declaring Assab to be an Italian Colony, making it a free port, and giving the Italian Government the right of making concessions of land and concluding treaties with the neighbouring rulers; and, whether Her Majesty's Government regards Assab Bay as now belonging to Italy or to Egypt?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the Papers about to be laid on the Table will show the view taken by Her Majesty's Government of this question. We have endeavoured to promote an agreement which would be advantageous to all parties; but it has not yet been accepted by the Egyptian Government.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the hon. Baronet to answer the last part of the Question. Did Assab Bay belong to Italy or Egypt?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The Italian flag was hoisted in Assab Bay, as I have already frequently stated, in the month of January, 1880, by an Italian frigate and an Italian corvette. There has been no transfer of Sovereignty at Assab Bay, and the view Her Majesty's Government take of the present condition of affairs can only really be judged by reading the Papers.

THE ROYAL MINT—PROFIT ON THE COINAGE OF SILVER.

MR. WILLIAMSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, in view of the very large profit made by the Mint on the coinage of silver during 1881, amounting to £166,823 (after charging £46,000 to the account for loss on old silver coins), Whether he would keep the exceptionally large net gain from the Mint for 1881 in a "Suspense Account," excluding it and subsequent gains from the credit side of the National Finance Accounts until the Government has had time to consider what may fairly be done with these Mint-age gains to meet, either wholly or partially, heavy impending losses to the community through the abrasion and deterioration of our gold currency?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GLADSTONE): Sir, I may say it is not a matter at the discretion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or the Treasury, it being provided by the existing Act of Parliament, under which the whole of the expenses of the coinage at the Mint are defrayed from the Consolidated Fund, that the receipts also shall be paid in full into the Exchequer, and carried to the credit of the Consolidated Fund.

LAW AND POLICE—SEIZURE OF ARMS IN CLERKENWELL.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, that on account of a leading article in The Times of to-day, reflecting on the conduct of the Department over which he had the honour to preside for some years, and containing statements which were entirely of a misleading character, he begged to ask the Secretary of State for War some Questions, of which had given him private Notice. The statement in The Times was—

"When we remember that in 1879 some 200,000 rifles were sold by the War Office, and, in spite of the protest of the then Irish Secretary, were allowed to find their way into Ireland, and that these very weapons are now in the hands of the miscreant bodies with which Ireland swarms, we may well doubt whether one landlord the less will be shot, or one official the less be struck down, in consequence of Saturday's seizure."

He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman—First, Whether any arms at all were sold by the War Office in 1879; secondly, whether any sale of arms had taken place since the protest of the Irish Government was received at the War Office in July, 1879; and thirdly, with reference to the seizure of Saturday, whether he could state if the arms seized at Clerkenwell were manufactured by or for the Government?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the noble Lord, I have to state that his two first Questions have been already answered, I think, satisfactorily; but, in order to relieve his mind, I will answer them again. No arms were sold by the War Office in 1879, and no arms have been sold since the objection made by the Irish Government in that year. The arms seized at Clerkenwell are in course of examination this day; but I have heard a few minutes ago, that none of them were manufactured either by or for the Government.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that in consequence of the Question of the noble Lord (Lord Eustace Cecil), and the answer given by the Secretary of State for War as to the sale of arms, he should ask, Why the Irish Government remonstrated in July 1879, respecting the sale of arms, if no arms had been sold; and, whether it was not the fact that a very unadvised and a very large sale of arms took place in 1879, under the auspices of the Conservative Government?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) makes a reference to the remonstrance addressed by the Irish Government to the War Office in 1879. I may say at once, without taking any further notice of the subject, that I did make a remonstrance against the sale by a private individual in Sheffield of some arms which bore the Government mark, and which had been previously in the possession of the military authorities. That was what the protest referred to.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he can give any further information about the seizure of arms; and as there is considerable anxiety among the public as to the fact that only one person has been apprehended, whether he can explain how it came to pass that the police were unable to apprehend other persons concerned?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Substantially, I may say that the accounts in the newspapers are correct. A very large number of rifles and a great quantity of ammunition and revolvers were seized by the police. I do not, however, think it would be desirable that I should at present make any further statement on the subject. The person who was admittedly in custody of these arms was arrested; and what further information can be obtained with reference to those with whom he was connected I do not think it would be wise to communicate.

PARLIAMENT — PUBLIC BUSINESS — ARREARS OF RENT (IRELAND) BILL.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked the Prime Minister, Whether it was his intention to proceed to-morrow with the Motion in reference to the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill, of which he had given Notice; and, if so, whether he would give an explanation as regards the general Business.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, it was in consequence of noticing a remark made by the right hon. Gentleman, and likewise an observation of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), that I postponed until to-morrow the Notice that I had given in the House; but I will, to-morrow, in making that Motion, state, as far as the actual condition of circumstances permits, what views the Government have in regard to the Business of the House. I shall only be able to do it in a form somewhat general to-morrow; but it will undoubtedly be made in a form more specific when we have made further progress.

MR. HEALY asked the Prime Minister, Whether he intended to make his statement at a Morning Sitting, or at 4 o'clock.

MR. GLADSTONE answered, at a Morning Sitting.

POST OFFICE — THE LETTER CARRIERS.

MR. SCHREIBER asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is true that the proposals made by the Postmaster General to the Treasury for increasing the pay of the letter carriers have been rejected, but that the right hon. Gentleman is still pressing for an equitable settlement of the question; and, if not, what delays the announcement of a decision so often promised and so anxiously expected?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, the statement quoted by the hon. Member is inaccurate. The proposals which have been made and discussed included many details. Most of these have been settled; one or two are still pending, but an early decision may be looked for.

EGYPT—SIR EDWARD MALET, CONSUL GENERAL.

MR. CHAPLIN: I wish to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question, of which I have not given him Notice, but the propriety of answering which he will probably admit. It is, Whether the rumour, rather widely circulated yesterday, that Sir Edward Malet is seriously ill at Alexandria is correct?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I am happy to say, Sir, that Sir Edward Malet is not seriously ill. He has a mild attack of fever, which will probably incapacitate him for work for about a week.

own interest more by accepting some of the moderate and mild Amendments of Irish Members, than by exasperating them by refusals of every reasonable concession; and he would appeal to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland to reconsider the view he had taken of the Amendment before the Committee.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) thought the hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. M'Coan) could not have been in the House when the last Amendment was accepted by the Government, or he would not have made the statement with which he concluded his speech. It seemed to him they had been engaged for a considerable time upon a matter which was not worthy of discussion. As he understood the clause, a man roaming about under suspicious circumstances was to be brought before the magistrate, who would inquire into the case. The magistrate was not to decide upon the statement of the constable alone, but to inquire into the case by the aid of all the evidence he could get. But the Amendment asked that there should be a partial record—and not a complete or perfect record—taken, which should be brought forward again after the magistrates had inquired into all the circumstances of the case.

MR. GIVAN said, the hon. and learned Member for Colchester (Mr. Willis) had stated that the inhabitants of London lived under a law by which a constable might arrest a man on the mere suspicion of crime. That was not the point. The point was that a man might be arrested on the unsworn evidence of a young, green, and irresponsible constable, taken before a magistrate as inexperienced as the policeman, and imprisoned for six months, or bound over to keep the peace, without leaving any record behind sworn. He did not know any law which gave such a power to a policeman or magistrate, and he therefore hoped the Government would agree to the Amendment. If the policeman could say that the man he arrested had been loafing about with, apparently, nothing to do, that fact should be put in the information—there should be a record of it. But do not leave the public in general at the mercy of, it might be, an inexperienced, but, certainly, an irresponsible policeman.

Mr. M'Coan

MR. LEAMY said, he was unable to understand the point of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland in his reply to the hon. Member for Wicklow (Mr. M'Coan). The hon. Member for Wicklow had said the whole thing was ridiculous; but if he had been present when the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was under discussion, he would not have said such a thing. [Mr. M'COAN: I did not say anything of the kind.] He was under a mistake, then. It appeared to him to be the most astonishing thing in the world that the Secretary of State for the Home Department should refuse to accept such an Amendment as this. Frankly, he would say he should have thought the Amendment necessary, and should have thought it impossible, for a moment, to believe that the Government intended that strangers arrested in any part of Ireland should be taken before the magistrates and compelled to enter into recognizances, or sent to gaol in default, without the slightest sworn testimony having been given. He felt convinced that if the Amendment had not been brought forward, and the clause had passed without Amendment, or without discussion on Amendment, no magistrate in Ireland would have thought of compelling a man to enter into recognizances, or of sending him to gaol in default, without sworn evidence. He very much feared, now that the question had been raised, that if the clause were to pass without Amendment, the magistrates would do under the Bill what they would never have thought of doing. He was surprised to see that some hon. Gentlemen saw a similarity between the power possessed by the policeman in England of arresting a man on suspicion, and that which, according to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, was to be claimed by the policeman in Ireland of not only arresting a man on suspicion, but of getting him to enter into his recognizances or being sent to prison. Taking the clause as it stood, he would ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, was it possible that it was the intention of the Government to do this in the case of a stranger without requiring a particle of sworn testimony to be given against him?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, it could not for a moment be contemplated that a case would be decided without sworn evidence. What he had objected to was that it should be laid down in the Bill that only part of the evidence should be sworn. So far as he was aware, there was no other way in which a magistrate could inquire into a case except by hearing sworn evidence.

MR. SEXTON said, they did not ask that part of the evidence only should be sworn and recorded; but they wished to make certain that a particular portion of it should be so treated. If the Committee looked at the clause, they would see that the magistrate must make a report of the committal to the Lord Lieutenant—and, of course, before such a report as that was made, sworn evidence must be given. He did not share the apprehensions of some of his hon. Friends, that the magistrates would send a man to gaol without sworn testimony. A policeman brought a man up under suspicious circumstances—what was the function of the magistrate? It was to take evidence on oath, so that he might form a pretty correct opinion as to whether the man had been in the place or neighbourhood from which he was taken for an unlawful purpose. He took it for granted that in a Court claiming to be a Court of Justice, or a Court of Law, the magistrates would not hear a charge against a man without evidence. What he desired was that the information laid by the police should be placed on record, so that afterwards it might be open to the Representatives of the people to demand the evidence upon which a man had been committed.

“Stating the grounds of the committal, the security required, and any explanation given by the prisoner by way of defence;”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, they need not discuss this matter at any length. The Committee would understand that it was proposed in the Amendment, not that evidence should be taken and a record made of it, but that one portion of the evidence only should be recorded. If the hon. Member (Mr. O’Kelly) would look at his own Amendment he would see that it ran thus—

“On the information on oath and in writing of the constable testifying to the facts which, in his opinion, render the presence of such stranger in the district,” &c.

Would the Committee be good enough to put on one side the question of arrest by the constable? When the constable had arrested a person on suspicion, that person would be brought before the magistrates; and they had accepted an Amendment by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), which said that—

“If such justice, after inquiry into the circumstances of the case, is satisfied he is not there for a lawful purpose.”

Every lawyer in the House must agree with him (the Attorney General) that this meant inquiry on oath. He would suggest to hon. Members opposite that their object was to have the evidence as a whole, and that it should be taken down in a manner similar, perhaps, to that in which depositions were now taken. In the absence of his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, he (the Attorney General) would not say more than that the hon. Member should not move an Amendment dealing with an isolated portion of the evidence, but that it would be much better for him to raise the whole question of the entire evidence being recorded. The hon. Member might move, in page 5, line 10, after “committal,” to insert “and the evidence that has been taken,” and then they would not only get the statement of the police, but the evidence of all the witnesses.

MR. M’COAN said, that what the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James) had just stated as to the character of the inquiry—to use the word embodied in the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell)—would be unanswerable and conclusive if the inquiry were to take place before London magistrates. But, as a matter of fact, the Committee must bear in mind that, in many of these cases, the magistrate would be a Justice of the Peace in some remote part of Ireland, and that such an individual would probably not view the case with the judicial mind of a London stipendiary. He would not, in fact, feel himself under an obligation to take sworn evidence at all. This was what would happen in the great majority of cases. The constable would meet a stranger, and, sniffing suspicion in the air, he would arrest him under what he—the constable—might choose to consider suspicious circumstances. It might be that all the ground of suspicion attaching to this stranger would be that he had a slouch hat, square-toed boots, and a coat of foreign cut. Well, the policeman arrested this man, and there was no other witness in the case. He took him before a magistrate, and said to his worship—"I saw this person walking under a hedge, and I thought his movements suspicious." That was all the suspicion there might be, and it could hardly be the intention of the Government to allow, say, a lay magistrate, who knew nothing of law, and who would be much more likely to attach weight to the word of a policeman than to that of a stranger, to send any man to prison on such a presumption of guilt. No committal should take place except on sworn evidence duly recorded, and such record should be sent to the Lord Lieutenant. Yet if the clause were allowed to become law as it stood, most magistrates would read the section as an instruction to commit without sworn evidence at all. The Government surely could not mean that this was to be done, because great injustice might be the result.

[Fourteenth Night.]

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he entirely agreed with a great deal that the hon. Member (Mr. M'Coan) had said; but the hon. Member wished only to have a record of the policeman's evidence, and the suggestion the Government made was that it would be better to move an Amendment to provide that there should be a record of all the evidence. Why the Irish Members should object to have the other evidence besides that of the policeman, he (Sir Henry James) could not conceive. If the Amendment he suggested were proposed in its proper place, no doubt his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department would discuss it and accept it.

MR. O'KELLY said, that, in view of the explanation of the hon. and learned Gentleman, he would postpone his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he had a small Amendment to propose which was not on the Paper, and he hoped the Government would not have any objection to it. He wished to suggest that after the word "sureties," in line 2,

Mr. M'Coan

page 5, they should insert the words, "of not more than fifty pounds."

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 2, after the word "sureties," insert the words "of not more than fifty pounds."
—(Mr. T. P. O'Connor.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. HEALY took it that the object of the Amendment was to prevent a prohibitive recognizance being insisted upon by the magistrate. In Ireland, as most of them knew, there were various types of magistrates. Some of them would be very fair; whilst others, who were entirely in the interest of the landlord class, were inclined to be very severe, especially upon people of the lower grades of society. If they made the amount of the recognizances definite and certain, it would not matter what kind of a man a prisoner was brought before. If they did not fix the recognizances, the prisoner should be allowed some choice; he should be permitted to say what magistrates he should be taken before. The Government had drawn this clause very loosely; and, under it, if the magistrate felt so disposed, he might make the recognizance, say, £1,000,000, which would be absurd on the face of it. He was sure the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. W. M. Johnson) could not have been consulted when this clause was drafted, or he would not have given his assent to it.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that he had consulted with his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) upon the question, and he saw no objection to accepting the Amendment, on the understanding that each of the sureties and the principal himself would be liable for the amount of the recognizances.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR thought the proposal made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman was a very fair one, and he would incorporate it in his Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the Amendment would be inserted in the Bill.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Then I suppose I had better withdraw the Amendment.

MR. T. A. DICKSON: Do I understand that the sureties are £50 each?

MR. TREVELYAN: Yes.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BIGGAR said, he begged leave to move, in page 5, after the word "behaviour," to insert the words "while within such district." He thought there ought to be limits to the responsibility of the sureties. It was one of the primary objects of the Government to get rid of what were called "suspicious characters;" in fact, if they left the country, that was all the Government desired. For that reason it was that he moved the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 2, after the word "behaviour," insert the words "while within such district."
—(Mr. Biggar.)

Question proposed, "That such words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was afraid he could not accept the Amendment, because it would only be necessary, in that case, to evade the operation of the clause, for a man to move 50 yards away from the place.

MR. HEALY wished to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland whether he would distinguish between being at peace, and being of good behaviour? Under the Statute of Edward III. they bound a man over to be of good behaviour; and he had always believed that if the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had availed himself of the provisions of this Act, in dealing with the Salvation Army, and had endeavoured to bind over the members of that organization to be of good behaviour, instead of endeavouring to get them bound over to keep the peace, he would have been successful in his prosecution. It would enlighten the Committee very much if the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) would explain to them, from the Front Ministerial Bench, the difference between keeping the peace and being of good behaviour———The hon. and learned Gentleman did not answer. Perhaps he could not give them an explanation?

MR. DILLON said, he should like to know, for his own personal information, what being of good behaviour was? It seemed to him to be a very wide expression. Surely it was very hard to ask a man to give substantial bail to be of good behaviour, if they did not give him the faintest idea of what they meant by good behaviour.

MR. BIGGAR did not wish to put the Committee to the trouble of dividing, and, therefore, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HEALY said, he would move, as an Amendment, after the word "peace," to leave out the words "and to be of good behaviour." He did it with the object of eliciting from the Government, if possible, what a man was to be bound over to do under these words.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) is withdrawn.

MR. HEALY said, he wished to know from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) whether a magistrate had power to bind a man over to be of good behaviour?

THE CHAIRMAN: No discussion can take place until we have a question before the Committee.

MR. HEALY said, he had moved an Amendment. He had moved to leave out the words "to be of good behaviour," and he had done so on the ground that he required information as to what the words meant. The Secretary of State for the Home Department, it must be remembered, had distinctly stated that there should be no surplusage in the Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 2, after the word "peace," leave out "to be of good behaviour."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) said he did not know the meaning of the phrase "to be of good behaviour," and he (the Attorney General) would not contradict the hon. Gentleman on that point. [A laugh.] He did not mean that personally; but he could not believe that the hon. Member did not understand the words. It was an old legal term, which meant something more and wider than keeping the peace. Binding a man over to keep the peace meant binding him over to refrain from acts of violence; but binding a man over to be of good behaviour amounted to binding him over not to commit acts, which might not be acts of violence, but yet which would be likely to set class against class, or to incite to acts which would be a breach of the peace, and which would, therefore, be seditious. The words were continually used.

[Fourteenth Night.]

MR. HEALY said, he should like to know why the words were not included in the magistrates' commission? Why, should they have one law in Ireland and another in England? Why did he not bind over the "Salvationists" to be of good behaviour? The fact of the matter was, that they dared not do so. Although, under the Statute of Edward III., the Government could bind over every man-jack of the "Salvationists" to be of good behaviour, they had not the courage to invoke that Statute. They dared not do so; there would be such an outcry against it in England. It was only good enough for the mere Irish.

MR. SEXTON said, that, although his hon. Friend the Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) had exposed himself to a somewhat sarcastic statement from the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James), it was, nevertheless, the fact that the same doubt, which was evidently in the mind of his hon. Friend, was experienced by many people in Ireland. Probably, the hon. and learned Attorney General, therefore, would make the same sarcastic observation with regard to many other people. The ladies who went from Dublin to superintend the building of huts for evicted tenants were held by Mr. Clifford Lloyd to be guilty of bad behaviour, and had been called upon to find sureties to be of good behaviour. Two carpenters from Limerick, who were employed upon the construction of these huts, and who were earning 4s. a-day at their trade, were also declared by Mr. Clifford Lloyd to be of bad behaviour; and so, in the case of various acts, in themselves most innocent, done in different parts of the country, the magistrates had held that the people committing them had been of bad behaviour, simply because it was believed that their operations interfered with the interests of the land-owning class of Ireland. Unless some definition of these words were given, to limit the power to be conferred under the clause, the Amendment must certainly be pressed further.

MR. DILLON said, he hoped the Government would make some concession on this point, because, really, the more they examined into the clause, the more clearly would they see its insidiousness. What did it amount to? They had a whole system of offences marked out against a man in this Act. They bound him down so that he could hardly do anything; but, for fear that he might just be able to do one or two little things, they brought forward this clause, under the pretext that it was to be a protection against a man who came into a district for the purpose of committing murder or manslaughter, treason or treason-felony, attempts to kill, aggravated crimes of violence against the person, arson, whether by Common Law or by Statute, or attacks on dwelling-houses. If the clause were to be used only against persons who came into a district for the purpose of committing these offences, he (Mr. Dillon) and his Friends should not oppose it; but it might be used for an entirely different purpose, and the statements they had heard from the Government as who was to be considered a stranger, showed them how this clause was to be used. A man might be a stranger in a district, although his character and business might be very well known. If he (Mr. Dillon) went into the county he represented, he was a stranger—he was a stranger in every district of that county, because he had never lived there. Well, if he went into that county, he might be taken and bound over to be of good behaviour. The hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James) had said that anything that might be said or done calculated to set class against class, or anything that might be said to be an incitement to the committal of a breach of the peace, would be included in these words—"to be of good behaviour," as being seditious. Well, for the first time in his life, he (Mr. Dillon) now heard a Crown Lawyer laying down that definition, and saying that anything tending to set class against class in Ireland was sedition. It amounted to this—that anybody who was agitating in Ireland, if that agitation were calculated in any way to set one class against another, might be regarded by a magistrate, or a Crown lawyer, or a Judge, as acting in a seditious manner. Under such a rule as that, it would be impossible for anybody in Ireland to complain of the action of the landlords, or to complain of evictions—it would be impossible even for them to complain of the action of the Government, because every complaint of that kind would be seditious. They knew that, under ordinary circumstances, when a case came to be tried before a jury, the common sense of the jurymen interpreted accurately the amount of the offence committed by a defendant. But, under this Bill, the trial would not be by a jury, but it would partake of the character of a “Star Chamber” inquiry. A man who habitually lived in Ireland, and who made himself obnoxious to the authorities, if he went out of his district, although his aim and object might be perfectly legitimate, and although he might in no way be connected with outrages, might be put under the rule of bail, which would pursue him all over Ireland. If such a man did anything, no matter where, that was calculated to produce discontent in the minds of any person, he would forfeit his own bail and that of his sureties.

MR. MARUM said that, if a man swore the peace against another, that other was bound over to keep the peace. Under the Statute of Edward III. the law of England and the law of Ireland were exactly the same, although he did not maintain that the administration of it was similar.

MR. GIVAN said, that, under the existing law, there was a power to bind over a person to keep the peace, and the terms on which persons were so bound over were given in the 34th section of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 93. The magistrates had jurisdiction to bind over to keep the peace in respect of assaults and malicious injuries, and in the Schedule there was a form under which persons were bound, not only to keep the peace, but also to be of good behaviour. He did not think that the point was of much moment.

MR. HEALY said, that on this subject of binding a person over to be of good behaviour, he would read an extract from Paterson's Liberty of the Subject. In the volume entitled Security of the Person, he said—and the Secretary of State for the Home Department might take a hint, perhaps, from this statement of opinion in dealing with the point—

“How far surety for good behaviour may be ordered:”

“The proceeding of binding over a party to keep the peace towards some individual is an intelligible and necessary remedy and precaution, because it points to a definite and precise mischief which it is designed to avert. It is founded on the oath of an individual, that already some overt act or disposition towards personal violence had been manifested, and that if the party is not restrained or cautioned in an emphatic manner, he may do irreparable mischief. But when, in somewhat similar circumstances, it is thought to extend such jurisdiction into a wider sphere, and to demand ‘sureties for good behaviour’ this involves so vague and shadowy an imputation on the party aimed at, that the Courts might well hesitate to act upon it.”

That was a very important opinion. The writer went on to say—

“Good behaviour, in view of the law, can only mean conduct flowing from a general disposition to observe its full directions in their full latitude and detail; and, indeed, such a frame of mind ought to be frankly accepted and presumed in all subjects whatever. If any person manifests a proclivity towards any specific crime, there are, or ought to be, appropriate modes of punishing not only the crime, but any attempt to commit it. All kinds of threats of violence towards the person are fully disposed of, as already described, on the application to swear the peace.”

That was highly important to consider in regard to this Bill.

“To go beyond that, to exact sureties for being a good citizen, without reference to any overt step towards a breach of the law, is to travel beyond the proper province of the law into the region of morals, and to seek a kind of specific performance of good conduct, which comes neither within the category of crime nor any attempt or threat to commit it. It would be time enough to interfere when something had been done sufficiently definite to disturb the general security which the law throws round every subject of the realm.”

The writer went on to say a great deal more; but he (Mr. Healy) would not trouble the Committee with it. The statement he had read was a most important one—the authority was that of a very well-known lawyer. Surely, after hearing the extract, the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James) would give way on the point. The hon. and learned Gentleman only told them that the phrase, “to be of good behaviour,” was a very old and well recognized one. That was true. But what were the facts? There was a phrase in the Statute of Edward III.; but there

[Fourteenth Night.]

MR. WARTON suggested that the words "under suspicious circumstances" should be placed after the word "district," instead of occupying their present position in the clause. That was the more necessary, as the Government had intimated their willingness to adopt the definition of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), to avoid confusion of language.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT thought it would, perhaps, be better that the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) should be withdrawn, and moved again later on, in the form that would better suit the wording of the clause. As it stood at present, it would create some confusion in the wording of the clause.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he had discovered that his Amendment would give rise to some verbal difficulty in the clause, and did not intend to press it on that occasion.

MR. CALLAN said, he had intended to move that the term "stranger" in the clause should be defined to mean "a person not usually resident within a radius of ten miles of the place where he was arrested;" but, considering that too great a distance, he now proposed to alter it to five miles. The clause would then read as follows—

"If a constable finds in a proclaimed district any stranger not usually resident within a radius of five miles therefrom under suspicious circumstances," &c.

His proposal would limit the arbitrary power which the clause vested in policemen. The clause would still enable a policeman to arrest a stranger under suspicious circumstances; but when the person arrested gave proof that he usually resided within five miles of the district, he would be relieved from the necessity of giving bail to the magistrate. He had already endeavoured to get an explanation of the meaning of the term "stranger;" but this had not been forthcoming. The clause provided that any policeman might arrest a person under suspicious circumstances who was a stranger, but it did not say whether this meant a stranger to the district or a stranger to the policeman. Now, it was a fact that policemen in Ireland did not remain in any district for a length of time; they were removable, and were frequently sent to places where they themselves were strangers. Hon. Members would know that it would take months before they became acquainted with the residents in a district. Notwithstanding that, a policeman was to be allowed to arrest any person he did not know, and to bring him before a magistrate, and on the mere statement of the constable that he found the man under a hedge, or sitting in the shade, perhaps, and did not know him, the magistrate would require the individual to give bail for good behaviour, or, in default, would commit him to prison. He (Mr. Callan) wanted that a man should not be required to give bail if he resided within five miles of the district; and this was not at all an unreasonable limit to propose, for it was often the case that people in Ireland had to travel five miles from their homes to chapel. It was clear that some definition of the term stranger must be supplied, and with that object he begged to move the Amendment to which he had referred.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 36, after the word "stranger," to insert the words "not usually resident within a radius of five miles therefrom."—(Mr. Callan.)

Question proposed "That those words be there inserted."

MR. SEXTON said, although this Amendment was an improvement upon the clause, he was inclined to believe that any single-barrelled or absolute definition of the word "stranger" would be unjust. He thought the definition ought to be alternative; it should be either that a person was unknown in the place or town, or that he resided out of it. It was well known that policemen in Ireland were not, as his hon. Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) had pointed out, allowed to remain in districts where they were born and bred, lest they should be hampered by former associations in the performance of their duties. It was, therefore, absurd to say that a man should be arrested by a policeman because he was a stranger, for he might be less a stranger in the place than the policeman himself. Suppose a person to be unknown in a village or town—to be merely on a visit—but having letters of introduction to persons living there, he asked, could that person be arrested under the clause? He argued that the word "stranger" should be defined to mean a person living beyond a certain radius; but he considered the limit of

MR. SEXTON said, he begged to move a new sub-section after Sub-section (1), as follows:—

“(2). The justice shall, on the application of any such person brought before him as aforesaid, adjourn the further hearing of the case to a petty sessions to be held for the petty sessions district within which such arrest took place, not less than four days after the date of such application, and to consist of at least two justices, on such person giving reasonable bail for his appearance at such petty sessions. Such court of petty sessions shall deal with the case in manner provided by ‘The Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851,’ and the Acts amending same, in case of summary proceedings, and shall have the same power to deal with such person as in this section hereinbefore conferred on a justice of the peace.”

It would be apparent to the Committee that the object of this Amendment was to give an accused person an opportunity of going before two Justices in a Court of ordinary Petty Sessions. If a person was willing to be tried by a single Justice, he might be so tried; but he (Mr. Sexton) wished to reserve to such person the right of going to the Petty Sessions. The arrangement for trial before a single Justice was one which contained a great deal of danger. The Justice might hold his Court at his private house, and hold an investigation at night, under such circumstances as to deprive the defendant of the advantage of having his case heard in open Court, in the presence of the representatives of the Press. Considering the state of feeling existing between the landlord and the tenant classes in Ireland, it would be dangerous to bring a man under this clause before a single magistrate. The magistrate might be a landlord himself, and a landlord unable to collect his rents, or he might be an agent. It would be absurd to bring a man before a single magistrate of that kind—it would be equivalent to convicting him at once off-hand. The landlord and the land agent, who divided between them the function of magistrate in Ireland, would be only too glad to convict. If the Amendment was agreed to, he proposed that not less than four days should expire between the hearing of the case by the magistrate and its hearing in the Petty Sessions Court. This interval was for the purpose of enabling the accused to put his defence in some sort of shape. In the case of a stranger, who had very few friends in the district, or in the country, it would be more necessary than it would be in the case of a person living in the neighbourhood that he should have ample time and opportunity for preparing his defence, and that publicity should be given to the proceedings. The Press should have an opportunity of hearing and reporting the case. He thought the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would see the reasonableness of his proposal.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 6, after “month,” insert as a new sub-section:—“The justice shall, on the application of any such person brought before him as aforesaid, adjourn the further hearing of the case to a petty sessions to be held for the petty sessions district within which such arrest took place, not less than four days after the date of such application, and to consist of at least two justices, on such person giving reasonable bail for his appearance at such petty sessions. Such court of petty sessions shall deal with the case in manner provided by ‘The Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851,’ and the Acts amending same, in the case of summary proceedings, and shall have the same power to deal with such person as in this section hereinbefore conferred on a justice of the peace.”—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, “That the sub-section be there inserted.”

MR. HEALY said, the Amendment was a very reasonable one indeed, and he hoped the Government would see their way to accept it. It amounted to this—that where a man had been arrested, his case might not be adjudicated on at once if he did not wish it to be, but might be taken to the Petty Sessions for hearing. That, surely, was not too much to ask. The practice of Mr. Clifford Lloyd used to be to take a whole bundle of men into his private room, harangue them and sentence them thereafter.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he understood the object of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) to be that when a man was brought before one Justice, he might claim, on giving bail, to have his case adjourned for the purpose of having it heard before two Justices. That, he thought, was not unreasonable.

MR. WARTON said, that if the Amendment were accepted, it would have an effect upon the next sub-section of the clause. They would have to consider who was to send to the Lord Lieutenant a report of the committal, stating the grounds of the committal and so on. They would have to consider whether it was not a single instance in English practice; there was not a single record of its having been put into practice.

[Fourteenth Night.]

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, there certainly were records that could be given.

MR. HEALY said, he only spoke of newspaper reports of the proceedings of the Courts in Ireland. He had not been present at the time; but he was informed that during the State Trials in Dublin it was stated that there was no record of its having been put into practice, and that the statement was never contradicted.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was anxious to avoid entering into a legal argument with the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), because he was very much much afraid that he (Mr. Healy) would get the better of him if he did. He could not, however, help thinking that the hon. Member was wrong in this matter. In every Commission of the Peace, under which a Justice of the Peace obtained his powers, it was stated that the Justice should have power to cause a person to find sufficient security for the peace, or to be of good behaviour. Then, under the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1879, Courts of Summary Jurisdiction were expressly given the power to adjudge persons to enter into recognizances as security to keep the peace or to be of good behaviour towards the person or persons complaining. [Mr. HEALY: Towards the "person or persons?"'] Yes, that was the common form. Then there was the Act of 1851, and even the hon. Gentleman, in his Amendment, wished to put that into operation. [Mr. HEALY: In regard to an individual.] He did not wish to go into the discussion again. There were a great many things pointed at in the words "good behaviour," and the power of binding over to be of good behaviour was required in respect of acts not amounting to a breach of the peace, but which led to it. That power was intended rather to prevent the commission of crime than to punish it. The phrase had been in common use in England for a long time, as the hon. and learned Member (Dr. Commins) sitting near the hon. Member for Wexford would be able to tell that hon. Gentleman. This was by no means the application to Ireland of a strange law. The law was the same as that which was in existence in England.

Mr. Healy

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, he wished to say a word in addition to what had fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Henry James). He had here the form universally in use in England, and it was as follows:—"To keep the peace and to be of good behaviour to all Her Majesty's subjects." That was the form in a book of great authority, and the form universally used throughout England.

MR. HEALY said, he should be happy to withdraw his Amendment, if the hon. and learned Attorney General would consent to put in the words he had mentioned—"to be of good behaviour towards some person."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that if they inserted words in the plural, they would include all persons. The common form was to keep the peace not only towards certain persons, but towards all Her Majesty's subjects.

MR. HEALY said, he had no objection to the hon. and learned Gentleman putting it as much in the plural as he liked. But the hon. and learned Gentleman could not get off in that way on this point. What they wanted to get at was this—Whether the hon. and learned Gentleman would agree to put in the Bill words to the effect that the person bound over should be of good behaviour towards some "person or persons?" Unless these words were inserted, they might find Irish magistrates contending that it was bad behaviour to erect a hut, or to collect subscriptions for persons put in goal for erecting huts.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was anxious to meet the wishes of the hon. Member. Would words of this kind suit him?—

"Shall be of good behaviour towards Her Majesty and all her liege subjects, and especially towards the complainant."

MR. HEALY: Yes; put that in.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I will, on Report.

MR. HEALY: Very well; then I beg to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SEXTON said, he begged to move a new sub-section after Sub-section (1), as follows:—

“(2). The justice shall, on the application of any such person brought before him as aforesaid, adjourn the further hearing of the case to a petty sessions to be held for the petty sessions district within which such arrest took place, not less than four days after the date of such application, and to consist of at least two justices, on such person giving reasonable bail for his appearance at such petty sessions. Such court of petty sessions shall deal with the case in manner provided by ‘The Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851,’ and the Acts amending same, in case of summary proceedings, and shall have the same power to deal with such person as in this section hereinbefore conferred on a justice of the peace.”

It would be apparent to the Committee that the object of this Amendment was to give an accused person an opportunity of going before two Justices in a Court of ordinary Petty Sessions. If a person was willing to be tried by a single Justice, he might be so tried; but he (Mr. Sexton) wished to reserve to such person the right of going to the Petty Sessions. The arrangement for trial before a single Justice was one which contained a great deal of danger. The Justice might hold his Court at his private house, and hold an investigation at night, under such circumstances as to deprive the defendant of the advantage of having his case heard in open Court, in the presence of the representatives of the Press. Considering the state of feeling existing between the landlord and the tenant classes in Ireland, it would be dangerous to bring a man under this clause before a single magistrate. The magistrate might be a landlord himself, and a landlord unable to collect his rents, or he might be an agent. It would be absurd to bring a man before a single magistrate of that kind—it would be equivalent to convicting him at once off-hand. The landlord and the land agent, who divided between them the function of magistrate in Ireland, would be only too glad to convict. If the Amendment was agreed to, he proposed that not less than four days should expire between the hearing of the case by the magistrate and its hearing in the Petty Sessions Court. This interval was for the purpose of enabling the accused to put his defence in some sort of shape. In the case of a stranger, who had very few friends in the district, or in the country, it would be more necessary than it would be in the case of a person living in the neighbourhood that he should have ample time and opportunity for preparing his defence, and that publicity should be given to the proceedings. The Press should have an opportunity of hearing and reporting the case. He thought the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would see the reasonableness of his proposal.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 6, after “month,” insert as a new sub-section:—“The justice shall, on the application of any such person brought before him as aforesaid, adjourn the further hearing of the case to a petty sessions to be held for the petty sessions district within which such arrest took place, not less than four days after the date of such application, and to consist of at least two justices, on such person giving reasonable bail for his appearance at such petty sessions. Such court of petty sessions shall deal with the case in manner provided by ‘The Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851,’ and the Acts amending same, in the case of summary proceedings, and shall have the same power to deal with such person as in this section hereinbefore conferred on a justice of the peace.”—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, “That the sub-section be there inserted.”

MR. HEALY said, the Amendment was a very reasonable one indeed, and he hoped the Government would see their way to accept it. It amounted to this—that where a man had been arrested, his case might not be adjudicated on at once if he did not wish it to be, but might be taken to the Petty Sessions for hearing. That, surely, was not too much to ask. The practice of Mr. Clifford Lloyd used to be to take a whole bundle of men into his private room, harangue them and sentence them thereafter.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he understood the object of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) to be that when a man was brought before one Justice, he might claim, on giving bail, to have his case adjourned for the purpose of having it heard before two Justices. That, he thought, was not unreasonable.

MR. WARTON said, that if the Amendment were accepted, it would have an effect upon the next sub-section of the clause. They would have to consider who was to send to the Lord Lieutenant a report of the committal, stating the grounds of the committal and so on. They would have to consider whether it should be "the justice" or "the justices."

MR. HEALY said, that difficulty could be got over by saying "the said justice or justices."

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, that if the right hon. and learned Gentleman were to accept the Amendment as it stood, it was a question for consideration whether he would not take cases of this kind out of the Act altogether, by enabling the prisoners to appeal to Quarter Sessions, and using all the other methods of appeal which would be open to them in ordinary cases. He saw no objection to having two Justices to try a case, instead of one; but, in other respects, it seemed to him that the appeal ought to be the same in these cases as in other cases. If this were not so, they would be giving special protection to a prisoner who chose to take advantage of the clause.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, what was wanted was to get security in this case—it did not matter how it was obtained, whether in the form of bail or in any other way.

Amendment agreed to; Sub-section inserted accordingly.

MR. HEALY said, he had an Amendment on the Paper, to give an appeal to the County Court Judge, subject to the provisions and in manner provided by the 24th section of "The Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851." He did not, however, propose to move that, as the hon. Member for Monaghan, later on, would move an Amendment to give an appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench. He (Mr. Healy), however, had a second Amendment on the Paper to this part of the clause. It was to insert as a sub-section—

"Upon the hearing of a charge under this section against a person, such person, or the husband or wife of such person, may, if such person thinks fit, be examined as an ordinary witness in the case, but the failure to exercise this right shall not be held to create any presumption against such person."

He was aware that, as regarded the wife, this, if accepted, would be a departure from the ordinary law; but he thought that as the whole Act was a departure from the ordinary law, the Government could raise no complaint on that score. The Amendment was a very reasonable one. It merely said that an accused person could, if he thought fit, give evidence, and his wife, if she happened to be about, could do so likewise. A stranger to the district was not likely to have his wife with him, so that the Government could not say that they would be in any way damaged by passing this sub-section. With regard to the latter part of his Amendment, he did not suppose its principle would be readily admitted in the House of Commons; but there were enactments containing such a provision on the Statute Books of America. He only mentioned that fact to show that it had already entered the minds of some lawyers to lay down that when a prisoner could exercise a right, and did not do so, it should not be held to create any presumption against him. The Government, he thought, might accept the clause. There was very little in it one way or the other, and if the Government objected to it, he should not be prepared to fight it; but it would give a prisoner a slight advantage. It should not be forgotten that, as he had said, if a man's wife happened to be on the spot, it could not be said that the man was a stranger in the district. If the Amendment in one respect disregarded the ordinary theory of the law, that was no reason why, in a measure like this, it should not be accepted.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 6, after "month," insert as a new sub-section:—"Upon the hearing of a charge under this section against a person, such person, or the husband or wife of such person, may, if such person thinks fit, be examined as an ordinary witness in the case, but the failure to exercise this right shall not be held to create any presumption against such person."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the sub-section be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES), said, there was no objection to the principle of the Amendment. He had accepted the principle in one of the Licensing Acts. The only exception he would take was that it would necessitate a slight revision of the 3rd clause. Inasmuch as they had not used the words in the previous clause, it would appear as though there was to be a presumption in the one class of case and not in the other. He would also suggest that the Amendment should end with the words "witness in the case."

MR. HEALY said, he would accept the hon. and learned Gentleman's suggestion, and leave out the latter part of the sub-section. Probably he would bring it up again on Report.

Amendment agreed to; Sub-section, as amended, inserted accordingly.

MR. PARNELL said, he begged to move the following Proviso:—

“Provided, That no person shall be deemed a stranger, within the meaning of this section, if any justice of the peace, clergyman, or other credible person known to such justice, shall attend before such justice and certify, on oath, his acquaintance with such first-mentioned person, and that he is of good character.”

This was an Amendment which he should hope the Government would feel themselves able to agree to. It was one of a very simple character. A Justice of the Peace ought to be able to judge whether the testimony of a clergyman or other credible person who gave a good character to a man was sufficient.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 6, at the end of the foregoing Amendment, to insert the words “Provided, That no person shall be deemed a stranger, within the meaning of this section, if any justice of the peace, clergyman, or other credible person known to such justice, shall attend before such justice and certify, on oath, his acquaintance with such first-mentioned person, and that he is of good character.”—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not think the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Parnell) would be disposed to retain the Amendment in that form, because the fact of a clergyman, or other credible person, certifying that the man was of good character did not prove that he was not a stranger. He might be a stranger of good character; but he could not be said not to be a stranger. The real point was, that he was under suspicious circumstances. Of course, the evidence of a respectable person that the man was of good character and good conduct would induce a Justice of the Peace to release him; but that was only part of the evidence which would prevent the stringency of this clause coming into operation; and if, by any means, the Justices of the Peace were not satisfied that persons could be released, they must give security under the section. Therefore, in either case, an arrested man would be safe. If there were a person of good character in the locality to testify in his behalf, he would not be deemed to be a stranger under suspicious circumstances, or, if there were any doubt upon that point, his friends would be able to give the securities required under the section. But to say that a man should not be deemed a stranger in the locality because some credible person said he was of good character would be inconsistent with the clause.

MR. HEALY said, that the Amendment said such a man should not be deemed a stranger within the district “within the meaning of this section,” which was an entirely different point. He admitted that the evidence of a Justice of the Peace or other credible person would not prove whether a man was a stranger; but the Amendment said “for the purpose of the section,” and that entirely disposed of the right hon. and learned Gentleman’s argument. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had taken up a position that the Amendment was not necessary, and that no amount of evidence by a clergyman or Justice of the Peace would prove that a man was not a stranger; but the whole point was that it was to be “within the meaning of the section.”

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the wording of the Amendment was not very clear; but his main point was that he was trying here to define the evidence which should satisfy a Justice of the Peace. It might be that a Justice of the Peace or a clergyman might know that a man was generally of good character; but there might be circumstances in connection with persons otherwise of good character so suspicious that the evidence could not be conclusive. The decision ought to be left to the tribunal, for it might be that the circumstances of suspicion might outweigh the general good character. If that were so, and a Justice of the Peace came to the conclusion that the circumstances were so suspicious as to require security, then the persons who were satisfied of the absolute good faith and good character of the man had only to become security for him and he could be discharged.

MR. M’COAN said, the object of the Amendment was to rebut the presumption of suspicion which might lead to a man’s committal. He did not wish to joke on so solemn a topic as the personality of the Home Secretary; but if the right hon. and learned Gentleman happened to be walking along a country road in Ireland, and was arrested as a should be "the justice" or "the justices."

MR. HEALY said, that difficulty could be got over by saying "the said justice or justices."

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, that if the right hon. and learned Gentleman were to accept the Amendment as it stood, it was a question for consideration whether he would not take cases of this kind out of the Act altogether, by enabling the prisoners to appeal to Quarter Sessions, and using all the other methods of appeal which would be open to them in ordinary cases. He saw no objection to having two Justices to try a case, instead of one; but, in other respects, it seemed to him that the appeal ought to be the same in these cases as in other cases. If this were not so, they would be giving special protection to a prisoner who chose to take advantage of the clause.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, what was wanted was to get security in this case—it did not matter how it was obtained, whether in the form of bail or in any other way.

Amendment agreed to; Sub-section inserted accordingly.

MR. HEALY said, he had an Amendment on the Paper, to give an appeal to the County Court Judge, subject to the provisions and in manner provided by the 24th section of "The Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851." He did not, however, propose to move that, as the hon. Member for Monaghan, later on, would move an Amendment to give an appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench. He (Mr. Healy), however, had a second Amendment on the Paper to this part of the clause. It was to insert as a sub-section—

"Upon the hearing of a charge under this section against a person, such person, or the husband or wife of such person, may, if such person thinks fit, be examined as an ordinary witness in the case, but the failure to exercise this right shall not be held to create any presumption against such person."

He was aware that, as regarded the wife, this, if accepted, would be a departure from the ordinary law; but he thought that as the whole Act was a departure from the ordinary law, the Government could raise no complaint on that score. The Amendment was a very reasonable one. It merely said that an accused person could, if he thought fit, give evidence, and his wife, if she happened to be about, could do so likewise. A stranger to the district was not likely to have his wife with him, so that the Government could not say that they would be in any way damaged by passing this sub-section. With regard to the latter part of his Amendment, he did not suppose its principle would be readily admitted in the House of Commons; but there were enactments containing such a provision on the Statute Books of America. He only mentioned that fact to show that it had already entered the minds of some lawyers to lay down that when a prisoner could exercise a right, and did not do so, it should not be held to create any presumption against him. The Government, he thought, might accept the clause. There was very little in it one way or the other, and if the Government objected to it, he should not be prepared to fight it; but it would give a prisoner a slight advantage. It should not be forgotten that, as he had said, if a man's wife happened to be on the spot, it could not be said that the man was a stranger in the district. If the Amendment in one respect disregarded the ordinary theory of the law, that was no reason why, in a measure like this, it should not be accepted.

Mr. Warton

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 6, after "month," insert as a new sub-section:—"Upon the hearing of a charge under this section against a person, such person, or the husband or wife of such person, may, if such person thinks fit, be examined as an ordinary witness in the case, but the failure to exercise this right shall not be held to create any presumption against such person."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the sub-section be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES), said, there was no objection to the principle of the Amendment. He had accepted the principle in one of the Licensing Acts. The only exception he would take was that it would necessitate a slight revision of the 3rd clause. Inasmuch as they had not used the words in the previous clause, it would appear as though there was to be a presumption in the one class of case and not in the other. He would also suggest that the Amendment should end with the words "witness in the case."

MR. HEALY said, he would accept the hon. and learned Gentleman's suggestion, and leave out the latter part of the sub-section. Probably he would bring it up again on Report.

Amendment agreed to; Sub-section, as amended, inserted accordingly.

MR. PARNELL said, he begged to move the following Proviso:—

“Provided, That no person shall be deemed a stranger, within the meaning of this section, if any justice of the peace, clergyman, or other credible person known to such justice, shall attend before such justice and certify, on oath, his acquaintance with such first-mentioned person, and that he is of good character.”

This was an Amendment which he should hope the Government would feel themselves able to agree to. It was one of a very simple character. A Justice of the Peace ought to be able to judge whether the testimony of a clergyman or other credible person who gave a good character to a man was sufficient.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 6, at the end of the foregoing Amendment, to insert the words “Provided, That no person shall be deemed a stranger, within the meaning of this section, if any justice of the peace, clergyman, or other credible person known to such justice, shall attend before such justice and certify, on oath, his acquaintance with such first-mentioned person, and that he is of good character.”—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not think the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Parnell) would be disposed to retain the Amendment in that form, because the fact of a clergyman, or other credible person, certifying that the man was of good character did not prove that he was not a stranger. He might be a stranger of good character; but he could not be said not to be a stranger. The real point was, that he was under suspicious circumstances. Of course, the evidence of a respectable person that the man was of good character and good conduct would induce a Justice of the Peace to release him; but that was only part of the evidence which would prevent the stringency of this clause coming into operation; and if, by any means, the Justices of the Peace were not satisfied that persons could be released, they must give security under the section. Therefore, in either case, an arrested man would be safe. If there were a person of good character in the locality to testify in his behalf, he would not be deemed to be a stranger under suspicious circumstances, or, if there were any doubt upon that point, his friends would be able to give the securities required under the section. But to say that a man should not be deemed a stranger in the locality because some credible person said he was of good character would be inconsistent with the clause.

MR. HEALY said, that the Amendment said such a man should not be deemed a stranger within the district “within the meaning of this section,” which was an entirely different point. He admitted that the evidence of a Justice of the Peace or other credible person would not prove whether a man was a stranger; but the Amendment said “for the purpose of the section,” and that entirely disposed of the right hon. and learned Gentleman’s argument. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had taken up a position that the Amendment was not necessary, and that no amount of evidence by a clergyman or Justice of the Peace would prove that a man was not a stranger; but the whole point was that it was to be “within the meaning of the section.”

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the wording of the Amendment was not very clear; but his main point was that he was trying here to define the evidence which should satisfy a Justice of the Peace. It might be that a Justice of the Peace or a clergyman might know that a man was generally of good character; but there might be circumstances in connection with persons otherwise of good character so suspicious that the evidence could not be conclusive. The decision ought to be left to the tribunal, for it might be that the circumstances of suspicion might outweigh the general good character. If that were so, and a Justice of the Peace came to the conclusion that the circumstances were so suspicious as to require security, then the persons who were satisfied of the absolute good faith and good character of the man had only to become security for him and he could be discharged.

MR. M’COAN said, the object of the Amendment was to rebut the presumption of suspicion which might lead to a man’s committal. He did not wish to joke on so solemn a topic as the personality of the Home Secretary; but if the right hon. and learned Gentleman happened to be walking along a country road in Ireland, and was arrested as a suspicious character, surely, if some clergyman came forward and declared that he knew him to be the Secretary of State for the Home Department, that ought to be sufficient to rebut the presumption. That was only carrying the argument to an extreme, and he thought it should require an exceedingly strong combination of suspicious circumstances concerning a man arrested under this clause to outweigh, say, such testimony as he had mentioned.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN considered it very desirable that some measure should be taken to provide that persons should not be arrested again and again in several districts, after having again and again proved that they were of good character, and had lawful business. He himself had an Amendment on the Paper, designed to carry out this view; but the Chairman had said the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was pretty much to the same effect. In his (Mr. Sullivan's) view, however, there was a substantial difference; but in putting forward his opinions in connection with this present Amendment, he would ask the Government to make some concession in that direction. What he had intended to propose was, that any person arrested and able to produce a certificate from any magistrate or clergyman in Great Britain or Ireland, certifying his good character, that should be held sufficient to enable him to go free. The present Amendment would make it necessary that on the occasion of each arrest a clergyman or magistrate should come forward and give his testimony. His proposition was that a man having lawful business might provide himself with a certificate from reputable and respectable authorities, which would enable him to travel through the country without having to undergo 20 or 30 different trials in as many different localities. Some reference to an idea of that kind was made earlier in the discussion, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department said he had an objection to introducing a system of "passports" into Ireland. He (Mr. Sullivan) did not think the right hon. and learned Gentleman need be so delicate about introducing a system of passports after all that he had done in connection with this measure. The word "suspects" had become naturalized in Ireland, and in a little while the clôture would be naturalized; and, therefore, he did not think there would be any very great objection to the introduction of passports to enable persons who had lawful business, and who were of good character, to avoid being again and again arrested, and having to go over the same ground to establish their innocence. He would suggest that the right hon. and learned Gentleman and the Government should consider whether some such plan could not be adopted with this Amendment.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, that, under a Bill of this kind, something like the passport system was necessary to enable a man to avoid arrest and trial. Suppose a newspaper correspondent or a commercial traveller was in Ireland, was he to be stopped in every town and put on his trial, and have to prove in some mysterious way that he was not a person of ill-purpose travelling for a suspicious motive? Would it not be better to allow him to produce, at the beginning of his journey, evidence that he was of good character, and travelling for a good purpose? He thought that was a natural and reasonable proposition. He supposed every Member of the House who had travelled in foreign countries had met with something of that kind. It had been his misfortune at Brindisi to be arrested and taken into custody on suspicion of being connected with a gang of smugglers, and he should have been glad of some person who would have come forward and shown that he was not a smuggler. The Committee should look the thing in the face; and as there was a foreign system of Government in Ireland there might as well be a foreign system of passport. He was in favour of the Amendment, and thought the Government ought to accept it.

MR. MACFARLANE thought the suggestion that passes should be provided by proper authorities was very reasonable; for it was possible that respectable people might be put to great inconvenience at many places—such as commercial travellers and newspaper correspondents. The system of passes might very well be adopted by the Government, the passes to be issued from Dublin for the protection of people from annoyance by the police. He thought this clause was one of great importance, for it seemed to him that the certificate of a Justice of the Peace, or a clergyman, or other credible person, would meet all that was required to enable a magistrate to discharge a man. If, however, the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) insisted on this Amendment, he would support it.

Mr. A. R. D. ELLIOT said, the question was not as to introducing passports, but as to what evidence would be necessary for a man taken before a magistrate.

Mr. PARNELL said, there were two conditions required to enable a Justice of the Peace to act under this clause. First of all, the person must be a stranger; and, secondly, the Justice of the Peace must consider that he was in a proclaimed district under suspicious circumstances. In that respect, the clause differed from the previous clause. Under the previous clause, a policeman was entitled to arrest a man under suspicious circumstances at night; under this clause the police were entitled to arrest strangers under suspicious circumstances whether at night or day. It was clear that if a person was arrested, and then got a Justice of the Peace, or a clergyman, or other credible person in the district to vouch for his good character and honesty, he ought not to be considered a stranger. He could not be a stranger under those circumstances, because he would be known to persons of repute and position in the district. Therefore, he submitted that he had made out his claim in regard to where evidence of that kind was produced a magistrate should be checked. If a man was not a stranger, the magistrate would be within his right in imprisoning a man; but, as the clause now stood, the question as to whether a man was a stranger or not was practically left to the police to decide, and, in most cases, the magistrate would only decide whether the man was in a proclaimed district under suspicious circumstances. He thought it was fair that if, under those circumstances, an accused person, arrested under the provisions of this extraordinary clause, produced some magistrate, clergyman, or other credible person, to testify in his behalf that he was not a stranger in the district, the magistrate ought not to have jurisdiction, and the man ought not to be brought under the operation of this clause. He thought the Government might have met him in this matter, and in consequence of their answer he should be obliged to take the sense of the Committee on the Amendment.

Mr. SYNAN said, he did not agree with the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) that the deposition of any person that a man was of good character had anything at all to do with the question of his being a stranger or not; but being a stranger under suspicious circumstances was not a rebuttal of facts, but an utter presumption against the man. The evidence of a magistrate, or clergyman, or other credible person that a man arrested was of good character ought to be sufficient to rebut that presumption. If there was evidence of the fact of the man doing anything, then such testimony would not be evidence as against the fact, but as against the presumption; and he apprehended that in any Court in the world, the evidence of a magistrate, clergyman, or other credible person in the neighbourhood would be quite sufficient to rebut the presumption against the man. Upon that ground he should support the Amendment.

Mr. DILLON explained that what the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) said was that it was not a question of the effect of this evidence, but it was a question of having a definition of the word "stranger." They wanted to know what a "stranger" was; and it was very important to have that defined, because the term was a very wide one. It might mean a man who had not a dwelling-house in the district, or simply that a man was not known in the district, and those two distinctions were entirely different in effect. The point of the hon. Member for the City of Cork was that a man known by people of good position and standing ought not to be called a stranger. If the hon. Member went to Cork, where he had no house, would he be considered a stranger, although he could call a hundred witnesses who could swear to his good character? Under the clause, however, he might be treated as a stranger; and if he (Mr. Dillon) himself went to Tipperary he might be treated as a stranger. The object of the Amendment was to place something like a narrow definition upon the word stranger, and to rule that "stranger" could not include a man who was known to persons of standing and repute. He own interest more by accepting some of the moderate and mild Amendments of Irish Members, than by exasperating them by refusals of every reasonable concession; and he would appeal to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland to reconsider the view he had taken of the Amendment before the Committee.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W.M. JOHNSON) thought the hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. M'Coan) could not have been in the House when the last Amendment was accepted by the Government, or he would not have made the statement with which he concluded his speech. It seemed to him they had been engaged for a considerable time upon a matter which was not worthy of discussion. As he understood the clause, a man roaming about under suspicious circumstances was to be brought before the magistrate, who would inquire into the case. The magistrate was not to decide upon the statement of the constable alone, but to inquire into the case by the aid of all the evidence he could get. But the Amendment asked that there should be a partial record—and not a complete or perfect record—taken, which should be brought forward again after the magistrates had inquired into all the circumstances of the case.

MR. GIVAN said, the hon. and learned Member for Colchester (Mr. Willis) had stated that the inhabitants of London lived under a law by which a constable might arrest a man on the mere suspicion of crime. That was not the point. The point was that a man might be arrested on the unsworn evidence of a young, green, and irresponsible constable, taken before a magistrate as inexperienced as the policeman, and imprisoned for six months, or bound over to keep the peace, without leaving any record behind sworn. He did not know any law which gave such a power to a policeman or magistrate, and he therefore hoped the Government would agree to the Amendment. If the policeman could say that the man he arrested had been loafing about with, apparently, nothing to do, that fact should be put in the information—there should be a record of it. But do not leave the public in general at the mercy of, it might be, an inexperienced, but, certainly, an irresponsible policeman.

Mr. M'Coan

MR. LEAMY said, he was unable to understand the point of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland in his reply to the hon. Member for Wicklow (Mr. M'Coan). The hon. Member for Wicklow had said the whole thing was ridiculous; but if he had been present when the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was under discussion, he would not have said such a thing. [Mr. M'COAN: I did not say anything of the kind.] He was under a mistake, then. It appeared to him to be the most astonishing thing in the world that the Secretary of State for the Home Department should refuse to accept such an Amendment as this. Frankly, he would say he should have thought the Amendment necessary, and should have thought it impossible, for a moment, to believe that the Government intended that strangers arrested in any part of Ireland should be taken before the magistrates and compelled to enter into recognizances, or sent to gaol in default, without the slightest sworn testimony having been given. He felt convinced that if the Amendment had not been brought forward, and the clause had passed without Amendment, or without discussion on Amendment, no magistrate in Ireland would have thought of compelling a man to enter into recognizances, or of sending him to gaol in default, without sworn evidence. He very much feared, now that the question had been raised, that if the clause were to pass without Amendment, the magistrates would do under the Bill what they would never have thought of doing. He was surprised to see that some hon. Gentlemen saw a similarity between the power possessed by the policeman in England of arresting a man on suspicion, and that which, according to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, was to be claimed by the policeman in Ireland of not only arresting a man on suspicion, but of getting him to enter into his recognizances or being sent to prison. Taking the clause as it stood, he would ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, was it possible that it was the intention of the Government to do this in the case of a stranger without requiring a particle of sworn testimony to be given against him?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, it could not for a moment be contemplated that a case would be decided without sworn evidence. What he had objected to was that it should be laid down in the Bill that only part of the evidence should be sworn. So far as he was aware, there was no other way in which a magistrate could inquire into a case except by hearing sworn evidence.

MR. SEXTON said, they did not ask that part of the evidence only should be sworn and recorded; but they wished to make certain that a particular portion of it should be so treated. If the Committee looked at the clause, they would see that the magistrate must make a report of the committal to the Lord Lieutenant—and, of course, before such a report as that was made, sworn evidence must be given. He did not share the apprehensions of some of his hon. Friends, that the magistrates would send a man to gaol without sworn testimony. A policeman brought a man up under suspicious circumstances—what was the function of the magistrate? It was to take evidence on oath, so that he might form a pretty correct opinion as to whether the man had been in the place or neighbourhood from which he was taken for an unlawful purpose. He took it for granted that in a Court claiming to be a Court of Justice, or a Court of Law, the magistrates would not hear a charge against a man without evidence. What he desired was that the information laid by the police should be placed on record, so that afterwards it might be open to the Representatives of the people to demand the evidence upon which a man had been committed.

“Stating the grounds of the committal, the security required, and any explanation given by the prisoner by way of defence;”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, they need not discuss this matter at any length. The Committee would understand that it was proposed in the Amendment, not that evidence should be taken and a record made of it, but that one portion of the evidence only should be recorded. If the hon. Member (Mr. O’Kelly) would look at his own Amendment he would see that it ran thus—

“On the information on oath and in writing of the constable testifying to the facts which, in his opinion, render the presence of such stranger in the district,” &c.

Would the Committee be good enough to put on one side the question of arrest by the constable? When the constable had arrested a person on suspicion, that person would be brought before the magistrates; and they had accepted an Amendment by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), which said that—

“If such justice, after inquiry into the circumstances of the case, is satisfied he is not there for a lawful purpose.”

Every lawyer in the House must agree with him (the Attorney General) that this meant inquiry on oath. He would suggest to hon. Members opposite that their object was to have the evidence as a whole, and that it should be taken down in a manner similar, perhaps, to that in which depositions were now taken. In the absence of his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, he (the Attorney General) would not say more than that the hon. Member should not move an Amendment dealing with an isolated portion of the evidence, but that it would be much better for him to raise the whole question of the entire evidence being recorded. The hon. Member might move, in page 5, line 10, after “committal,” to insert “and the evidence that has been taken,” and then they would not only get the statement of the police, but the evidence of all the witnesses.

MR. M’COAN said, that what the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James) had just stated as to the character of the inquiry—to use the word embodied in the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell)—would be unanswerable and conclusive if the inquiry were to take place before London magistrates. But, as a matter of fact, the Committee must bear in mind that, in many of these cases, the magistrate would be a Justice of the Peace in some remote part of Ireland, and that such an individual would probably not view the case with the judicial mind of a London stipendiary. He would not, in fact, feel himself under an obligation to take sworn evidence at all. This was what would happen in the great majority of cases. The constable would meet a stranger, and, sniffing suspicion in the air, he would arrest him under what he—the constable—might choose to consider suspicious circumstances. It might be that all the ground of suspicion attaching to this stranger would be that he had a slouch hat, square-toed boots, and a coat of foreign cut. Well, the policeman arrested this man, and there was no other witness in the case. He took him before a magistrate, and said to his worship—"I saw this person walking under a hedge, and I thought his movements suspicious." That was all the suspicion there might be, and it could hardly be the intention of the Government to allow, say, a lay magistrate, who knew nothing of law, and who would be much more likely to attach weight to the word of a policeman than to that of a stranger, to send any man to prison on such a presumption of guilt. No committal should take place except on sworn evidence duly recorded, and such record should be sent to the Lord Lieutenant. Yet if the clause were allowed to become law as it stood, most magistrates would read the section as an instruction to commit without sworn evidence at all. The Government surely could not mean that this was to be done, because great injustice might be the result.

[Fourteenth Night.]

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he entirely agreed with a great deal that the hon. Member (Mr. M'Coan) had said; but the hon. Member wished only to have a record of the policeman's evidence, and the suggestion the Government made was that it would be better to move an Amendment to provide that there should be a record of all the evidence. Why the Irish Members should object to have the other evidence besides that of the policeman, he (Sir Henry James) could not conceive. If the Amendment he suggested were proposed in its proper place, no doubt his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department would discuss it and accept it.

MR. O'KELLY said, that, in view of the explanation of the hon. and learned Gentleman, he would postpone his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he had a small Amendment to propose which was not on the Paper, and he hoped the Government would not have any objection to it. He wished to suggest that after the word "sureties," in line 2,

Mr. M'Coan

page 5, they should insert the words, "of not more than fifty pounds."

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 2, after the word "sureties," insert the words "of not more than fifty pounds."
—(Mr. T. P. O'Connor.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. HEALY took it that the object of the Amendment was to prevent a prohibitive recognizance being insisted upon by the magistrate. In Ireland, as most of them knew, there were various types of magistrates. Some of them would be very fair; whilst others, who were entirely in the interest of the landlord class, were inclined to be very severe, especially upon people of the lower grades of society. If they made the amount of the recognizances definite and certain, it would not matter what kind of a man a prisoner was brought before. If they did not fix the recognizances, the prisoner should be allowed some choice; he should be permitted to say what magistrates he should be taken before. The Government had drawn this clause very loosely; and, under it, if the magistrate felt so disposed, he might make the recognizance, say, £1,000,000, which would be absurd on the face of it. He was sure the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. W. M. Johnson) could not have been consulted when this clause was drafted, or he would not have given his assent to it.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that he had consulted with his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) upon the question, and he saw no objection to accepting the Amendment, on the understanding that each of the sureties and the principal himself would be liable for the amount of the recognizances.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR thought the proposal made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman was a very fair one, and he would incorporate it in his Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the Amendment would be inserted in the Bill.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Then I suppose I had better withdraw the Amendment.

MR. T. A. DICKSON: Do I understand that the sureties are £50 each?

MR. TREVELYAN: Yes.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BIGGAR said, he begged leave to move, in page 5, after the word "behaviour," to insert the words "while within such district." He thought there ought to be limits to the responsibility of the sureties. It was one of the primary objects of the Government to get rid of what were called "suspicious characters;" in fact, if they left the country, that was all the Government desired. For that reason it was that he moved the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 2, after the word "behaviour," insert the words "while within such district."
—(Mr. Biggar.)

Question proposed, "That such words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was afraid he could not accept the Amendment, because it would only be necessary, in that case, to evade the operation of the clause, for a man to move 50 yards away from the place.

MR. HEALY wished to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland whether he would distinguish between being at peace, and being of good behaviour? Under the Statute of Edward III. they bound a man over to be of good behaviour; and he had always believed that if the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had availed himself of the provisions of this Act, in dealing with the Salvation Army, and had endeavoured to bind over the members of that organization to be of good behaviour, instead of endeavouring to get them bound over to keep the peace, he would have been successful in his prosecution. It would enlighten the Committee very much if the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) would explain to them, from the Front Ministerial Bench, the difference between keeping the peace and being of good behaviour——— The hon. and learned Gentleman did not answer. Perhaps he could not give them an explanation?

MR. DILLON said, he should like to know, for his own personal information, what being of good behaviour was? It seemed to him to be a very wide expression. Surely it was very hard to ask a man to give substantial bail to be of good behaviour, if they did not give him the faintest idea of what they meant by good behaviour.

MR. BIGGAR did not wish to put the Committee to the trouble of dividing, and, therefore, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HEALY said, he would move, as an Amendment, after the word "peace," to leave out the words "and to be of good behaviour." He did it with the object of eliciting from the Government, if possible, what a man was to be bound over to do under these words.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) is withdrawn.

MR. HEALY said, he wished to know from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) whether a magistrate had power to bind a man over to be of good behaviour?

THE CHAIRMAN: No discussion can take place until we have a question before the Committee.

MR. HEALY said, he had moved an Amendment. He had moved to leave out the words "to be of good behaviour," and he had done so on the ground that he required information as to what the words meant. The Secretary of State for the Home Department, it must be remembered, had distinctly stated that there should be no surplusage in the Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 2, after the word "peace," leave out "to be of good behaviour."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) said he did not know the meaning of the phrase "to be of good behaviour," and he (the Attorney General) would not contradict the hon. Gentleman on that point. [A laugh.] He did not mean that personally; but he could not believe that the hon. Member did not understand the words. It was an old legal term, which meant something more and wider than keeping the peace. Binding a man over to keep the peace meant binding him over to refrain from acts of violence; but binding a man over to be of good behaviour amounted to binding him over not to commit acts, which might not be acts of violence, but yet which would be likely to set class against class, or to incite to acts which would be a breach of the peace, and which would, therefore, be seditious. The words were continually used.

[Fourteenth Night.]

MR. HEALY said, he should like to know why the words were not included in the magistrates' commission? Why, should they have one law in Ireland and another in England? Why did he not bind over the "Salvationists" to be of good behaviour? The fact of the matter was, that they dared not do so. Although, under the Statute of Edward III., the Government could bind over every man-jack of the "Salvationists" to be of good behaviour, they had not the courage to invoke that Statute. They dared not do so; there would be such an outcry against it in England. It was only good enough for the mere Irish.

MR. SEXTON said, that, although his hon. Friend the Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) had exposed himself to a somewhat sarcastic statement from the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James), it was, nevertheless, the fact that the same doubt, which was evidently in the mind of his hon. Friend, was experienced by many people in Ireland. Probably, the hon. and learned Attorney General, therefore, would make the same sarcastic observation with regard to many other people. The ladies who went from Dublin to superintend the building of huts for evicted tenants were held by Mr. Clifford Lloyd to be guilty of bad behaviour, and had been called upon to find sureties to be of good behaviour. Two carpenters from Limerick, who were employed upon the construction of these huts, and who were earning 4s. a-day at their trade, were also declared by Mr. Clifford Lloyd to be of bad behaviour; and so, in the case of various acts, in themselves most innocent, done in different parts of the country, the magistrates had held that the people committing them had been of bad behaviour, simply because it was believed that their operations interfered with the interests of the land-owning class of Ireland. Unless some definition of these words were given, to limit the power to be conferred under the clause, the Amendment must certainly be pressed further.

MR. DILLON said, he hoped the Government would make some concession on this point, because, really, the more they examined into the clause, the more clearly would they see its insidiousness. What did it amount to? They had a whole system of offences marked out against a man in this Act. They bound him down so that he could hardly do anything; but, for fear that he might just be able to do one or two little things, they brought forward this clause, under the pretext that it was to be a protection against a man who came into a district for the purpose of committing murder or manslaughter, treason or treason-felony, attempts to kill, aggravated crimes of violence against the person, arson, whether by Common Law or by Statute, or attacks on dwelling-houses. If the clause were to be used only against persons who came into a district for the purpose of committing these offences, he (Mr. Dillon) and his Friends should not oppose it; but it might be used for an entirely different purpose, and the statements they had heard from the Government as who was to be considered a stranger, showed them how this clause was to be used. A man might be a stranger in a district, although his character and business might be very well known. If he (Mr. Dillon) went into the county he represented, he was a stranger—he was a stranger in every district of that county, because he had never lived there. Well, if he went into that county, he might be taken and bound over to be of good behaviour. The hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James) had said that anything that might be said or done calculated to set class against class, or anything that might be said to be an incitement to the committal of a breach of the peace, would be included in these words—"to be of good behaviour," as being seditious. Well, for the first time in his life, he (Mr. Dillon) now heard a Crown Lawyer laying down that definition, and saying that anything tending to set class against class in Ireland was sedition. It amounted to this—that anybody who was agitating in Ireland, if that agitation were calculated in any way to set one class against another, might be regarded by a magistrate, or a Crown lawyer, or a Judge, as acting in a seditious manner. Under such a rule as that, it would be impossible for anybody in Ireland to complain of the action of the landlords, or to complain of evictions—it would be impossible even for them to complain of the action of the Government, because every complaint of that kind would be seditious. They knew that, under ordinary circumstances, when a case came to be tried before a jury, the common sense of the jurymen interpreted accurately the amount of the offence committed by a defendant. But, under this Bill, the trial would not be by a jury, but it would partake of the character of a “Star Chamber” inquiry. A man who habitually lived in Ireland, and who made himself obnoxious to the authorities, if he went out of his district, although his aim and object might be perfectly legitimate, and although he might in no way be connected with outrages, might be put under the rule of bail, which would pursue him all over Ireland. If such a man did anything, no matter where, that was calculated to produce discontent in the minds of any person, he would forfeit his own bail and that of his sureties.

MR. MARUM said that, if a man swore the peace against another, that other was bound over to keep the peace. Under the Statute of Edward III. the law of England and the law of Ireland were exactly the same, although he did not maintain that the administration of it was similar.

MR. GIVAN said, that, under the existing law, there was a power to bind over a person to keep the peace, and the terms on which persons were so bound over were given in the 34th section of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 93. The magistrates had jurisdiction to bind over to keep the peace in respect of assaults and malicious injuries, and in the Schedule there was a form under which persons were bound, not only to keep the peace, but also to be of good behaviour. He did not think that the point was of much moment.

MR. HEALY said, that on this subject of binding a person over to be of good behaviour, he would read an extract from Paterson's Liberty of the Subject. In the volume entitled Security of the Person, he said—and the Secretary of State for the Home Department might take a hint, perhaps, from this statement of opinion in dealing with the point—

“How far surety for good behaviour may be ordered:”

“The proceeding of binding over a party to keep the peace towards some individual is an intelligible and necessary remedy and precaution, because it points to a definite and precise mischief which it is designed to avert. It is founded on the oath of an individual, that already some overt act or disposition towards personal violence had been manifested, and that if the party is not restrained or cautioned in an emphatic manner, he may do irreparable mischief. But when, in somewhat similar circumstances, it is thought to extend such jurisdiction into a wider sphere, and to demand ‘sureties for good behaviour’ this involves so vague and shadowy an imputation on the party aimed at, that the Courts might well hesitate to act upon it.”

That was a very important opinion. The writer went on to say—

“Good behaviour, in view of the law, can only mean conduct flowing from a general disposition to observe its full directions in their full latitude and detail; and, indeed, such a frame of mind ought to be frankly accepted and presumed in all subjects whatever. If any person manifests a proclivity towards any specific crime, there are, or ought to be, appropriate modes of punishing not only the crime, but any attempt to commit it. All kinds of threats of violence towards the person are fully disposed of, as already described, on the application to swear the peace.”

That was highly important to consider in regard to this Bill.

“To go beyond that, to exact sureties for being a good citizen, without reference to any overt step towards a breach of the law, is to travel beyond the proper province of the law into the region of morals, and to seek a kind of specific performance of good conduct, which comes neither within the category of crime nor any attempt or threat to commit it. It would be time enough to interfere when something had been done sufficiently definite to disturb the general security which the law throws round every subject of the realm.”

The writer went on to say a great deal more; but he (Mr. Healy) would not trouble the Committee with it. The statement he had read was a most important one—the authority was that of a very well-known lawyer. Surely, after hearing the extract, the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James) would give way on the point. The hon. and learned Gentleman only told them that the phrase, “to be of good behaviour,” was a very old and well recognized one. That was true. But what were the facts? There was a phrase in the Statute of Edward III.; but there was not a single instance in English practice; there was not a single record of its having been put into practice.

[Fourteenth Night.]

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, there certainly were records that could be given.

MR. HEALY said, he only spoke of newspaper reports of the proceedings of the Courts in Ireland. He had not been present at the time; but he was informed that during the State Trials in Dublin it was stated that there was no record of its having been put into practice, and that the statement was never contradicted.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was anxious to avoid entering into a legal argument with the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), because he was very much much afraid that he (Mr. Healy) would get the better of him if he did. He could not, however, help thinking that the hon. Member was wrong in this matter. In every Commission of the Peace, under which a Justice of the Peace obtained his powers, it was stated that the Justice should have power to cause a person to find sufficient security for the peace, or to be of good behaviour. Then, under the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1879, Courts of Summary Jurisdiction were expressly given the power to adjudge persons to enter into recognizances as security to keep the peace or to be of good behaviour towards the person or persons complaining. [Mr. HEALY: Towards the "person or persons?"] Yes, that was the common form. Then there was the Act of 1851, and even the hon. Gentleman, in his Amendment, wished to put that into operation. [Mr. HEALY: In regard to an individual.] He did not wish to go into the discussion again. There were a great many things pointed at in the words "good behaviour," and the power of binding over to be of good behaviour was required in respect of acts not amounting to a breach of the peace, but which led to it. That power was intended rather to prevent the commission of crime than to punish it. The phrase had been in common use in England for a long time, as the hon. and learned Member (Dr. Commins) sitting near the hon. Member for Wexford would be able to tell that hon. Gentleman. This was by no means the application to Ireland of a strange law. The law was the same as that which was in existence in England.

Mr. Healy

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, he wished to say a word in addition to what had fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Henry James). He had here the form universally in use in England, and it was as follows:—"To keep the peace and to be of good behaviour to all Her Majesty's subjects." That was the form in a book of great authority, and the form universally used throughout England.

MR. HEALY said, he should be happy to withdraw his Amendment, if the hon. and learned Attorney General would consent to put in the words he had mentioned—"to be of good behaviour towards some person."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that if they inserted words in the plural, they would include all persons. The common form was to keep the peace not only towards certain persons, but towards all Her Majesty's subjects.

MR. HEALY said, he had no objection to the hon. and learned Gentleman putting it as much in the plural as he liked. But the hon. and learned Gentleman could not get off in that way on this point. What they wanted to get at was this—Whether the hon. and learned Gentleman would agree to put in the Bill words to the effect that the person bound over should be of good behaviour towards some "person or persons?" Unless these words were inserted, they might find Irish magistrates contending that it was bad behaviour to erect a hut, or to collect subscriptions for persons put in goal for erecting huts.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was anxious to meet the wishes of the hon. Member. Would words of this kind suit him?—

"Shall be of good behaviour towards Her Majesty and all her liege subjects, and especially towards the complainant."

MR. HEALY: Yes; put that in.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I will, on Report.

MR. HEALY: Very well; then I beg to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SEXTON said, he begged to move a new sub-section after Sub-section (1), as follows:—

“(2). The justice shall, on the application of any such person brought before him as aforesaid, adjourn the further hearing of the case to a petty sessions to be held for the petty sessions district within which such arrest took place, not less than four days after the date of such application, and to consist of at least two justices, on such person giving reasonable bail for his appearance at such petty sessions. Such court of petty sessions shall deal with the case in manner provided by ‘The Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851,’ and the Acts amending same, in case of summary proceedings, and shall have the same power to deal with such person as in this section hereinbefore conferred on a justice of the peace.”

It would be apparent to the Committee that the object of this Amendment was to give an accused person an opportunity of going before two Justices in a Court of ordinary Petty Sessions. If a person was willing to be tried by a single Justice, he might be so tried; but he (Mr. Sexton) wished to reserve to such person the right of going to the Petty Sessions. The arrangement for trial before a single Justice was one which contained a great deal of danger. The Justice might hold his Court at his private house, and hold an investigation at night, under such circumstances as to deprive the defendant of the advantage of having his case heard in open Court, in the presence of the representatives of the Press. Considering the state of feeling existing between the landlord and the tenant classes in Ireland, it would be dangerous to bring a man under this clause before a single magistrate. The magistrate might be a landlord himself, and a landlord unable to collect his rents, or he might be an agent. It would be absurd to bring a man before a single magistrate of that kind—it would be equivalent to convicting him at once off-hand. The landlord and the land agent, who divided between them the function of magistrate in Ireland, would be only too glad to convict. If the Amendment was agreed to, he proposed that not less than four days should expire between the hearing of the case by the magistrate and its hearing in the Petty Sessions Court. This interval was for the purpose of enabling the accused to put his defence in some sort of shape. In the case of a stranger, who had very few friends in the district, or in the country, it would be more necessary than it would be in the case of a person living in the neighbourhood that he should have ample time and opportunity for preparing his defence, and that publicity should be given to the proceedings. The Press should have an opportunity of hearing and reporting the case. He thought the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would see the reasonableness of his proposal.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 6, after “month,” insert as a new sub-section:—“The justice shall, on the application of any such person brought before him as aforesaid, adjourn the further hearing of the case to a petty sessions to be held for the petty sessions district within which such arrest took place, not less than four days after the date of such application, and to consist of at least two justices, on such person giving reasonable bail for his appearance at such petty sessions. Such court of petty sessions shall deal with the case in manner provided by ‘The Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851,’ and the Acts amending same, in the case of summary proceedings, and shall have the same power to deal with such person as in this section hereinbefore conferred on a justice of the peace.”—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, “That the sub-section be there inserted.”

MR. HEALY said, the Amendment was a very reasonable one indeed, and he hoped the Government would see their way to accept it. It amounted to this—that where a man had been arrested, his case might not be adjudicated on at once if he did not wish it to be, but might be taken to the Petty Sessions for hearing. That, surely, was not too much to ask. The practice of Mr. Clifford Lloyd used to be to take a whole bundle of men into his private room, harangue them and sentence them thereafter.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he understood the object of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) to be that when a man was brought before one Justice, he might claim, on giving bail, to have his case adjourned for the purpose of having it heard before two Justices. That, he thought, was not unreasonable.

MR. WARTON said, that if the Amendment were accepted, it would have an effect upon the next sub-section of the clause. They would have to consider who was to send to the Lord Lieutenant a report of the committal, stating the grounds of the committal and so on. They would have to consider whether it should be "the justice" or "the justices."

MR. HEALY said, that difficulty could be got over by saying "the said justice or justices."

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, that if the right hon. and learned Gentleman were to accept the Amendment as it stood, it was a question for consideration whether he would not take cases of this kind out of the Act altogether, by enabling the prisoners to appeal to Quarter Sessions, and using all the other methods of appeal which would be open to them in ordinary cases. He saw no objection to having two Justices to try a case, instead of one; but, in other respects, it seemed to him that the appeal ought to be the same in these cases as in other cases. If this were not so, they would be giving special protection to a prisoner who chose to take advantage of the clause.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, what was wanted was to get security in this case—it did not matter how it was obtained, whether in the form of bail or in any other way.

Amendment agreed to; Sub-section inserted accordingly.

MR. HEALY said, he had an Amendment on the Paper, to give an appeal to the County Court Judge, subject to the provisions and in manner provided by the 24th section of "The Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851." He did not, however, propose to move that, as the hon. Member for Monaghan, later on, would move an Amendment to give an appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench. He (Mr. Healy), however, had a second Amendment on the Paper to this part of the clause. It was to insert as a sub-section—

"Upon the hearing of a charge under this section against a person, such person, or the husband or wife of such person, may, if such person thinks fit, be examined as an ordinary witness in the case, but the failure to exercise this right shall not be held to create any presumption against such person."

He was aware that, as regarded the wife, this, if accepted, would be a departure from the ordinary law; but he thought that as the whole Act was a departure from the ordinary law, the Government could raise no complaint on that score. The Amendment was a very reasonable one. It merely said that an accused person could, if he thought fit, give evidence, and his wife, if she happened to be about, could do so likewise. A stranger to the district was not likely to have his wife with him, so that the Government could not say that they would be in any way damaged by passing this sub-section. With regard to the latter part of his Amendment, he did not suppose its principle would be readily admitted in the House of Commons; but there were enactments containing such a provision on the Statute Books of America. He only mentioned that fact to show that it had already entered the minds of some lawyers to lay down that when a prisoner could exercise a right, and did not do so, it should not be held to create any presumption against him. The Government, he thought, might accept the clause. There was very little in it one way or the other, and if the Government objected to it, he should not be prepared to fight it; but it would give a prisoner a slight advantage. It should not be forgotten that, as he had said, if a man's wife happened to be on the spot, it could not be said that the man was a stranger in the district. If the Amendment in one respect disregarded the ordinary theory of the law, that was no reason why, in a measure like this, it should not be accepted.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 6, after "month," insert as a new sub-section:—"Upon the hearing of a charge under this section against a person, such person, or the husband or wife of such person, may, if such person thinks fit, be examined as an ordinary witness in the case, but the failure to exercise this right shall not be held to create any presumption against such person."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the sub-section be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES), said, there was no objection to the principle of the Amendment. He had accepted the principle in one of the Licensing Acts. The only exception he would take was that it would necessitate a slight revision of the 3rd clause. Inasmuch as they had not used the words in the previous clause, it would appear as though there was to be a presumption in the one class of case and not in the other. He would also suggest that the Amendment should end with the words "witness in the case."

MR. HEALY said, he would accept the hon. and learned Gentleman's suggestion, and leave out the latter part of the sub-section. Probably he would bring it up again on Report.

Amendment agreed to; Sub-section, as amended, inserted accordingly.

MR. PARNELL said, he begged to move the following Proviso:—

“Provided, That no person shall be deemed a stranger, within the meaning of this section, if any justice of the peace, clergyman, or other credible person known to such justice, shall attend before such justice and certify, on oath, his acquaintance with such first-mentioned person, and that he is of good character.”

This was an Amendment which he should hope the Government would feel themselves able to agree to. It was one of a very simple character. A Justice of the Peace ought to be able to judge whether the testimony of a clergyman or other credible person who gave a good character to a man was sufficient.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 6, at the end of the foregoing Amendment, to insert the words “Provided, That no person shall be deemed a stranger, within the meaning of this section, if any justice of the peace, clergyman, or other credible person known to such justice, shall attend before such justice and certify, on oath, his acquaintance with such first-mentioned person, and that he is of good character.”—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not think the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Parnell) would be disposed to retain the Amendment in that form, because the fact of a clergyman, or other credible person, certifying that the man was of good character did not prove that he was not a stranger. He might be a stranger of good character; but he could not be said not to be a stranger. The real point was, that he was under suspicious circumstances. Of course, the evidence of a respectable person that the man was of good character and good conduct would induce a Justice of the Peace to release him; but that was only part of the evidence which would prevent the stringency of this clause coming into operation; and if, by any means, the Justices of the Peace were not satisfied that persons could be released, they must give security under the section. Therefore, in either case, an arrested man would be safe. If there were a person of good character in the locality to testify in his behalf, he would not be deemed to be a stranger under suspicious circumstances, or, if there were any doubt upon that point, his friends would be able to give the securities required under the section. But to say that a man should not be deemed a stranger in the locality because some credible person said he was of good character would be inconsistent with the clause.

MR. HEALY said, that the Amendment said such a man should not be deemed a stranger within the district “within the meaning of this section,” which was an entirely different point. He admitted that the evidence of a Justice of the Peace or other credible person would not prove whether a man was a stranger; but the Amendment said “for the purpose of the section,” and that entirely disposed of the right hon. and learned Gentleman’s argument. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had taken up a position that the Amendment was not necessary, and that no amount of evidence by a clergyman or Justice of the Peace would prove that a man was not a stranger; but the whole point was that it was to be “within the meaning of the section.”

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the wording of the Amendment was not very clear; but his main point was that he was trying here to define the evidence which should satisfy a Justice of the Peace. It might be that a Justice of the Peace or a clergyman might know that a man was generally of good character; but there might be circumstances in connection with persons otherwise of good character so suspicious that the evidence could not be conclusive. The decision ought to be left to the tribunal, for it might be that the circumstances of suspicion might outweigh the general good character. If that were so, and a Justice of the Peace came to the conclusion that the circumstances were so suspicious as to require security, then the persons who were satisfied of the absolute good faith and good character of the man had only to become security for him and he could be discharged.

MR. M’COAN said, the object of the Amendment was to rebut the presumption of suspicion which might lead to a man’s committal. He did not wish to joke on so solemn a topic as the personality of the Home Secretary; but if the right hon. and learned Gentleman happened to be walking along a country road in Ireland, and was arrested as a suspicious character, surely, if some clergyman came forward and declared that he knew him to be the Secretary of State for the Home Department, that ought to be sufficient to rebut the presumption. That was only carrying the argument to an extreme, and he thought it should require an exceedingly strong combination of suspicious circumstances concerning a man arrested under this clause to outweigh, say, such testimony as he had mentioned.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN considered it very desirable that some measures should be taken to provide that persons should not be arrested again and again in several districts, after having again and again proved that they were of good character, and had lawful business. He himself had an Amendment on the Paper, designed to carry out this view; but the Chairman had said the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was pretty much to the same effect. In his (Mr. Sullivan's) view, however, there was a substantial difference; but in putting forward his opinions in connection with this present Amendment, he would ask the Government to make some concession in that direction. What he had intended to propose was, that any person arrested and able to produce a certificate from any magistrate or clergyman in Great Britain or Ireland, certifying his good character, that should be held sufficient to enable him to go free. The present Amendment would make it necessary that on the occasion of each arrest a clergyman or magistrate should come forward and give his testimony. His proposition was that a man having lawful business might provide himself with a certificate from reputable and respectable authorities, which would enable him to travel through the country without having to undergo 20 or 30 different trials in as many different localities. Some reference to an idea of that kind was made earlier in the discussion, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department said he had an objection to introducing a system of "passports" into Ireland. He (Mr. Sullivan) did not think the right hon. and learned Gentleman need be so delicate about introducing a system of passports after all that he had done in connection with this measure. The word "suspects" had become naturalized in Ireland, and in a little while the oldsters would be naturalized; and, therefore, he did not think there would be any very great objection to the introduction of passports to enable persons who had lawful business, and who were of good character, to avoid being again and again arrested, and having to go over the same ground to establish their innocence. He would suggest that the right hon. and learned Gentleman and the Government should consider whether some such plan could not be adopted with this Amendment.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, that, under a Bill of this kind, something like the passport system was necessary to enable a man to avoid arrest and trial. Suppose a newspaper correspondent or a commercial traveller was in Ireland, was he to be stopped in every town and put on his trial, and have to prove in some mysterious way that he was not a person of ill-purpose travelling for a suspicious motive? Would it not be better to allow him to produce, at the beginning of his journey, evidence that he was of good character, and travelling for a good purpose? He thought that was a natural and reasonable proposition. He supposed every Member of the House who had travelled in foreign countries had met with something of that kind. It had been his misfortune at Brindisi to be arrested and taken into custody on suspicion of being connected with a gang of smugglers, and he should have been glad of some person who would have come forward and shown that he was not a smuggler. The Committee should look the thing in the face; and as there was a foreign system of Government in Ireland there might as well be a foreign system of passport. He was in favour of the Amendment, and thought the Government ought to accept it.

MR. MACFARLANE thought the suggestion that passes should be provided by proper authorities was very reasonable; for it was possible that respectable people might be put to great inconvenience at many places—such as commercial travellers and newspaper correspondents. The system of passes might very well be adopted by the Government, the passes to be issued from Dublin for the protection of people from annoyance by the police. He thought this clause was one of great importance, for it seemed to him that the certificate of a Justice of the Peace, or a clergyman, or other credible person, would meet all that was required to enable a magistrate to discharge a man. If, however, the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) insisted on this Amendment, he would support it.

Mr. A. R. D. ELLIOT said, the question was not as to introducing passports, but as to what evidence would be necessary for a man taken before a magistrate.

Mr. PARNELL said, there were two conditions required to enable a Justice of the Peace to act under this clause. First of all, the person must be a stranger; and, secondly, the Justice of the Peace must consider that he was in a proclaimed district under suspicious circumstances. In that respect, the clause differed from the previous clause. Under the previous clause, a policeman was entitled to arrest a man under suspicious circumstances at night; under this clause the police were entitled to arrest strangers under suspicious circumstances whether at night or day. It was clear that if a person was arrested, and then got a Justice of the Peace, or a clergyman, or other credible person in the district to vouch for his good character and honesty, he ought not to be considered a stranger. He could not be a stranger under those circumstances, because he would be known to persons of repute and position in the district. Therefore, he submitted that he had made out his claim in regard to where evidence of that kind was produced a magistrate should be checked. If a man was not a stranger, the magistrate would be within his right in imprisoning a man; but, as the clause now stood, the question as to whether a man was a stranger or not was practically left to the police to decide, and, in most cases, the magistrate would only decide whether the man was in a proclaimed district under suspicious circumstances. He thought it was fair that if, under those circumstances, an accused person, arrested under the provisions of this extraordinary clause, produced some magistrate, clergyman, or other credible person, to testify in his behalf that he was not a stranger in the district, the magistrate ought not to have jurisdiction, and the man ought not to be brought under the operation of this clause. He thought the Government might have met him in this matter, and in consequence of their answer he should be obliged to take the sense of the Committee on the Amendment.

Mr. SYNAN said, he did not agree with the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) that the deposition of any person that a man was of good character had anything at all to do with the question of his being a stranger or not; but being a stranger under suspicious circumstances was not a rebuttal of facts, but an utter presumption against the man. The evidence of a magistrate, or clergyman, or other credible person that a man arrested was of good character ought to be sufficient to rebut that presumption. If there was evidence of the fact of the man doing anything, then such testimony would not be evidence as against the fact, but as against the presumption; and he apprehended that in any Court in the world, the evidence of a magistrate, clergyman, or other credible person in the neighbourhood would be quite sufficient to rebut the presumption against the man. Upon that ground he should support the Amendment.

Mr. DILLON explained that what the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) said was that it was not a question of the effect of this evidence, but it was a question of having a definition of the word "stranger." They wanted to know what a "stranger" was; and it was very important to have that defined, because the term was a very wide one. It might mean a man who had not a dwelling-house in the district, or simply that a man was not known in the district, and those two distinctions were entirely different in effect. The point of the hon. Member for the City of Cork was that a man known by people of good position and standing ought not to be called a stranger. If the hon. Member went to Cork, where he had no house, would he be considered a stranger, although he could call a hundred witnesses who could swear to his good character? Under the clause, however, he might be treated as a stranger; and if he (Mr. Dillon) himself went to Tipperary he might be treated as a stranger. The object of the Amendment was to place something like a narrow definition upon the word stranger, and to rule that "stranger" could not include a man who was known to persons of standing and repute. He could not understand the contention of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who seemed to say that it really did not matter to a man whether he was put under a rule of bail or not. The right hon. and learned Gentleman argued that if a man was known in a neighbourhood he could easily get bail; but there were cases in which people who knew a man would not wish to become bail, and there was a great difference between being discharged absolutely and being placed under a rule of bail. He objected to a man being put under a rule of bail for good behaviour, and there was a marked difference between deciding that a magistrate, upon receiving certain specific evidence that a man was not a stranger, but was known to be of good character and honest, should discharge him, and say that he should be held to bail for good behaviour.

MR. O'DONNELL said, the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), in fact, proposed that where a man was known to respectable inhabitants of a district, it was not necessary for him to be known to the police. The Secretary of State for the Home Department resented that as quite intolerable, and refused to accept such a suggestion; but the opinion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman really called attention to a very curious distinction between government in Ireland and government in England. In England it was the very reverse of a compliment to a man for him to be known to the police; while, according to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, it was only that class of persons who were likely to be supporters of the Government in Ireland.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 46; Noes 161: Majority 115.—(Div. List, No. 154.)

DR. COMMINS said, the Government had introduced a new system, which was practically martial law, into Ireland. There was about to be an Industrial Exhibition held in Dublin, and during that Exhibition an enormous influx of visitors from America and other places might be expected; and unless they were protected they would be liable to arrest under the Alien Act, and to be worried in such a way that probably, after the first few of such visitors, the influx would cease altogether. The section he proposed provided for giving a certain amount of protection to those who visited Ireland to see the Industrial Exhibition, or for other honest purposes, and to furnish them with an easy means of avoiding such annoyance and worry as they were otherwise sure to be subjected to. Many persons coming from France, or America, or Holland, or any other country, upon an honest and lawful errand, could, under this proposal, be provided with an easy means of identification, and of showing that they were upon a lawful errand in the country, and ought not to be interfered with. In that way a visitor would avoid the interference of the police, which must necessarily take place if something was not done in the way of giving a passport. The question whether the passport system might not be further extended to natives of Ireland might be raised hereafter. But he thought the Committee might adopt this Amendment, which would prevent irrevocable damage being done to the Exhibition and to the country by keeping away foreigners.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 12, at end, add, "Provided always, that an alien visiting Ireland or travelling there between the first day of August and the last day of December, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two, who shall within one week of his arrival have deposited with the Consul of his Nation in Dublin a notification of his name, nationality, and description, and received under the Consular seal a certificate reciting and acknowledging the same, shall upon the production of such certificate, be considered a person not within the provisions of this section, and not liable to arrest or detention under such provisions."—(Dr. Commins.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the best way to encourage people to come to the Exhibition was to put the country in a state of tranquillity. An hon. Member had said that Ireland was the most hospitable country in the world; but it seemed to him (the Secretary of State for the Home Department) that strangers coming over to visit an unpopular landlord, for instance, might feel a little uncomfortable at the present time. If the hon. and learned Member (Dr. Commins) looked at the Amendment, he would see that under it every alien would be able to put himself out of the clause, because every alien was entitled to a certificate from his Consul saying that he was an alien. But such certificate did not say that he was a respectable man, and he might be the greatest ruffian in the world, and might have formidable weapons upon him. Yet, by this proposed clause, because a man had a certificate, he could not be touched. Surely the hon. and learned Member could not intend that? For that reason he could not accept the Amendment.

Mr. Dillon

MR. PARNELL said, if a person was discovered under the circumstances mentioned by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, he might be sentenced to three months' imprisonment under the present law by summary jurisdiction.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, there might be many other suspicious circumstances; but all that was proposed here was that a mere declaration that a man was an alien would take him out of the clause, although he might be, to the knowledge of the Consul, the greatest ruffian in the world.

MR. HEALY remarked that, earlier in the evening, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had used the same argument, saying that if a man was found with suspicious weapons he could get three months' imprisonment under the ordinary law; and now the right hon. and learned Gentleman made the same statement. Those were specimens of the arguments with which the Government met Irish Members.

DR. COMMINS said, he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE CHAIRMAN: The next Amendment is by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy). It proposes that henceforth no person shall be imprisoned under this section, provided that he shall give securities for his good behaviour. This Amendment cannot be proposed, because it would alter the general law of the country.

MR. SEXTON, in moving to omit the six principal cities of Ireland from the operation of the Bill, said, that the provisions elsewhere in the Bill gave ample security, and the Bill could not be considered necessary for Dublin or other Irish cities. There was to be a great National Exhibition in Dublin, which, it was hoped, would bring people from all parts of the world. The Secretary of State for the Home Department said strangers would visit the country, if the country was tranquil; but how could the country be expected to be tranquil, when the police were at liberty at any hour of the day or night to arrest a stranger, and take him before a magistrate? People from Australia, or America, or other distant places, would not visit Ireland if, in the very streets of the capital, they were to be exposed to annoyance from policemen on the shallowest pretext. If there was any reason to suppose that the efficiency of the Act would suffer by this proposition he should not make it; but one of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's Colleagues had admitted that the cities of Ireland were not in the condition which had produced that against which this Bill was directed. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had given Notice to propose that the Curfew hours should not be further continued in the city.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, at end of clause, to add, "This clause shall not apply to the cities of Dublin, Cork, Belfast, Limerick, Galway, and Waterford."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT thought the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) must entirely misapprehend the object of this clause. If it was to apply to agrarian crime, it was quite as much required for the leaders and agents of the Fenian Conspiracy, and the assassinations by which that conspiracy was supported; and, if he were to give an opinion, he should say that the clause was more necessary for the great towns of Ireland than for the smaller towns. See what would be the result of such an exemption! It would make these cities the places of refuge—the Alsatia of all those people—and the action of the clause would be entirely defeated. If there had been this clause before, the murders in Phoenix Park might have been anticipated by seizing the murderers. This clause, he ventured to state, was more applicable to Dublin and other great cities than to any other parts of the country.

MR. PARNELL said, the Secretary of State for the Home Department had stated that his desire was to use this clause against murderers and conspirators. He (Mr. Parnell) apprehended the right hon. and learned Gentleman would have to make a very wide use of the clause in a large city like Dublin if he expected it to be of any use against murderous conspiracies which he supposed might exist in Ireland. A clause of this kind would be absolutely useless for such a purpose in a large city, while it would only afford a temptation to the police in large cities to harass people who were going about their lawful business. He could quite understand that the police in a city like Dublin might think it of the greatest importance, and quite in accord with their duty, to harass people who might come from the United States of America in order to visit the popular National Industrial Exhibition in autumn next; and he thought the Secretary of State for the Home Department might have excluded Dublin from the operation of this clause during the period of the Exhibition—that was, during the three months stated in the Amendment. The clause was based on the clause in the Act of 1875, which was admittedly brought in for the purpose of dealing with an agrarian conspiracy. Agrarian conspirators, it was manifest, had to move about the country from place to place, and in moving about the country they were liable to come under the notice of the police; but any person going to, and remaining in, a city with the intention of committing a murder or other outrage would not be at all likely to come under their notice in the manner hoped for under this clause. It appeared to him that it was only an excessive desire to inflict discomfort on all the humbler classes in Ireland that induced the Government to reject all consideration of this Amendment. It was perfectly intolerable that a clause of this kind should apply to Dublin or Cork, and there was not a shadow of excuse for it. In what way would this clause have helped the Government to prevent the murders in Phoenix Park? It would not have been of the slightest assistance to prevent those murders, and he hoped the Government would show a desire to meet the Irish Members in this matter, at all events, by agreeing to omit Dublin from the clause during the period of the Exhibition.

[Fourteenth Night.]

Mr. Parnell

MR. GIBSON said, this clause must be read in connection with the 20th clause of the Bill. It could only apply to a proclaimed district; and if the Lord Lieutenant, under the 20th clause, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, decided to proclaim a district, it would be unreasonable to say that if the Lord Lieutenant arrived at the conclusion that it was necessary to proclaim a part of Ireland, he should be met with a clear statement in the Act that, notwithstanding his conclusion, he could not apply the Act. Unfortunately, the condition of Dublin, at the present time, was not at all satisfactory; and it would be a curious and a painful Return which would show how many people were under police protection in the streets of Dublin at this moment.

MR. O'DONNELL said that, judging from the Returns in that House of the hundreds of unclaimed corpses in London, there were a large number of persons in this City who, if they were not under police protection, ought to be; but there was another point to which he would refer. This clause, under which it was sought to exempt the chief cities in Ireland, was, in reality, the only clause for the arrest of "suspects;" and when the Secretary of State for the Home Department said that if this clause had been in operation he might have been able to prevent such terrible occurrences as the assassinations in Phoenix Park, he forgot that he had already a law for "suspects" in his hands, and that the possession of that law, wielded with sufficient vigour for a long period of time, had not in the slightest degree interfered with the murderers, and he feared that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would find this clause equally ineffective. He would call attention to this fact—that Dublin and Cork were the chief places of debarkation for persons coming into Ireland. If persons of the poorer condition of life who disembarked at Dublin, or at Cork, could once get to the districts of the country where their friends live, and where they were known, and where they could easily obtain references, there would be no danger whatever of such persons suffering under a fair administration of this clause. But supposing the police arrested a number of recently-arrived men in Dublin or in Cork, men who were 50 or 60, or possibly 100 miles away from home, who knew nobody in Cork or in Dublin, a great injustice would be done these men by requiring them to give surety by entering into recognizances and sureties to keep the peace and be of good behaviour. Such men might be kept in gaol for an indefinite time simply because of their being arrested in Cork or Dublin, the place of their debarkation, and the place in which it was utterly impossible for them to obtain references or sureties, knowing no one in the place to whom they might apply. Hon. Members on the other side of the House repudiated the statement of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) that the Government seemed to be anxious to pass a Bill which would be as aggravating and as irritating as possible to the poorer classes of the population of Ireland; but certainly he did not see any sign about this clause which was calculated to produce any other impression than that against which hon. Members opposite protested so vehemently. This clause seemed a poor man persecution clause, and he was afraid it would be regarded in that light in Ireland. He did not think it would be of the slightest use in preventing crime; but it would be of great use in promoting discontent, which was closely akin to dissatisfaction.

MR. SEXTON hoped that, if the Government could not see their way to assent to this Amendment, they would, at least, allow the clause to be inoperative in Dublin during the few months that the forthcoming Industrial Exhibition was open. He was perfectly certain that nothing would be lost to the country if this clause was allowed not to be effective in the City of Dublin during that time. If it did operate during this period it would sensibly hurt the Exhibition, because it would prevent many strangers from attending. Reference had been made by the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the recent assassinations in Phoenix Park; but, surely, if the clause had been in operation at the time of these assassinations, it would have been of little service in discovering the assassins, because the police must have suspected the men before they put the clause into operation, and up to the present time there had not been a scintilla of evidence to show that they had any knowledge whatever who the criminals were. He must protest against the Secretary of State for the Home Department citing the recent assassinations as an argument in favour of this clause.

MR. METGE said, there was only one possible excuse for the clause, and for the proposing of the Amendment in the modified form which the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had suggested.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that that is not the Amendment before the Committee. The Amendment before the Committee is to exempt the cities of Dublin, Cork, Belfast, Limerick, Galway, and Waterford from the operation of the clause.

MR. METGE thought that the only way in which the Government could justify the application of the clause to the City of Dublin would be for them to bring forward evidence of having suspected a single individual who had any connection whatever with the treacherous crime committed recently in Phoenix Park. No one deplored that crime more than he did; but he thought when the Government had the audacity to refer to that crime in this House, in order to influence and prejudice the sentiments of hon. Gentlemen opposite and to get their support to this Bill, they should, at least, bring forward one case to support their arguments of an individual who had been suspected in connection with this crime, and who this clause would have affected had it been in operation at the time of the murders. As had been pointed out by hon. Members around him, they were to have an Exhibition in Dublin, which was of vital importance, as he believed, to the trade of Ireland generally. He (Mr. Metge) was connected in various ways with several people interested in the trade of Ireland, and he knew that all looked forward to the success of the forthcoming Exhibition with deep interest. The only possible effect of enforcing this clause would be that it would break down, in a very great measure, the success of that undertaking, and thereby give rise to increased irritation amongst the trading classes in Dublin and in Ireland generally. For these reasons, if the Government were about to enforce this clause during the time of that Exhibition, they ought, at least, to show that under the law as it at present existed their powers were not sufficient to reach such people as committed the recent crime in Phoenix Park.

[Fourteenth Night.]

MR. TREVELYAN said, that he could not help thinking, when listening to this discussion, how very little the facts and arguments of hon. Members opposite touched the point under discussion, as that point was looked at by the people who were responsible for the safety of Ireland. He might almost say, if there was one clause about which, at that moment, the Irish people were anxious, it was this particular clause. The clauses of the Act, about which the Irish Government at this moment were so anxious, were those directed against secret societies and their agents; and he did not scruple to say that in one of those very towns which it was proposed to exempt from the operation of the clause there were a number of strangers of the most suspicious kind—of that sort of suspicion which would not bring them within the scope of the Protection of Person and Property Act referred to by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), but strangers about whom the Government would very much like to know something, and as long as the Government did not know that something they were most anxious indeed. It was in towns such as those proposed to be exempted, where, if any outrage was in contemplation, strangers from a distance mostly collected; and from these towns they broke out into the agrarian districts and committed outrages; and from these towns they plotted outrages against officials of which they had had a foretaste, and of which, if this Bill did not pass, and pass very promptly, they would have some heart-rending specimens, he was afraid, at no distant time. Such was the case in one of the towns in Ireland; and that town might be Dublin, although he did not say it was. There was, however, no reason why Dublin should not be for the moment the centre where these strangers collected; and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) said very justly that this clause would not be put in force except a district was proclaimed. The Committee might be very certain that as soon as this Act was passed with this clause in it, the Government would take good care to proclaim any part of the country, rural or urban, where strangers of this sort were lurking, and they would take very good care not to proclaim any town which was free from these persons. This clause was most essential; and he must say that if the Bill was to be discussed at this length on every clause like the present—and the operation of this clause was well known and had proved to be innocuous to law-abiding citizens—very great calamities might happen before it became law.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that if hon. Members would just calmly consider the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, they would not fail to perceive that if there be any clause in this Bill which was capable of protecting Dublin or any other town it was certainly not this clause. Let them imagine there was a band of strangers of the most desperate purposes in a town in Ireland, say Cork, or Dublin; that they were men of a powerful organization, and that they had got £1,500 or £2,000, or it might be £5,000 at hand, what effect would this clause have upon three or four of the most desperate of these men? Why, a Justice might require one of these men to give security by entering into recognizances, and find sureties to keep the peace and be of good behaviour during the ensuing six months, and, in default, commit him to prison. Well, of course, an assassin of that kind, with £5,000 at his banker's, would be quite ready to offer £50 or £100 security, and he would have two or three of his kidney who would stand surety to the extent of £50 or £100, if necessary; and if they had a great crime to carry out, they would just have as little regard to the estreating of their recognizances as they would for any item of loss in connection with their horrible business. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that if it was the object of the Government to put down desperate assassination and to prevent great excesses, this clause would be as ineffective as a net-work of cob-webs would be to stop a rush of buffaloes. This clause, however, would be of the greatest use in worrying and annoying inoffensive strangers; but it would be totally ineffective against desperate, determined criminals.

Question put, and negatived.

On Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill?"

MR. DILLON said, that before the Question was put, he wished to make a few observations. He distinctly disapproved of the clause; but he would not oppose it if the Committee could only be assured that it would be used in the manner described by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. He opposed it because it was in the power of the magistrates and of the Executive Government in Ireland to use the powers it conferred in a most tyrannical and a most extravagant fashion. They knew how the powers of the famous Act of Edward III. had been employed; and the point he wished to place before the Committee was that, although for some time the clause might be used in the way the Chief Secretary for Ireland promised it should be used, they had no authority whatever that it would not be used as the Statute of Edward III. had been enforced, for entirely different purposes to those for which it had been asked. The Act of Edward III. empowered magistrates to bind over people to be of good behaviour; but who were the people who were bound over under that Act by the magistrates to be of good behaviour? They knew that some 10 or 12, possibly 15 or 20, people were bound over under that Act to keep the peace, and amongst that number he defied the right hon. Gentleman to say that there was a single individual who he or his Predecessor (Mr. W. E. Forster) would suspect for a moment of any intention to commit an outrage. They knew that some of those imprisoned under the Act of Edward III. were ladies of the highest character, and he did not think the right hon. Gentleman would deny that they were ladies of the highest character; and the worst that could be alleged against them was that their conduct was calculated to produce intimidation. Amongst the number imprisoned were several Catholic priests. One Catholic priest, under the Act, underwent three months' imprisonment; and he challenged the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford to say that anything at all substantial could be alleged against the character of that reverend gentleman. Would the Government give them any security that this clause would be used simply against men who were suspected of being agents of assassination societies, or men who came to Ireland for the purpose of assassination and outrage? If the Government would give that assurance, he and his hon. Friends would withdraw their opposition to the clause. They wanted to know that the clause would not be used against men well-known in Ireland—men of respectable character and entirely above suspicion. Men who were simply found out of their own districts might be treated as strangers under the clause; and he had no doubt that many of such men would positively refuse to find sureties, if required to do so, because they would not care to run the risk of forfeiting their bail, not knowing what would be held by the Government to be "good behaviour." He would give the Committee an instance which might come home to any one of them. Suppose anyone were required to give bail under the clause, and that afterwards they went down to the country to make a speech condemning the landlords, or condemning the Government, or criticizing the action of the Commissioners, how did they know that the views of the Government with regard to good government might not alter between now and then; because it must be remembered that the views of the late Chief Secretary for Ireland were very much altered during the course of his administration of Irish affairs. They might find their bail forfeited, and their friends landed in very great sacrifices. The reason why he particularly opposed the clause was not because he feared the way in which the Government would use it; but because he feared that something might happen which happened under the Coercion Bill of last year—that the Government might get the clause, plausibly to use for certain purposes, just as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford got the Coercion Bill last year—to arrest assassins, and outrage-mongers, and dissolute ruffians; and that it might be used by the officials in Ireland to arrest men against whom they could allege nothing, except that they were political opponents. He did not know that this clause might not be used in the same way as the Act of last year was used, for the purpose of the wholesale arrest of political opponents. The practical effect of the clause would be that no man of position could say anything or do anything at all against the Government; and if he were out of his own neighbourhood he would be subjected to the risk of immediate arrest.

Mr. SEXTON said, he wished to join his hon. Friend (Mr. Dillon) in his opposition to the clause. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had just complained of the length of time the Irish Members had taken up in discussing the various Amendments proposed to the Bill; and, in the same breath, the right hon. Gentleman confessed that there was no clause about which the Government were more anxious than this. That admission in itself, to some extent, explained the reason why he and his hon. Friends had occupied so much attention in discussing the clause. The anxiety which the Government felt in reference to the clause was, no doubt, a measure of its importance; the importance of the clause was the reason why so much time had been occupied in its discussion. He had, however, yet to learn that less than five hours was an excessive time to occupy in the discussion of a clause which would enable every policeman in Ireland for the next three years to arrest every stranger he might come across. The powers conferred by the clause were so drastic, so despotic, and so extraordinary that he and his hon. Friends would be false to their trust, and very cowardly indeed in the presence of this Committee, if they did not speak out upon this subject, and speak out at such length as might be necessary to show the hypocrisy of the Government. They knew full well that the Coercion Act of last year was obtained for one purpose, but used for another. It was obtained for the arrest of the assassin, but it was used to arrest political opponents; it was obtained as a weapon against the midnight marauder, but it was used for the purposes of arrest by day. They had heard that the clause under notice would be used against the agents of secret societies and the emissaries of secret organizations. He had no doubt that if the Statute of Edward III. were given up and disused, this clause would be made to take its place, and that priests, and respectable artisans, and ladies would be arrested under this clause, which dealt with strangers. The Irish Members had sought in vain for a definition of the term "stranger." They had asked that a stranger should be considered a person unknown, or a person residing at a certain distance; but no; the Secretary of State for the Home Department would not even consent to such a definition, for he feared that the elastic action of the Irish police might be somewhat retarded if a definition were given. The effect of the clause would be that, in the course of the next three years, every man, woman, and child in Ireland would, at some time or another, be placed at the mercy of any policeman they might come in contact with. They had asked for a definition of "suspicious circumstances," and they had asked for some indication of what was to constitute "a criminal intent." But all their pleading had been in vain, and their desires were unheeded. Suspicious circumstances were just whatever might strike the more or less ignorant mind and dull imagination of any ordinary policeman. A stranger was not to be brought before a Superior Judge, or even before a County Court Judge, or one of those stipendiary magistrates who were so learned in the law: but, unfortunately, if a stranger—it might be he was a tourist—fell into the hands of a policeman by day or by night, he was to be brought before one of the ordinary magistrates of the country. The ordinary magistrates were either landlords or agents, for the Commission of the Peace was divided between the owners of the land and those who were paid a percentage upon the rents paid by the tenants. He need not say how, in the present condition of feeling in the country, these men would view a stranger who might be brought before him, and who might not be able to give a very lucid account of himself. By a reversal of common sense, a stranger, who had probably no friends in the locality in which he was found, was asked to give a good account of himself; and, finally, he was required to give sureties to keep the peace and be of good behaviour for six months. They had already discussed the question of good behaviour, and hon. Gentlemen seemed to be a little surprised that Irishmen did not understand what was meant by good behaviour. He could only say that, when artisans putting up huts had been held to be persons of bad character, when ladies engaged in mere works of charity had been held to be persons of bad behaviour, the judgments of the Irish people had been broken to pieces, and their faculties had been pulverized by the decisions given by Resident Magistrates as to what constituted good behaviour. The clause was a double-edged weapon put in the hands of the police, and which was to be used in as tyrannical a manner as possible against public liberty. When the story of the next three years came to be told, it would be found that offences against the public liberty as disgraceful—though, perhaps, not so hurtful to individuals—as any committed during the régime of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) had been committed.

DR. COMMINS said, that, as to the importance of the clause, he agreed with his hon. Friends and the Government. The Secretary of State for the Home Department had told the Committee the clause was one of the most important of the whole Bill; and he (Dr. Commins) thought that any person who read it would see that the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not mis-state its importance. Last Tuesday, two important decisions were given in the Courts of Queen's Bench—one in the English Queen's Bench and the other in the Irish Queen's Bench. Both decisions were with regard to the requirement of people to be of good behaviour. The Irish case was that of "Hogan v. the Justices of County Kerry," and the Irish Queen's Bench held that it was perfectly legal to commit Miss Margaret Hogan, a member of the Ladies' Land League, to prison for six months, in default of her finding bail to be of good behaviour. Strangely enough, the case of "Beatty v. Gillbanks" was held the same day in the Court of Queen's Bench at Westminster, and Mr. Justice Cave and his brother Justice held that no one could be committed under the Statute of Edward III. in default of bail, and no one could be bound over to be of good behaviour, unless some overt act of bad behaviour was proved against them. The Courts of Ireland had been using, for the last three or four months, precisely the Act that was appealed against on Tuesday last at Westminster; they had been committing to gaol educated ladies of the highest character, simply because it entered into the heads of policemen to disagree with certain acts of those ladies, acts which any reasonable person would be inclined to regard as acts of charity. This section proposed to legalize this kind of proceedings, and it did so without openly declaring the intentions of its framers. The Secretary of State for the Home Department, who seemed to have taken gentle care of the section, would not, though pressed on all sides, say what use it was intended to make of it. The right hon. and learned Gentleman would not give the Committee the slightest idea as to who was to constitute a stranger; but, from the discussion, it was perfectly clear that a person might be considered a stranger within a bow-shot of his own house. The section itself did not afford the Committee any information as to what kind of persons were to be subject to the penalty it imposed. It was evident, though the Secretary of State for the Home Department would not admit it, that the whole object of the section was to place a weapon in the hands of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, or of the Government of Ireland, to suppress any opinion they might think fit. It was just possible that a person who stepped upon a public platform—he might be a Member of Parliament desirous of addressing his constituents—might be considered a stranger for aught the Committee knew. Any person who expressed an opinion which was not approved of by the police in the neighbourhood, or by the Resident Magistrates—the names of some of whom the Irish people knew too well—might be called upon to give security to keep the peace, or, in default of finding sureties, they might be committed to prison. Then they came to the fact that sureties for good behaviour might be estreated, because of words spoken, though there was no breach of the peace. Though there was no prosecutable offence, sureties might be estreated simply for some word spoken that might be alleged to be seditious, or alleged to be contrary to the law. It was not possible to conceive anything so unjust. The inevitable result of such a law, administered in the way it would be in Ireland, would be that hundreds of people who, possibly out of friendship, might have gone surety for a person alleged to be a stranger would be ruined. Regarding this as a deliberative attempt to crush the liberties of the Irish people, he should vote against the clause.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 194; Noes 31: Majority 163.

[Fourteenth Night.]

AYES.

Acland, C. T. D.
 Acland, Sir T. D.
 Agnew, W.
 Alexander, Colonel C.
 Allen, H. G.
 Armitage, B.
 Armitstead, G.
 Bailey, Sir J. R.
 Balfour, A. J.
 Balfour, J. B.
 Baring, T. C.
 Barttelot, Sir W. B.
 Bentinck, rt. hon. G. C.
 Biddell, W.
 Birkbeck, E.
 Blennerhassett, Sir R.
 Board, T. W.
 Borlase, W. C.
 Brand, H. R.
 Brassey, Sir T.
 Brett, R. B.
 Bright, rt. hon. J.
 Brinton, J.
 Broadhurst, H.
 Broadley, W. H. H.
 Brooks, W. C.
 Bruce, rt. hon. Lord C.
 Bruce, Sir H. H.
 Bryce, J.
 Campbell, R. F. F.
 Campbell-Bannerman,
 H.
 Carington, hn. Colonel
 W. H. P.
 Cartwright, W. C.
 Cecil, Lord E. H. B. G.
 Chainé, J.
 Chamberlain, rt. hn. J.
 Cheetham, J. F.
 Childers, right hon. H.
 C. E.
 Clive, Col. hon. G. W.
 Compton, F.
 Cotes, C. O.
 Courtney, L. H.
 Creyke, R.
 Crichton, Viscount
 Cropper, J.
 Cross, rt. hon. Sir R. A.
 Crum, A.
 Dalrymple, C.
 Davenport, H. T.
 Davey, H.
 Davies, R.
 De Worms, Baron H.
 Dilke, Sir C. W.
 Dillwyn, L. L.
 Dodds, J.
 Dodson, rt. hon. J. G.
 Douglas, A. Akers-
 Duckham, T.
 Duff, R. W.
 Dundas, hon. J. C.
 Dyke, rt. hn. Sir W. H.
 Ebrington, Viscount
 Egerton, Adm. hon. F.
 Elliot, G. W.
 Emlyn, Viscount
 Errington, G.
 Farquharson, Dr. R.
 Fawcett, rt. hon. H.
 Feilden, Major-General
 R. J.
 Fenwick-Bisset, M.
 Firth, J. F. B.
 Fitzpatrick, hn. B. E. B.
 Fitzwilliam, hon. H. W.
 Flower, C.
 Forster, Sir C.
 Fowler, R. N.
 Fry, T.
 Gibson, rt. hon. E.
 Gladstone, rt. hn. W. E.
 Gordon, Sir A.
 Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.
 Gower, hon. E. F. L.
 Grafton, F. W.
 Grantham, W.
 Gregory, G. B.
 Gurdon, R. T.
 Hamilton, I. T.
 Hamilton, right hon.
 Lord G.
 Hamilton, J. G. C.
 Harcourt, rt. hon. Sir
 W. G. V. V.
 Hayter, Sir A. D.
 Heneage, E.
 Herschell, Sir F.
 Hibbert, J. T.
 Hill, T. R.
 Holden, I.
 Holland, Sir H. T.
 Holmes, J.
 Home, Lt.-Col. D. M.
 Howard, E. S.
 Howard, G. J.
 Illingworth, A.
 James, Sir H.
 James, W. H.
 Jardine, R.
 Jenkins, D. J.
 Jerminham, H. E. H.
 Johnson, W. M.
 Jones-Parry, L.
 Kingscote, Col. R. N. F.
 Lawson, Sir W.
 Leake, R.
 Leatham, W. H.
 Lee, H.
 Lefevre, rt. hn. G. J. S.
 Leigh, hon. G. H. C.
 Leigh, R.
 Lewisham, Viscount
 Loder, R.
 Long, W. H.
 Lubbock, Sir J.
 M'Arthur, A.
 Macartney, J. W. E.
 M'Garel-Hogg, Sir J.
 Mackintosh, C. F.
 Macnaghten, E.
 Marjoribanks, E.
 Maskelyne, M. H. Story-
 Miles, O. W.
 Mills, Sir C. H.
 Monk, C. J.
 Moreton, Lord
 Morgan, rt. hon. G. O.
 Morley, A.
 Mulholland, J.
 Mundella, rt. hon. A. J.

Newdegate, C. N.
 Noel, E.
 Northcote, H. S.
 Northcote, rt. hon. Sir
 S. H.
 Paget, T. T.
 Pease, A.
 Pease, Sir J. W.
 Peddie, J. D.
 Pemberton, E. L.
 Plunket, rt. hon. D. R.
 Porter, A. M.
 Powell, W. R. H.
 Pugh, L. P.
 Raikes, rt. hon. H. C.
 Ramsay, J.
 Ramsden, Sir J.
 Rathbone, W.
 Richard, H.
 Roberts, J.
 Rogers, J. E. T.
 Rothschild, Sir N. M. de
 Round, J.
 Russell, G. W. E.
 Rylands, P.
 Salt, T.
 Schreiber, C.
 Slater-Booth, rt. hn. G.
 Severne, J. E.
 Simon, Serjeant J.
 Smith, E.
 Smith, rt. hon. W. H.
 Spencer, hon. C. R.
 Stanton, W. J.
 Stevenson, J. C.
 Talbot, C. R. M.
 Tavistock, Marquess of
 Taylor, rt. hn. Col. T. E.
 Thornhill, T.
 Tollemache, H. J.
 Tottenham, A. L.
 Tracy, hon. F. S. A.
 Hanbury-
 Trevelyan, rt. hn. G. O.
 Wallace, Sir R.
 Walrond, Col. W. H.
 Walter, J.
 Warton, C. N.
 Wedderburn, Sir D.
 Whitbread, S.
 Whitley, E.
 Williams, S. C. E.
 Williamson, S.
 Willis, W.
 Winn, R.
 Wodehouse, E. R.
 Wolff, Sir H. D.
 Woodall, W.
 Wortley, C. B. Stuart-
 Wroughton, P.
 TELLERS.
 Grosvenor, Lord R.
 Kensington, Lord

NOES.

Biggar, J. G.
 Byrne, G. M.
 Callan, P.
 Commins, A.
 Corbet, W. J.
 Cowen, J.
 Dillon, J.
 Gill, H. J.
 Healy, T. M.
 Labouchere, H.
 Lalor, R.
 Leamy, E.
 M'Carthy, J.
 Macfarlane, D. H.
 Martin, P.
 Marum, E. M.
 Metge, R. H.
 Molloy, B. C.
 Nolan, Colonel J. P.
 O'Connor, T. P.
 O'Donnell, F. H.
 O'Gorman Mahon, Col.
 The O'Sullivan, W. H.
 Parnell, C. S.
 Power, J. O'C.
 Sexton, T.
 Sheil, E.
 Smithwick, J. F.
 Sullivan, T. D.
 Synan, E. J.
 Thompson, T. C.
 TELLERS.
 Power, R.
 Redmond, J. E.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 10 (Newspapers).

Mr. DILLWYN moved, as an Amendment, in page 5, line 14, to leave out "wherever." He said he did not object to the Lord Lieutenant having power to prevent objectionable foreign publications being brought into Ireland; but he strongly objected to the suppression under this clause of Irish newspapers themselves. There was ample power under the existing law to prevent an abuse of the liberty of the Press. To him it appeared that the Bill rather tended to encourage secret societies than otherwise. They had already prohibited public meetings, and now an endeavour was being made to prevent the free expression of public opinion through the medium of the Press. He would not enter into any lengthy argument, but simply say that all the Amendments of which he had given Notice on this clause had the same object in view. These Amendments would prevent newspapers published in Ireland being dealt with under this clause, for if the Amendments were adopted, the clause would read—“Where after the passing of this Act any newspaper printed and published in any foreign country,” &c., should be dealt with by the Lord Lieutenant. The omission of the word “wherever” would clearly make it impossible for the Lord Lieutenant to establish a censorship over the newspapers published in Ireland.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 14, to leave out the word “wherever.”
—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘wherever’ stand part of the Clause.”

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the Amendment would certainly defeat the object the Government had in view by the clause. It was quite plain that if this Amendment were accepted everything that was done by foreign newspapers could be done by Irish newspapers, and yet the latter would not come under the operation of the clause. He knew of no power of dealing with Irish newspapers, except by the process of common procedure. This clause was intended to make quite clear the power of seizure. His hon. Friend (Mr. Dillwyn) must be perfectly aware that the legality of the power which had been exercised by the Irish Government of seizing newspapers—without which he ventured to say very great evil would have ensued—had been challenged. One of the intentions of this clause was to make it quite clear that the Lord Lieutenant’s power to seize newspapers was legal; and if the power were confined to foreign newspapers, the Irish Government would have no remedy against Irish newspapers, except they proceeded before a jury. The hypothesis on which they had all along proceeded was that that was no remedy at all. If this Amendment were adopted, Irish newspapers would have the power to reprint the objectionable part of a foreign newspaper, and thus do all the mischief which it was the object of the clause to prevent. He, therefore, thought his hon. Friend would see that his objection should be taken to the clause as a whole. To introduce this immunity for newspapers printed in Ireland would be to allow the whole effect of the Foreign Press to operate as strongly as it did now. It was not necessary to go into particulars. It was quite obvious that Irish newspapers could and would, if the Amendment were adopted, reprint the very passages from foreign newspapers which the Government considered so objectionable.

MR. DILLWYN said, that if Irish newspapers did reprint objectionable passages from foreign newspapers, he took it they would be liable to prosecution, such as that which the Government were now carrying on in respect to The Freiheit.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the prosecution of The Freiheit was brought before an English jury; but if the case of an Irish newspaper were brought before an Irish jury, there would be no chance of a verdict being obtained against the paper. It was upon that hypothesis the Government had proceeded in the previous clauses, and it was upon that hypothesis they were proceeding now. If the only remedy possessed against objectionable Irish newspapers was that of proceeding before an Irish jury there would be no remedy at all.

MR. T. P. O’CONNOR observed, that as the Bill progressed the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department was gradually abandoning the practice of advancing arguments in favour of the clauses he had to propose. He (Mr. T. P. O’Connor) invited the Secretary of State for the Home Department to give a single instance in which any of the newspapers in Ireland called National had reprinted from an American newspaper any matter which would come fairly within the scope of this clause. He also invited the right hon. and learned Gentleman to give the Committee a single case in which an Irish newspaper, charged with an offence against the law, had been brought before an Irish jury, and in which the newspaper had not been convicted. There were two cases quite familiar to the minds of anybody who had paid any attention to Irish history, the cases in which Mr. A. M. Sullivan, for many years a respected Member of that House, and Mr. Richard Pigott, were brought before Dublin juries for writing in newspapers objectionable matter in connection with the execution of three Irishmen in Manchester, on the charge of taking part in the rescue of some Fenians. Although Mr. A. M. Sullivan was then, as now, a man against whose respectability not a word could be uttered, he was convicted by a jury of his fellow-citizens in Dublin, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment. In the same way, Mr. Richard Pigott was convicted and sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was utterly unable to give a single instance in proof of the statement that the Jury Law had broken down with regard to newspaper prosecutions in Ireland; in fact, all the cases of which they had experience went to show just the contrary. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that Irish newspapers could, and would, if that Amendment were adopted, copy the most objectionable matter from American newspapers. The right hon. and learned Gentleman must know, as well as he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) did, that the only Irish newspaper which, in recent days, had copied from an American paper an objectionable article was The Dublin Daily Express—the organ of the Conservative landlords of Ireland. He did not think the right hon. and learned Gentleman would stand up and say that if The Dublin Daily Express copied some other objectionable article from an American paper it would be prosecuted under the clause. The fact of the matter was that this clause was not intended to put down the wild, revolutionary, and murderous newspapers of America, of which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had given such eloquent descriptions; but the object of it was to establish a censorship over the Press of Ireland, so that any newspaper which did not suit the good graces of the Lord Lieutenant should be suppressed.

Mr. JOSEPH COWEN said, it was impossible for the Secretary of State for the Home Department to cite a single instance in which an Irish newspaper had been prosecuted, and in which a fair verdict had not been given. It was a remarkable fact that verdicts in the case of such prosecutions had invariably gone against the newspaper involved. It was, therefore, well that when a change of the law in respect to newspapers was sought, the Government should give them at least one instance where the law, as it now stood, had broken down. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would see his way to take the sting out of this clause, by adopting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn). If any person outside Ireland wished to send newspapers into the country they would never be at a loss for the means of doing it, notwithstanding this clause. He was certain the right hon. and learned Gentleman would be aware that persons interested in the circulation of newspapers would be able to force that circulation if they were disposed to do so. There would be abundant ways of effecting that in Ireland; and, by way of illustration, he need only refer to what took place in Russia, Italy, and Austria.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, he wished the Committee to bear in mind that an Act passed last Session gave an alternative to the owners of newspapers with respect to the Law of Libel, and that a provision which might not have been necessary previous to the passing of that Act had become most necessary after it was passed. The Act to which he referred had not attracted the amount of attention to which he thought it was entitled, inasmuch as it completely reversed the principle of Lord Campbell's Act, that principle being that the person supposed to have spoken the libel was responsible; whereas the Act of last Session made the person supposed to have spoken the libellous matter responsible, in the first instance, for the printer's conduct. Formerly, under Lord Campbell's Act, it rested with the discretion of the owner of a newspaper whether he would report libel, because he was responsible for publishing it; but the Act of last year reversed that principle, and now the person supposed to have spoken the libel was by law liable for what the owner of a newspaper chose to publish. Therefore, he thought that this precaution was fully required, owing to the change in the law made during the last few nights of the previous Session.

Mr. LABOUCHERE said, there was a distinction between a newspaper published abroad and a newspaper published in Ireland, and it was this—In the latter case, the paper was owned and published by someone in the country, and if it contained matter inciting to the commission of treason or violence, he took it that the publisher or the owner could be proceeded against under the other clause of the Act; whereas, if the owner and publisher were abroad, that would be impossible. But he thought the sting of the whole clause would be taken out by the concession which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had made; and he did not think that the clause, as altered, would create in Ireland, so far as the Press was concerned, a state of things greatly differing from the conditions which at present existed there. Yet he hoped that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would agree to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), and that he would admit into the clause some definition of the word "intimidation"—say, for instance, that it should be "illegal or violent intimidation," or some such words. The Lord Lieutenant might take an exceedingly large view of what the word intimidation meant. In fact, he might sometimes come to the conclusion that landlords in Ireland were intimidated.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

THE CHAIRMAN said, the remarks of the hon. Member were not pertinent to the Amendment before the Committee, which was simply to omit the word "wherever."

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he would conclude his remarks by expressing the hope that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would make the concession asked for; because, even if he did so, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland would still be able to act as at present—that was to say, to seize any newspapers that contained matter objectionable to him. Practically, the Lord Lieutenant could do that, because he (Mr. Labouchere) took it that the only way open to a person who objected to the seizure would be the bringing of an action against the person who did it. But if the action were brought, the case would go before a jury; and, as the question would be of a political kind, he imagined that the person who brought it would not get the verdict. The Lord Lieutenant, therefore, already possessed the powers sought to be given by this clause.

MR. TREVELYAN said, the Irish Government had considered this clause very carefully from the point of view put forward by the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn). They had had experience of the Act of 1870, which, as the hon. Member was aware, contained some extremely stringent clauses. Those clauses, however, had not actually been put into operation, and consequently the Irish Government came to the conclusion that in this matter they would be able to reduce coercion to a minimum. It was not the case, as had been stated by hon. Members opposite, that newspaper publishers had only quoted the extremely objectionable papers published elsewhere. He did not want, in any sense, by these remarks to inflame the character of that discussion, which he was bound to admit, up to the present time, had been extremely practical and sensible. But he must point out that the Irish Government, during the last year or 10 months, had found it necessary constantly to stop single issues of newspapers published both abroad and in England. He would give one instance in which this had taken place. There had been cases in which actual "Boycotting" notices of the strongest sort, and even notices sent by "Captain Moonlight," had been published as advertisements in local newspapers; and the Committee would see that these were cases in which some interference was necessary. Judging not by theory, but by practical experience, the Irish Executive had come to the conclusion that the power contained in this clause was sufficient for the purpose in view; but it would not be sufficient if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea were accepted.

MR. SEXTON said, with reference to the fact that "Boycotting" notices had been published in Irish newspapers, he believed that they had only appeared as advertisements; but it was a characteristic feature of the Government policy that they always wanted two or three ways of doing the same thing. The Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland said the Irish Executive had reduced the clause to a minimum; but what was that minimum? It was one which would enable the Lord Lieutenant to ruin any newspaper proprietor in Ireland. Disguise it as they might, the Lord Lieutenant could ruin any newspaper proprietor there if he thought fit, and he (Mr. Sexton) challenged contradiction of that statement. Whenever the Government had brought an Irish newspaper before an Irish jury on a criminal charge, they had always succeeded in getting a verdict; and that, he contended, was a great fact in support of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea. Whenever the Secretary of State for the Home Department had endeavoured to incite a feeling in that House against the Irish Members, he had not attempted to do so by quotations from Irish newspapers. He had never quoted Irish newspapers—he always quoted from The Irish World, or the newspaper edited by O'Donovan Rossa. He had once quoted from United Ireland, but the Government had already exercised against that paper the power asked for in this clause. He (Mr. Sexton) said that if the Government had only supported their proposal by quotations from American newspapers, an unanswerable case had been made out for the Amendment before the Committee.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that, as the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Sexton) had stated that he never quoted from Irish newspapers, but only from those published in America, he would give an instance of passages of the kind which the Government thought it their duty to suppress, and he asked the attention of the Committee to a quotation, not from an American, but from an Irish newspaper (The Clare Journal), published on the 13th of April, 1882:—

“MOONLIGHT PLACARD.”

“Men of Historic Clare and Ireland.”

“This is to give you due and public notice that Pautch Cunningham, Turnpike, Ennis (father doing business for Bannatyne, Cross Road of Mills); this low-bred fellow is giving his cars this long time with impunity to the peelers to attend evictions, etc., in the County of Clare; also to King Clifford Lloyd, of Cromwellian descent, to drive him and his breed of hired assassins throughout the entire county. This Pautch Cunningham is, by all accounts, of rotten lineage, as every one of his breed in the town of Ennis are villains. For instance, ‘Curse of Christ’ Matty is uncle, and the rest of his gang of bailiffs are blood relations of his. Anybody, no matter whom he may be, in the town of Ennis or elsewhere, after reading or hearing of this public warning, who supplies cars to such parties, I swear by Parnell, Davitt, and Dillon, and the rest of the patriots that are pining in English dungeons, they shall die the death of Bailey, the informer of Dublin. Furthermore, no matter whom he may be that gives his cars for similar purposes in the future the same fate awaits him, if it was in ten years to come, to avenge the principal and grand object in view for the exaltation of the honest and patriotic people of Ireland.”

COLONEL NOLAN: I wish to ask the Home Secretary whether that appears in a Conservative newspaper?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: What does that signify? The notice continues—

“Also not forgetting the low, hungry robber and degraded blackguard Maurice Quinlan, Cross of Clare Road, who is supplying cars to the enemy since the very start of the agitation, in defiance of the general wishes of the people. This low scoundrel drives himself to every eviction with an air of independence; and his brother Tom gives support to the peelers. . . . his horses on every occasion that arises for further coercion and persecution of our down-trodden country. . . .

With regard to this renegade, some Land Leaguer will die the death of a traitor for entering and supporting his houses. Groves, another smart Orangeman, who has supplied his cars repeatedly, will be similarly dealt with.

“By Order,—Captain Moonlight.”

“Men of Clare to the rescue.”

“God save Ireland.”

He thought he had now answered the challenge of the hon. Member opposite by reading a passage from an Irish newspaper. It mattered not whether the newspaper were Conservative or Liberal. A newspaper that published such an article as that ought to be suppressed, and Her Majesty's Government were now asking Parliament for the power to seize such a publication. He would give another reference to the same newspaper. When the woman who published it was called upon to give an undertaking to publish nothing of the same or similar character she gave that undertaking, but afterwards withdrew it on the statement that other newspapers in Ireland were doing the same thing. Here was a newspaper inciting to the assassination of men for no other offence than that of supplying cars which they had for hire, because it did not suit the views of “Captain Moonlight” that they should do so. It was the duty of Her Majesty's Government to arm the Irish Executive with the power of dealing with such publications.

MR. O'SHEA thought language of the kind quoted by the right hon. and learned Gentleman could be dealt with under Clause 4 of the Bill. He understood the right hon. and learned Gentleman to say that these words were printed in The Clare Journal. That paper was a Conservative organ of the highest respectability; it was a paper to which he himself, in the ordinary course of business, subscribed, though pressure of affairs prevented his giving it all the attention it deserved. The proclamation was evidently given as an ordinary piece of news. He should be glad to hear from the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether such language, under whatever circumstances it might be published, could not be dealt with under the 4th clause of the Bill.

Mr. Sexton

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, with regard to the 4th clause of the Bill, it would, in his opinion, be a very insufficient remedy to send the person who published a newspaper to prison for six months, and allow the publication of the newspaper to continue. The object was not only to punish individuals, it was to prevent pestilent and poisonous matter being circulated throughout the length and breadth of Ireland.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, if the legislation for the Press was to be based on such extreme cases in Ireland, he would be glad to know why the same legislation should not be extended to England. A few nights ago, he had quoted in that House passages of a character so abominable that he believed hon. Members were shocked by the reference which he had felt it his duty to make to them. The Secretary of State for the Home Department, it appeared, took no notice of things of this kind published in England. In order to strengthen his case, he had to go to The Clare Journal, and furnish a solitary extract from that paper; and it was upon that he asked the House to destroy the liberty of the Press in Ireland. Why did the right hon. and learned Gentleman not proceed against publications in England which advocated the overthrow of the Queen and the destruction of society at large—that told people there was no use in assassinating a single Monarch, Ruler, or statesman; that they must make a clean sweep of them—sharpen their knives and strengthen their arms, and drive their weapons through the hearts of their foes? This was no invention. It was only a few nights ago that he had the publication to which he referred in his hands, and he had it still in his possession. Why did the right hon. and learned Gentleman not put the law in force against some of the atrocious publications which appeared in this country from day to day? The right hon. and learned Gentleman, upon a single copy of a placard appearing in a Clare newspaper, now came forward to ask the House of Commons to sweep away the liberty of the Press in Ireland. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, the other day, compared this Bill to a fire engine to put out the fire burning in Ireland; but, by a clause of this kind, he would put out, not the fire, but the lamps which gave some glimmer of light in the darkness of that country. The result of this atrocious measure would have the effect of producing silence and darkness in Ireland; and this, it would seem, was the object which the right hon. and learned Gentleman desired to bring about. He had already prevented platforms being brought into requisition, and now he sought to prevent the Press in Ireland speaking to the people, and guiding and instructing them. Every day that passed over their heads they were confronted with the consequences which followed this baneful and oppressive legislation in Ireland; and in the face of those things, the warnings he had received, and the plain results which had followed the attempts to stifle the voice of the people, the right hon. and learned Gentleman came forward with new attempts upon the Press of the country. It was useless to protest in that House against tyranny of that kind; but Irish Members would always denounce it. The people of this country might not pay attention to their denunciations; but the Irish people would, and so would their kindred in America, who were watching the present proceedings attentively, and did not mean to forget them.

COLONEL NOLAN pointed out that the only way in which a Conservative newspaper could be supported in Ireland was by advertisements given by the agents and land-owning families who subscribed to it. In this particular instance, it was really the upper classes who were responsible for the conduct of the newspapers. In legislating for matters of this kind, where a gentle remedy could be used, it was a great mistake to adopt a violent and unusual one. In the case in question, the practical remedy would have been for some of the gentlemen who subscribed to the paper to have remonstrated with the editor, and to have intimated that they would cease to be subscribers; but to say that the whole of the Press of Ireland was to be manœuvred, because a Conservative paper printed such an extraordinary article, was really going too far. Common sense would tell them at the present moment the attitude the Conservative Party had taken up on the agitation in Ireland. But it did not matter whether these things were published in a Conservative paper or not, no one in authority seemed to raise any objection. It was possible that objectionable articles might be published in other newspapers; but even if they were, it would be a strong measure to take to stop the mouth of the whole of the Press in consequence. In the case of The Dublin Daily Express, when they took into consideration the class of people that supported the paper, it surely was hardly fair for the Secretary of State for the Home Department to quote the case against the whole of the Irish Press.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he wished to make an appeal to the Government with regard to a Bill down for consideration, that night—namely, the Settlement and Removal Law Amendment Bill. That was a measure considered by Members on that (the Conservative) side of the House as of very great importance. They had not blocked it, for the simple reason that they did not wish to interfere with the progress of Government Business—they did not want to offer a factious opposition to it. The second reading of the Bill ought not to be taken at an unreasonable hour. [Cries of "Order!"] Hon. Gentlemen seemed to think that he was out of Order in referring to another Bill in Committee upon the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill; therefore he would move to report Progress. It was a strange thing that no one could ever speak on that side of the House without being received with interruptions by the other side. He desired, in the most respectful way, to appeal to the Government to allow Progress now to be reported, in order that the Bill to which he was referring could be brought on—or he wished to receive a pledge from them that the measure would not be taken that night. No one on the Conservative side wished to obstruct the Bill. His own constituents, and, no doubt, the constituents of many other hon. Members, were very deeply interested in the matters dealt with in the Bill; and he would, therefore, pro forma, move to report Progress, in order that the Government could consider the point he had raised, and, if they thought it desirable, allow the Settlement and Removal Bill to come on. The debate on the present clause of the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill appeared to be one which was hardly likely to come to a speedy termination.

Colonel Nolan

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir H. Drummond Wolff.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the Government had been making great exertions and great sacrifices, and so, also, it was only fair to say, had the Opposition, in order to make progress with the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill. There seemed to be a disposition on the part of the Committee to go on with the measure, and to make some further progress with it that night; and he, therefore, sincerely trusted that the hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) would not persist in his Motion to report Progress. The debate on the present Amendment had been very exhaustive, and he thought that a division might very soon be taken upon it.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he did not think his hon. Friend (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) wished to stop the discussion upon the Amendment before the Committee. All he desired was to elicit a promise from the Government that the other Bill would not be taken that evening.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the Government never had the remotest intention of proceeding with the second reading of the Settlement and Removal Bill that evening, and why the hon. Member should have thought they had he could not understand. The same question might be asked with regard to any Bill, and it was a most unusual thing to interrupt the progress of one measure in order to ascertain what was likely to be done with another.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he really did not think the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had any right to lecture him upon the matter. The right hon. and learned Gentleman might lecture hon. Members on his own side of the House; but that was no reason why he should venture to do the same to hon. Members who sat opposite to him. There was no reason why the Settlement and Removal Bill should not be brought forward that evening. There was no Amendment to it; it was not blocked; and he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) only feared that it might be the intention of the Government to smuggle it through the House without debate, if possible.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: Are we to understand that the Settlement and Removal Bill will not be taken to-night?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have always understood that when a Member of this House once makes a promise he is not expected to repeat it.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: The right hon. and learned Gentleman did not make a promise in the first instance; but now that he has done so, I beg to withdraw the Motion for reporting Progress.

THE CHAIRMAN: Is it your pleasure that the Motion be withdrawn?

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he hoped it was not too late to make an observation upon this matter. He was in favour of the Motion to report Progress for, he thought, a much better reason than that advanced by the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken—namely, for the reason that the Irish Members, who had taken an active part in advancing Amendments to and in the discussion of the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill, had made as many sacrifices in the interest of Public Business as the Government or the Conservative Opposition, and to do their duty they would have to be in the House again at 2 o'clock the next day at the Morning Sitting. Under the circumstances, it was surely a reasonable thing that Progress should be reported, seeing that it was now nearly half-past 1. During the time he had been in the House he had always consistently opposed any attempt to continue any discussion on grave public questions at an unreasonably late hour. Well, this was an unreasonably late hour. The clause of the Bill they were on was a very important one, and, without any reference at all to the Notice of the hon. Gentleman (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) near him, he trusted that the Motion to report Progress would be adhered to, and that the Government would agree to it. This question as to the liberty of the Press in Ireland was one that could not be disposed of that night. He set the highest value on the concessions the Government had already made in striking out so many sub-sections of the clause. It seemed to him to show a very good spirit on their part, and to that spirit, so far as he was concerned, he would very gladly respond; but, at the same time, he thought they had reached such a late hour on a matter of such importance that it was highly desirable that Progress should be reported.

MR. RAIKES hoped the Committee would allow the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) to withdraw his Motion, as it had only been made for the purpose of eliciting some statement from the Government with regard to another Bill. The Secretary of State for the Home Department had made the required statement in a very fair way, and, the purpose of his hon. Friend having been entirely met, he trusted he would now be allowed to withdraw his Motion. So far as he (Mr. Raikes) was concerned, he could not see why this question of the liberty of the Press in Ireland could not be discussed for at least another hour. Members on that (the Conservative) side of the House were not anxious to interfere with the progress of this Bill through Committee.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that with reference to the observations that had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) he (Mr. Trevelyan) had watched the progress of this discussion with the greatest interest, and had noticed that so representative a Member on this question as the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Joseph Cowen) appeared to think that, now the Government Amendments were on the Paper, his principal objections were removed, and that the fears of other hon. Members as to the objectionable character of the clause were removed. The clause, as it stood, simply gave the Lord Lieutenant a power that he had practically been exercising for the past year or 18 months. He (Mr. Trevelyan) could not help thinking that the discussion on the question as to whether that power should be put into this Bill had proceeded, at any rate to a satisfactory length, and he earnestly trusted that the Committee would permit them now to add the clause to the Bill. He must admit that he thought that hitherto the progress which had been made with the Bill had not quite answered to the number of nights which had been spent upon it. If the Government could get this clause they would gladly accede to the wish of the hon. and learned Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), and agree that Progress should be reported.

Mr. PARNELL said, he never yet had seen a Minister of the Crown who had anything to do with the progress of a measure through that House satisfied that the advance of that measure was proportionate to the amount of time devoted to it; and he did not know why the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland should be an exception to the general rule. He (Mr. Parnell) agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) that they ought not to be called upon to vote away the liberty of the Press in Ireland in a single hour. Though it was true that the Amendments of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department did away with a great many of the objections the Irish Members felt to that clause, still this was, no doubt, a section of the Bill which, even in its shortened condition, retaining only the 1st sub-section, gave enormous powers to the Executive in Ireland over the freedom of the Press in that country; in fact, it practically put newspaper editors at the mercy of the Executive authorities. The Lord Lieutenant practically had power now to seize newspapers that he considered objectionable, and there was no way in which newspaper proprietors could prevent the exercise of that power, because it would rest upon a newspaper proprietor to bring an action against the authorities, and everyone must know that it would be impossible for a journalist in Ireland to obtain a verdict from a jury that would be empannelled on such a case, party feeling running so high. As to the other clauses—Clauses 1 and 4—the Government had taken ample, nay, more than ample power to deal penally with editors of newspapers, and they had made out no case why this additional power that they sought should be granted. It was true the Secretary of State for the Home Department had attempted, for the first time on this Bill, to justify the provisions in question—for the first time he had given them an example. Undoubtedly the right hon. and learned Gentleman had selected his example most unfortunately, because he had chosen to refer to something which had appeared in a Conservative paper, a landlord journal, in the County of Clare. In this case, the offence of "Boycotting" was illustrated, and what was the intention with which this Conservative paper had published a "Boycotting" notice? It was to show what a heinous institution the Irish National Land League was when such a notice could be issued apparently in its name. Such was the example the right hon. and learned Gentleman was content to select as a justification for the demand he made for this extra power. He (Mr. Parnell) would challenge the right hon. and learned Gentleman to select a single passage from any popular newspaper in Ireland upon which charges of this description could be founded. He (Mr. Parnell) knew, as a matter of fact, that no popular newspaper during the whole of last winter dared publish such an extract as that which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had referred to. If any popular journal had done so, the editor would have been arrested under the Coercion Act by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and sent to Kilmainham. On the contrary, Irish popular journals during the past six or seven months had been exceedingly careful with regard to the original matter they admitted into their columns. He would call on the Secretary of State for the Home Department to give any passage from United Ireland newspaper—which had been seized in innumerable instances last winter—upon which such a charge as that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had made against a Conservative paper could be founded. Why was not the editor of that Conservative journal, from which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had read an extract, arrested under the Coercion Act? Simply because the newspaper was Conservative, and because the object of that incitement to assassination by the editor of that journal was for the purpose of running down the Land League and showing up its work. The suggestion he (Mr. Parnell) would make as to this question of Progress would be this. He believed the hon. Member who had moved the Amendment did not intend seriously to press it. In that case, let the Committee go on with the discussion upon the Amendments before them until they came to a point upon which there was a serious difference of opinion. When that serious difference arose then let them report Progress.

Mr. Trevelyan

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. DILLWYN said, he quite admitted that the principal objection he had to the clause would be removed by the Amendments the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had given Notice of. At the same time, he was far from being enamoured of the clause, even as it would stand. It would place the Press in Ireland under the power of the Lord Lieutenant. However, hon. Gentlemen opposite did not seem to feel such a strong objection to the clause now that it was to be amended. [Cries of "No, no!"] At any rate, a great deal of the objectionable character of the clause had been removed; and, seeing that that was the case, he was willing to withdraw his Amendment, if it was the pleasure of the Committee that it should be withdrawn. He thought it was desirable that they should come to a decision upon the clause that night.

MR. HEALY said, it seemed to be the impression of the Government that because they had put ballast in their ship, which they could throw out at any moment to suit the winds, therefore hon. Members must agree with them. Surely they could not expect to pass the clause as it stood. They had put things into it, for the purpose of taking them out, and he should like to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department a few questions with regard to this power of seizure. Would the Lord Lieutenant order such a paper as The Glasgow Herald to be seized, when sent over to Ireland; Town Talk, Bradlaugh's journal, and immoral journals generally? Would these papers be liable to seizure? There were a number of journals that he, for his own part, should be happy to lay an information against if he thought it would conduce to their seizure. He did not see why an offence against morality should not be as objectionable to the Secretary of State for the Home Department as anything else.

Surely the right hon. and learned Gentleman would not maintain that temporal affairs were of more importance than spiritual. A prosecution had been instituted against Town Talk, and most people knew the character of that journal. Would he allow such a publication as that to circulate in Ireland?

Main Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 143; Noes 33: Majority 110.—(Div. List, No. 156.)

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) that if his Amendment which stands next on the Paper is negatived, a similar Amendment in the name of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) cannot be put, as it contains the same matter substantially. I do not know, therefore, whether the hon. Member intends to proceed with his Amendment. The Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork goes more into detail than that of the hon. Member for Sligo.

MR. SEXTON: In that case I will withdraw my Amendment.

MR. PARNELL said, he would move an Amendment with the object of providing that where a newspaper was seized, the editor, or other person responsible for the publication, might know what the objectionable matter was, and so might prevent its re-publication in subsequent issues.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 20, at end, to add, "In every case where copies of a newspaper are seized the order directing the seizure shall specify the matter objected to."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had no objection to the Lord Lieutenant, in taking so strong a measure as seizing a newspaper, setting forth the reasons in the order of seizure.

MR. GIBSON thought it necessary that the Committee and the Government should realize what would be the effect of the Amendment if it was accepted. If it was put in the Bill, it had better be worth something; but if the clause was altered, as this Amendment proposed, it would be impossible to work it. The sub-section of the clause only enabled the Executive to seize a particular issue of a newspaper; but if the Lord Lieutenant, before he seized a newspaper which was printed and turned out complete, was to have before him the whole of the printed matter, and introduce it into the warrant, the paper would be circulated throughout the land before the Government stopped it.

[Fourteenth Night.]

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT did not understand that the statement of the reasons was to be precedent to a seizure. The seizure would take place, and then, afterwards, the parties affected would have supplied to them, under the clause, a copy of the order of the Lord Lieutenant directing such seizure, and specifying the matter in such newspaper which appeared to the Lord Lieutenant to be calculated to incite to treason or any act of violence. The Lord Lieutenant might make up his mind to seize a newspaper, on the ground of certain passages which it contained; and he (the Secretary of State for the Home Department) conceived it would be sufficient, when the Lord Lieutenant made up his mind, that he should cut out the passages necessary to the seizure, and specify them as the ground of the seizure. The seizure must be due to certain passages. The Amendment provided that—

“In every case where copies of a newspaper are seized, the order directing the seizure shall specify the matter objected to.”

Therefore, if the Lord Lieutenant had made up his mind to seize a newspaper, he must have made up his mind as to the objectionable passages therein, and must have seen the newspaper. That was the practice at present; the Lord Lieutenant seized the newspaper, and specified the grounds. No doubt, this was an imperfect provision; but it was one which the Irish Government believed to be of practical utility, for they could, under this provision, practically control the Press. That being so, he thought that when the Lord Lieutenant saw a newspaper, he made up his mind as to the passages upon which it should be seized, and ought to give to everybody affected a statement of the passages which had led to the seizure.

MR. GIBSON said, he had listened with great attention to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and he would only make this criticism upon what he had said—that part of the Press which he considered it of the first importance to deal with was the Foreign Press—copies of newspapers coming from America, pouring out nothing but the most dangerous matter that could be conceived for a country like Ireland, in its present state. If the Amendment was applied to the whole clause, it would not apply to those terrible publications from America in the same way as to those in Dublin. The Irish Government would be apprised, by telegram or otherwise, that The Irish World, or some other American paper, contained in a particular impression a lot of treasonable matter. If an order could not be issued to seize such a paper, without the passages being quoted, it would be impossible to prevent the circulation of papers which would do the greatest harm. He would suggest that the Secretary of State for the Home Department should consider whether it would not be desirable to put in some words excluding from this Amendment papers brought from abroad.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, an instruction was once given to a reviewer to cut the leaves of a book and then smell the paper knife, and that was what the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) seemed to wish to have done with regard to Irish newspapers. It would suffice for the Lord Lieutenant to smell treason in them without reading them at all. He was really astonished to hear the right hon. and learned Gentleman, representing such a centre of enlightenment as Trinity College, Dublin, recommending such a mode of treating the Press. Surely it was not too much to ask that the Lord Lieutenant, before ordering the suppression of a newspaper, should himself see what it contained, and form his own opinion as to the character of the contents. If he concluded that the matter was either treasonable, seditious, or intimidating, it would not take him very long to have the objectionable passages copied; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin required that the Lord Lieutenant should not wait at all, although it would not take him more than three minutes to select from the paper the objectionable passages and put them into the warrant. It was really too bad that even the safeguard given by the Amendment, requiring that the Lord Lieutenant should read the papers himself, and form his own opinion, should, it was suggested, be refused. It was not very much of a safeguard; but even that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the seat of learning in Dublin, where it might be supposed some regard would be had for enlightenment and education, proposed should not be allowed.

Mr. Gibson

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he thought the Government appeared to be accepting this Amendment rather hastily, and without sufficient consideration; and there was one point he should like to understand. He presumed the object of the Government was to stop the circulation of papers containing mischievous notices throughout the land; and if, in that case, they were compelled to cite the objectionable passages to enable them to suppress the newspapers, would they not be publishing precisely what they wished to suppress? Or was a private communication to be given to the newspapers? If it was to be provided that the paper was to be stopped by the objectionable passages being cited, surely that was giving publicity to the very passages it was desired to suppress. He would suggest to the Government that they should let this matter stand over to the Report, and see in what way they could meet the question, which was, no doubt, worthy of consideration, and with which, he thought, they were acting rather hastily in accepting the Amendment.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT thought the objection of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) would apply to any publication, because to set out any passages in the newspaper objected to obtained for those very passages publicity. That was the objection to the prosecution of The Press. He wished the right hon. Gentleman to see what the Amendment provided, and how it bore upon the clause. The only power in the clause was—

"Any copy of such newspaper, appears to the Lord Lieutenant to contain matter inciting to the commission of treason," &c.

The Lord Lieutenant must, therefore, be cognizant of the newspaper before he could act; and the only question was one of how he was to set out the matter. There was some difficulty in imposing the duty of setting out the whole of the matter before the seizure. He thought the Lord Lieutenant ought to state, some time or other, what it was that had led to the seizure. Therefore, if the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) would agree not to make that statement a condition of the seizure, but that the statement should follow immediately on the seizure, and afterwards be accessible to the parties who were subject to the seizure, he would accept this Amendment, not as a precedent for procedure, but only as a statement of the grounds of the seizure, in order that the people concerned might learn those grounds. If the hon. Gentleman would accept that modification of the Amendment, he thought it would be better to defer the consideration of it. With that view, he would be willing to accept the Amendment.

MR. O'KELLY thought the Government ought to give an assurance that when a Conservative newspaper published any matter, which, if published in a national newspaper, would form a ground of prosecution, the same action should be taken as against the National paper. What had been the case in the last year? Some of the passages quoted in that House as the strongest evidence against liberty of the Press in Ireland were published in a Conservative paper in Ireland. In this matter there ought to be something like even-handed justice, and the Government ought, at least, to give an assurance that they would act in the same way in regard to a Conservative paper as to a National paper.

MR. PLUNKET said, whenever he had seen any of these passages in a Conservative paper, they had been accompanied by editorial condemnations. That was a very different thing from publishing those passages with expressions of approval, as was often done.

MR. PARNELL said, he was sorry to say that he could not accept the suggestion of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, because one of his objects was to provide that the Lord Lieutenant should have seen a newspaper before he ordered its seizure, and examined the objectionable passages. He wished to remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman and the Committee that the reason put forward by the Front Opposition Bench to induce the right hon. and learned Gentleman to make a change in the Amendment was that it might be inconvenient for the Government in dealing with foreign newspapers, which might get into the country and be circulated, if they had no opportunity of seeing and seizing them. He thought it so desirable that proper precautions should be taken with regard to Irish newspapers—that was to say, that there should be no risk in their case—that he would suggest that, if the right hon. and learned Gentleman desired, on Report, to introduce some special provision to meet the case raised with regard to foreign newspapers, that would be very fair. But he did think that it would be desirable to require that the Lord Lieutenant should have seen a newspaper before seizing it. There was no practical inconvenience in this course, because the newspaper could not be circulated through Dublin without the Lord Lieutenant having an ample opportunity of seeing it. With regard to country newspapers, their circulation was very limited; but the Lord Lieutenant would be able to get information by telegram as to any contents which might be objectionable. He hoped the Secretary of State for the Home Department would allow the Amendment to pass as it was; and then, before Report, they might consider what modification should be introduced to meet the objection as to foreign papers. After the Government had admitted the principle of the Amendment, he thought it was only fair that they should introduce the sub-section into the Bill; and then, on Report, it would be permissible for the right hon. and learned Gentleman to propose any modification.

[Fourteenth Night.]

MR. TREVELYAN said, he had listened to the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) with great interest, because the right hon. and learned Gentleman was evidently going through the same process as he (Mr. Trevelyan) himself had gone through some weeks ago upon a question with regard to which he had made some particular inquiries. When he first went to Dublin, he did not understand the process by which a single issue of a newspaper enabled the Government to obtain such a hold over the more dangerous ebullitions from the Press; but when he saw how the work was done he understood it quite well; and, in regard to newspapers in Ireland, he was perfectly satisfied that the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) might be adopted with perfect security. The form of the seizure order would run in this way—“Whereas a newspaper, entitled so-and-so, and dated so-and-so, appears to us to contain, in a passage therein, commencing with the word so-and-so, and ending with the word so-and-so, matter inciting to violence or intimidation. Now, we hereby order all copies of the said newspaper to be seized, and we authorize you to seize the same accordingly.” It was quite obvious that that was as short an order as could be given to an Executive officer. With regard to newspapers published abroad, he realized the difficulty referred to; but as the Government recognized the principle of the Amendment with regard to Irish newspapers, and as they had engaged to deal with the difficulty raised by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin as to papers published abroad, he thought the principle might be embodied in the clause now, and any modification left for Report.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that, after what his right hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan) had said, he hoped the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) would postpone his Amendment until Report. The Amendment of the hon. Gentleman would be taken as bearing upon home newspapers, and, by Report, they would have an opportunity of considering what form would be required to deal with foreign newspapers.

MR. PARNELL understood the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department to adopt substantially the provision contained in his (Mr. Parnell's) sub-section with regard to home newspapers, reserving to himself the right to bring up, on Report, a special provision with regard to foreign newspapers. Upon that understanding, he would ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL said, he would like to move, pro forma, an Amendment, providing that in case of seizure the person who executed the seizure should take with him a copy of the order authorizing the seizure. He could understand it would be, perhaps, inconvenient to present the order in cases where papers were seized from street vendors; but he thought that, in the case of tradesmen who sold papers over their counters, the constables making the seizure should be required to show that they had legal authority.

Mr. Parnell

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked the hon. Gentleman to let the proposed Amendment stand over until Report. It was very proper that the person interested ought to be furnished with information as to the ground on which the seizure had been made; but what limitations should be put upon that required some consideration. In principle, the ground on which the seizure was made ought to be accessible; but he would like time to consider how the thing should be carried out.

MR. PARSELL said, he would defer the matter for Report, and he would also defer until Report the introduction of a third sub-section he had to propose to the clause.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he would now move the Amendment which stood in his name, which practically amounted to the omission of Sub-sections 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, from the clause.

Amendment proposed, to leave out all the words from the word "Where," in line 21, page 5, to the word "unincorporate," in line 9, page 6.—(Secretary Sir William Harcourt.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that, of course, the omission of these sub-sections very materially weakened the power of the Government to deal with the Press. The clause, as originally framed, gave the Lord Lieutenant, in the first instance, power to seize and stop any particular newspaper; and subsequently, if he had reason to believe that the paper was altogether objectionable, he had power to deal with the paper by way of forfeiture. The Government now thought it unnecessary to proceed with the latter part of the clause. So far as papers published in Ireland were concerned, he (Sir Stafford Northcote) had no wish to say anything to challenge their discretion in the matter; but he would ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department to consider whether the same measure ought to be applied to foreign newspapers as he proposed to apply to Irish newspapers. He thought that in the event of its appearing that some particular newspaper, published abroad, and regularly forwarded to this country and to Ireland, was incorrigibly bad, and was continually publishing mischievous and dangerous matter, it was worthy of consideration whether power should not be reserved to the Government to stop the circulation of that paper in England or in Ireland? He did not ask for an answer at that moment; but he thought the question was one which deserved consideration, and which, perhaps, the Government would consider before the Report of the Bill.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the matter referred to by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) had been very carefully considered. The right hon. Gentleman, however, would observe that the sections it was proposed to omit never could have applied to foreign newspapers. He (Sir William Harcourt) would like to say, in a few words, why the Government abandoned these sections. When the Government proposed to have caution-money, they had great difficulty in knowing what to do with the recognizances when they were forfeited. The ordinary way of dealing with recognizances would have been to refer them to a jury; but he had already said that that would be of no avail. What were they to do upon the question of determining whether a paper, having given caution-money, had not forfeited its recognizances? The Government felt that there was a very great difficulty in referring Press questions to the Judges; and in considering whether the determination of the question should be left in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant, they felt very strongly the objections which were urged to the making of the Lord Lieutenant the Judge upon the forfeiture of recognizances. These were the grounds which induced the Government to abandon these sections, coupled with the fact that the Irish Government had found the power which they were practically exercising at present was sufficient to deal with the matter.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department need not have apologized for the omission of these sections. The Irish Members only wished he would go a little further and strike out the whole clause.

Question put, and negatived; words struck out accordingly.

Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 99; Noes 26: Majority 73.—(Div. List, No. 157.)

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Secretary Sir William Harcourt.)

MR. HEALY said, that before the Motion was put he would like to remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department that the Committee had now waited more than a week, and they had not yet seen the clauses which the Government proposed to bring up with relation to combinations and associations.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had put the clauses on the Paper that night. Hon. Gentlemen would see them to-morrow.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

COPYRIGHT (MUSICAL COMPOSITIONS)

BILL.—[BILL 161.]

(Mr. Gorst, Mr. Arthur Balfour, Mr. Beresford Hope, Viscount Folkestone.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Printed notice restraining public performance).

Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE said, that before the clause was passed he would

Sir William Harcourt

move the addition of the words "of every edition and every published copy" after the word "cover," in line 13.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 13, to add, after the word "cover," the words "of every edition and of every published copy."—(Viscount Folkestone.)

Amendment agreed to; words added.

Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clause 2 (Action for penalties under 3 and 4 W. 4, c. 15, to be dismissed in certain cases).

Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE moved, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 19, to leave out "incumbent upon the proprietor of such copyright," and insert "necessary." The noble Viscount said, it did not appear to be generally understood that the owner of the copyright and the owner of the performing right were two distinct persons. If the word "necessary" were inserted, the clause would not point at the wrong person, as it did at present.

Amendment agreed to; word substituted.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE moved, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 21, to insert after "Act"— "Or that, in the case of musical compositions printed before the passing of this Act, and in which such right of public representation or performance and such copyright are not vested in the same person, and notice to the like effect has within six months after the passing of this Act been given by the person in whom such right of public representation or performance is vested to the person in whom for the time being such copyright is vested."

The noble Viscount said the object of the Amendment was that people who wished to sing a song, and who did not know in whom the right of public performance was vested, should have a ready means of ascertaining the fact. At present there were no means of ascertaining the fact; but under this Amendment it would be necessary that the person in whom the copyright was vested should keep a list in his shop, or place of business, of the names of those in whom the right of public performance was vested.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 21, after "Act," insert "or that, in the case of musical compositions printed before the passing of this Act, and in which such right of public representation or performance and such copyright are not vested in the same person, a notice to the like effect has within six months after the passing of this Act been given by the person in whom such right of public representation or performance is vested to the person in whom for the time being such copyright is vested."—(Viscount Folkestone.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. WHITLEY doubted whether the Amendment would really carry out the intention of the noble Viscount. It was proposed that notice should be given by the person in whom the right of public representation or performance was vested to the person in whom the copyright was vested.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE said, that that was not the person performing.

MR. WHITLEY said, assuming that a person had not given that notice at all, and brought an action for penalties—

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE said, it was only in regard to the performing right that they would wish that an action for penalties should be brought.

MR. GORST said, the Amendment carried out the object of the noble Viscount. The owners of the performing right in some cases were not the owners of the copyright, and a person who sang a song, if he wished to retain the performing right, would give notice to the person who owned the copyright. A person, therefore, to find out if a certain song could be sung, would have to go to the owner of the copyright for information. That was the law, whether it was a protected song or not.

Question put, and agreed to; words inserted.

Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

PETTY SESSIONS (IRELAND) BILL.

[Lords.].—[BILL 203.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he did not propose to offer any opposition to the second reading, and he only reserved to himself the right in Committee to move the omission of a couple of lines, so that the Act would allow anybody to appear to represent himself.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

HIGHWAY RATE AND EXPENDITURE BILL.

On Motion of Mr. DONSON, Bill to extend certain provisions of "The Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869," to the Highway Rate; and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. DONSON and Mr. HIBBERT. Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 209.]

House adjourned at half after
Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 20th June, 1882.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—

Lunacy Districts (Scotland)* (117); Interments (felo de se) (130); Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 2)* (134); Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 4)* (150); Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 6)* (135); Local Government Provisional Order (No. 7)* (145); Local Government Provisional Order (No. 8)* (146); Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 9)* (147); Local Government Provisional Order (No. 10)* (136); Local Government Provisional Order (No. 11)* (152); Local Government (Gas) Provisional Order* (144); Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (No. 2)* (132); Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (No. 3)* (133); Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (No. 5)* (153); Land Drainage Provisional Order* (131); Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders* (148); Tramways Provisional Orders (No. 3)* (149); Customs and Inland Revenue Buildings (Ireland)* (142).

Select Committee—Report—Roads Provisional Order (Edinburgh) (78).*

Committee—Tramways Provisional Orders (No. 2) (126).*

Committee—Report—Election of Representative Peers (Ireland) (137); Public Health (Fruit-Pickers' Lodgings)* (127); Local Government Provisional Order (Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings)* (121); Intermediate Education (Ireland)* (138).*

Third Reading—Elementary Education Provisional Orders Confirmation (Finchley, &c.) (63), and passed.*

INTERMENTS (FELO DE SE) BILL.

(The Earl Fortescue.)

(NO. 130.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL FORTESCUE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the Bill in question had already passed through the House of Commons without opposition. The former legal requirements for the burial of persons who had committed felo-de-se were well known. They had to be interred at the junction of four cross roads, with a stake driven through them, and without any religious service whatever. Most of these had been repealed nearly 50 years ago by an Act which admitted the suicide's corpse to the parish churchyard, but required interment to take place between 9 and 12 at night within 24 hours of the finding of the verdict; and that had been interpreted to mean privately by the police. Besides, a religious service would now be performed over them under the recent Burial Act. The object of the Bill was to allow persons who had committed suicide to be buried by their relatives instead of by the police, and at a reasonable hour instead of at night.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl Fortescue.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

PARLIAMENT — PUBLIC BUSINESS —
THE HOUSE OF LORDS—THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BILL.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN asked, Whether the Government would, in consideration of the present state of public business, introduce the Local Government Bill in the House of Lords? In reply to the noble Earl (the Earl of Onslow) some time ago, the Government had stated that the Bill would be brought in in the House of Commons; but during the interval which had elapsed circumstances over which they had no control had prevented Her Majesty's Government from introducing the measure. Unfruitful as was the last Session in legislation on subjects of general public interest, the present Session promised to be still more unfruitful. At the present time two important Irish Bills were preventing the progress of all other Business, and they were proceeding at a rate which might be compared with that of a yacht in a calm. It seemed probable that most of the important Bills announced in Her Majesty's Gracious Speech would not even be introduced in Parliament, and it seemed certain that they would not pass any legislation of public interest. No measure announced in the Speech from the Throne had attracted more attention than the Local Government Bill. It having been long recognized that our present system was in a state of confusion, several successive Governments had announced their intention of dealing with the subject, and a measure was very anxiously expected by the country. Any Bill that might be introduced must be thorough and comprehensive, and considerable time must be given to its consideration. If the Government hoped to legislate on the subject next Session, it would be well to bring in a measure without delay, so that Parliament and the country might have ample time to study its provisions. What reason, he asked, existed for refusing to introduce the measure in their Lordships' House, whose Members ought all to be well acquainted with the subject of local government? The question was not a Party one, and the present Government would, perhaps, be better able than the Party opposite to handle the subject efficiently, since it was generally recognized that the changes which ought to be made must interfere, to a considerable extent, with the privileges at present possessed by the magistrates. It was said that the Bill dealt with local taxation, and, therefore, was a Money Bill, and could only be brought in in the House of Commons. Well, the relations between the two Houses were well known, and the House of Commons could take care of its own privileges. The House of Commons had never shown itself either unwilling or unable to guard its privileges; and if that House was at any time of opinion that those privileges had been infringed by their Lordships dealing with a subject which might be supposed more peculiarly to belong to them, they had the remedy in their own hands—namely, that of throwing out the Bill sent down by their Lordships. Looking at the present condition of Business, he believed the House of Commons would think that their Lordships were performing a public service by discussing a question which could not but be of very great importance. The argument to which he had just adverted had often been disregarded, notably in the case of the Rivers Conservancy Bill, which was introduced in their Lordships' House, and by which it was proposed to tax every parish in the Kingdom. Seeing that, from the stagnation of Business in the House of Commons, the Local Government Bill could not be introduced there, he begged to ask the Government whether they would not give their Lordships an opportunity of considering it?

LORD CARRINGTON said, that a month ago, when the noble Earl (the Earl of Onslow) brought this question before the notice of their Lordships, he did not attempt to argue as to facts; but, anticipating the answer he was about to receive, he sought to demolish the arguments on which he thought it would be based; and it appeared to him the noble Earl (the Earl of Camperdown) had proceeded upon the same lines. The noble Earl had adduced as an argument in support of his request the fact that the Rivers Conservancy Bill was introduced in their Lordships' House. But that Bill dealt with other matters besides the question of local taxation—the conservancy of rivers, for instance, and the prevention of floods; and the clauses relating to local taxation were sent to the other House in red ink. But the most conclusive answer to his noble Friend's contention was the statement made in "another place" by the Prime Minister, who declared, on April 24, that the Bill could not be proceeded with this Session. It should be remembered that the County Government Bill, which the Government intended at one time to introduce, would create in counties a new authority analogous to that now existing in municipal boroughs, who would be intrusted with the management of the whole county finance. It had also been contemplated, in connection with the measure, to make proposals with regard to the most provident form of contribution from Imperial funds in aid of local charges. The raising and management of local taxation were the principal features of the measure; and, therefore, he submitted that the introduction of the Bill in their Lordships' House would not be consistent with precedent.

EARL STANHOPE said, he regretted that the Government had not introduced in their Lordships' House any Bill of first-rate importance. He regretted the fact the more, because their Lordships had agreed to sit an hour earlier in the day than formerly, in order to have ample time in which to transact Business. If the Bill to which attention had been drawn by the noble Earl opposite could not be introduced in that House, why not introduce in it the Bankruptcy Bill, or some of the other measures of importance mentioned in the Speech from the Throne? No Assembly was better fitted than their Lordships' House, which contained so many learned Lords celebrated for their legal knowledge, to discuss such a Bill as the Bankruptcy Bill. He thought it a hard thing that they should sit there day after day with their arms folded without having any Business brought before them. He wished to know whether the Government intended to give their Lordships any work to do this Session?

EARL GRANVILLE said, he was aware that reasonable complaint was made in connection with the subject of the non-introduction of Bills in that House. It was a complaint which had been made in the last few Sessions, and frequently before. Lord Aberdeen in 1853 said that the complaint had been continually made since the commencement of the present century. His Colleagues in the Ministry were aware how often he had implored them to allow certain Bills to be introduced in their Lordships' House. Unfortunately, good reasons were always given against that step. Those good reasons existed even in the case of the Conservative Government, which, though it had a large majority in their Lordships' House, had always felt it expedient that more Bills should be introduced in the House of Commons than in the House of Lords.

THE CHANNEL TUNNEL SCHEME.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he only rose for the purpose of asking his noble Friend

(the Earl of Morley) to fulfil the promise he had made in the early part of the Session, when he (Viscount Bury) had put several Questions regarding the progress of the Channel Tunnel. The noble Earl had always said that a Technical Committee was sitting at the War Office, that the whole matter was being brought before them, and that as soon as they had reported their Lordships should know the result of their deliberations. He wished, therefore, to ask for the production of that Report. No doubt most of their Lordships were aware of the sense in which the Committee had reported. It was matter of notoriety amongst all those—and they were a large number—who had taken a great interest in the question of the construction of the Tunnel. He would only suggest to his noble Friend that they should not be supplied with a part, but with the Report of the Committee in its entirety.

THE EARL OF MORLEY: My Lords, I am not at present in a position to give a categorical answer to the noble Lord's Question. The Report to which he refers is now under the consideration of the military authorities of the War Office, and until they have expressed their opinions upon it, it is impossible to determine whether it should be presented to Parliament or not; and if it is presented, whether it should be given in its entirety, as I need not point out to the noble Lord that some portions of the Report are of a very confidential character. I am not surprised at the interest which my noble Friend and the country take in the question, and I can only say that what information can be given to the House, when the opinions of the military authorities have been taken, will be presented, with any other Papers which can be communicated to Parliament. At the same time, I must observe that I did not make the promise the noble Viscount has referred to. I only promised that the whole subject should be fully considered, and that the Report should be presented in a form most consistent with the interests of the Public Service.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he was not at all satisfied with the answer the noble Earl had given, and he should be compelled, if their Lordships did not get the information that he asked for, to make a Motion on the subject.

Viscount Bury

EGYPT—THE RIOTS AT ALEXANDRIA —REPARATION TO BRITISH SUBJECTS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM, in rising to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What measures Her Majesty's Government have taken or intend to take to exact reparation for the murder and outrage of British subjects in Alexandria, and for the future security of the lives and property of our fellow-countrymen in Egypt? said, their Lordships were only too well aware of the grave state of affairs in Egypt, and of the catastrophe which had occurred at Alexandria, in which the lives of more than 200 Europeans had been sacrificed, and in which British subjects had been outraged and slaughtered under the guns of the British Fleet. Thus valuable lives had been sacrificed and the national flag insulted. That unfortunate circumstance had caused a great panic among the European population, and last week had witnessed the terrible spectacle of the whole European population flying from the country, and undergoing all the distress incidental to such an event. It would not be the proper occasion on which to enter upon the various considerations which might be brought forward in a debate upon this subject, or to enter into the causes which led to this disaster; but he might be permitted to remark that much of the evils which had occurred and of the misfortunes which had arisen might, in his humble judgment, be attributed to the departure by Her Majesty's Government from the traditional policy of this country, the policy of Lord Aberdeen and of Lord Palmerston, a policy which was ably carried out by Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, and which was continued under the Administration of Lord Beaconsfield—namely, that we should maintain the independence and integrity of the Turkish Empire. They had allowed the peace of that country to be disturbed and the rights of the Sultan in Egypt to be interfered with; in other words, they had allowed him to be stripped of his Sovereign rights over a very large part of his Empire. Her Majesty's present Advisers had recognized the loss by Turkey of her Sovereignty in Tunis, and so, in his opinion, they had alienated the Government of Turkey. At all events, that policy had not the effect of conciliating that Government, and he believed it had engendered feelings of hostility to us on the part of the population of the Turkish Dominions. With regard to the immediate cause of this outbreak, it must be matter of regret to everyone that the policy of Her Majesty's Government in the East had not been successful. One main condition of that policy was the dismissal and banishment of Arabi Pasha; but that condition had been treated with contempt. In his opinion, the Government had no right to make demands without the means of enforcing them, or without providing the necessary machinery for that purpose. The result had been that this country had lost the prestige and power which it formerly possessed. But it was, perhaps, more important now to inquire what were the measures which Her Majesty's Government proposed to take in the present circumstances. Statements had been made in "another place" which were vague and uncertain. They knew from the noble Earl (Earl Granville) that Her Majesty's Government had augmented the Fleet and had provided transports for fugitives; but apart from that no statement had been made as to the means which had been taken to meet the requirements of the case, and to secure the safety of those who remained in Egypt. They knew that Her Majesty's Government had proposed a Conference, and he believed the proposal had been accepted by the other Powers. But had it come to this—that we were to look to a Conference of the European Powers to demand the adoption of those measures which the outrage and murder of our fellow-countrymen called for? Was the Conference to exact reparation for the murder of British subjects, and to assess the compensation which she was entitled to claim? He considered that to adopt such a course, instead of at once demanding and insisting on reparation, would be to dishonour the country. He believed the Government of England was the best judge and the only authority that had a right to demand reparation for the injury done to British subjects. He would not pursue the subject further. Other opportunities would, no doubt, occur for bringing forward the subject. But he hoped their Lordships would learn that Her Majesty's Government were determined to take more vigorous measures, and that they would not allow the honour and prestige, the influence and the power of England to be sacrificed, or England any further to be humiliated. He hoped also that steps would be taken to secure the property of Europeans in Egypt, considering that it was the high road to our Indian Empire. The noble Earl concluded by asking the Question which stood on the Paper in his name.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, the noble Earl has asked the Question of which he has given Notice, and he has added a certain amount of argument, which he was perfectly entitled to do. I have ventured to urge upon your Lordships, and it appeared to be generally acquiesced in by the House, that it was not desirable that the general policy of the Government with regard to Egypt should be debated piecemeal. There were, however, one or two subjects on which the noble Earl touched with regard to which I will make a few remarks. The noble Earl attributed all that has happened to our having departed from the policy of previous Governments as to the maintenance of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire. My Lords, I will only say that on coming into the Government we found the integrity of the Ottoman Empire somewhat diminished by arrangements immediately owing to former circumstances and to the provisions of the Treaty of Berlin. Our policy was to carry out the arrangements of that Treaty; but beyond that we have endeavoured, as our policy shows, to maintain entirely the integrity of the Ottoman Empire as defined by that Treaty, and it is certainly not with regard to Egypt that Her Majesty's Government have been at all slack to maintain the tie existing between the Sovereign of Egypt and Egypt itself, or in any way helped to diminish the Sovereignty of the Sultan. There was another point on which the noble Earl touched, and in which I entirely agree with him. It was this—that with regard to outrages on British subjects and loss of their lives or property, we have not to address other countries, but have a right to judge ourselves what satisfaction or reparation we want. Sir Edward Malet has been instructed to make it clearly understood that Her Majesty's Government will require full reparation and satisfaction for the outrages committed during the late disorder at Alexandria. Notice will be given to all British subjects in Egypt to register at the Consulate the claims they may have to put forward, and a similar Notice will be given to the relatives of those who have been unfortunately killed. My Lords, instructions have been given to the Admiral which we believe will be sufficient in case any further disturbance takes place at Alexandria, and we have been informed by the French Government that they have also given instructions to their Admiral to concert with ours the measures that would be taken in this contingency. I believe I have now answered the Question of the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, I hope I shall not be accused of a desire to embarrass the Government on such a delicate question as this if I venture to supplement the remarks of my noble Friend (the Earl of Feversham); particularly as the answer of the noble Earl opposite did not quite completely meet the Question asked by my noble Friend. My noble Friend asked, as I read his Question, for information on three distinct points—first, as regards reparation for the murder of British subjects; secondly, as regards loss of property; and, thirdly, as to the security to be taken for the future. Now, the question of compensation enters into two of these subjects—the loss of life and the loss of property. For the first of these it is, unhappily, impossible to make adequate compensation, and it is hardly possible even that compensation should be made of such a nature and form as to give any satisfaction for such losses; but, as regards compensation for loss of property, that, of course, is a different matter. I gather from the noble Earl opposite that an application has been made on this subject, and that some communication, of which I do not distinctly understand the nature, is to pass, or has passed, by means of the British Consul. It seems to me, however, that there is this very considerable difficulty, and that we must ask the question from whom is this compensation to be claimed? There can be but three persons to whom such a claim can be addressed. Is it Tewfik? He may have the best will in the world, but he has no power. We have pledged ourselves to his support, and, recognizing him as the de facto and de jure

Earl Granville

Ruler of Egypt, it would be only conformable to practice that our application should be made to him; but, as I have said, he is powerless and is a fugitive from his own capital. Is it, in the second place, Arabi to whom you will make application? He has the power, no doubt; but he is the sworn enemy both of England and of France, and it seems to me that you are hardly in a position to address such a demand to one whom you have constantly denounced and whose banishment you require. Is it, then, in the third place, from the Sultan, as Suzerain, that you require compensation? No doubt you have a fair case for going to him; but, if you do so, you restore him to a position in which, as I should have thought, the Government would not wish to place him. But from one of these three parties compensation, if obtained, must come; and this is the question which Her Majesty's Government must seriously consider. But it is necessary not only to exact reparation for what has been done, but also to consider what measures are to be taken for preventing any future outrages to life and property. Unless you do this effectually, not only do you expose the country to the danger of recurring disorder, but you run the risk of destroying those resources from which your reparation is to come. At present trade is paralyzed in Egypt, banks are shut up, and postal communications, I presume, no longer follow the accustomed route. I read in the newspaper to-day that the telegraph to Cairo has been stopped, and that all the telegraph functionaries have left. Then, again, you have to take security for the safety of the lighthouses along the Red Sea, on which such enormous interests depend. That, I hope, has not escaped the attention of Her Majesty's Government. Lastly, there is the question of the Suez Canal and its maintenance and preservation from injury. Last night I heard the declaration of the Government that they were truly alive to the importance of this question; but I read the other day a statement which, if true, was, at least, singular on the part of the Prime Minister, that it was hardly possible to do any serious mischief to the Canal. But those who at all understand the nature of the Canal, and the risks to which it is exposed at such a time as this, will be at a loss to know how such a statement could be made. As regards permanent injury, it may, of course, require a long time to accomplish it; but as regards temporary injury, everyone who knows the nature of the Canal is aware that it might be easily blocked, and that the passage might be stopped for several weeks. It was only to-day that I heard that a very serious block has occurred in the Canal; that the pilots have taken their departure, and that ships at one end—and I believe at the other also—are assembled in large numbers unable to pass through. These are all very serious matters arising out of the Question of my noble Friend, and they have not been met by the answer given by the noble Earl opposite. There is one other point on which I must touch. The noble Earl mentions that transports have been provided for the refugees, and, no doubt, it is very wise and proper to take this step; but if what I have heard is true, a very large number of these refugees are bound for British territory in Malta and elsewhere, and I should be glad to know whether any measures have been taken for providing them with sustenance and the means of life. I need only add that I quite recognize the force of the appeal of the noble Earl and his argument that it is unwise to embarrass the Government; but, at the same time, the Government must remember that we have had remarkably little information vouchsafed to us on this subject, and that, if they had any success to point to, the House would bear their reticence better than it does at the present moment. The Papers that have been presented record only what occurred a few months ago, and have no value as regards current events or present difficulties; and we can get no information with regard to that which is essential at the present moment to the honour and interests of the country.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, in answer to the Question which the noble Earl had put with regard to the refugees there, that he had telegraphed to the Governor of Malta and to the Commissioner of Cyprus, to which places, no doubt, large numbers of British subjects were proceeding, and those officials would take such steps as were necessary, as had been done in the recent case of the refugees from Tunis. He declined to follow the noble Earl in his remarks upon the political situation, because he must say that, on a subject so grave as this, piecemeal discussion, arising out of an answer to a Question, was not at all likely to advance the interests of the country.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Our complaint, my Lords, is that we can only discuss this question in a piecemeal manner until we have before us the Papers on which alone a discussion can be based; and, unfortunately, on this occasion Her Majesty's printer is the close ally of Her Majesty's Government. If the business of the printing office went on as rapidly as affairs in Egypt, and if the printer were as energetic as Arabi Pasha, I should at once recognize the wisdom of the objections urged by the Government; but as things are, I must say that either the printer or the Government is trying the patience of both Houses of Parliament in putting off the discussion of a question in which the country is beginning to feel a most intense interest, and which nearly concerns vast numbers of Her Majesty's subjects. I am sure that the answers given by the noble Earl opposite will appear to many whose whole future is bound up in the issue which this question may take as scarcely worthy of the gravity of the subject.

[The subject then dropped.]

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND)—THE LANDLORDS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD asked the Lord Privy Seal (Lord Cairlingford)—First, In what form Her Majesty's Government have ordered daily Returns to be sent in to Dublin Castle of evictions, with opinions thereon of the magistrates and police as to whether they are cases of hardship or not; Secondly, when such order came into force, and what steps are taken by the magistrates and police so as to enable them to form a correct judgment on the matter; Thirdly, whether the landlords and others interested are given any opportunity of explanation before a Return is sent in on which a public official charge that they have acted in a cruel and unpatriotic manner may be founded; Fourthly, whether Her Majesty's Government will take care that outrages are not encouraged by hasty censures passed upon those who appeal to the law for the assertion of their legal rights? He put those Questions in consequence of a statement made in "another place" during last week by the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. He should, in the first place, like to draw the attention of their Lordships to a speech by the Prime Minister, made, he believed, in October last, in which he made what was considered a most cruel and unjustifiable charge of cowardice against the Irish landlords. The matter was of so much importance that he would read the Prime Minister's words. He said—

"That other unhappy fact is the traditional sluggishness and incapacity of the wealthier portions of society in Ireland to do anything whatever for themselves."

And further on he said—

"A general cowardice seems to prevail among all the classes who possess property, and Government is expected to preserve the peace with no moral force behind them. That is the great scandal and evil of Ireland, and until the evil is removed the condition of Ireland will not be thoroughly sound and healthy."

Since the delivery of that speech the landlords had been, as they thought, supporting the Government by enforcing their legal rights, which the Prime Minister believed they ought to do; but the Chief Secretary for Ireland had lately called them "cruel and unpatriotic" for doing so. During the winter the landlords were led to believe that it was their absolute duty to enforce their legal rights, and that by doing so they would materially assist the Government in putting down the Land League. This was after the issue of the "no rent" manifesto. The landlords had since asked, not for the whole of their rents, but for a portion of them, some payment on account, and they were now called "cruel and unpatriotic" for doing what the Government in the first instance had recommended them to do. The Chief Secretary stated that the magistrates and the police were to send in reports to Dublin Castle, on hearsay evidence, gathered in a hostile country, as to whether evictions were cases of hardship or no. He (the Marquess of Waterford) maintained, considering the present condition of Ireland, and that the people were entirely hostile to the landlords, that it would be difficult for even a Court of Law to find out whether an eviction was a case of hardship or not, especially when they knew what power the Irish tenant had of hiding his money. He trusted the Lord Privy Seal would tell them what opportunities landlords would have of rebutting the accusations made against them. Apparently the police would make these reports and send them into Dublin Castle, and the poor landlords would not be allowed to say a word in their own defence. No men had ever been so outrageously ill-used. Their property had been confiscated by the Government, notwithstanding it was stated by the Government that the Act would not have that effect. Many of them had nothing to live on except their rents; and many of them had not received them for several years. Mortgagees and others holding charges were now pressing them to pay. After two good seasons they asked the tenants to pay something on account or else to give up the land; and then they were called "cruel and unpatriotic." It was a monstrous thing that such imputations should be cast upon the landlords of Ireland. A few among them might have acted harshly; but they were a small minority. A landlord would not be such a fool as to evict a tenant when he knew he could not get another in his place. They all knew the state of Ireland at the present time, and that the Land League prevented tenants taking farms from which others had been evicted, and, therefore, what could induce a landlord to evict a tenant if he had no chance of getting any rent from him at all? He hoped the noble Lord would answer the Questions fully, because he thought they were of the utmost importance. The last one was of special importance, because he feared that if hasty and unjust censure was cast by the Chief Secretary on those who up to the present time had been in the very gravest danger of outrage and assassination, it would not much conduce to their safety, nor would it conduce to the decrease in the number of outrages in Ireland, which he was certain the noble Lord and Her Majesty's Government were so anxious to bring about.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRIVY SEAL): My Lords, I am willing and anxious to answer the Questions of my noble Friend as fully and as accurately as I can. First, as to the Returns of evictions, about which the noble Lord inquires; these Returns of evictions are nothing new. There is no novelty of any consequence that I know of in these Returns, or in their form. It has been the duty of the Constabulary for years past, under an article of their Code, to report all cases of evictions to the Inspector General, and upon forms that have been long in use. These forms, I find, were made somewhat fuller, so as to comprise a greater number of particulars, by the late Mr. Burke about a year ago. These Returns have included the statements of the police as to the nature and circumstances of the evictions, so far as they could learn. The instruction upon that point is contained in these words—

“The statement is to comprise information as to the circumstances of the cases, the causes of the evictions, and whether they produce hardship or lead to excitement in the neighbourhood.”

These Returns are made to the Inspector General. So far as concerns the mere number of evictions, they come every day before the authorities in the office, and when the Inspector General finds anything special in a case he sends it to the Chief Secretary or the Under Secretary, calling attention to the statement of the police as to the circumstances of the eviction. Of course, if the Government had their attention called to a special case they would ask for the Return. The system, I understand, has been in operation for a long time. In the same way the Resident Magistrates report every week upon the general state of the districts or the county or counties over which they have charge, and, among other matters, give an account of the evictions that have taken place, expressing their opinions as to the character of them. I have looked through a number of these Police Reports, and they strike me as being singularly impartial. I have found in them no trace of animus on the part of the police in the descriptions they give of the character of the evictions. These statements of the police have been made use of over and over again for purposes quite different from those to which the noble Lord has called attention. They have been made use of for showing the undue and improper resistance that has been made to the payment of rent legally due on the part of many Irish tenants, and to prove the influence of the Land League in that direction, and the progress of the “no rent” movement. When these reports, of which complaint has hastily been made, were used for other purposes, they were trusted as evidence of the facts. I believe they were good evidence, and I believe they are equally trustworthy evidence as to cases of eviction. I find that in cases of reported hardship reasons are given for believing that they are such. My noble Friend is aware that, generally speaking, the police have sufficient means of knowing what is going on. On the other hand, I find numerous cases in which the police report facts that are very unfavourable to the tenant, showing that the landlord has been justified in asserting his rights, and that the tenants have been unduly and improperly, very often under external influence, resisting those rights. The Irish Government are of opinion that, on the whole, these reports are trustworthy, and can be depended upon as much in one direction as in the other. What I have stated has answered the first two Questions. As to the other Question, I have to say, on the part of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that he never intended to pass any censure, hasty or otherwise, upon the landlords merely because they appealed to the law in the assertion of their legal rights. As my noble Friend has reminded us, the Government more than once expressed the opinion that the Irish landlords ought to enforce their legal and just rights. We did not question it for a moment; but my right hon. Friend, on the basis of official information, referred to certain cases of hardship in this matter of evictions. I have to say, on his authority, that the phrase which he used, and which has been often repeated, was not correctly reported. He spoke on one of those days on which a good deal of condensation takes place, and the phrase which he used did not apply directly to the landlords. The phrase he used was this. He said “that these cases of hardship in evictions, of which he believed a certain number had taken place, were cruel to the Executive Government.” He used the phrase in the sense that they increased those difficulties which already press so enormously on the Government. My noble Friend may rest assured that neither the Chief Secretary nor any other Member of Her Majesty’s Government contests the perfect right of Irish landlords to assert their just rights; but, undoubtedly, in the present condition of Ireland, the assertion of those just rights does require great consideration, great prudence, and great humanity.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: My Lords, I have here the quotation to which I referred. According to the report in The Times, the Chief Secretary for Ireland said—

“He deeply regretted that there were landlords who did not adopt the attitude of the hon. Member for Carrickfergus, and who, at a time when the Executive was grappling with a situation of extreme difficulty, asserted their rights in a cruel and unpatriotic manner.”

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRIVY SEAL): My Lords, I have a positive assertion from my right hon. Friend that he said “cruel to the Executive Government.”

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN said, he wished to know whether he rightly understood the Lord Privy Seal to say that no fresh orders to the police had been issued? His impression was that some new instructions had been given to the police to report as to evictions, whether they inflicted hardship or not. But even if the police made exactly the same reports that they had always made, he submitted that at the present moment it would be very injudicious that such reports should be relied upon, or should give rise to any action on the part of the Government, because, although in ordinary circumstances the police and the magistrates might possibly be able to form a just opinion as to whether hardship was inflicted or not, he maintained that it was absolutely impossible for them to do so now. Matters had been entirely altered by the circumstances in which the landlords were placed. What might be thought unjust if a landlord were not hard pressed would be legitimate and right if he and his family were in circumstances of great difficulty, and compelled to get the land in their own hands or to obtain their rents. Under the circumstances, great injustice might be done if the reports of the police were considered to be reliable at the present time. All Irish landlords, he felt sure, would be only too pleased if an inquiry could be made into their conduct at the present time and during the last two years. He did not think any information that was worth anything could be gathered from the reports which were now handed in by the police.

Lord Carlingford

The position of Irish landlords was very peculiar and very difficult. They did not know how to act. At one time they were twitted by prominent Members of the Liberal Party because they ran away, and at other times they were told that they caused great inconvenience to the Executive Government because they did not exercise their rights more strictly. These were two very different views, and it seemed impossible to know how Irish landlords were to conduct themselves so as to please the various Members of the present Government. The one thing they did not appear to be allowed to do was to exercise those rights which the law of their country had yet left them. The Lord Privy Seal said the Government wished to see the landlords exercising their legal and just rights; but the difficulty was to get unanimity of opinion as to what was just in the matter. It appeared to him that the landlords, as long as the law allowed them to make use of certain means to obtain what was due to them or to get back their property into their own hands, had a perfect right to exercise those means. There were many other difficulties in the way of Irish landlords. It appeared to him that their position was often misunderstood and misrepresented in this country. He had seen their conduct compared with that of the English landlords. It had been asserted that the Irish landlords had not made allowance for bad seasons, and had not treated their tenants in the same way as English landlords did. But the circumstances of the two countries were altogether different. In Ireland it was impossible for a landlord to know whether a reduction was really wanted by a tenant or not. In England, on the other hand, there were many circumstances from which a landlord could ascertain this. In England, if a tenant found himself unable to pay his rent, he took his money out of the farm and went away. This was never done in Ireland. Again, the difficulty was increased in consequence of the action of the Land League and the “no rent” manifesto. How was it possible for any human being to ascertain for certain whether a tenant could or could not pay his rent, seeing that, in point of fact, a great number of tenants who could pay did not pay? There were cases, no doubt, in which hardship was inflicted by landlords in Ireland. Some landlords, irritated by the conduct of Her Majesty's Government and by other causes, might exercise their rights very harshly; but the victims of such injustice had only to thank the Land League and those advisers who had recommended them to pay no rent. He was very glad to hear the Lord Privy Seal give some explanation of the extraordinary expression used in Parliament by the Chief Secretary. He was glad to find that the right hon. Gentleman did not consider the Irish landlords were cruel to their tenants, but only thought they were cruel to the Executive. Still, he did not believe that the Irish landlords were cruel, even in that limited sense. The noble Lord had not shown why they should be supposed to be unpatriotic. He could understand, indeed, that they were unpatriotic from the Nationalist or Separatist point of view; but from the point of view of the Union between the two countries, he could not see how their conduct had been unpatriotic. Could anything be more injudicious than the words spoken by the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, even under the construction put upon them by the noble Lord? They were only to be equalled by some of the expressions as to Ireland which had fallen from the lips of the Prime Minister.

EARL COWPER: First of all, my Lords, I wish to make one or two remarks on the Police Returns, as to whether there is hardship or not in cases of eviction. I can assure the noble Lord who spoke last that if the reports err at all, they err, on the whole, in the other direction from what he assumes. I think they are, on the whole, very impartial. In these days evictions cannot be carried out in a hole-and-corner manner, but an account of them appears in the papers. These reports go far to prove how false some of the newspaper reports were, and to show that the landlords did not behave so badly as a great portion of the Press tried to make out. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Waterford) said that two different charges had been brought against the landlords of Ireland. I am not here to defend the language of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. I do not even remember what the words were; but, as far as I can judge, the explanation given of them removes any blame which might be attached to the right hon. Gentleman for the language he is reported to have used. I do think there have been cases of considerable harshness in Ireland. The noble Marquess is a most excellent and conciliatory landlord, and has never acted harshly towards his tenants, and I do not think there is any one of your Lordships who has property in Ireland of whom the same thing might not be said. But I think all who know the country will admit that there have been cases, particularly in the crowded parts of the West and North-West of Ireland, where the people have been absolutely unable to pay, were in a state of starvation, with nothing else in the world to turn to, and hopelessly in arrear, and have been turned out in a heartless manner. It may be true that it might be much better in the long run that these estates should be cleared, and only those for whom there is room allowed to remain; but this should be done in a cautious and kind manner, provision being made for those who are removed. Similar difficulties from overcrowding had arisen in the Highlands of Scotland, and some of the proprietors had emigrated the people in a kind and careful manner—no doubt at considerable expense—and very small thanks they got for it. All that is a matter of history. We know also that many landed proprietors in Ireland have behaved in a very kind manner towards their tenants; but it is certainly true that there have been cases of hardship among the tenants. I think in these days, when there is such a cry against the landlords, that they ought to be the first to dissociate themselves from those who have behaved in an unpatriotic manner. While, on the one hand, the Government have had to complain of the harshness of some landlords, in others there has been observable a certain amount of laxity and want of combination. That, I think, is what the Prime Minister referred to. There have been many cases in which men have allowed their tenants to remain without paying rent when they were perfectly able to pay. There have been other cases in which notice has been given that proceedings would be taken against tenants able to pay, a force of police and soldiers have been brought together, a great deal of trouble has been taken by the Executive, and at the last moment the landlord, for some unexplained and inexplicable reason, has drawn back. In many cases it would have materially assisted the Government if the landlords in disturbed parts of the country had agreed among themselves and made an example of the tenants in certain districts; but, for want of combination, that has not been done. I am bound to say that if a landlord who had tenants who were perfectly well able to pay, and whose rents were fair and just, had, in combination with his neighbours, made an example of the ringleaders in the "no rent" movement, he would have done a good thing for himself and a service to the country and to the cause of law and order. My Lords, I will not detain you further, but will only observe that, though among a large body of men there must be some who act in one way and some in another, yet I am happy to say that there is a great number who have acted in a just and firm and, at the same time, conciliatory manner, and are well deserving of thanks for what they have done.

LORD INCHQUIN said, that the statement of the Chief Secretary for Ireland was made last Wednesday, and though some days had elapsed there had been no explanation or contradiction given to it, though the statement had been circulated throughout the country. The effect of such a statement would be greatly to increase crime and outrage, and therefore it required the strongest condemnation. When the Chief Secretary saw the way in which he was reported he should have taken the earliest opportunity of contradicting it. With regard to the answer of the Lord Privy Seal, he should like to ask upon what grounds the police proceeded when they stated that a particular eviction was a harsh one or the reverse, for he believed that no application was ever made either to the landlords or their agents to make any report to the police on the subject? It was only fair that the reports sent to Dublin Castle should contain both sides of the question. As to the general condition of the country, he might mention a case which occurred to himself the other day. A tenant of his who owed him £500 had been pressed over and over again for the amount, but declined to pay. Last year an ejectment decree was issued against him, but withdrawn. This year a decree was obtained, and men were got down from Dublin to execute it; but the very next day the brother-in-law of the tenant came forward and paid £400 out of the £500. This clearly showed the difficulty of deciding before a man was turned out of his holding whether he had money or not. It was well known that there was a great deal of money deposited by the tenants in the savings banks, on which they were obtaining interest. With respect to evictions, the Lord Privy Seal appeared to forget that the County Court Judges possessed a power of staying evictions, and that that power was constantly exercised. The noble Earl the late Lord Lieutenant had blamed the Irish landlords for not combining to resist the "no rent" movement. He could say for the County Clare that the landlords of that district did their utmost to combine so far as possible; but no one who had not experienced it could understand the difficult and dangerous position in which they were placed. When he rode into his own county town, every country gentleman he saw came accompanied by his escort of soldiers or police. It was impossible for the landlords to combine with regard to evictions in the manner suggested by the noble Earl. He maintained that the landlords had behaved in a most patriotic manner; in every case they had been as lenient as they could towards their tenants, while doing their utmost to put an end to the combinations used against them. He would repeat that the language used by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland was deserving of the severest condemnation. The non-payment of rent caused evictions, not for inability to pay, but because the tenants acted upon the advice given to them by the Land League.

Earl Cowper

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE pointed out the dangers by which Irish landlords were surrounded, and the difficulties in the way of their doing more than they had done to act in combination against the forces opposed to them. Even speaking in their Lordships' House was dangerous, for the Irish papers circulated among the people garbled extracts from their speeches, combined with the grossest possible abuse and misrepresentation. Up to the time of the new departure, the Irish landlords certainly did not think that the government was carried out as it ought to be, or that the Executive showed sufficient force and energy; but they found the tenants were beginning to be tired of what was going on, and were coming in to pay whatever rent they could, and also to make arrangements for future rents with their landlords. Since the new policy had been introduced, however—since the “suspects” had been released and the Arrears Bill introduced—there had been hardly a shilling of rent paid, and few, if any, men would make agreements. He thought it was a great hardship that some tenants should be forced to be evicted merely because other people would not pay their rents. He knew of one case in which 30 notices of eviction were served, and 29 of the tenants came forward just when they were being turned out and paid every shilling that was due from them. The 30th tenant showed the money and said, “You may have the land.” It was the unfortunate vacillating policy of Her Majesty’s Government, constantly changing front, and constantly causing new expectations to be entertained by the tenants, that had increased, and would continue to increase if it was still adhered to, the unfortunate and disastrous state of Ireland which at present existed.

LORD VENTRY said, if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had only used the words which had been attributed to him by his noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal (Lord Carlisle), and not those which had been reported in the newspapers, he thought the Chief Secretary ought, in justice to the landlords of Ireland, have taken the earliest available opportunity of explaining what it was he said, or intended to say. That was more especially the case because there were at the present time so many charges flying about against Irish landlords, in reference to evictions, both in the public Press and on public platforms. The parties who made those charges were ready at once to turn to account any words uttered by a Member of the Government which helped them, or any of the exaggerated reports which they circulated; and in proof of this he would read an extract from a letter sent to the Press by Dr. Donnelly, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Clogher, in reference to the Rossmore Estate. In that letter, Dr. Donnelly said—

“Writs are being issued on the Rossmore Estate for rent and arrears. Everyone knows that the tenants are unable to pay, so the enforcement by Lord Rossmore of his legal right means the entire destruction and annihilation of the unfortunate tenants.”

The County Inspector of Constabulary in that district subsequently called at the Estate Office to make inquiries as to what was going on, and he supposed the fact of the Inspector having done so would throw some light on the means which were being taken by Her Majesty’s Government to obtain information as to the action of the Irish landlords in these matters. In the statement addressed by the agent of the estate subsequently to the County Inspector, the following explanation occurred:—At the time Dr. Donnelly wrote the letter to the Press only three writs at the suit of the landlord had been issued on the estate for six months previous; and, as a matter of fact, only seven writs had been served on the tenants during the last 10 years. Now, he thought, when such sweeping charges were made upon such slender grounds, and were being sown broadcast throughout the country, that Members of Her Majesty’s Government ought to be very cautious how they let fall a word which could strengthen the hands of those who made such charges. With respect to the general question of evictions, speaking of the district with which he was best acquainted, he could say that there had been nothing in the conduct of the landlords generally in that county to call for such reprobation as had been passed upon their acts. He did not believe that their conduct had been either cruel or unpatriotic, either towards Her Majesty’s Government or towards their tenants. He believed that they had evicted in many cases; but he also believed that they had abstained from taking any steps in numberless cases where they would have been perfectly justified in acting differently. He would not detain their Lordships any further upon the subject.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, it appeared to him to be a very serious thing that an arbitrary report should be made by the police of the cases which came under their notice. It might be that the report was favourable to the landlord; but, on the other hand, it might be very unfavourable, and that report went up to the Irish Executive, and the landlord in question had not the least power in the world to make a contradiction.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRIVY SEAL) : Nor have the tenants.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, that was the case; but the tenant, being on the spot, was more likely to have a chance of contradicting the report than the landlord. What he wanted to ask his noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal was, whether the Government could not manage to produce those reports? He should like to know what the reports were; and he could not see that there could be any objection to producing them.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRIVY SEAL) : I do not know that I can add anything to the information which I have already given to your Lordships, and to what has already been said by my noble Friend the late Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (Earl Cowper) as to the nature of these reports. As to the reports themselves, there is nothing new in them. As to the production of those reports to Parliament, that, I think, would be quite inconsistent with their nature. I entirely concur in all that was said by my noble Friend the noble Earl behind me (Earl Cowper) as to the impartiality of those reports, and as to their general bearing, and I also agree with my noble Friend that in very numerous cases they must have had the effect of correcting exaggerated and unfair reports against the landlords.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : My Lords, I do not think that the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal has entirely comprehended the evil of which my noble Friend (the Marquis of Waterford) complains. The Irish landlords at the present moment are the objects of a great deal of very vigorous popular censure. It is said some of them are very bad, and many of them are very good. I cannot quite agree with the view of the noble Lord the late Viceroy of Ireland, that we ought to be anxious to disconnect ourselves from the Irish landlords.

EARL COWPER : Will the noble Marquess pardon me. What I said was that the good Irish landlords ought to disconnect themselves from the bad ones, and not that we in England ought to disconnect ourselves from the Irish landlords.

The Earl of Donoughmore

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : I am glad to hear the noble Lord make the correction; but I think it is right to recollect in connection with the Irish landlords that if some of them, and perhaps some of the poorer class, have taken a purely commercial view of their position—if they resolved to treat the money which they expended on their property as a pure investment—they may have done wisely or foolishly, but they have, no doubt, followed the teaching of Parliament itself. They were induced to make these investments at a time when a different philosophy prevailed, when the doctrines of political economy were in force. They were induced to make these investments in the belief which Parliament then entertained, that the application of purely commercial principles to land in Ireland would tend greatly to cure all the evils under which that country suffered—that the application of these principles would have the effect of pushing out a population that could not properly live there, and would induce men to invest capital in the country; and that the ordinary results of the investment of capital, the establishment of a proper equilibrium between the population and the resources of the country, would relieve the chronic poverty, and, with that, its political difficulties would disappear. That, I believe, was the view held by both political Parties 30 years ago, and it was under that belief that the Encumbered Estates Act was passed. It was at the invitation of Parliament that small capitalists from different parts of Ireland and England invested their property in land in Ireland. Yet, after being told by the Judge of the Encumbered Estates Court that the rents might be raised—when they act in accordance with the principles which have been accepted from generation to generation by every body of statesmen, and by every writer who has dealt with the question of Irish difficulties—when they act on their undoubted legal rights, they find that Parliament turns round and rejects as folly the philosophy which it preached before, and that unfortunate landlords who have invested their all in this land at the invitation of Parliament, and who only try to get fair commercial interest for their investment, are blamed by my noble Friend the late Viceroy, and other landlords are asked to shun them as though their touch were contamination. I admit that it may be a misfortune that landlords should press their rights in too hard a manner. We must all wish that in times of difficulty all classes of Her Majesty's subjects should show consideration one to another; but I cannot help deprecating the censure passed upon those who are only acting consistently with the doctrines preached by Parliament itself. There is also another consideration which ought to be kept in view. These Irish landlords are pressing for their arrears, and they are pressing for them by way of eviction. But has not Parliament given them a broad hint to do so? Do they not know that a Bill is now before Parliament for the purpose of confiscating absolutely the property of those landlords who have been foolish enough in past times to be indulgent on the subject of arrears, and may they not wish to save themselves from the results of the predatory instincts of the Liberal Party? These things must be remembered when you propose to condemn a class of Irish landlords who are themselves struggling with dire necessity, and who have been reduced to this position through the action of Parliament itself. I wish to impress on your Lordships the extreme danger of this indiscriminate censure upon Irish landlords. If you are anxious to condemn an Irish landlord, name the man whom you condemn. State your indictment against him and prove it; but if you are not prepared to take that course, do not condemn in flowing phrases a certain body of Irish landlords, not indicating whom you condemn nor whom you absolve, and, when taken to task, merely say that you only intended to condemn the few. That reservation, it should be noticed, is not made by those in Ireland who read the words uttered here. This is not the first time that these careless words have sharpened the edge of public bitterness against an unpopular class, and tended to stimulate and maintain the animosities to which disaster and outrage are due. But a few years ago the Prime Minister stated that tenants might regard eviction as a sentence of death; and that phrase, the echo of which still rings in our ears, is still repeated by the Prelates of Ireland as an undoubted truth, admitted by the Prime Minister of this country, and still used to embitter Irish tenants and the whole public opinion of Ireland against those who use a fitting legal remedy to maintain an undoubted legal right. I regret very much that the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant should have used these words. I regret very much that when he saw that they were in some degree misrepresented he did not at once correct the dangerous character that had been given to them in the report. But I regret still more, and I trust that my regret may not be intensified by future occurrences, that Ministers should rashly and hastily level these bitter words against a class of men who are struggling with difficulty against pressure, against indigence, which Parliament itself has, to a great extent, inflicted upon them—who are struggling to maintain their rights in the face of the strongest public resistance, and against whom any careless language spoken by men high in authority here is too apt to be the certain messenger of death.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, a rebuke from the noble Marquess with regard to the use of rash and hasty words—

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I am not in Office.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: No, not in Office, and, therefore, without official responsibility. A rebuke from him, no doubt, presses heavily upon us; but I would address a slight remonstrance to him in his turn. If there is one thing to be remembered in connection with Irish affairs, it is the violent language that is used, and the violent passions that are roused. We hear in this House about the predatory instincts of the Liberal Party. Out of it we hear of predatory landlords and plundering tenants. I believe that there is nothing more dangerous than that landlords and tenants should bandy such words, and I regret that the noble Marquess should have made use of the bitter language which he knows how to use with such effect. Does the noble Marquess mean to deny that there are such persons as harsh landlords? Why, they exist in England as well as in Ireland. Does the noble Marquess mean to say that there is no such thing as the exercise of proprietary rights in a harsh manner? It is a matter of every-day experience, both in Ireland and England, that many landlords would think it harsh to push to the full extent their undoubted legal rights; but, on the other hand, there are cases in Ireland in which the tenant has been subjected to great hardship. I do not know, however, any reason why all the good and fair landlords in Ireland should take to themselves an accusation which only applies to some members of their class. What is it that has been said? What has been said, and what I most earnestly believe from my own experience is, that in the present crisis in Ireland great hardship has been done towards some tenants. I am not an Irish landlord; I am an English landlord; but I should not consider that I was outraged or insulted if I were told that there had been some cases of hardship inflicted by landlords in England. It is quite true that small proprietors have invested money in land in Ireland, and in many cases, no doubt, they find themselves hard pressed. In many cases, also, they have not pressed their rights more than is desirable, and upon such as have not done so I should be chary, indeed, to express censure. But there have been cases in which hardship has been inflicted, and all the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant said was this—"That landlords who enforced their legal rights in a harsh manner, acted unpatriotically." I agree with that opinion, and, keeping Ireland alone in view, I say that those who act in that manner are men who are unpatriotic, men who increase the unfortunate gulf which separates landlord and tenant by their want of readiness to act with forbearance. The Chief Secretary, therefore, in my opinion, said nothing of which he should be ashamed. The state of Ireland is a grave question, and for Heaven's sake let us not make it still more grave by exaggerating existing evils, and endeavouring to increase, by Party attacks, a bitterness which has already attained such proportions as to menace the welfare of the nation.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, the condition of Ireland was indeed grave, and the words which had fallen from the Members of the Government were naturally watched with anxiety, because the effect of those words was not confined to those gentlemen who had been called bad and shameless landlords, but the legislation of the Government, founded upon those utterances, was addressed to good as well as to bad landlords in Ireland. For the sake of the worst, the Government had inflicted a penalty upon the good landlords; and, therefore, when language was addressed to the public, it was not unnatural that men should put upon it an interpretation consistent with the acts of the Government—acts which had been addressed to all the Irish landlords. The difficulty in Ireland was a formidable one, and it was hard to keep silent with respect to the evils existing there. It was natural, under the circumstances, that landlords who were using their just rights should complain when the Government were steadily pursuing a downward course, destructive of all rights of property, and were employing language which would not apply to those who were using their just rights.

House adjourned at a quarter before
Seven o'clock, to Thursday next,
a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 20th June, 1882.

The House met at Two of the clock.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Select Committee —Report—Local Government Provisional
Orders (No. 5) * [160].

Committee—Prevention of Crime (Ireland) [167]
—R.P. [Fifteenth Night].

Committee—Report—Vagrancy (re-comm.) [199].
Considered as amended—Third Reading—Copyright (Musical Compositions) * [161], and passed.

PETITION.

PARLIAMENT—PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) BILL—DUBLIN PETITION.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (Mr. DAWSON), who was clothed in his robes of office, said: Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a Petition from the Corporation of Dublin against the Bill now passing through this House for the prevention of crime in Ireland. The Corporation of Dublin represent the mercantile, commercial, and trading classes of Ireland, who have a deep anxiety for the peace, the prosperity, and contentment of that country. They are fully convinced, as this Petition states, that the present state of Ireland results from the imposition and action of unjust laws, and they are of opinion that the present measure will not tend to lull or pacify their anxiety, but rather to increase the disturbed condition of Ireland. They view with extreme apprehension the abolition of trial by jury, a step fraught with danger, and one which has been condemned by the highest jurists and statesmen in England, and has been also condemned by the majority of the Judicial Bench in Ireland. ["Order!"] They fear that by this temporary exercise of a—

The Earl of Kimberley

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Member is entitled to read the prayer of the Petition, but is not entitled to debate the Petition nor the subject of it.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (MR. DAWSON): The Petitioners state that they pointed out to this honourable House on previous occasions the abhorrence of coercive measures in Ireland — ["Order!"] — and the result has proved that — ["Order, order!"] — I will read the prayer of the Petition:—

"That we, the Municipal Council, principally composed of merchants and traders and representatives of the mercantile community"—

[Renewed cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I understand the right hon. Member to be reading the prayer of the Petition, and in so doing he is quite in Order.

MR. SEXTON: On the point of Order I would ask if the right hon. Member is not entitled to summarize the heads of the Petition as well as to read its prayer? [Cries of "Read!"]

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN (MR. DAWSON): I will read the prayer—

"Your petitioners therefore humbly pray your honourable House not to pass the Prevention of Crime Bill, or so to modify it as to leave untouched Constitutional liberty whilst only dealing with the repression of crime. We further pray your honourable House at once to enact such legislation as will stay the fearful sufferings now entailed by the numerous evictions that are daily taking place, and so to amend the Land Act as to prevent the recurrence of those evictions. We also pray your honourable House speedily to take into your earnest consideration the advisability, as well in the interest of the Empire as of Ireland, of the restoration to Ireland of her legislative independence."

QUESTIONS.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—RELEASE OF PERSONS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. P. O'Connor, of Miltown Malbay, has been transferred from Limerick Gaol to Kilmainham, 130 miles further away from his home; whether, since this man is over sixty years of age, the Government will reconsider his case; and, whether, as all the suspects from Hook, County Wexford, have been released except Mr. Nicholas Walsh, of Taghmon, who is still confined in Kilkenny Gaol, the Government will include him in the general liberation of Wexford men?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant has had the cases of Messrs. O'Connor and Walsh under his consideration, and found that he could now order their release. The orders were accordingly issued yesterday.

COLONEL DAWNAY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If Patrick Gallogly, Patrick Beirne, and John Sheridan, who were confined in Monaghan Prison on suspicion of breaking into houses by night and assaulting persons therein, have recently been discharged from custody by order of the Lord Lieutenant; whether any communication has been made on the subject to the persons assaulted by them; and, whether it is intended to put them on their trial for the offence with which they were charged?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the persons named in the Question of the hon. and gallant Member were released at the beginning of the present month. So far as I am aware, no communication has been made to the persons assaulted. I am not aware that it is intended now to prosecute them for the offence of which they were reasonably suspected. They had been in detention for upwards of 14 weeks, and even if they had been convicted of the assault under the ordinary law, they might very probably have escaped with a lighter sentence.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 —
PRISON WARDERS.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that, in consequence of the extra duty thrown upon prison warders by the Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, trustworthy men had to be drafted from the different prisons where they were permanently settled to the places where the political prisoners were confined; whether these warders were in many instances separated from their families; whether the sum granted to them for lodging, fuel, and light (if married) when so transferred was only ten shillings per month; whether the Government are aware that these men were frequently obliged to spend fully three times this amount for lodging, &c.; whether in Dublin their hours of duty were such that they have had to remain on twenty-six and a half hours out of thirty-six; whether similar excessive duty had to be performed in other gaols where suspects were confined; whether the extra warders employed by the Government were old police pensioners, many of whom were past work before leaving the police force, and were entirely ignorant of prison discipline; whether, therefore, duties of much greater weight and responsibility devolved upon the regular warders than before; whether the police who are getting an extra grant were also relieved by auxiliaries from the Army and Army Reserve; and, whether, taking all the circumstances of the case of the prison warders into consideration, the Government can see their way to make an allowance for their increased duty and responsibility during the past eighteen months?

MR. TREVELYAN: The hon. Member asks me 10 Questions, the answers to which would take up a considerable time, and I trust he will be satisfied when I tell him that as soon as all the persons detained under the Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act have been released, it will be the duty of the Prisons Board to submit the names of certain prison officers to Government for some reward for extra duties. As, however, this is a matter which cannot be arranged without the consent of the Treasury, and as the case is not yet in a position to be submitted to their Lordships, I wish to avoid raising hopes that may not afterwards be capable of fulfilment.

MR. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman state that in proportion to their number and the work they have done they shall receive rewards comparatively as great as those granted to the police?

MR. TREVELYAN: The answer to that cannot, of course, be made by any Department without the consent of the Treasury.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—POLICE SUPERANNUATION BILL.

BARON DE FERRIERES asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he cannot give some facilities for considering the Police Superannuation Bill, for being opposed it runs the risk of never coming before the House, owing to the half-past Twelve o'clock Rule and the existing press of business, and thus the legitimate expectations of a most deserving body of men appear likely to be again indefinitely postponed?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he could assure the hon. Member that he regretted very much that the legitimate expectations of a most deserving body of men appeared likely to be indefinitely postponed. But the hon. Member must undertake the task of inducing the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) and the hon. Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) to relent. If he succeeded in that difficult task, then they might hope to make some progress with the Bill.

STATE OF IRELAND—INTIMIDATION.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to the burning of a labourer's house near Mallow, reported in the "Cork Constitution" as follows:—

"There are circumstances attending upon the burning of the labourer Looney's house near Mallow, on Friday last, as reported in our columns of Saturday, which present features of incredible barbarity. It appears that this poor family, having barely escaped being burned to death in their humble home, were first compelled to watch helplessly while the little they possessed was being consumed in the flames, no one coming to their aid, and many hours after were found by the magistrate crouching by the side of the public road half naked and without food, because, being under the ban of "boycotting," nobody was courageous enough to afford even the infant of a month old, who formed one of the miserable party, any succour ;"

and, whether the above facts are true; and, if so, whether any steps have been taken to lessen the state of intimidations apparently prevalent in the district?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I have had a report on this case from the Sub-Inspector of Constabulary, who was present on the spot the morning of the occurrence. As usual in such cases, the newspaper account is somewhat exaggerated. The poor people had their clothing on, and were able to save some few articles of furniture. The youngest of the children is 10 months old, not one month, as stated. They received assistance from one of the neighbours only, and the Sub-Inspector sent them some bread from the Constabulary barrack. They are now under shelter in a place called "Dan's Castle," in the vicinity, and pending the erection of a police hut near the scene, a party of police have been quartered in the castle, which is the only available house in the vicinity.

EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—THE SPECIAL, AND RESIDENT MAGISTRATES, AND THE POLICE.

MR. GIBSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, In what form had the constabulary and special and resident magistrates been induced to give their opinions on evictions; had any data been given them as to how they were to discriminate between ejectments which were not to be censured and those which they should describe as cases of hardship; were they to have any regard to the necessities of the landlord and his family; and, were the duties of censorship, as to the character of legal process, to be applied to all the creditors of the tenant, or to be confined to the landlord only?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, in the detailed report of evictions sent in by the constable or Sub-Inspector of the district, a statement is called for which is described as follows in the printed form:—

"This statement is to comprise information as to the circumstances of the case, the cause of evictions, whether they produced much hardship or excitement in the neighbourhood."

Those are the instructions which are given. With regard to the last paragraph of the Question, the instructions were always held to relate to the evicting person, whether landlord or creditor. The late Mr. Burke altered the form, with a view of obtaining fuller particulars, about a year ago. I will give a specimen of two of the answers without the names—

"The case of A B is one of hardship, as he was highly-rented, had indifferent land, and a large family. That of C D was not a case of hardship, as he could have paid his rent, and was comfortably off."

Then, again—

"There was no hardship in this case. E F is a carpenter, and well able to pay his rent if so disposed; but he wanted to get away with it, as he expects to get money from the Land League for allowing himself to be evicted. He has a new house, built for himself, where he intends to live."

And, again —

"G H, wife, and eight children were evicted for non-payment of rent. The eviction was not a case of hardship, as the rents were reasonable, and being admitted as caretaker, he had six months to redeem."

And, again—

"Tenants had nowhere to go. These men were paying very high rent; nearly double valuation. These people were in a miserable state of poverty."

The Special Resident Magistrates send in periodical reports of the nature of the evictions in their districts. Frequent Ministerial statements have been made in Parliament as to the contumacious refusal to pay rent among the tenants of Ireland. These statements would have been based on the reports to which I have referred, and I never have heard that their general accuracy or authority was disputed when used for this purpose. I hope I may take this opportunity to say a word of explanation. Having observed much criticism on the epithet "cruel," which I used the other day, I may say that I did not apply the epithet to the conduct of any landlord towards his tenant. What I did say was that those particular landlords who were carrying out evictions which were reported to the Government as cases of hardship were behaving in a cruel manner towards the Executive Government, which was trying to do its best under great difficulties. As often happens on a Wednesday, the newspaper report was much condensed, and so the mistake arose.

MR. J. LOWTHER: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman what machinery the authorities have invented for testing the value of the land, and the ascertaining whether it is over-rented?

MR. TREVELYAN: They have the valuation, the rent, and the number of years' rent due. The authorities have the same means of getting information on this subject that they have of getting materials for any Report on the peace and order or position of the district.

MR. GIBSON said, the right hon. Gentleman had explained his meaning to be that the conduct of certain landlords towards the Executive Government was cruel. Could the right hon. Gentleman say whether or not those landlords were compelled to evict their tenants in order to obtain money wherewith to support their families; and, whether, if they ceased from evictions, the Government would enable them to support their families?

MR. TREVELYAN: I referred only to landlords who, being in the same position as the hon. Member for Carrickfergus (Mr. Greer), did not take the same course as that Gentleman—the course, namely, of waiting for the Arrears Bill instead of proceeding with evictions.

MR. GIBSON: That was not my Question. Has the right hon. Gentleman satisfied himself that he has not made a charge of cruelty against landlords who are unable to support their families if they do not get their rents?

MR. TREVELYAN: It was only to those in the position of the hon. Member for Carrickfergus (Mr. Greer), and who did not follow his example, that I referred. That there are such landlords the Government are absolutely informed, but I do not say they are many. I hope and believe they are few.

MR. HEALY: May I ask if landlords are not as well able to work for their living as any other people?

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked whether a summary of the evictions could not be presented to the House, showing how many, in the opinion of the constable, were cases in which the tenants could not pay their rents, and how many were cases in which they were able, but wilfully refused to do so?

MR. TREVELYAN: No, Sir; I cannot undertake to place such Returns upon the Table of the House. Those Returns are given in great detail for the purpose of enabling the Government to form their judgment on peace and order in Ireland, and the Government draw from them the conclusions they think ought to be drawn, in whatever direction those conclusions point.

MR. GIBSON: Will the right hon. Gentleman communicate to the House what instructions have been given to the Constabulary with respect to the manner in which the means of the landlords are to be ascertained by them?

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked whether it was not a fact that the landlords had lately evicted their tenants for the payment of half-a-year's rent in arrear only?

[No answer was given to these Questions.]

NORTH SEA FISHERIES CONVENTION —RATIFICATION.

MR. BIRKBECK asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When it is proposed to ratify the Convention of 6th May relative to the North Sea Fisheries?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government are prepared to ratify the Convention as soon as the other Powers, parties to it, are ready to do so. It is not yet certain when it will be ratified by France, Belgium, and the Netherlands, and I cannot, therefore, at present name any certain date.

LAW AND POLICE—CASE OF CHARLES FROST, WRONGFULLY CONVICTED.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the case of a man named Charles Frost, who was charged at the Mansion House with having attempted to destroy himself; and if it is true, as stated by the man, that he was tried three years ago and sentenced to fifteen years penal servitude upon the perjured evidence of a police officer, and after serving two years was released, his innocence having been proved; and, if the man's statement is well founded, whether it is his intention to grant him any compensation for the injury done him by such miscarriage of justice?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, this is one of those unfortunate cases that do sometimes occur of mistaken identity. On careful investigation the man was found to have been wrongfully convicted. He was pardoned, and I took every pains to see that he should get good employment afterwards, which he did get. As to what has happened since, I am not particularly informed; but I have ordered further inquiries into the matter, in order that what can be done may be done.

MR. MAOFARLANE inquired whether, in accordance with precedent, some compensation could not be made to the man?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I cannot answer that Question, but I will order further inquiries to be made.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—
MICHAEL M'SWEENEY AND JOHN RYAN.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Michael M'Sweeney and John Ryan, who were released during the month of May, had been imprisoned under reasonable suspicion of having committed murder?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the hon. Baronet is quite correct in this matter. In answering the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) on the 8th of June, to the effect that John Ryan was guilty of inciting to murder, and not murder, I was quoting from a report from Dublin, in which a mistake had been made on this point. The existence of that mistake was not brought to my notice until I inquired about it this morning. With regard to Michael M'Sweeney, he was released on the 7th of June. That was the day on which the report was sent me from Dublin, and I can only suppose that the release was not yet known to the Department which forwarded it. I have given directions that in any case where a mistake has been made in information on which I have grounded an answer in Parliament, the matter may be brought to my notice at once.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—
RESIDENCES OF RELEASED PRISONERS.

MR. DONALDSON-HUDSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he can give any information as to the present residences of those persons who have been released from prison within the last two years who were imprisoned on suspicion of having committed murder, or having been accessory to it?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, if the hon. Member will specify any individual cases upon which he requires this information, I shall have no objection to endeavour to supply it to him; but I cannot give him the general information off-hand.

EGYPT—THE POLITICAL CRISIS—THE FLEET AT ALEXANDRIA.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he can state what steps were taken by Sir Beauchamp Seymour, and Her Majesty's ships under his command, last Sunday, the 11th of May, for the protection of British life and property at Alexandria; and, whether Her Majesty's Government nourish the belief that the repetition of such steps will be sufficient to preserve British interests in that City in case of the renewal of disturbances?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Sir, the hon. Member yesterday addressed this identical Question to my hon. Friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. I have nothing to add to the answer then given by my hon. Friend.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs yesterday did not give me a satisfactory answer. I shall continue asking this Question until I do get one.

EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—DEATH FROM EXPOSURE AT AN EVICTION AT RHODE, KING'S CO.

MR. MOLLOY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that Mr. Gowing, coroner, attended at Rhode, King's County, on Wednesday last, to open an inquest on the body of a child, aged twelve months, who died from exposure consequent upon an eviction and the refusal of the resident magistrate to allow the shelter huts to be erected which had been provided; if the child, at the time of the eviction, was lying ill of the measles, and in a dangerous state; whether Sub-Inspector Caulfield neglected to summon a jury, although he had received the coroner's precept eighteen hours before the time for holding the inquest; and whether, at the opening of the inquest, the police offered no explanation to the coroner, but merely stated in reply that, although the precept had been received, no jury had been summoned; what steps the Government propose to take in the matter; and, whether the family of the dead child, and the other families of the evicted, are not at liberty to take advantage of the shelter huts, the use of which has been denied to them by the resident magistrate?

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that the police, at Rhode, King's County, recently prevented by threats the erection of a hut, provided by the Ladies' Land League, to shelter the family of an evicted labourer named Kavanagh; whether, in consequence of the conduct of the police, Kavanagh, his wife, and his children, who, as notified to the police, were ill of measles, had to avail themselves of the shelter of a shed or stable without door, window, or chimney, and have lived there for the last fortnight; whether the result has been that exposure has caused the death of one of the children, and that another is now lying at the point of death; whether the coroner of Queen's County, in accordance with the Law, issued his precept to the police directing them to provide a jury to inquire into the death of the child, and giving them twenty-eight hours' notice for the purpose; whether the police disregarded the precept, and failed to provide the jury, in consequence of which no inquest has yet been held; and, whether the Executive will take notice of the conduct of the police, and institute further action in the matter?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, as these two Questions relate to the same matter, I shall answer them both together. I am informed that the facts of the case are as follows:—The Coroner did attend at Rhode, in the King's County, on the 14th instant, to open an inquest on the body of a child of a labourer named Kavanagh, who has been employed on the farm of a Mr. Kerr. He, with other labourers, had demanded higher wages, and, being refused, struck work, and had been ordered by the magistrates in Petty Sessions to give up his house and garden. There was no eviction in the case. Kavanagh's child was at the time suffering from measles, and Mr. Kerr told him he might remain in the house if he produced a medical certificate to the effect that moving the child would be injurious. Kavanagh, however, gave up possession at once and got shelter in an unoccupied house, which I am informed a very little trouble would have rendered quite habitable. The child having died, the Coroner, by letter of the 12th instant, sent the Sub-Inspector a precept to hold an inquest on the 14th, and the Sub-Inspector telegraphed on the 13th to have the Coroner informed that an inquest was unnecessary, as the child had died from natural causes. Nevertheless, the Coroner attended on the 14th, when the Sub-Inspector handed him a notice explaining that the time had not been sufficient to enable him to collect a jury, there being few eligible persons residing in the locality. The Sub-Inspector asked for a fresh precept, giving sufficient time to summon a jury; but the Coroner stated he would not issue one, but would leave the matter in the hands of the Government. No communication has, however, been since received from him by Government. The erection of the huts for these labourers had been prevented by the magistrate, as information had been given that they were to be erected for purposes of intimidation and for the encouragement of the labourers' strike. Huts are allowed to be erected now under the circumstances which I stated on Friday. The doctor who attended Kavanagh's child states that it died from natural causes; another of his children is now ill. I have no reason to doubt the accuracy of this report; but I have directed further inquiry to be made as to the alleged neglect of the Sub-Inspector.

IRELAND—ADVANCES TO IRISH LANDLORDS ON IRISH ESTATES.

CAPTAIN AYLMER asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether, seeing that many Insurance Companies, and persons who have lent money on Irish estates, or have bought up charges on same, insist on payment of their interest, and threaten foreclosure if the landlords of such estates do not take all legal steps to put themselves in position to pay such charges, the Treasury will, in such cases, where the tenants have not paid their rents, make advances to these landlords to enable them to pay such charges if they stay for the present further evictions?

Mr. Molloy

MR. COURTNEY: No, Sir; it is not intended to make such advances.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON RAILWAY RATES—DRAFT REPORT.

MR. E. STANHOPE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, as Chairman of the Select Committee on Railways, if he can account for the publication by the daily newspapers of the Draft Reports submitted to that Committee, before they have been finally decided on?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: No, Sir; I cannot account for the circumstance. All that I have been able to ascertain is that the first publication of the Draft Report was in the Dublin Freeman's Journal. I think, however, that, with the permission of the House, I may be allowed to say that if that publication has occurred through the instrumentality of any Member of the Committee, I cannot understand how any Gentleman could consider it consistent with his duty to the House to treat a Paper marked "strictly private and confidential" as one which should be laid before the public.

EGYPT—THE POLITICAL CRISIS.

MR. M'COWAN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Sir Edward Malet had been instructed to take any and what steps to exact punishment and reparation for the murder of the British subjects killed in Alexandria during the riot of the 11th instant; whether any provision, beyond the stationing of a gunboat at either end of the channel, has been made, or is contemplated, for the protection of the Suez Canal; whether Sir E. Malet has been any party to the arrangement under which Ragheb Pasha has formed a new Egyptian Ministry in which Arabi Pasha remains Minister of War; and, whether, in view of the recent Anglo-French Note, demanding the removal of Arabi from office and his exile from Egypt, Her Majesty's Government will recognise any ministry of which he still forms a part?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that before that Question was answered it might be convenient that he should ask the Prime Minister a Question on this subject, of which he had given him private Notice. That Question was, Whether Her Majesty's Government still adhered to the policy which they had announced, that no settlement of the Egyptian Question could be entertained or sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government which did not require the dismissal of Arabi Pasha from any position of trust or power in Egypt; and, whether that declaration had been laid down as one of the bases of the approaching Conference?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir Edward Malet was informed on the 17th instant that Her Majesty's Government abstained from making demands for the present; but that he was to let it be clearly understood that they would require full reparation and satisfaction for the outrages committed during the recent disturbances. The Government have already declined in both Houses to make a detailed statement as to the safety of the Suez Canal; but they attach the highest possible importance to the immense interest of England in connection with it. Sir Edward Malet has not been a party to the formation of the new Egyptian Ministry; and Her Majesty's Government have in no way receded from their declaration on the subject.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that perhaps now the Prime Minister would answer the Question he had put to him.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I am bound to say that this is rather a strong example of the inconvenience of putting Questions relating to matters of the utmost delicacy without due Notice. ["Oh!"] I think I have a right to express that opinion, although hon. Members opposite think it necessary to interrupt me. The so-called "private Notice" which I received was a note placed in my hands as I entered the House. Undoubtedly, a part of it does join on and dovetail with the answer just given by my hon. Friend, in which he stated that Her Majesty's Government had nothing to retract from what they had heretofore said on the Egyptian Question. But alongside the question of the ultimate political settlement of Egypt there has come up another question, which for the moment is the dominant question, and that is the safety of European life and property in Egypt. That cannot be considered except with reference to the hands in which the power is temporarily placed. That question and the interests connected with it would render it highly improper in me to give any answer to the Question now addressed to me. With regard to the Conference, I can give a little more particularity to the answer I gave yesterday, because reference has been made, in the Correspondence now going on, to the particular despatch as containing what we are quite ready to admit are the bases of the Conference. That is a despatch dated the 6th of February, and it is included in the Papers already in the hands of Members.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Sultan has concurred with the holding of a Conference upon the affairs of Egypt; and, whether he can state where and when this Conference will be held, and what Powers will be represented?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, as the result of the exchange of views which has lately taken place among the Powers, the Great Powers have agreed, upon the initiative of England and France, that there is ground for deliberation in common on the present state of Egypt, and on the measures which it may entail; and Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the Republic have proposed that the Representatives of the six Great Powers shall meet in Conference at Constantinople on Thursday next.

MR. G. W. ELLIOT said, that the latter part of the Question had not been satisfactorily answered.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I can only state that the present information that the Government have is that the Conference is to meet without the concurrence of Turkey; but the hon. Member will see, when he comes to read the Correspondence, that it is not easy to answer accurately Questions on this subject.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Has the Sultan declined to take part in the Conference?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: All I can say is that there is an actual conflict of words on the fact.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, on the 25th of September 1881, Sir E. Malet wrote to Lord Granville in the following terms:—

"During the late crisis there was a considerable panic in the large Foreign population at Alexandria and Cairo, arising not so much from the expectation that the movement would turn against Foreigners, as from the sense of helplessness on their part if it did.

"In connection with this point, I would venture to recommend that one of Her Majesty's ships of war should be stationed at Alexandria during the winter;"

whether, on the 24th of October 1881, after the withdrawal of the "Invincible," Sir E. Malet again wrote to Lord Granville, as follows:—

"The despatch of H.M.S. 'Invincible' to Alexandria, which was ordered by Her Majesty's Government in consequence of a passage in my despatch of the 25th ultimo, in which I had ventured to recommend that a ship of war should be stationed at Alexandria during the winter, assumed, from the force of circumstances, a different character from that which was intended. The complaint and the presence of the Turkish Commission gave it a political significance which had not originally belonged to it, with the ultimate result that, instead of being stationed at Alexandria, and fulfilling the object of preventing panics among the Foreign population, the 'Invincible' quitted the port on the day following her arrival.

"I trust that this circumstance may not prevent Her Majesty's Government from carrying out the design with which the 'Invincible' was first despatched;"

and, whether he can state the dates of the arrivals and departures from Alexandria of any of Her Majesty's vessels of war between that date and the present time, and of the class, tonnage, and armament of such vessels?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the passages in Sir Edward Malet's despatches, to which the hon. Member refers, are correctly quoted. For the information respecting the movements and size of Her Majesty's ships, I must refer the hon. Member to the Secretary to the Admiralty.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked, How long it was since the 25th of September, when Sir Edward Malet wrote to Lord Granville that Alexandria had been left without the presence of any English man-of-war?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The hon. Gentleman's Question only appeared upon the Paper yesterday, and it was impossible for me to obtain the necessary information from the Admiralty by 2 o'clock to-day. I think it would be best to address the Question to the Secretary to the Admiralty.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, that the hon. Baronet had referred him yesterday to the Secretary to the Admiralty, who, when he had put a Question to him to-day, had declined to give him any answer.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The hon. Member is inaccurate in saying that I referred him yesterday to the Secretary to the Admiralty.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I understand my hon. Friend to say that yesterday the hon. Baronet referred him to me, and that I have declined to answer him. The hon. Baronet did not refer my hon. Friend to me. The words used, which, for greater accuracy, I have brought with me, were these; he concluded his answer by saying—

“In the opinion of the Admiralty, however, it would not be right for me to state the purport of those instructions.”

That is hardly a reference to me for further information.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I am very sorry I cannot quite agree with my hon. Friend. I therefore wish to ask him a Question. I want him to inform me, not what instructions the Admiralty have issued to Sir Beauchamp Seymour, but what were the measures taken for the protection of British life and property in Egypt up to the 11th of May, the Under Secretary of State having stated that he had received a despatch from Sir Beauchamp Seymour containing information on that question. It is a question of fact, and not of instruction.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I cannot understand how the hon. Member can think that this Question can be answered by me. The answer of my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, if I must read it in its whole length, was this—“The despatch of Sir Beauchamp Seymour containing an answer to the first part of the Question is on its way home.” He did not say it had come, but that it was on its way home.

MR. BOURKE said, that if it was not inconvenient to the Prime Minister, he should like to ask him one Question arising out of the answer he had given as to the bases of the proposed Conference. The right hon. Gentleman, in his answer just now, had referred to a despatch of the 6th of February, in which the bases of the Conference were stated to be, as far as he understood them, the maintenance of life and property, the welfare of the Egyptian people as secured by the Firman of the Sultan, and the strict observance of International engagements. He should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman a Question with regard to the last paragraph. Alluding to the Conference, the last paragraph said that it was also, in their opinion, the right of the Sultan to be a party in the proceedings of the discussion which might ensue. He wished to ask whether that portion of the arrangement so proposed by Lord Granville in February with respect to the Conference had been departed from, and whether the Government had abandoned the idea of the Sultan taking part in this discussion?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; undoubtedly, it was our opinion that it would be his right, and it is so now; but the Sultan himself is of a different opinion, and in this particular he does not fall in with the opinion which all the other Powers have arrived at. We have neither the inclination nor the power to override his judgment.

MR. ONSLOW asked whether, as the Porte had decided not to join the Conference, it would still be held at Constantinople?

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, Sir.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND)—LORD ROSS. MORE'S ESTATES.

MR. DILLON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he has been informed that several writs for arrears of rent have been served on the estates of Lord Rossmore, Stephen Murphy, and the Rev. Hans Acheson, in the county of Monaghan; that three writs have already been executed on the Rev. Mr. Acheson's property, the tenant's interest in each case being sold and purchased by the bailiff, with a view to bar them from all rights under the Arrears Bill; and, that ejectments on the title were served on June 12th; whether his attention has been directed to a letter from Rev. D. Donnelly, Lord Bishop of Clogher, dated June 1st, and in which occurs the following words:—

“Writs, you see, are being issued over the Rossmore Estate, writs for rent arrears which every one knows the people are utterly unable to pay, writs which therefore mean simply, be Lord Rossmore's legal rights what they may, the utter destruction and annihilation of the unfortunate tenants;”

whether he is aware that this system is being adopted in many parts of Ireland; and, whether, in view of this state of things, he will not now consider the necessity of immediately introducing a short Bill putting a stay of six months on the execution of all eviction decrees in Ireland?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, my attention has not been called to the instances mentioned otherwise than by the hon. Member's Question. I naturally read the Question with great pain, in consequence of the allegation which by implication it contains. With regard to the inquiry whether I am aware that this system is being adopted in many parts of Ireland, I had better refer the hon. Member to what has already been stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. The hon. Member further asks me whether I will consider the necessity of immediately introducing a short Bill putting a stay of six months on the execution of all evictions in Ireland? That is a repetition of a Question which I have already answered. I do not complain of the Question being repeated; but I can only refer the hon. Member to my former answer, in which I state that I know of no mode in which we can effect the object desired by the hon. Member, except by expediting ourselves, and, as far as we can, inducing others to expedite, the passing of the Arrears Bill. That this legislation should be expedited as much as possible is the interest, not of the tenants alone, but also of the landlords. I have received this morning a letter from a landlord in the West of Ireland, who was well known to me long ago, in which he states—and I place the utmost reliance upon his statement—that not only has he received no rent for the last four years, and that, being convinced that any attempt to evict would only cause crime, he has not evicted anyone, but that these Sessions he is sued by the Guardians of his Union for the payment of £192 for poor rates. Under these circumstances, we can only trust that in the interest of all, both landlords and tenants, everyone will strive to expedite the Irish legislation as much as possible.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE NEW RULES OF PROCEDURE.

MR. GORST asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to a speech made by Mr. R. W. Duff, Junior Lord of the Treasury, at Banff, on the 16th instant, in which he is reported to have said:—

Mr. Dillon

“I believe the Government are determined to pass the Procedure Rules, if possible, before Parliament rises; and, if not, though of course I am not in Cabinet secrets, I believe by calling an Autumn Session for the purpose;”

and, whether Mr. R. W. Duff has correctly described the intention of the Government of which he is a Member?

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, Sir; my attention has been called to the speech of my hon. Friend; and I observed with pleasure that my hon. Friend, in the exercise of that caution which is supposed to exist North of the Tweed in a degree at least equal to that in which it exists South of the Tweed, did not undertake to convey in his remarks the intentions of the Government; but said that his own opinion was that it would not be an unreasonable course if they were determined to carry the Procedure Rules; and, standing upon that opinion, he thought that the Government would act upon it. It was very natural, I think, with the perfect confidence my hon. Friend has in the Government, that he should think that whatever has commended itself to him as highly reasonable would be adopted by the Government. I shall, Sir, have something more to say on the subject when I come to speak on the Business of the House.

PARLIAMENT—PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES) BILL.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether three letters, which were published by the “Times” newspaper, on Saturday, 10th June, and which purported to have been respectively addressed by the First Lord of the Treasury, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and the President of the Board of Trade, to the Birmingham Trades Council, on the subject of the Corrupt Practices Elections Bill, are genuine; whether Her Majesty's Government propose to amend the Corrupt Practices Bill by charging official election expenses on the local rates; and, whether he is now prepared to inform the House what course he intends to take upon the amendment of the honourable Member for Stoke, referred to in the above-mentioned letter?

MR. GLADSTONE: In reply to the hon. Member's Question, I have to state that the three letters referred to in the Question as having appeared in The Times are genuine. Her Majesty's Government have no intention of proposing to amend the Corrupt Practices Bill by charging official election expenses on the local rates.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—QUESTIONS.

MR. MAC IVER, as a point of Order, asked the Speaker if it was not part of the unwritten law of Parliament that private Members should refrain from pressing on Ministers Questions which, in their discretion, it was not for the public interest should be answered; and also, if it was not part of the unwritten law of Parliament that Ministers who assumed to answer Questions should use reasonable endeavours to see that those answers were correct? The point on which he respectfully asked the judgment of the Speaker was whether the practice of making evasive and incorrect statements in reply to Questions was not disrespectful to Parliament and fraught with inconvenience.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not asking me a Question on a point of Order now arising, and therefore I must respectfully decline to answer.

MOTION.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I have to move that the Arrears (Ireland) Bill have precedence, on every day for which it is put down, of all other Orders of the Day and Notices of Motion except the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill. I have postponed making this Motion until to-day, because when we commenced proceedings on the Prevention of Crime Bill I had no means of forecasting what would be the duration of those proceedings, or what would be the amount of pressure on the time of the House, and unless there were considerable pressure on the time of the House I did not wish to make a Motion of an innovating character. But, in the present circumstances, there is no need of any detailed justification upon making this Motion, so far as the immediate subject-matter is concerned. The House is aware, from many previous declarations, that the Prevention of Crime and the Arrears Bills are both, in the view of Her Majesty's Government, absolutely necessary to be passed into law, and to be passed with such despatch as a just consideration of their provisions will allow. I do not know whether there is any disposition to contest that proposition generally; but I will not detain the House by dwelling on it. But intimation has been given, and not unreasonably, considering that we have now reached the 20th of June, that it would now be expected that the Government would give some account of their general views, as far as time permits, with regard to the further transaction of Public Business in the House; and, Sir, it is quite natural that when the Government are asking for time to push forward Business for which they are more immediately responsible, other Members of the House, who have business of their own in which they take a deep interest, should wish to be assured that the Government are not going to take advantage of the facilities that may be given to it for the purpose of giving any unfair precedence to measures, either which they have introduced or which they may intend to introduce, over Business in charge of independent Members. Of course, the House is aware that the Prevention of Crime Bill occupies, and has all along occupied, the first place in the view and intentions of the Government. As regards the intentions of the Government with respect to the Arrears Bill, I wish to say that, with the consent of the House, I should desire to pass it through Committee pro formd. The House is aware that that will in no manner diminish the privilege of any Member of discussing any portion of this measure, either on the Motion to leave the Chair or in Committee. But there are two or three changes which we wish to introduce into the Bill, and it is for the convenience of the House that changes of the kind should be embodied in the text of the Bill, rather than that a number of Amendments should be on the Paper in the name of the promoters of the Bill, possibly causing some confusion and some difficulty to other Members in giving Notice of Amendments which they may wish to propose. The Amendments which we wish to introduce into the Bill are already in type, and I believe may be distributed to-morrow morning, and the Bill committed pro forma on a future day. The Amendments we propose to introduce are substantially these. In the first place, there is an Amendment which is no alteration of the intention of the Bill. We are not quite satisfied with the definition in the Bill as it stands in regard to the particular words "accrued due," in the 1st clause, and in regard to determining the important point what rents paid may be set down as accrued in 1881. We wish to make our original intention, to which we adhere, perfectly clear. That is one change. The next point is this. As the House is aware, the clause in the Land Act of last year operated only to a very small extent, and we introduce an Amendment which is limited to this object, for the purpose of enabling a very few persons who took advantage of that clause to submit themselves to the conditions of the present Bill, which are not in all respects the same, and to go through the conditions and to take the benefit of the present Bill. I think that is a provision which will be generally approved. The third alteration touches another point of importance. It is to avoid the risk which might be if we were to place new duties in the hands of the Sub-Commissioners under the Land Act at the present moment—a risk which might interfere with the great progress they are making in the important business they have in hand. We propose, therefore, to ask the House to empower the Land Commissioners, subject to the consent of the Treasury, to appoint competent persons for the purpose of making investigations into questions of fact which the Bill contemplates as being necessary to adjudication. These matters, it will be observed, raise questions of principle; but as they do not alter the corpus of the Bill, I propose to take the course I have stated. The next Bill of which I wish to take notice is the Tax Bill. I need not go into the details. The House is aware how it stands. It is an exceedingly simple measure, as our action is extremely straitened by the circumstances of the comparative revenue and charge of the country. In order to enable us to fulfil the engagement entered into at the commencement of the Session, the Bill proposes an augmentation on the tax on carriages. I do not anticipate any discussion, nor give any opinion on this subject; but the House will see, from the manner in which these two matters are associated together, that they will have to take their choice between granting the relief and imposing the charge, or letting the matter stand for another occasion, when the Government may be enabled to deal with the projected changes in the local charges and government. The Government hope to be able to obtain a measure dealing with this question next year. These subjects I have mentioned to the House already on former occasions. I will now refer to two Bills which are likely, I know, from Notice given, to be mentioned to-day. I will anticipate the hon. Members, and, so far as I can, open the way for the hon. Gentlemen in charge of the Bills, if they may feel it necessary to say anything on the subject of them. The first is the Irish Sunday Closing Bill. I have been requested to state the intentions of the Government in regard to this Bill. I can only say, Sir, that, in our opinion, the Act ought not to be suffered to expire; but there is an important question in relation to it with regard to large towns, which are now excluded from its operation. I cannot say whether it will or will not be convenient to deal with that during the present year. If it is so, I do not know that the Government are under any obligations to charge themselves with the conduct of the Bill; if it is not dealt with as to that important but secondary question—in that case it will be our duty to insert it in the General Continuance Act of the year. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) has intimated that he will ask what facilities we can give, or whether we are prepared to give any facilities, for the further consideration of the Agricultural Holdings Bill, which deals with a subject in which he and many others take a great interest. Sir, when we are compelled to make sacrifices, some of them absolute and some of them contingent, of measures which seemed likely to be realized this Session, and measures of our own, and even measures announced in the Speech from the Throne, the hon. Gentleman will not be surprised that I cannot enter into any engagement with him on this subject at the present time. When the two Irish Bills are disposed of [A laugh].—I must say that experience causes me great anxiety that the House should make up its mind with despatch upon these two Irish Bills, for the sake of the best interests of Ireland; and I am sorry that hon. Gentlemen opposite should be tempted to smile in connection with such a subject—when these two Bills are disposed of our command of the time of the House will have ceased, and private Members will then re-enter into possession of such rights as they usually enjoy at that period of the year. What I am going to say, Sir, I shall say not without some hesitation. I am by no means sure that the hon. Member will take advantage of it, or be inclined to take advantage of it; but I do feel great anxiety, and the Government feel great anxiety, that some progress should be made, if possible, in the business of satisfactorily legislating with regard to agricultural holdings on this side of St. George's Channel. There are several Bills before the House. My hon. Friend the Member for North Devonshire (Sir Thomas Acland), behind me, has a Bill upon this subject. There is, I believe, a third Bill of another hon. Member—the Member for Bedfordshire (Mr. J. Howard). I do not know what view may be taken exactly on the merits of these Bills; but it may be that as to some of these Bills, or all of these Bills—I cannot say which, nor is it the business of the Government, as a Government, to charge itself with any judgment upon the merits of those Bills at the present moment—but it may be that, by favour, the House might be disposed to give to several of these Bills a second reading without the necessity of a debate at that stage. Well, Sir, what we think is this. If it were the pleasure of those in charge of any of those Bills, or of all of them—I do not interfere with any such arrangement, or give any particular opinion about it—but if it were the pleasure of the House to allow the privilege of a second reading, either without discussion or without any ample discussion, and if it were then the pleasure of the Gentlemen in charge of the Bills to move to refer them to Committees chosen pro hac vice, without committing them to the general judgment of the House in the manner indicated in the Rules laid upon the Table with respect to Procedure, the Government will make no objection. They have no intention of forcing that course upon hon. Members.

They only wish to say that they will place no impediment to that course in case those in charge of other Bills, or the House generally, think that any good can be gained by the adoption of such a mode of action. We only propose this as a matter for consideration. There is one other point. There are two Bills relating to Scotland which I wish to mention. One is on the subject of Scotch entail. It has not yet reached this House, but it is likely to arrive here; and I believe it represents, so far as I have yet been informed, a very great unanimity of Scottish feeling on the subject. I hope, if that is so, if the Bill should arrive here from the House of Lords, we certainly should be anxious that it should be passed. There is another Bill relating to endowments in Scotland, to which also many Scotch Members attach great value. I cannot say that it will be in our power to appropriate the time of the House for that measure, which is a Government Bill. But if Scotch Members think that any suggestion such as I have made with respect to the Bills of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) and my hon. Friend the Member for North Devonshire (Sir Thomas Acland) can be made available in that matter, that is a question of which we by no means intend to prevent the discussion. But further than that we do not go. It would not be fair to do so. The appointment of large Committees for practically dealing with certain Bills is part of our own plan in relation to Procedure, and we do not desire, by indirect means, to obtain the sanction of the House to that plan. Well, Sir, these are all the Bills which I should mention at the present moment. But there is still an exception. There is the question of the amendment of the Land Act. That comprises several important questions. I do not know that I can enumerate them all from recollection. There is the question of leases, with regard to which certain recommendations have been submitted to the Government by the Land Commissioners. There is the question relating to the labourers, with respect to which also certain recommendations have been submitted; and, thirdly, there are the Purchase Clauses. I can announce no intention, no positive intention, upon the part of the Government; I can only give assurances that we will endeavour to make up our minds, at what we think the proper time, when we approach the close of the discussion of the two Bills now before the House. But, Sir, I have made a serious mistake in passing over an important measure, or rather three measures, which I think I ought to have mentioned to the House. It was in my anxiety to get at the Bill of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire that I overlooked them. The first is the Bill dealing with Corrupt Practices. That has made considerable progress, and it is the intention of the Government to persevere with it. It would involve great loss and waste of the time of the House if we entertained any intention not to send that Bill on to the other House with a view to its passing into law. There are two other Bills on important subjects—one relating to certain boroughs, the total or partial disfranchisement of which is provided for; the other is a Bill relating to the amendment and continuance of the Ballot Act. With respect to these two subjects, I cannot, at the present moment, announce any final decision. Our proceedings must depend upon the progress of Business. I, therefore, distinguish between them and the Corrupt Practices Bill, upon which our mind is certainly made up, as to our duty in persevering with them. With respect to these, it will be our duty to take further time before we arrive at a conclusion. There are two other subjects, one the amendment of the Land Act, of which I have sufficiently disposed for the present purpose; the other is the important question of Procedure. At the present moment I have no positive announcement to make excepting this—that the Government remain more than ever convinced that a satisfactory and thorough settlement of the question of Procedure may, in one sense, be said to transcend every other measure of importance—in this sense, that upon it depends the efficiency as well as the dignity of the great legislative instrument by which the Business of the Empire is mainly carried on—namely, the British House of Commons. With the evils of the present system we shall deem it our duty to deal if any legitimate method be open to us. We shall deem it our duty not to remit the settlement of this question of Procedure to another Session of Parliament in the coming year. We desire that when Parliament meets for its annual Session in February next, or about its usual time, whatever precisely that time may be, it shall not have about its neck the terrible embarrassment brought about by the present state of its Rules and Orders, but shall be enabled to set about with something like its old energy and dignity to the transaction of its Business. At the present moment, I do not go further; but with respect to those matters on which I have not spoken definitely, when we obtain some further daylight, with respect to the two Bills now before the House, I shall be desirous, and it will be quite right and just, to give the House some further information.

Mr. Gladstone

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill have precedence, on every day for which it is set down, of all other Orders of the Day and Notices of Motions, except the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill.”—(Mr. Gladstone.)

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE:

Mr. Speaker, as far as relates to the particular measure to which this Motion points, I think that the right hon. Gentleman has undoubtedly, from his point of view, stated the case very fairly. But I think we ought to take care, before we assent to the proposal he makes, to enter these two caveats. In the first place, it must not be assumed that by giving assent to the proposal that we should lay aside all other Business for the purpose of proceeding with this Bill with regard to arrears that we are giving assent to the scope and merits of the Bill. I am quite aware of the inconvenience that arises from keeping this burning question open any longer than can be avoided; and I am, on that ground, not unprepared to agree to the proposal for the rapid discussion of that Bill, subject to one or two reservations. But I think it ought to be clearly understood that we do not thereby abandon the objection which many of us feel to this Bill, and that we shall not refrain from criticizing, and even, if necessary, opposing it. Besides that general observation, I wish to put a particular question to the right hon. Gentleman, with regard to certain information which I think the House ought to be in possession of before we proceed to the discussion of that Bill. There were two questions put last week—one by myself, the other by my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith).

MR. GLADSTONE: It was an omission on my part. I should have mentioned that. The first Paper relating to the sufficiency of the Church Surplus Fund, and the finding of the money, is actually in type, and, I hope, will be in the Vote Office this afternoon and circulated to-morrow. The second Paper is also all but ready, and will be in the hands of Members, I hope, to-morrow or the next day.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE : That is satisfactory so far as it goes. We shall have time, no doubt, to examine that. With regard to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, that the Bill should go into Committee pro forma, that undoubtedly will be convenient, and we shall have no objection to make. Then we have had from the Prime Minister, besides, a statement with regard to the general condition of Business and the prospects of the year. I must say, from one or two points of view, I feel disappointed by the statement which has just been made; and while I quite agree that it is of importance that we should not lose any time that can be avoided in proceeding with these Irish Bills, I do think there are other questions which ought to be borne in mind, and about which far too little has been said. With regard to the Budget Bill, the right hon. Gentleman said that it was one of the measures that would be proceeded with. We knew that; but what we want to know is, when it will be proceeded with? Is it intended that the Budget Bill is to stand over until after the two Irish Bills have been disposed of? I cannot help thinking that that would lead to some financial inconvenience. I do not know how the financial arrangements of the country would stand, with leaving a Bill of that sort over to the end of the financial year. Whether it has been considered or not, we ought to be told when the Bill is likely to be taken, or whether we are to wait for the indefinite period pointed out by the description that it will be not only after the Arrears Bill, but after the Prevention of Crime Bill has been concluded. I rather infer from what was said by the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the Carriage Tax that the proposal is likely to be withdrawn. If so, that would answer the question which otherwise I should put; but if it were persevered with, we must remember that it will be an additional tax, imposed for the purpose of giving certain relief, and we shall require to be informed how that relief is given, and take care that at the end of the Session we have not been putting on a burden without giving any relief. If I am correct in reading between the lines of what the Prime Minister has said, and in inferring that the Carriage Tax is likely to be withdrawn, we shall not be put in that particular position. But it seems to me that in the minds of all who feel strongly on the question of local burdens, some dissatisfaction will arise that the question of the Road Tax should not have been dealt with after all; and my hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Harcourt) may, perhaps, feel that he has a word or two to say upon this subject at the proper time. There is another point on which we have been told nothing, and that is, what are we to do about Committee of Supply? Now, undoubtedly, the Business of Ireland is extremely important, but the Business of Supply is, perhaps, the primary duty of the House of Commons; and we have had this year uncommonly few opportunities of proceeding with Supply, which, consequently, is in a very backward state. I have no accurate account of the precise state of the Votes; but my impression is that only one Vote has been taken for the Navy, eight for the Army, and I think the Education Vote has been taken, but not the whole of it, and some two or three Votes of comparatively little importance have been taken in the first class of the Civil Service Estimates. That on the 20th of June is by no means large progress, and there are certain matters in regard to these Estimates which demand our examination. We on this side of the House have been reproached for our extravagance, and we want to have an opportunity of seeing some of that economy practised which was so loudly preached, that we may have an opportunity of profiting by the lesson. We have not been told anything with regard to the other Bills of Her Majesty's Government. There has been a very clean sweep of a considerable number of measures mentioned in the Queen's Speech. With regard to those which have been proceeded with, undoubtedly I express the general feeling on this side of the House when I say that we are glad to hear that the Government do not intend to drop the Corrupt Practices Bill. A great deal of time has been spent on it, it is a very important Bill, and we are glad it is to be proceeded with. I am not sure that it will not be found possible to deal with one or two other Bills which have made progress, either in the hands of the Government, or in those of private Members. The Agricultural Bills, to which reference has been made, are, doubtless, important Bills. I speak especially of the Agricultural Bills which have been mentioned by the Prime Minister, and which I think of great importance. I will also venture to refer to another Bill, which is in the hands of a private Member opposite, and which was to have been one of the Government measures. I mean the Bankruptcy Bill, which has made some progress. I suppose this Bill will be proceeded with. These are the matters upon which we must accept such a statement as the Government can make. Subject to the question which I have asked as to when the right hon. Gentleman proposed to proceed with the Budget Bill, and also to what I have said of the importance of taking Supply, I should have no further observations to make upon the necessary measures which are likely to be before us. But I must say one word on the subject of the Rules of the House. It seems to me that the Government are taking a course with regard to the Procedure Rules which is not likely to facilitate the real Business of the House. It seems to me that a great deal of time has been consumed in the present Session—I will not use the word “wasted”—by a not very well advised attempt to pass those Rules. I cannot but think that much wiser steps might have been taken. A great deal of irritation might have been avoided, and practical improvements made in the Rules of Procedure, if the Government could have persuaded themselves to take the matter up in a different way. I am quite aware that when the Government have got into a contest with a certain part of the House, and feel themselves supported by a majority behind them, it is difficult to stop in a course on which they have entered and to strike out a new one. But so much time has elapsed, circumstances have so much changed in many particulars, that I cannot but think that the Government may yet be disposed to take counsel in this matter, and to consider whether they cannot make these proposals in a form more likely to be acceptable to the general feeling of the House and more efficient to the purposes in view. Whether we deal with it in this Session, that is in the usual Session, or in the manner hinted at by the Junior Lord of the Treasury (Mr. R. W. Duff), and rather ingeniously hinted at by the First Lord of the Treasury when he said that the Government would not be willing to remit this question to another Session—which was rather significant of its being dealt with in the coming autumn—I can only say we must wait. But I think the last proposal is one which will be extremely unpopular, and I greatly doubt whether it will tend to the satisfactory settlement of the question. Well, there is still a subject which has not been alluded to by the Prime Minister, upon which I should like to say a word or two, and I would introduce it by the observation that a great many complaints have been made, and the country at large has been a good deal surprised in consequence of the large and increasing number of Questions continually put in this House. No doubt the number of questions is large. But it is to be borne in mind that one cause is the fewness of opportunities for discussing questions of importance in consequence of the absorption of the time of the House by the Government taking possession of private Members' days, and also of the length of time expended in discussing Government measures. I only mention that in passing, in order to say that I think the Government, in considering the time which remains at their disposal, have forgotten that it will be important before long that we should have the means of discussing a portion of their foreign policy. There has been no disposition—on the contrary, there has been the direct opposite of a disposition—on the part of this side of the House to embarrass or annoy the Government in the policy they are pursuing. But do not let the Government deceive themselves in consequence of that. Do not let them think there is any indifference on our part. It is a subject which it will be necessary for us to discuss, and before very long we shall have to call upon the Government to state when it will be possible to give information which will enable us to discuss it. It will be quite impossible to make a reckoning as to the close of the Session without taking into account the necessity of that. I do not know that I need say anything more on these points at the present moment. I think, as far as the proposal goes, that the Government might have left it till later. But we have no reason to object to the particular proposal to do for the Bill in its remaining stages what we did at its second reading. We gave it precedence on its second reading, as we gave precedence to the Prevention of Crime Bill. We think the same course may be followed with regard to the Arrears Bill, with the understanding that we do not waive any objections or abandon any intentions we may have of criticizing or even opposing it.

MR. GLADSTONE said, if any right hon. Gentleman or hon. Gentleman opposite wished to put questions on any of the subjects he had mentioned, perhaps it would be more convenient that they should be asked now, so that he might deal with them all at once.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that the Motion was that the Arrears of Rent Bill should have precedence on every day on which it was set down. The effect of that would be to enable the Government to take other Business on Government nights, and the Arrears of Rent Bill on Wednesdays and on the Morning Sittings of Tuesday and Friday. No doubt, it was the intention of the Government to take the Arrears of Rent Bill from day to day; but, as he said, the Motion would enable them simply to appropriate the days of private Members. He presumed that, with the necessary intervention of Supply, it was intended that the Bill should be continued from day to day.

MR. ONSLOW inquired of the Speaker whether, if he put a question to the Prime Minister, to suit the right hon. Gentleman's convenience, he could afterwards speak on the general policy of the Government?

MR. SPEAKER said, if the hon. Gentleman addressed the House now, he could not afterwards make another speech.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON asked whether the Government would endeavour to proceed with the Prevention of Floods Bill on an early day?

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the Prime Minister had spoken of the former efficiency of the House of Commons, and he rejoiced that he had done so, for they had been Members of the same Party from 1843 to 1846. As an old Member, he desired to remark that the delay and obstruction which had been witnessed of late would have been quite impossible in former Parliaments. The House had no right to throw upon its Leader the responsibility for its own inefficiency. There seemed a change in the present House from the temper and disposition of former Houses. There was more individuality, and less independence among Members generally. The Rules of the House were the same as they were in 1843 and in 1846. The House had forgotten its corporate duty. Supposing that the House needed new Rules, as had, indeed, been admitted, he (Mr. Newdegate) could only say that the House was already very late in adopting them. The habit of putting questions had grown into an abuse. This practice frittered away the responsibility of Ministers, while it proved the inability of the House to exact their responsibility. As an old Member, he would appeal to the House to vindicate the transaction of its Business from the stigma now resting upon it.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he hoped that the Settled Land Bill of Lord Cairns, which had passed the House of Lords, and, after a second reading in the Commons, had been referred to a Select Committee, and which had been regarded most favourably in all quarters, would receive, at all events, the favourable attention of the Government this Session. It affected the interests of a large number of people.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he felt grateful to the Prime Minister for his sympathetic tone with regard to a Bill in which he felt interested. The right hon. Gentleman made a suggestion with regard to Bills relating to agriculture, without binding himself to a suggestion which, he thought, it was his duty to notice. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to suggest that those Bills should be referred to something like a Grand Committee. There were three of them, and one that stood in the name of the hon. Baronet the Member for North Devonshire (Sir Thomas Acland) contained so much which he individually approved that he did not think there would be any objection to referring it in connection with one which stood in his own name to a Select Committee; but the Bill of the hon. Member for Bedfordshire (Mr. J. Howard) contained principles to which he was so entirely opposed, that he must guard himself at once against being supposed to be willing to have anything to do with it. As to the kind of Committee alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman, he felt precluded from expressing any opinion, or, at all events, a favourable one; he could not predict whether its proceedings would be likely to facilitate the progress of a measure. For this Session, at any rate, he should like to see the two Bills referred to a Select Committee. As to the Rules of Procedure, there was no monopoly on either side of a desire to see some effective change made in them. He would suggest the substitution of what he would describe as an individual clôture for the general and sweeping clôture proposed by the Prime Minister's Resolution—a solution of the difficulty which he believed would find more favour than the right hon. Gentleman imagined. As to the present Motion, it was hardly fair to ask them to assent to it before they had seen the Amendments proposed to be made in the Arrears Bill; it was possible they might influence Members in considering the Motion, particularly if, like himself, their views were hostile to the measure. But why was the Motion made at the present time? It seemed premature until they approached somewhat nearer the completion of the Committee on the Crime Bill, especially as it was understood there was no intention of taking any other Business until the Bill was through Committee. The Motion might very well have been postponed at least a few days longer. He hoped it would not be agreed to, unless they had a distinct assurance that no further attempt would be made to carry the Procedure Resolutions in their present shape during the present Session.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Prime Minister whether he would arrange that the Committee on the Arrears Bill should take precedence of the Report on the Prevention of Crime Bill? He also wished to direct his particular attention to the extreme importance of endeavouring to do something this Session for the agricultural labourers of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman might have noticed that he (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) had had a Motion on the Paper dealing with this subject, and that, as it had occupied the second place on the Orders of the Day for this evening, he ought to have fairly counted upon the subject being discussed to-night had it not been cut off by the urgency given to the Crime Bill. He should do his best during the remainder of the Session to obtain a chance of bringing the subject before the House; but he sought to impress upon the Prime Minister the great necessity of the Government taking the matter up, so that it might be dealt with in an effective way this Session. It ought to be clearly understood whether the right hon. Gentleman intended to take up the Arrears Bill on any night on which the Government were unable to proceed further with the Crime Bill. He also thought that fair opportunity should be given to the Opposition to discuss the increasing financial expenditure of the Government.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he hoped the Government would not accede to the request of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) to send two Bills only to a Select Committee, and leave out that of the hon. Member for Bedfordshire (Mr. J. Howard), which he believed the farmers of England would very much prefer to the other measures. Let that Bill be examined and considered along with the others, and it would be found to compare most favourably in the best interests of agriculture. The very fact of the hon. Member condemning it proved that there was some good in it. He hoped the Prime Minister would do justice to the farmers, and if Bills were to be committed to a Grand Committee, then the three should be dealt with on equal terms.

MR. RITCHIE said, he desired to ask the Prime Minister whether he had the slightest intention of putting down the Arrears Bill and taking it on any night before the disposal of the Crime Bill? On one previous occasion the Arrears Bill was placed at the head of the Orders before Supply on a Friday, obviously, he presumed, with the intention of that Bill being taken, if possible, before Supply. He feared the reason why the right hon. Gentleman was making this Motion just now was that he might have an opportunity of proceeding with the Arrears Bill, perhaps at a very late hour of the evening, after he had been unable to proceed any further with the Crime Bill that night. Such a course would be extremely inconvenient. With regard to the Budget Bill, the right hon. Gentleman must not suppose that by giving up the increase of taxation, as he proposed to do, he would dispose of a question in which many hon. Members felt a deep interest. They thought it was high time that the question of the management of finance by Her Majesty's Government should be fully discussed. No question influenced more the decision of the constituencies at the last General Election than the attack made by those who were at present in power upon the financial arrangements of those who were now in Opposition. They ought to understand that a full opportunity would be given to discuss, not only the actual proposals made by the Government in this year's Budget, but also the whole scale of expenditure in this year's Budget, with a view of ascertaining how it was that the expenditure of the Government was on a much larger scale than the expenditure which they so much denounced when they were in Opposition.

Mr. Chaplin

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, the Prevention of Floods Bill raised a matter which the present condition of the country made one of considerable urgency and importance; and he hoped the Prime Minister would not entirely exclude the further consideration of that Bill from the programme of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. GORST said, he thought the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), and the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie), gave expression to a very natural curiosity, which must be felt in many parts of the House, as to why the Government made this particular proposal at this particular time. It was quite obvious that there was no necessity for it. The Motion, if carried, could not possibly be operative at all for a week, or even 10 days. Why, then, should the Government have come down on this particular afternoon to ask the House to assent to this apparently useless proposal? He thought the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) had indicated what possibly might be the reason of this; and he should be very glad if he could feel quite certain that they were not on the trace of some fresh compact between Her Majesty's Government and those Members representing Irish constituencies, who had hitherto so persistently and with such apparent zeal opposed the Prevention of Crime Bill. Would the Government, in answer to the appeal of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, assure the House that they were not going to act on the suggestion of the hon. Member for Longford, and to take the Committee on the Arrears Bill before the Report on the Prevention of Crime Bill, so that while they were trying to coerce the Irish Members to pass the Prevention of Crime Bill, by holding the Arrears Bill before them, they might, perhaps, try to coerce other hon. Members to pass the Arrears Bill, in order that the Crime Prevention Bill might afterwards follow? What-ever might be the intentions of the Government, there was no doubt that the introduction of the Arrears Bill operated in Ireland as a "no rent" manifesto, which was far more effectual for its purpose than the previous "no rent" manifesto that was issued. Moreover, it was more dangerous to the Irish people, because, while the authors of the earlier "no rent" manifesto were confined in prison, the authors of the second "no rent" manifesto were Her Majesty's Government sitting on the Treasury Bench. It might be that the hopes of hon. Gentlemen representing Irish constituencies had been somewhat blunted, and that the Motion made to-day was a kind of refresher to show them that the Government were in earnest, and meant to carry out what some people believed to be the bargain made in the great "Kilmainham Treaty." He would be no party to a proceeding of this kind, and he hoped there were some Members on that side of the House who would support him in dividing the House against the proposition which the right hon. Gentleman had made. It was his intention to oppose the Arrears Bill most resolutely at every step, because he believed it was a measure which would be unjust to the taxpayers of the United Kingdom, and mischievous and pauperizing to the Irish people. He promised the right hon. Gentleman that when the Bill was brought forward for discussion he would give it a most relentless opposition. If hon. Members were prepared to oppose a Bill of this kind, they had a right to refuse to give the Government facilities for passing it. By voting for the Resolution they would be making themselves a party to the refresher which was thrown out in order to catch the votes of Members from Ireland. In his opinion, those who were opposed to the Arrears Bill ought to vote against the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. PARNELL said, that, as the Government intended to commit the Arrears Bill pro forma, he wished to direct attention to a matter which, he thought, was germane to that measure. The Land Act of last Session, according to the construction placed on it, permitted the judicial rent to date from the day of the application of the tenant in all cases where the tenant made his application on the occasion of the first sitting of the Court. About 40,000 or 50,000 made application at that time, and, consequently, they were placed in a very advantageous position as compared with those who made application afterwards. He would ask Her Majesty's Government to consider whether they could not see their way to make all arrears of rent which did not now come within the provisions of this Bill to be computed on the basis of the decision of the Court, where the tenant had made an application to have a fair rent fixed—that was to say, if a tenant was paying £15 a-year rent, and his judicial rent was fixed at £10, he should be entitled to claim a rebate of £5. In that way the tenants who had not yet made an application to the Court would be encouraged to enter the Land Court, and their landlords would be encouraged to make those settlements out of Court which were so desirable, if the Act were to succeed in its object. He was afraid he had not conveyed his meaning very clearly, but perhaps the Prime Minister would understand it.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I will first of all notice the last suggestion which has been made to me. The suggestion is that, on the committal pro forma of the Arrears Bill, the Government should introduce a provision which would have the effect of applying the reduction of rent which may be made by the Court to the arrears of rent. I am bound to say, without at present entering into the merits of the proposal, that, as far as I have ever viewed the question of committal pro forma, my opinion, and, I think, the practice of the House is, that the changes introduced are introduced for the mechanical convenience—if I may use the phrase—of all parties, and that they are generally understood to be changes in furtherance of the principles of a Bill, but not changes introducing new principles of importance. Therefore, such a subject could not be entertained in connection with a committal pro forma. Even if the proposal of the hon. Member was fit to be introduced—and I am bound to say I do not think it is—I cannot, therefore, see my way to a discussion of it in the House. With regard to the suggestion of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie), I quite agree with him that the Arrears Bill is a measure of such importance that it ought to be taken at the commencement of the evening, as is the usual practice. With respect to the precedence between the Prevention of Crime Bill and the Arrears Bill, I have to remind the House of what I ventured to say on more than one occasion—namely, that the Crime Bill takes precedence of the Arrears Bill, but that the convenience, and even the necessity of the case, requires that there shall be intervals at certain stages in the prosecution of the Crime Bill, and these intervals I should wish to turn to account for the purpose of forwarding the Arrears Bill. With regard to the question why this proposal is made to-day, it should be recollected that it was made to-day after a Notice of several days. The hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) professes to know exactly how long the Committee on the Crime Prevention Bill will last; but I have not so much foresight as the hon. and learned Gentleman, and it is our duty to be prepared for any acceleration of the proceedings that might take place. We may have clauses less thorny and difficult than those with which we have been dealing, which may enable the House to dispose of the Bill sooner than at present appears probable. With regard to the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), I do not intend to interfere in any way, on the part of the Government, as to the Bills he has mentioned; but I wish to leave the matter entirely to the free consideration of those concerned. With regard to the Settled Land Bill, of course the Government can say nothing positive, except that they would endeavour to give the same fair play and fair consideration, when the question arises, to that Bill which they have given upon former occasions. With regard to the question by the late First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. W. H. Smith), the right hon. Gentleman is perfectly right in his views. It is necessary for us to reserve the power of proceeding with other Business, because of the necessity which may arise for Supply, or in case it should be found necessary to proceed with the Tax Bill; but unquestionably we have no intention of interpolating any Government Business, unless it may be a matter of necessity, to the prejudice of the Prevention of Crime Bill in the first instance, and the Arrears Bill in the second. With regard to the Bill for the Prevention of Floods, we shall be very glad if opportunities can be found for proceeding with it; but it is not possible at present to make any positive announcement respecting it. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote) asked when we should proceed with the Budget? That is not an unnatural question. We have not had, as yet, any intimation from the Department of positive inconvenience arising from the delay. I must say the delay is open to objection. It is the regular practice that the Budget Bill should come forward a short time after the Budget, and it is a practice which we have only been parties to interrupting because of the extreme necessity of other Business. As it is, the Budget Bill will come forward, should it be practically necessary, whenever we find the necessity arise; and if the necessity does not arise, it will come forward when we have proceeded with the Crime Bill and the Arrears Bill to such a point as to make it not inconvenient to the House to take it; and the same with respect to Supply. No very long time will elapse before it will be necessary to make an application on the subject of Supply.

Mr. Gorst

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: A Vote on Account?

MR. GLADSTONE: The first necessity will not be a Vote on Account, but for one of the great Services, and we could not ask the House to go at large into the fields of Supply and Miscellaneous Services without causing a very great interruption and delay in these Irish measures; and that, I think, would be even a greater evil than the postponement of Supply, which I quite admit to be a serious evil. With reference to the subject of Procedure, various suggestions and recommendations have been made. But I think it is better that I should reserve myself in regard to the subject until further progress has been made towards the termination of discussion upon the two Irish Bills. But in one matter I agree very much with the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote), that the time we have already spent on the subject of Procedure ought not to be thrown away, unless it be an absolute necessity; and I think I have already said that nothing but absolute necessity will prevent us going forward during the present year—and I hope during the present Session—with the subject of Procedure. Beyond that I cannot enter into it in detail at the present moment, but must wait until circumstances are more matured.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, there was one point that had scarcely been cleared up, and that was, what were the relative positions to be occupied hereafter by the two Bills—the Prevention of Crime Bill and the Arrears Bill? The Prime Minister had spoken of availing himself of the interstices that might occur in the Prevention of Crime Bill, in order to deal with the question of arrears. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it was his intention to keep back the Prevention of Crime Bill for any purpose one moment longer than was absolutely required for taking its various stages in regular form? For instance, when that Bill had passed through Committee, would a discussion take place upon the Arrears Bill only until the reprint of the Prevention of Crime Bill had been placed in the hands of hon. Members?

MR. GLADSTONE: The progress of the Prevention of Crime Bill will only be delayed when it is for the convenience of the House.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that the announcement made last night by the Chief Secretary for Ireland had caused the passing of the Prevention of Crime Bill to be a matter of more importance than the convenience of the House of Commons, for he had stated that if the Bill was discussed at great length, and thereby delayed, it was impossible to say what might not happen before it became law. According to the statements of those representing the Irish Department of the Government, the importance of passing the Prevention of Crime Bill far transcended the convenience of the House of Commons. That being the case, did the right hon. Gentleman intend to delay that Bill by a single moment?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, no; not one single moment.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he thought it only right to indicate to the right hon. Gentleman that if he was under the impression that the Arrears Bill was one involving mere detail he was entirely mistaken. He (Mr. J. Lowther) thought he spoke the sentiments of the large majority of the Conservative Party, when he said he believed that the Arrears Bill was offering a direct premium on fraud and an official recognition of dishonesty. The right hon. Gentleman, on a previous occasion, had taken him to task for using language outside the House which he was not prepared to use in it; but, without reproducing his or any other speeches, he would merely say that it was within the knowledge of the right hon. Gentleman that the Arrears Bill had been described as part and parcel of a compact, treaty, or arrangement, and as partaking of the character of infamy. He believed it had been so described in the House of Commons—not by him, but with the general approval of the Conservative Members. With feelings so strong as many hon. Members entertained with regard to that Bill, it was not consistent with their duty not to make the most emphatic protests against the principles upon which it was based. He confessed he had heard the speech made by the Chief Secretary for Ireland with great regret. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of evictions and outrages in the same breath. He had spoken of simultaneous Returns of the evictions and outrages that had taken place, and he had, moreover, spoken of the cruelty of evictions. With the exception of two expressions of opinion which were historical, he had never heard any expression of opinion more calculated to cause serious evils in Ireland. The Chief Secretary had coupled the legitimate exercise of legal rights—rights which were legal at the present moment—in the same breath with breaches of the law, and even with terrible murders. The two expressions of opinion antecedent to that of the right hon. Gentleman were the well-known declaration of Lord Clarendon, in which eviction and felony were coupled in the same sentence, and the other expression of opinion was that which the Prime Minister, to some extent, apparently modified the other night.

MR. GLADSTONE: Never.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the right hon. Gentleman had not heard what he had to state.

MR. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman said I apparently modified an expression of opinion in regard to evictions, and I said "Never."

MR. J. LOWTHER: What he (Mr. J. Lowther) said was that the right hon. Gentleman modified an expression of opinion with which he had been credited with regard to the opinion, as he termed it, that the people of Ireland might form in regard to evictions.

MR. GLADSTONE: I say I never modified it.

MR. J. LOWTHER begged to submit to the correction. The right hon. Gentleman had, however, given a correction of that which he characterized as an erroneous impression that prevailed in the public mind respecting a well-known passage in one of his celebrated speeches. Passing that by, he would just emphasize this point—that a Representative of the Government having coupled evictions and outrages in the same breath, it became a matter for the House to consider how far they were entitled to allow measures dealing with those two subjects to be simultaneously dealt with without entering their most emphatic protest. The Chief Secretary had also drawn a distinction between two different classes of evictions—namely, those of tenants who could and would not pay, and those who were actually unable to pay. Was he to understand the right hon. Gentleman to hold that there was an act of cruelty and hardship on the part of the landlord involved in parting with a tenant who was hopelessly insolvent? He rather gathered, from an expression which fell from the Chief Secretary the other day, that the right hon. Gentleman considered it an act of cruelty for a landlord to evict from his estate a tenant who was hopelessly insolvent, and who had no prospect of ever being able to pay—that it was a hardship to evict a tenant who was absolutely incapable of carrying on his occupation as a farmer. Now, against any such idea he must utter his emphatic protest. In his judgment, if a tenant was not merely suffering from temporary adversity, but from hopeless insolvency, and was unable to pay his creditors in general, and his landlord in particular—if his landlord saw that there was no reasonable prospect of the tenant regaining his solvency, and pursuing agriculture with advantage to himself and to the community, then the landlord was thoroughly justified, and, in fact, it was his bounden duty, to part with that tenant.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR rose to Order, and asked the Speaker whether the right hon. Gentleman was justified, on the Motion then before the House, in discussing the details of the Arrears Bill?

MR. SPEAKER: The Question immediately before the House is simply a proposal for giving precedence in certain circumstances to a particular Bill, and the right hon. Gentleman is bound to confine himself to that Question.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he meant to do that, and the Speaker would no doubt have called him to Order had he failed to do so. He had consistently throughout his observations avoided entering in any shape or form into the details of the Arrears Bill. He had merely pointed out to the House matters for consideration at the present stage of their discussion. He hoped that the Government would be prepared to give them an assurance that not a moment would unnecessarily be lost in the prosecution of the Prevention of Crime Bill—that was to say, that if the discussion on the Arrears Bill, which must of necessity be one of some duration, should not be brought to a termination before the Prevention of Crime Bill was ready for another stage, the Government would proceed with all despatch with that important measure, which stood first for their consideration. In conclusion, he would only say that as the Arrears Bill involved the proposal that the honest and industrious tenant farmers of England, and the struggling taxpayers of the United Kingdom at large, who had honourably endeavoured to meet their legal obligations during a period of great hardship, should pay the rent of the disloyal and seditious persons who had, during exceptionally favourable seasons, deliberately withheld their rent, which they were able to pay if they were solvent men, the Government must expect a full and ample discussion of so novel and so serious a proposal.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he was in rather an awkward position, for the right hon. Gentleman had made one or two remarks about himself which he was afraid of answering, or referring to, without being out of Order. He hoped, however, he might be allowed to protest against the deductions of the right hon. Gentleman from a simple sentence of his the other day. The right hon. Gentleman said that he had coupled two very different and incongruous things—the exercise of the landlord's legal rights with breaches of law and actual murder, and he called that an expression of opinion on his part. Whence did it all come? Because he had said that in addition to a daily return of outrages the Government proposed to have a daily return of evictions. He had simply intended to justify the labour and expense of a daily return by a precedent; and no Member who heard him could have thought that he in any way coupled the two ideas. Then the right hon. Member asked whether he inferred any cruelty from the landlord parting with the tenant who was hopelessly insolvent? [MR. J. LOWTHER: Hardship.] Well, he would call it hardship—whether he inferred hardship on the part of the landlord who turned out a tenant who was hopelessly insolvent. No; he inferred no such thing. What he did say was that if, as in the cases which their officers reported, the rent of the holding was far too high; if the tenant had gone through several very bad seasons, and from no fault of his own could not pay the rent; then, at the time when there had passed through both Houses of Parliament a Land Act which was the Constitutional and received method of pacifying Ireland by fixing a fair rent, and when a Bill was on the Table for the purpose of enabling a tenant to pay his arrears, the landlord who put the tenant out of the power of getting the advantage of these two measures sadly hampered the Executive in Ireland, and did something in spirit, if not illegally, to defeat the intentions of the Legislature.

MR. ONSLOW said, it was the duty of the Tory Party to vote against the Motion, because they did not really know what the Arrears Bill was at the present time. To put himself in Order, and to give the Prime Minister an opportunity of answering one or two questions he was about to put, he should, if necessary, conclude with a Motion. He wished to learn from the Prime Minister whether proper opportunities would be given for bringing forward important questions connected with the affairs of Egypt and of India. If the programme of the Government were carried out, he feared that they could not have a discussion on the Indian Budget much before the beginning of September. He asked whether the Prime Minister intended to pass the Rules of Procedure or the Corrupt Practices Bill first? The Corrupt Practices Bill could not be duly considered by the House if it were put off till the end of August, when there would probably be few Members present. Again, were they to rattle through the Estimates this year in the same way as they did last year? The Arrears Bill was an iniquitous measure, and one to which hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House should endeavour to offer a strenuous and persistent opposition. He did not believe that the country at heart cared two straws about the clôture Resolutions. It was easy for the right hon. Gentlemen to get some Liberal meeting now and then to pass a resolution urging the House to deal with them; but the inconvenience of an Autumn Session would far outweigh any facilities which the passing of the Resolutions would afford. Complaints had been made by the Government of the way in which the practice of questioning Ministers had increased. That increase, however, was solely due to the reticence of the Government, particularly of the Prime Minister and the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; and if the Government would cease to give evasive replies they would find the number of Questions at once diminish. He wished to know whether it would be possible to take a discussion of the affairs of Egypt, if necessary, between the passing of the Prevention of Crime Bill and the Arrears Bill, a discussion from which they ought not to be precluded? He should be glad also to hear from the Government when the Indian Budget was to be looked for, and whether another Vote was to be taken on account, making the almost unprecedented number of three Votes on Account that Session?

MR. O'DONNELL said, he thought the House had received another illustration of the sort of leadership exercised by the right hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) over the Conservative Party. He did not think he would be far wrong in stating that, for this occasion at least, the right hon. Baronet had been formally deposed on the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), seconded, with his usual rollicking political incompetence, by the right hon. Gentleman the ex-Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. J. Lowther). He was afraid that the spirit which had been displayed by the light horse of the Conservative Party on this occasion was only too sure an indication of the treatment which the Arrears Bill would receive in "another place," when it would come more particularly under the purview of a Conservative statesman who, in many respects, was not altogether dissimilar from the political temperament of the ex-Chief Secretary for Ireland. He had protested before, and of course he would protest again, against the deplorable action of the Government in introducing a Coercion Bill, destined, as he believed it to be, to strangle most of the benefits which might otherwise arise from their remedial legislation; but at present he merely wished to observe that in the observations which had fallen from the lips of the Premier they had not heard the slightest indication of any intention of discussing the Colonial and Indian policy of the Government. He ventured to say that the policy which had handed over to John Dunn a nation on whom they had unjustly made war, which had permitted the deplorable scandals in the Pacific, whereby the British flag was made a veritable black flag of piracy, and which refused to listen to the wrongs of 250,000,000 tortured human beings in India, was worthy the attention of Parliament. He could assure the House that the grievances of the Indian people were becoming matters of comment in the Native Press of India, and even in the Press of Egypt; and the Government were bound to give facilities for discussing them as a part of the Business of this Imperial Parliament.

MR. SPEAKER: I must invite the hon. Member to keep to the Question before the House.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he had been speaking to that portion of the Business of the House which concerned the people of India. He was not aware that he was more out of Order than the Prime Minister, who introduced several subjects connected with their Business, but omitted some of the most important. Would the Government give any opportunity for condemning the default in bringing to justice the murderers of Bengal prisoners, and the flogging of starving prisoners?

Mr. RAIKES said, he did not intend to travel so far a-field as the hon. Member who had just sat down; but he wished to express his entire concurrence with the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst). No reason existed why special facilities should be given to the Government for passing the Arrears Bill through the House. They on that side of the House were not only opposed to the principle of the Bill, but they regarded it as a measure which was tainted in its origin; and they knew it to be the first-fruit of that transaction which in that House they must not call a treaty, but which was described by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford as a negotiation. He (Mr. Raikes) rose more particularly for the purpose of asking the House whether it was not possible to obtain from the Government some more satisfactory and definite forecast as to what was in the mind of Her Majesty's Ministers with regard to the other Business of the Session? They had heard something that day about the clôture Resolutions. He rather objected to that form of nomenclature, because there was only one Resolution which was directly aimed at the clôture. The other Resolutions affected the Business of the House; and he was sure that many hon. Members on both sides would have been in favour of many of them were it not that they were tied by the neck to one objectionable Resolution which excited the hostility of the House. At a proper time hon. Members on that side would have been perfectly willing to have considered and passed a great many of them, and the Government might now have been using them to facilitate the discussion of the Prevention of Crime Bill then before them. He wished the Government would enter into some definite engagement as to when these proposals would be brought on. Something dark had been thrown out by the youngest Member of Her Majesty's Government, and something still darker had been suggested by the Prime Minister with regard to an Autumn Session. He did not himself object to an Autumn Sitting; certainly, it was preferable to forcing the Resolutions upon a thin House in the third or fourth week in August. He hoped that some assurance would be given by the Government that, if they contemplated the resumption of the consideration of the Procedure Rules this Session, they intended to avoid the public scandal of thrusting those Rules down the throat of the House at a period of the Session when it would be impossible for them to be more than hastily and imperfectly considered. He wished to say a word with regard to the state of Supply. In general there was circulated among the Members of that House a little, but a very useful paper, which showed the state of Supply; but this year, perhaps for economical reasons, the Government had not circulated what would be most likely nearly a blank sheet. He had understood that when the Government asked for the last Vote on Account they had intimated that they would not ask for another without urgent necessity. The fact was that, both as regarded home affairs and our foreign policy, our Government had reached the no plus ultra of absurdity. It appeared to him that Ministers lived in a fool's paradise, and were engaged in balancing the two halves of their Irish policy, considering it to be of the greatest importance which of those two halves was to be proceeded with first, while every other consideration of either home or foreign affairs was put aside. Instead of either English or Scotch legislation being proceeded with, the House met every evening to witness a fight—which, after all, might be merely a sham one—between the Government and their Irish allies. He was glad that the Irish Sunday Closing Bill was to be included in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill, because the House would be saved from a very tedious discussion on the subject. It had been suggested that the Agricultural Holdings Bills, the Scotch Entail Bill, and the Scotch Endowment Bill should be referred to Grand Committees. It would, however, be necessary to discuss carefully the constitution of any Grand Committee, not only on general grounds, but also because otherwise a claim would be put forward that all Irish Business should be referred to a Grand Committee which would consist almost entirely of Irish Members, which would be a most dangerous proceeding. With regard to the Corrupt Practices Bill, there was a general desire on both sides of the House to see that measure passed into law during the present Session. The only objection that he had to take to the action of the Government with regard to that Bill was that they were putting the cart before the horse. He hoped that it was not too late for them to proceed with their Bill for disfranchising the corrupt boroughs before they dealt with corrupt practices. Before they framed fresh laws dealing with corrupt practices, they ought to know what punishment was to be meted out to those who had violated the present law. It was certainly a very cruel thing that the persons and the boroughs implicated should be hung up Session after Session without their knowing whether the Government was in earnest in dealing with them, or whether the House was not to be made a laughing-stock, as far as its professions of purity were concerned. If the Government were determined to have an Autumn Session, let them tell the House so straightforwardly; but do not let these Rules of Procedure be considered at a late period of the present Session.

MR. GIVAN said, he was bound to condemn the tone of the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther) and the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) with reference to the Arrears Bill. Before the release of the Members imprisoned in Kilmainham a requisition, numerously signed by Members on both sides of the House, was presented to the Prime Minister, urging him to deal with the question of arrears; and, under those circumstances, to reiterate, in the tone adopted by the two Members referred to, a charge, which had over and over again been denied, that the action of the Prime Minister was calculated to foster discontent in the minds of the poor farmers of Ireland who awaited the Arrears Bill, and to remove from them the confidence they had in the Government, was unwise. Instead of the Arrears Bill operating as a "no rent" manifesto, as the hon. and learned Member for Chatham stated, it was an "all rent" manifesto, because, immediately that it was introduced, many landlords thought proper to proceed against their tenants for the purpose of recovering all the arrears due to them before the Bill became law. He had in his possession bundles of writs which had been served on poor tenants, and when he looked at the particulars of them he thought it was outrageous that they should be served at all. He had one in which a tenant owed three years' rent. Last year he sold his last cow and thereby paid a year's rent, but was unable to pay more; and yet it was sought to pass judgment on this man, and deprive him of the benefit of the Arrears Bill. He warned the Government that if the Crime Bill was allowed to be put into operation in Ireland unaccompanied by the Arrears Bill, or, at all events, by a prospect of its speedy passing, much crime would be the result. He urged the Prime Minister to deal, if possible, this year with the pressing questions of the date from which judicial rents were to take effect. At present, hundreds and thousands of tenants were unable to get their claims heard. In all their cases, if the Government did not step in, the judicial rent would only date from the gale day succeeding the decision of the Court.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he thought it would be admitted that the Arrears Bill was one of the first importance, and that, as such a short debate took place on the second reading, some time ought to be given for its discussion prior to going into Committee. It seemed to him that it was a Bill which proposed to tax the people of this country to pay rents which dishonest tenants in Ireland had failed to pay. An opportunity ought to be given to those who were opposed to it to discuss its principle. He hoped, as regarded the Indian Budget, that it would be brought forward earlier than it was last year. As regarded the Corrupt Practices and the Disfranchisement Bills, they would like some more information. He thought it very desirable that the latter Bill should be pushed forward. It was a Bill more urgently required for the punishment of offenders, and involving much less detail, than the former. In order to give the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity to reply, he begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. MAC IVER seconded the Motion.

Mr. Raikes

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. R. N. Fowler.)

MR. GLADSTONE: I think the hon. Gentleman will see that it is absolutely beyond my power to give any undertaking with regard to the Disfranchisement Bill. With regard to the question of the Indian Budget, it is a matter on which no opinion can be pronounced in the present state of things. When the necessity has arisen for the consideration of the question it must be regarded in connection with the convenience of the great body of the House; but it will be impossible to give beforehand any engagement as to the position in which it should stand, and its precedence over every other Bill. As regarded an Autumn Session, that was a matter on which they could not then pronounce any opinion. But then, Sir, I have been asked whether it was intended that the Corrupt Practices Bill should take precedence of the Resolutions on Procedure, or whether the Resolutions on Procedure should take precedence of the Corrupt Practices Bill. Sir, I thought it would be quite distinctly understood that the Corrupt Practices Bill was a measure which we were resolved, so far as it depends upon us, to push forward; while with regard to the Resolutions on Procedure, I have said that the mode of dealing with them must stand for further and future consideration, stating at the same time, in the most positive terms at our command, that they would come within the compass of the present year, so as not to go into the next Session. In our opinion, that subject should be thoroughly and effectually dealt with. With regard to the Vote on Account, I cannot understand the meaning of the right hon. Gentleman. No sort of engagement was given that no further Vote should be asked for. Why, Sir, no person in his senses could give such an engagement, and no such engagement could be given. It is quite evident that the question of the Votes must depend on the demands of the various descriptions of Business at the time before the House of Commons; and what I want to point out is, that every unnecessary debate, and every unnecessary speech, however it may profess to aim at the removal of obstruction, and the bringing forward of this question, is in point of fact a practical contribution to enhancing the difficulties of the position in which we stand, and though each of these speeches may be small in themselves, it is the multiplication of them out of which the whole gigantic difficulty arises.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he would not be doing justice to his own convictions if he did not repeat an observation which, on all occasions similar to this, he had annually made since he had the honour of a seat in that House. The Prime Minister was in the same position to-day that every Leader of the House had been in during his observation for the past eight years. He had had to come down at a certain period of the Session, and to acknowledge, in tones of patriotic humiliation, that Parliament was utterly inefficient for the discharge of its great duties, and from all quarters of the House that statement had received support. But what he (Mr. O'Connor Power) marvelled at was the care with which men of all shades of English opinion in that House evaded the one great question which lay at the root of Parliamentary difficulties. The expectation held out to them in relation to certain methods of forwarding the legislation of the country had always been doomed to disappointment. The Government felt that the one thing necessary for restoring the efficiency of Parliament was to pass in their entirety the Rules of Procedure which some months ago were laid on the Table of the House. He ventured to say, and he did not think his prediction would be falsified, that even if these Rules were adopted in their entirety, the Prime Minister would come towards the close of the Session of 1883, and go through the same operation that every Leader of the House of Commons had to go through since the passing of the Reform Bill—namely, to announce the withdrawal of important legislative measures, because Parliament was powerless to deal with them in a manner satisfactory to the country. It was certainly an unpleasant prospect that after the long days they had sat considering public questions, the alternative should be held out to them of sitting into the month of September to discuss Rules of Procedure of doubtful expediency, or of adjourning in the middle of August, and coming back in the middle of October to pass Rules to restore the efficiency of Parliament, or, in other words, to subject themselves to the operation of that coercion which so many of them had been willing to impose on the people of Ireland, in the vain hope of making themselves more efficient for the transaction of Public Business. They would simply put the House into a strait jacket, and then expect its movements to be more rapid, and the result of its proceedings to be more satisfactory. For the eighth year he rose in his place as an Irish Member to say that their difficulties in that House, that the obstruction of important legislative Business which the people of England were calling for, that their difficulties in Ireland, which were now striking at the very foundation of society in the country and threatening the stability of public order, were all referable to the one great cause, and that was that the English House of Commons persisted in managing the domestic affairs of the Irish people, although the experience of 82 years protested with all the voice of impartial history that such a practice was likely to be attended with no appreciable success as far as Ireland was concerned, while it must inflict upon the people of England a continuance of the many difficulties which they had hitherto experienced in carrying out this impossible task. He had intended to put one or two Questions to the Prime Minister with reference to the Land Act; but, as the process of interrogation had been carried so far already, he could only expect fragmentary answers, with which he should not feel satisfied. He intended, however, to interrogate the right hon. Gentleman, on an early day, with reference to the definition of a town park under the Land Act.

EARL PERCY said, that many of the numerous speeches of which the Prime Minister complained as delaying progress were due to the extraordinary course which had been followed by the Government. Not a single measure mentioned in Her Majesty's Speech at the opening of the Session had been pursued with anything like a determination to carry it out to a successful issue. The proposal to take precedence for the Arrears Bill, and thus shut out all the rights of private Members, was one as to which they ought to have more full explanation from the Government. As the course proposed was quite unprecedented, he wished to ask one or two questions—First, whether the Government really meant to carry out their threat and not leave the clôture to another year; secondly, whether a Bill might not be discussed in Committee after having been considered by a Grand Committee—that was the view which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister took of the matter, he believed—and, thirdly, whether the Government would really restore the rights of private Members when these two Bills were passed?

Mr. J. HOWARD said, he regretted that he was not in his place when the Prime Minister threw out a suggestion that the Agricultural Holdings Bills should be referred to a Committee, and he was surprised to learn that the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) did not fall in with the suggestion. It was impossible that any private Member could deal with this great question satisfactorily without a Select Committee. Looking to the diversity of opinion which prevailed both out-of-doors and in that House upon the question, he thought such a Committee would do great good in guiding public opinion on the matter, and for himself he cordially accepted the suggestion.

Mr. CHAPLIN said, the hon. Member misunderstood him; all that he had said was that he wished to guard himself against being supposed to have anything to do with the Bill of the hon. Member for Bedfordshire. He hoped his observations would not be misunderstood as to the Prime Minister's suggestion. All he intended to convey was that, in his opinion, a Committee of the kind suggested by the Prime Minister—namely, a Grand Committee—would probably not substantially facilitate the progress of the measures.

Mr. WARTON said, that, at the present time, Public Business was in a most unsatisfactory condition. In his opinion, the Indian Budget would be taken this Session later than ever. With regard to the Arrears Bill, he was surprised at the Prime Minister's proposal; it was a weak and unworthy surrender to Obstruction. He also protested against the Prime Minister bringing forward the clôture Resolution at any period of the Session. He thought that "Philip had become sober," and that a good many of the right hon. Gentleman's friends had also become sobered. Most noxious creatures had their stings in their tails; but these Resolutions had their sting in their head. He had a personal interest in the matter, for he had been included by the Secretary of State for India among the four upon the proscribed list.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he did not wish his previous observations to be misunderstood. The reason why he had not accepted the Prime Minister's suggestion was that the right hon. Gentleman proposed to refer the Bill to a Grand Committee, which he did not think would be of any real benefit. Though anxious to give consideration to the proposal of the Government as regarded the Arrears Bill, he felt bound, until he knew how far the Amendment would affect it, to oppose the measure. If his hon. Friend pressed his Motion to a division he would support it.

MR. MAC IVER said, he thought the Government had been guilty of a great waste of time.

MR. SHEIL asked whether the hon. Member was at liberty to address the House, having seconded the Motion for Adjournment?

MR. SPEAKER: Several hon. Members rose together to second the Motion, and I did not accept the hon. Member for Birkenhead as seconding the Motion.

MR. MAC IVER said, the difficulty about late hours of the House, which were so injurious to the health of hon. Members, might be obviated if the House would adopt some other mode of taking the Votes.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not speaking to the Question before the House.

MR. MAC IVER: I understand the Question is the adjournment of the debate.

MR. SPEAKER: The Question before the House is the adjournment of the debate on the Motion for the giving of precedence to the Arrears Bill.

MR. MAC IVER said, he should, then, oppose the Motion.

COLONEL NOLAN said, the Irish Members were anxious to expedite the proceedings in reference to the Bills before the House as much as possible; and, although they were more anxious for the passage of the Arrears Bill, they certainly were not willing to sell their rights and privileges for £500,000, as they would be doing if they assented to hasten the passage of the Prevention of Crime Bill. Short of doing this, they would be prepared to do their utmost to facilitate the Bill.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put.

The House divided: — Ayes 253; Noes 97: Majority 156. — (Div. List, No. 158.)

Ordered, That the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill have precedence, on every day for which it is set down, of all other Orders of the Day and Notices of Motions, except the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 157.]

(Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 19th June.]

[FIFTEENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART III.

GENERAL POWERS.

Clause 11 (Searches for arms and illegal documents).

MR. T. C. THOMPSON said, the Amendment he had to propose was not upon the Paper, and he would therefore read it to the Committee. He proposed to insert the words in line 11 making it necessary to fill up the warrant of the Lord Lieutenant to search for arms and illegal documents with the names of the suspected persons, the names of the occupiers of the houses, and the hour at which the search was to be made. He hoped the Government would consent to accept the Amendment, because he believed it was strictly in accordance with the principle the Committee had laid down in regard to the Bill. He understood the Bill was to be carried out, as far as possible, in accordance with Constitutional principles. The Act of last year was founded on unconstitutional principles—namely, that an English subject might be arrested on the mere suspicion of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and detained without being brought up for trial. This Bill, however, was to be carried out as much as possible in accordance with Constitutional principles; and although trial by jury was taken away by the Bill, it was, to a certain extent, restored by providing another tribunal. It was quite true that an accused person was not to be tried by 12 jurors; but, at the same time, he was to be tried by six Judges, who were practically equivalent to an ordinary jury. In this particular case the accused was to be tried by two stipendiary magistrates, one of whom was to be a lawyer. That was a course which was not unknown to the English law, and, to a certain extent, it was carrying out the law of England. At the same time, if they proposed to carry out the law of England in this way, they ought also to carry it out in accordance with the principles on which that law was established; and, so far as he understood, it had never been the practice in England to issue blank warrants. Such warrants might have been resorted to in times gone by; but so strong was the feeling against them that the House of Commons itself had protested, and the Judges, in the most solemn manner, had decided that the issue of blank warrants was altogether illegal. Instead of permitting the issue of blank warrants in this case, he proposed that the Lord Lieutenant, in issuing a warrant for search, should specify into whose house, and at what hour, the search was to be made. By that means something would be done towards guarding the sanctity of the home. Nothing had been more insisted upon in English history than that an Englishman's house should be his castle. It was to carry out that principle that the Amendment was brought in. He would not say that there were not times and occasions when the Executive of the country might be called upon to violate the sanctity of a man's home. The Criminal Law offered instances when such a necessity arose; but it was the duty of the Government to provide that there should be no abuse of the power. If the Committee refused this Amendment, they would leave open to the Government a very wide field of abuse. It must be borne in mind that the Bill might not always be carried out under the guidance of Lord Spencer, a Nobleman whom they all respected, or of the present Chief Secretary for Ireland, who was a man anxious to conduct the government of that country, as far as he was concerned, fairly and properly. He thought the Committee ought not to deprive the people of Ireland of their Constitutional rights without the strongest necessity being shown, and ample power being given, to restrain the exercise of the power of the Executive in cases where the public safety was not in danger. He trusted that the Government would insert this Amendment in the Bill.

[Fifteenth Night.]

Mr. T. C. Thompson

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 11, to insert after the word "warrant," the words "specifying the name or names of such inspectors, the house or houses, with the name or names of the occupiers thereof, where such search is to be made, together with the day and hours of the day or night on which, and within which, such search is to be made."—(Mr. T. C. Thompson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. T. C. Thompson) would forgive him if he declined to enter into the general discussion which he had raised. The object of the clause was distinct from that which was inserted in the Act of 1870. Its object was to give to certain persons—the Inspectors and Sub-Inspectors of Constabulary, for the time being, acting in any Constabulary district—the power of search for, and seizing, in any proclaimed district, or any part thereof, specified in the warrant, arms, ammunition, paper, documents, instruments, or articles suspected to be used, or intended to be used, in connection with any secret society, or secret association, for criminal purposes. It was not the general power to search for arms, but only a specific power to search for arms in connection with secret societies and criminal associations. What the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. T. C. Thompson) asked was this—that every warrant should be filled up with the names of the suspected persons, of the occupier of the house, and the hour at which the search was to be made. How could the Lord Lieutenant, in issuing his warrant, know the particular houses in which the documents or arms proposed to be searched for were secreted? [Derisive cheers from the Irish Members.] He hoped hon. Members would not misunderstand the object of the Bill. [An hon. MEMBER: A blank warrant.] It was nothing of the kind.

Its only object was to give power to search any districts which were suspected for arms and other things, and it was desirable that that power should be exercised wherever such articles could be found. It was to protect a district from connection with the possession of unlawful arms, and with criminal associations, that the clause was proposed to be inserted in the Bill. This was an Amendment to the entire clause, and not to a particular part of it. Substantially the first requirement would be fulfilled; but it would be impossible for the Lord Lieutenant to specify the names of the occupiers of the houses. It would be impossible, also, that the Lord Lieutenant could give directions as to what time the search should be made. It might be reasonable, in the opinion of some hon. Members, to strike out the clause altogether, if they were of opinion that it was not desirable to detect these criminal purposes; but it would be ridiculous to retain it and to accept the proposed Amendment.

MR. O'KELLY said, that the only object of the Amendment was to try to get the Government to confine the warrants to places or persons who were reasonably suspected; but, as the clause now stood, the warrant would be as described by the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. T. C. Thompson), a perfectly blank warrant, under which the police could search the house of any person in a particular county, and the object of the Amendment was to prevent an abuse of the powers conferred by the clause upon the police.

MR. SEXTON said, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had accurately described the Amendment as an objection to the entire clause. It raised a question of very considerable importance—namely, whether the right of search by general warrant should be exercised in Ireland. All the principles of liberty were outraged by the Bill. By what means was this clause to be carried out? It was to be enforced by the Inspectors and Sub-Inspectors of the Constabulary. If the right were limited to the County Inspectors they were only some 30 in number, and they were mostly men of experience and discretion, and he should not object to the clause if it were so limited; but the Sub-Inspectors numbered some hundreds, many of them being mere boys, and a very few were men of experience in the Service. They comprised among them such men as Sub-Inspector Smith and Sub-Inspector Ball, of Ballina notoriety, and Sub-Inspector Webb.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member was discussing a question which would arise upon the next Amendment, and not upon the Amendment then before the Committee.

MR. SEXTON said, he would at once close his arguments upon that point. The search warrant was to be a general warrant to remain in force for three months, and during all that time this general warrant might be made use of as an instrument of torture, and for the purpose of private revenge. The Sub-Inspectors were not generally on very good terms with the inhabitants, and in many parts of the country there were strong feelings of resentment and private pique entertained by them against the people. Was it necessary, for the purpose of discovering concealed arms, that a subordinate officer of the police should have in his possession a document for three months which would enable him to enter the house of any person, and conduct a search which would be regarded by the Irish people as an insulting search? The Government had referred to no figures in regard to this clause. They had given no figures with reference to the exercise of the power of search by night under the previous Act. They had abstained from giving the figures as to the number of strangers who had been arrested; but he thought it was most desirable, before the Committee were called upon to accept the clause, that some statistics should be set forth. They wanted to know whether this was a well-tryed and proved weapon for detecting crime. A similar power existed in the Act of 1870, and he should like to know what the effect of the exercise of that power had been? How was the right exercised? How many searches were carried out, and what were the results? The Committee ought to be made acquainted with the total number of searches, and the total number of cases which had justified them. His contention was that this right to search had proved altogether inoperative in Ireland, and that arms and papers of the description specified were not generally concealed, and that, if they were concealed, they were not concealed in dwelling-houses, or in places likely to be searched. If the police had a power of divination, this general right of search for the existence of secret societies might be of value, and, perhaps, in some of the Irish bogs they might discover something; but, not possessing that attribute, all this was a matter "of sound and fury signifying nothing." It could have no other effect than to annoy and harass innocent people. He was glad the Amendment had been moved by an English Member, because he hoped that that fact would insure it greater attention from English Members generally than if it had been moved by a Member representing an Irish constituency. Before the Government insisted upon retaining the clause, he called upon them to show the necessity for it, and to prove that the exercise of similar power in past times had led to the slightest result.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he had no doubt this was a very stringent clause, and was not astonished that the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. T. C. Thompson), entertaining the views he did, took exception to it. But, in the state of things in Ireland, criminals obtained such an advantage over the law that it was absolutely necessary to give the Government exceptional power for enforcing the law. Secret crime in Ireland had reached such an extent as to fully warrant the Government in asking for a power of search; but he thought the policeman making the search should be bound to make some record of the grounds upon which he made it, otherwise this clause might be liable to be abused.

MR. HEALY said, no clause of exceptional severity against the Irish people had ever been introduced into the House that some hon. Member was not ready to declare he saw the full necessity of. That was the raison d'être, in the view of the Government, for the Bill. Personally, he could not see that this provision was more necessary than any other portion of the Bill. Therefore, when he heard an hon. Member talk of the necessity of the Bill, he was inclined to think that that argument was growing somewhat stale. Perhaps the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) was not aware that the Government already possessed in Ireland very extensive powers of search between sunrise and sunset. They had power to do what they liked in that respect. He wished to know if they proposed to repeal the provisions of the Peace Preservation Act? What was the present demand of the Government? Did they suppose that when the sun set a man removed from a bog, or any other hiding-place, his blunderbuss, and brought it into his own house for the purpose of taking it to bed with him? The Government had already the same power of searching a house in the day time as they now asked for, and the same power of searching at night. People often read in romantic sketches of arms being taken out of the bog, or out of the graveyard; but the only object for removing them in a case like this would be to bring them to the fire-side to air. Nothing could be more absurd, and the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) must be aware that the Government possessed all the powers of search they now asked for. The provision contained in the Peace Preservation Act lasted for five years, and the Government only asked for this for three. Why should they not propose it for six years, and spare themselves from any further extra trouble? It was astonishing how the Government always presumed on the ignorance of hon. Members in regard to anything connected with Ireland. The Act to which he had referred was called the Peace Preservation Act; but what peace it had preserved had always been an enigma to him. Most Members of the House of Commons spent their time gloriously downstairs, or anywhere except upon the floor of the House; and, as the English newspapers were in a conspiracy to burke the speeches of Irish Members, he was not astonished that the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy should be ignorant of the existing state of things, and that the Irish Members should be compelled to repeat the arguments they had used over and over again upon this matter. He did not suppose, however, that they would produce very much effect or influence upon the Government; but whether that was due to a want of intelligence on the part of the Government or upon the part of Irish Members he would not pronounce an opinion. The provision of the Act of last year was that where the warrant was addressed to a Sub-Inspector it must be addressed to a particular individual, and must be used within 10 days. As the Bill was brought in a blank was left in the warrant, so that the Sub-Inspector might use it at any time, but the right hon. and learned Gentleman in charge of the Bill consented to limit the period to 10 days. If the arguments, then, used were sufficient to shorten the duration of the warrant from all eternity to 10 days, he did not see why the Government should not now consent to shorten the period in this instance. Why should a Sub-Inspector have three months for harassing an entire district? No doubt the Sub-Inspectors of Ireland were treated as if they were the sweetness and light of the country, and he had not the smallest desire to object to that view; indeed, he had very little doubt that if Mr. Cliford Lloyd were closely examined, it would be found that he possessed angel's wings floating out behind. Therefore, it was too much to ask that an entire district should not be given over to the ransacking of an Inspector at any hour of the day or night. In the last Bill the Government inserted a provision that arms should be paid for if they were given up, and they got more arms in consequence of that provision than from any other power conferred by the Act. They had instituted searches of the most stringent and even disgraceful character. They had pulled down the hay-stacks of the unfortunate peasants and scattered them to the winds, and let rain come down upon them; but not one stand of arms, nor one pound of gunpowder, nor one paper of percussion caps had they succeeded in discovering. He, therefore, claimed that under this Bill something in the nature of compensation should be given for injuries that might be inflicted in carrying out an abortive search.

THE CHAIRMAN wished to point out to the hon. Member that he was scarcely speaking to the Amendment before the Committee, but to the effect of the clause generally.

MR. HEALY said, he was simply pointing out that a better way of obtaining arms and ammunition than the Government proposed would be found in providing compensation for the giving up of arms; but he would not continue in that strain if the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair ruled that he was out of Order. What he wished to say was, that in future these general warrants would be as ineffectual as they had been in the past. They had hitherto been used for the purpose of giving the people living in the district as much trouble as possible. The Chief Secretary for Ireland was known to be a humane man. He (Mr. Healy) had no authority to speak for hon. Members on that side of the House; but, as far as he was personally concerned, he was prepared to say that the right hon. Gentleman had afforded the greatest amount of satisfaction in his new Office. He was sure that the right hon. Gentleman would very greatly regret that cases should be brought under his notice such as those which were constantly referred to the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster)—cases in which houses had been burst open by the Sub-Inspectors, women pulled out of their beds, and obliged to dress themselves in the presence of five or six policemen, and then turned out of the room while the constables ransacked the premises. He could not understand why the resources of civilization should not have been kept back so as to enable those unfortunate women to dress, unless there was some fear that they might personally secrete something in the few moments the police might be kept out of the room. The Act was carried out in such an extremely objectionable manner, that in very numerous instances these poor women, after being expelled from their beds, were compelled to dress themselves in the presence of four or five constables. When such things occurred in a district, it was not a matter of surprise that they should excite a feeling of passion and hatred. It was this system of searching that had provoked reprisals in Ireland; and he asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland if he would be willing to put into the Bill a Compensation Clause, such as that as was put in the last Bill, to compensate all persons who voluntarily surrendered the arms they possessed? At present the state of the case was this. A man's bed might be ripped up, the boards of his dwelling-house pulled to pieces, his mantelpiece knocked down, his hay-rick scattered to the winds, and other damage done; and what he wanted to know was, whether in such a case, the search having failed to discover concealed arms or ammunition, the owner of the property who had sustained injury would be compensated?

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must again point out to the hon. Member that he was speaking upon the general clause, and not upon the Amendment.

MR. HEALY said, that, unfortunately, these things followed from an unrestricted right of search. He was only pointing out one of the consequences of passing this clause, and if he was not to argue in this way there was no use in his arguing at all. Therefore, he would resume his seat.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, no matter had given so much dissatisfaction in connection with previous Coercion Acts as the exercise of this right of search. If it could be shown that it was of advantage, and that there was an absolute necessity for it, he should have nothing to say; but he did not think that in this case the Government had made out a case sufficient to warrant the Committee in assenting to this very objectionable provision. The hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) had stated, better than he (Sir Patrick O'Brien) was able to do, the objections which were raised to the exercise of this power in Ireland, and he would ask the Government if it was worth while to increase the ill-feeling of the people against their measures by adopting so arbitrary a provision? During the late Winter Assizes in Ireland, they had had some experience of the manner in which arms could be easily got away and put away in Ireland. The concealment of arms was, in point of fact, reduced to a system. A man did not take home a double-barrelled gun and hide it in his house; but men, many of whom had been formerly in Her Majesty's Service, were employed under "Moonlight" arrangements to convert them into "Moonlight" arms; and instead of having a firearm hidden away in its integrity, these men, who possessed a technical knowledge, took them to pieces, and a lock would be disposed of in one place, a barrel in another, and a stock in another. He, therefore, failed to see what advantage the Government would derive from this clause; and it would, undoubtedly, tend to inflame the bad feeling and the bad passions of the people against the Government. He had already expressed his opinion as to the desirability of passing some such measure as the present; but, at the same time, he felt that the Government, in asking for this clause, were asking for one that was quite unnecessary, and were asking for a power which would excite the bitterest feeling of hostility against themselves in Ireland.

Mr. Healy

COLONEL NOLAN said, he concurred with the hon. Baronet the Member for King's County (Sir Patrick O'Brien), that this clause would be regarded as a very odious one in Ireland; and he thought the Amendment of the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. T. C. Thompson) would be a very useful one indeed in restricting this right of search and placing it under some sort of rule. He might give an example as to how the right already existing had been used under the old Coercion Act. A tenant of his complained that his house had been searched. The tenant said he did not complain of the police searching it, provided they found anything in it; but he did complain that they held the power of searching it again and again, and asked him (Colonel Nolan) to interfere. He called the attention of the late Conservative Chief Secretary to the matter; and the argument he used was that, although something might be found if the search were conducted in the course of six months, it was not likely that anything would be discovered upon premises which were searched once a-week. In this particular instance the search was stopped. He was afraid that if the clause were passed as it now stood, and warrants were issued in the general way, the officer entrusted with the execution of them might employ the right of search as a means of molestation against an individual in regard to whom he had some private pique. If the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for the City of Durham (Mr. T. C. Thompson) was introduced, the Lord Lieutenant would only grant a warrant when a necessity for it was shown, and there would be an essential control over the exercise of it, and there would be not nearly so much chance of the right being abused.

MR. GILL said, he strongly supported the Amendment. There was one subject to which no hon. Member had at present alluded. When this right of searching for arms and other matters was enforced in Ireland, it had always been known that that was the time in which spies and informers had been enabled to carry on with the greatest success their machinations. His own opinion was that the exact hour of the search should be named in the warrant; if not, it would give to this class of spies and informers in Ireland the opportunity of concealing arms or other things about the house of a man, and of then going to the Sub-Inspector and saying—"Such and such a man is concealing arms in a haystack, or in a barn, or in a corner of his house, and if you go at once you will discover them." A Sub-Inspector, armed with this terrible power, would go at once, and naturally would discover these things, the result of which would be that the unfortunate victim, although thoroughly innocent, would be subjected to severe punishment; while the spy, or the man who bore malice against the unfortunate victim, would remain unharmed, and even obtain a reward for his treachery. If the clause were safeguarded by the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. T. C. Thompson) this could scarcely happen, because it would be necessary for the Sub-Inspector to obtain the insertion in the warrant of a particular hour for the search; and that might be made the means, to a large extent, of baffling a common informer who wished to carry out his own scheme of treachery. For that reason, if for no other, he thought the Amendment ought to be insisted upon.

MR. LEAMY said, he thought that before the Attorney General committed the Government to the clause he should have endeavoured to show that the already extensive powers which were given under the Act of 1881 had failed, and, if so, in what respect they had failed. As had already been pointed out, searches of a stringent character had been made under that Bill; and in some cases precautions of such an extraordinary character had been taken that it was utterly and completely impossible that any arms, if concealed in the houses which were searched, could have escaped discovery. The power of search had been exercised under the most favourable conditions; but, nevertheless, the Government had failed in the most signal manner to obtain the possession of concealed arms. What did that prove? That they had searched the houses of a good many people, and in almost the whole of them no arms were found at all. As had been pointed out, a Compensation Clause was placed in the last Bill for arms that were given up, and the result was that a large number of arms was surrendered under that clause, whereas scarcely any were discovered where the right of search was exercised. The Attorney General said that the present clause gave no general power to search at all, but only to search for particular arms and documents, &c., connected with secret associations. He wished to see how that would work. A district would be proclaimed, the Lord Lieutenant would send his warrant down to the Sub-Inspector of the district; and under that warrant the Sub-Inspector would be able to search every house in the county, not merely for arms, but for any documents which might be used in connection with criminal associations. But how was he to discover whether any letters or documents he came across did not come under the category unless he read every document that might be found in the man's house? Therefore, it was manifest that this a most unlimited power given to the police, which was to last for three months, and the right of search to be repeated day after day, at any hour of the day or night. The effect would be that every farmer in a proclaimed district would be completely at the mercy of the Police Inspector. The hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Gill) had pointed out another important matter—namely, that very frequently in Ireland, when laws of this character were brought into operation, a man possessing a feeling of hostility to his neighbour placed in the thatch of his neighbour's house something which would bring him under the provisions of the Act, and then communicate it to the police. The consequence had been that, on more than one occasion, an innocent man had been sent to gaol for concealing arms, the existence of which he was in entire ignorance. Supposing, under this clause, a Constabulary officer received a general warrant, and an anonymous letter was forwarded to him, stating that in a particular house firearms were concealed, he would be bound, even though he did not know from whom the anonymous letter came, to act upon it, and search for the arms and documents pointed out. It would, therefore, be in the power of any man who chose to conceal arms in the thatch of a neighbour's house, or in the hay-stacks of his hay-yard, to bring the whole force of the law down upon him, and to cause an innocent man to be sent to gaol for three months under the Arms Act. He, therefore, thought it was absolutely necessary to insist on the warrant specifying the house that was to be searched, so as to afford some guarantee that before a search was made there was some reasonable ground for suspecting that arms were concealed.

And it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, Committee report Progress; to sit again this day.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 31; Noes 61: Majority 30. — (Div. List, No. 159.)

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 11, after the word "time," insert "on information on oath and in writing being laid before him by some creditable person."—(Mr. T. P. O'Connor.)

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. SEXTON rose to speak.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the hon. Member had risen too late, the Question had been put to the Committee, and he thought the Noes had it. ["No, no!"]

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR rose to Order. Several Amendments had been handed in to the Clerk at the Table just before the rising of the House. These Amendments had been distributed amongst Members, but not in order, and the consequence of that had been that he had not been prepared to move his Amendment at the proper moment.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the point was that the last Amendment on which the Committee divided was moved after the word "warrant," and the Amendment of the hon. Member was after the word "time," which had been passed by the Committee. It was extremely difficult for the Chairman or the Clerks at the Table to deal with a large number of Amendments simultaneously handed in. He had, however, discovered that the Amendment of the hon. Member could not be put for the reason stated.

Mr. Leamy

MR. HEALY asked, with regard to the Amendments handed in to the Clerk at the Table, when hon. Members would have an opportunity of moving them? He had himself handed in several Amendments just before 7 o'clock, and it was then a quarter-past 9.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had pointed out that the division on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. T. C. Thompson) had carried the Committee down to the word "warrant." The hon. Member had now moved an Amendment after the word "time," which was not then before the Committee, and it could not, therefore, be put. He, therefore, called upon the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) to proceed with the next Amendment.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN rose to Order.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the point of Order had been already settled.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had called on the hon. Member for Sligo.

MR. HEALY rose to Order. Was not a Motion to report Progress before the Committee?

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had called on the hon. Member for Sligo before Progress was moved.

MR. SEXTON said, although he believed the Lord Lieutenant took the advice of the Privy Council with reference to all warrants, yet he was anxious that the form of the warrant should be prescribed. The Amendment which he was about to move was one intended to carry out the Act; and, therefore, he presumed that the Government would not object to it.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 11, after the word "warrant," insert "in the prescribed form."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. TREVELYAN said, he had no objection to those words.

MR. O'DONNELL rose to Order.

THE CHAIRMAN said, when the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sligo had been put, the hon. Member for Dungarvan could put his question to Order.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he had risen to a point of Order, before any other Member had risen, on the ordinary conduct of the Committee. Although the hon. Member for Sligo had been called, he (Mr. O'Donnell) had risen first. The question he wished to ask was, whether his Motion for Progress did not justly take precedence of the ordinary conduct of the Committee?

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had called on the hon. Member for Sligo, and saw him rise; he was, therefore, in possession of the Committee at the time the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) moved to report Progress.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked if he could now move the Amendment, which the Chairman had been unable to put to the Committee, with regard to information on oath and in writing being laid before the Lord Lieutenant?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member could now move.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the object of his Amendment was to guard, as far as possible, the use of the power contained in this clause, and to limit it to cases where the Lord Lieutenant had proper information before him for the purpose of taking this extreme action.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 11, after the word "form," insert "on information on oath and in writing being laid before him by some creditable person."—(Mr. T. P. O'Connor.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was unable to accept this Amendment. He wished, however, with the indulgence of the Committee, to state the intention of Her Majesty's Government with reference to an important point in the clause. He was aware that the present was not the stage of the Bill at which the statement should be made, yet he desired to make it at that stage, because it might affect the discussion upon the remaining portion of the clause. It had been thought necessary to ask for power for making searches in given districts, and without limiting them to any particular hours. But the Government were aware that there was the keenest feeling with regard to this clause as to search by night; and, although they were not prepared to give it up, they were prepared to limit it in such a manner as would insure that there should be no search at night except where there was reasonable suspicion that a secret society was holding a meeting, and to move an Amendment to this effect later on.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he thought that the Prime Minister had made a most reasonable concession. He could quite understand the Prime Minister taking the power of search in the case of a secret society which was holding a meeting. Although, of course, he could not support this Act, still he was prepared to admit that if such an Act had to be passed it was perfectly fair that the power reserved by the Prime Minister should be taken. He repeated that this was a most important concession on the part of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. HEALY said, he quite agreed that the concession of the Prime Minister was a most important one, and begged to offer the right hon. Gentleman his sincere thanks. Still, there was one question which he desired to put. Supposing that the police proceeded to make a search, having entered the place, would the police be enabled to withdraw if there were no meeting sitting?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that would, no doubt, be the case.

MR. LEAMY said, he thought it necessary to refer to the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), which sought to impose on the Lord Lieutenant the necessity of receiving information on oath before he granted the warrant of search. The Prime Minister said it was intended that this right of search should not be exercised in the night-time unless there was reasonable suspicion that a treasonable meeting was being held. He (Mr. Leamy) asked on whose determination was that search to be made? Were the Committee to understand that a general warrant would be issued to an Inspector of Constabulary in the district, telling him that he was not to make this search in the night-time, unless he had some reason to believe that a treasonable meeting was being held in a certain house, and that treasonable documents or arms would be found there? He did not underrate the concession of the Prime Minister; but he felt it his duty to ask what guarantee Irish Members had that a Sub-Inspector, armed with a warrant of search, would not proceed to search for documents and other things, after he found that there was no treasonable meeting being held? Surely there should be some investigation before a warrant was issued, because a policeman might be told by some irresponsible person that a treasonable meeting was being held, and upon that information he would be obliged to go to the place and make a search. Therefore, although he quite understood the spirit in which the Prime Minister had proposed the alteration, he failed to see, unless there were some explicit words put into the Bill to limit the power of Sub-Inspectors to make searches, that the concession would not be rendered valueless.

MR. PARNELL said, he wished to point out that the clause was drawn for the purpose of enabling Inspectors and Sub-Inspectors of Constabulary to make search for arms and illegal documents. The right hon. Gentleman said that he would introduce an Amendment later on into the clause which would prevent search by night, except where there was reason to suspect that a meeting was being held of a secret society or illegal society in the house or about the premises in which the search was being made. But the question he had to put to the right hon. Gentleman was this—For what purpose was the search to be made? Was it to be made under these circumstances—that was to say, where there was reasonable suspicion that a secret society was holding a meeting, search was to be made for the purpose of discovering arms or illegal documents for the purpose specified in the clause? Or was it to be made for the purpose of discovering the meeting? In the latter case, he would respectfully submit to the Prime Minister that the most convenient course would be to cut out the power of search by night as regarded arms and illegal documents, and bring up a new clause dealing with the right of entry—he said entry, because it was not a correct definition to call it right of search—at night for the purpose of discovering whether there was an illegal meeting being held or not. He repeated that the clause only referred to search for the purpose of discovering arms and illegal documents; and he feared that if the power of search were left expressly stated in the clause, it would be used by the police for all manner of searches entirely apart from the question whether illegal documents or arms were to be found or not.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he was competent to speak of the view taken of this clause by the Lord Lieutenant, who had arrived at his conclusion after careful consultation with persons of authority in the disturbed districts. The Lord Lieutenant, under that advice, came to the conclusion that the power to search for arms and documents at night was an unnecessary element in a Bill of this kind. The Lord Lieutenant, however, held strongly to the necessity of having the power of entering premises where it was supposed that men were engaged in concocting crime. The Government had not yet obtained from the Lord Lieutenant the exact suggestion as to the sub-section which they would propose for the purpose of arming themselves with this power. But that sub-section the Government proposed to put in on the Report, and they would lay great stress on having it in the clearest form possible. Acting on the advice of the Lord Lieutenant, they were willing that there should be no night search for arms, documents, or other matters, except upon the condition stated by the Prime Minister.

MR. PARNELL said, he understood, from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, that the Government proposed to leave in the clause words giving power to the police to make search in the manner described in the daytime, and that the Government would bring up a sub-section on Report, giving the police power with regard to entering premises at night for the purpose of detecting illegal meetings.

MR. TREVELYAN: Yes, Sir.

MR. MARUM begged to thank the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government for the concession he had made; but he had announced his intention, previous to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, to move a Proviso to this clause, to the effect that no entry or search should be made in any church or place of worship, monastery, nunnery, or conventual establishment in Ireland, except in the presence of a magistrate. It was now unnecessary; but he would throw out to the Government whether the right of search could not be modified by such a right of sanctuary as was prevalent previous to the Reformation? The Committee would readily understand the feeling which existed amongst Irish Roman Catholics; and he thought the reservation which they had proposed to ask for was one which ought to be adopted for the purpose of satisfying the just susceptibilities of his countrymen, who would certainly view it with gratitude.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he agreed with the general spirit of the remarks of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Marum). Still, he thought, on a question of violation of domestic privacy, even a policeman would draw a distinction between the laity and the clerical world. If, however, the police made a mistake in the case of monasteries and other institutions, the Government would, of course, have to deal with the enormous and extreme unpopularity which would result therefrom. He confessed he should be sorry to see an exception of that kind in so many words introduced into the Bill. He had every reason to express a hope that the Prime Minister, who had met this difficulty in such a broad and statesmanlike spirit, would take into consideration the precautions impressed on the Government by the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Leamy)—namely, that there should be some protection against the police, on the plea of searching for illegal meetings, making use of the plea to break into houses during the night-time. He did not know whether the Government were prepared to introduce words to bring about that desirable result. Probably the only check to this over-zeal on the part of policemen was to be found in the strict supervision of their superiors, and he thought the police authorities ought to take care to inform the police that where they made use of the power of search in an undue manner they would incur the displeasure of their superiors. He might add that though the limitation of search for illegal meetings was a most valuable one with regard to the privacy of Irish householders, and one which, at the same time, did not interfere with the just powers and rights of the Government to deal with crime, yet he thought the right hon. Gentleman could not take too many precautions in guarding against his subordinates mistaking mere friendly meetings for meetings of secret societies, and treating them accordingly, unless something like very reasonable suspicion was entertained. He would not suggest the addition to the clause of any particular words; but he trusted that, in the instructions given to the police, great care would be taken on this point, because, if uncontrolled power of search were given to every policeman, all the aggravation and arrogance would be caused to the people, under cover of search for illegal societies at night, which the Government were desirous to save them from.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he wished to apologize if he had led the Committee into anything like a discussion upon the alteration which the Government intended to make with regard to the right of search for arms and documents at night. He had endeavoured to make it clear that his announcement was made for the convenience of the Committee in dealing with the remaining portion of the clause. One word more. It had been said that reasonable suspicion was a thing which might be abused. But the same could be said of the word "suspected" in the first part of the clause as it then stood. Of course, the meaning of the Proviso intended to be inserted was that, although the police would be allowed to search only in case there was reasonable suspicion of a meeting of an illegal society being held, yet, having entered upon their search, it would, of course, be their duty to obtain anything in the nature of evidence with regard to the meeting which they might have been informed was going on.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that, although considerable interest had naturally arisen from the statement of the Prime Minister, he must remind the Committee that there was a large number of Amendments to the clause, which it would be difficult to deal with unless hon. Members proceeded with their arguments upon the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. PARNELL said, he agreed with the desirability of not entering into a discussion upon the statement of the Prime Minister at that moment; but, at the same time, he thought it right to endeavour to obtain as much information as he could without discussing the intended Amendment. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether the police, having entered a house and found no illegal meeting was to be held, would proceed with their search for arms and documents, or whether they would make only such search as would be necessary for the purpose of ascertaining that no illegal meeting was being held?

MR. PLUNKET said, he understood that there would be an opportunity for any Member, who did not wish at that moment to interrupt the course of Business, to express any objection which he might have to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. Certainly, before the clause was put, he should like to make some observations upon the statement of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. M'COAN said, he wished also to express his thanks for the concession made by the Prime Minister. He trusted he should not be anticipating the discussion on a subsequent Amendment by expressing the hope that the Government would recognize the importance of making a further concession in the direction indicated by the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Marum).

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must point out that it was imperative that the Amendments on the Paper should now be proceeded with.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, he would ask permission to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. T. C. THOMPSON said, he proposed to omit, in line 11, the words "and sub-inspectors." Although the two Amendments standing in his name were very close together in point of time, yet they referred to a very different state of circumstances. In submitting to the Committee his last Amendment, he was attempting to bring in a clause which would insure to a free people the power to prevent their homes being entered, and to prevent any assault being made on their liberty, except by warrants definite and clear in their nature. But in the Amendment he was about to move, he dealt with the interests of persons subject to a law which rendered them no longer a free people. He believed hon. Members would be alive to the fact that it was more difficult to govern a people by despotism than it was to govern them on the principles of freedom. In the one case you had the assistance of every inhabitant of the country in preserving the peace and order of society, whereas, in the second case, you were dealing with people more or less your foes. Consequently, if peace was to be preserved, those who were practically despots must take care to do nothing to irritate what, perhaps, he might call the heart-broken people of Ireland. Nothing had tended more in past time to break down despotism than irritation. He need scarcely refer to the history of this country, which showed that at one time the Monarchy was almost broken down by the Act of a Minister—

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must remind the hon. Member that he was travelling from the question before the Committee.

MR. T. C. THOMPSON said, his remarks were intended to support his Motion to eliminate the words "sub-inspectors" from the clause. He was arguing that under a despotism irritation was dangerous, because by acts of carelessness a Government which it was desired to preserve might be overthrown. Since the passing of the Act of last year, there had been a most remarkable increase of terrible crime in Ireland. Many reasons had been assigned for this increase, but he was inclined to think it had been caused by depriving the people of Ireland of that interest in their own concerns which belonged to every people. Having taken away from them that interest, having found a great increase not only in ordinary but in fearful crime, he wished that, as far as possible, fresh causes of irritation should be removed, and that Her Majesty's Government should take care in passing this Bill to make it work, if possible, smoothly. He, therefore, proposed to leave out that cause of irritation which arose from the employment, in searches for arms and documents, of sub-officials—people who were always willing to assume an authority which did not belong to them. The subject to which he asked the attention of the Committee was one of considerable importance. The whole of Europe, so to speak, was gazing upon that Committee, wondering at the events which had taken place in Ireland, and at the legislation proposed to deal with them; and he contended that it was a matter of necessity, in passing this Act, that all causes of irritation of the kind he had alluded to should be removed.

Mr. Parnell

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 11, after the word "inspectors," leave out "and sub-inspectors."—(Mr. T. C. Thompson.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. TREVELYAN said, he was afraid that if the eyes of Europe were gazing upon the Committee, Europe would have discovered that the hon. Member for Durham's idea of a Sub-Inspector of Constabulary was not a very clear one. A Sub-Inspector of Constabulary was, in point of education, very much like a subaltern officer; and, as far as his experience went, a subaltern of high order. The clause before the Committee, he need hardly point out, was one of extreme importance. It was not put in for the sake of appearance only, but in order that it might work; and, that being so, it was necessary that there should be a sufficient number of people to work it. It was a fact that there was only one Inspector in each county, and he might be at that time 30 or 40 miles away from the spot at which his services might be required; whereas in the case of Sub-Inspectors, there were 10 to 12 in each county, and if the clause was to work effectively he could not imagine a body of men more fitted to discharge the delicate duties which the clause imposed. The hon. Member for Durham had made an appeal to the Government not to pass another Act such as the Arms Act of last year, because since the time it came into operation an increase of crime had resulted. Her Majesty's Government, however, believed that in order to diminish crime the best way was carefully to study it and to see by what full, careful, and minute provisions this diminution could be effected. There were clauses in the Arms Act of last year which were found to be inefficient; but in this Bill the Government had introduced provisions which they believed would have the effect of putting down crime, although those provisions were milder in their character. For the reasons he had given he was unable to agree to the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Durham; and, in concluding his observations, he took an opportunity of expressing his belief that the Sub-Inspectors of the Irish Constabulary were a body of men thoroughly to be trusted in this matter.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he did not wish to detract from the character of Sub-Inspectors of Constabulary, so far as their education was concerned; but the right hon. Gentleman must have paid very little attention to the history of Ireland during the last year, or he would have known that among that body many of its members had behaved in a way that did not recommend itself to his Predecessor in Office. The Sub-Inspectors to whom he referred were associated with deeds of a very questionable character, and it seemed almost impossible that the right hon. Gentleman could wish them to have anything to do with the carrying out of another Coercion Act. It was true that there was only one Inspector in each county; but the Government were asking to interfere with the peace, the privacy, and, to some extent, with the happiness of every home in Ireland, and, therefore, he thought he was not asking too much that the highest police authority in the district should alone be intrusted with the duty of carrying out this very objectionable clause.

MR. HEALY said, that the concession of the Prime Minister was of so substantial a character that, on the supposition that it would be carried out bond fide, he believed there was now no difference between Irish Members and the Government with regard to this clause, except upon small matters of detail. It would be in the recollection of the Committee that the Government had already the power for five years to search for arms in houses in Ireland between sunrise and sunset. Now, he understood the Prime Minister was only prepared to ask that where the police had information of an illegal meeting taking place, they should have the power of search at night. If that were so, he thought Irish Members would be prepared to grant this clause as a whole. At any rate, for his part, he was prepared to do so, and to move no more Amendments to the clause if the Prime Minister was prepared to carry out the words he had used. As he understood it, all the Government asked in this clause was that the police should have the power to search for arms and illegal documents—not to pull down chimney-pieces, rip up floors, or turn decent women out of their beds, and compel them to dress themselves in the presence of constables. If it were understood that the police, on finding that no illegal meeting was being held, should immediately retire, then he would vote for the Government on every Amendment that was proposed to this clause. He again thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the concession he had made, which was one worthy of his character and of the position he held in that House.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was most reluctant again to intervene in this discussion, because he felt so much the force of the rule laid down from the Chair. But the hon. Member for Wexford had addressed to the Government an intimation of his intention, on certain conditions, to support the Government in reference to Amendments which might be proposed to this clause. If he understood the words of the hon. Member rightly, he believed the Government were prepared to act as he had described. He could not say more than that at the present moment; but there was one remark which he felt bound to make. The hon. Member for Wexford and other hon. Members, in the course of their observations, had given him the credit of proposing this alteration; but he was bound to say that that credit was entirely due to his noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, who had looked into this matter with the sincere desire that the Government should ask that which was necessary, and only necessary. It was the Lord Lieutenant himself to whom the credit of this concession was due.

MR. SEXTON said, he was fully sensible of the importance of the concession of the right hon. Gentleman; but he thought that his hon. Friend the Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) had scarcely expressed the views of Irish Members upon this subject. His hon. Friend had said that the Government, by the Arms Act of last year, were entitled to search for arms for a period of five years in any house in Ireland; but he must point out that under this clause they would be entitled to search not only for arms, but for papers and documents. For his own part, he thought it right and proper to proceed with the discussion of the Amendment before the Committee. That Amendment was of extreme importance, and it was one which the Government should be willing to accept. Of course, the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant was perfectly accurate in saying that there was only one Chief Inspector in the county; but it must be remembered that the search contemplated by this clause was one of very great delicacy, and he thought the Government ought to concede the point that the search should be conducted by the highest police-officer in the county, whose functions could not be said to be very elaborate, and whose time, in consequence, might very well be spared. It must be remembered that these Sub-Inspectors were, as a rule, young men, and that some of them had given instances of great rashness of temper. He would refer to the case of Sub-Inspector Ball, who, it was well known, had exasperated the feelings of the people of Ireland to a considerable degree. Now, he thought that the powers of the clause should not be committed to a body which contained men of the character he had referred to. Although he felt the value of the right hon. Gentleman's statement with regard to night-searches, he believed that the employment of Sub-Inspectors of Constabulary was not the best arrangement that could be made, and that it might, on occasion, prove to be dangerous. If the Government did not think the County Inspectors sufficiently numerous to carry out the object of the clause, he asked whether they would arrange for the senior Sub-Inspectors to be placed in command of a body of officers, many of whom were young men?

MR. LEAMY said, that, in view of the fact that the Government were empowered to make search for arms under the Arms Act, he would ask the Prime Minister whether he would not get rid altogether of the search for documents? He objected to the words "sub-inspectors," not on the ground stated by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), but simply because he desired that the Lord Lieutenant should, as far as possible, abandon this general warrant of search. He regarded it as a most infamous thing that, after the long connection which had existed between England and Ireland, a general warrant of search should be conferred upon any man in Ireland; and, if the Government had decided that it should be given, he should feel it his duty to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. T. C. Thompson), because it might, to some extent, limit the objectionable character of this clause.

Mr. Healy

COLONEL NOLAN said, he would be bound to vote with his hon. Friends, although he thought, after the substantial concession made by the Prime Minister, the Amendment might very fairly be withdrawn. He himself had an Amendment to the clause, but he should certainly withdraw it. He should vote with his Party, but he thought they had got more concessions on this clause than on any other. He was of opinion that on this question they ought to give the Government as little trouble as possible.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, the Government could not do better than make a few more concessions, and then he had no doubt the Bill would pass through the House with extreme rapidity. The point before them was the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Durham (Mr. T. C. Thompson), and the object of that Amendment was to limit the power of arbitrary search. He had no doubt the Irish Constabulary were a very efficient body of men; but it was now attempted by the Government to vest them with most unreasonable powers, for they could enter, under this Act, any man's house at their will and pleasure. He held that that was a power that Englishmen would resent, and that which the Irish people were justified in resenting. For all political purposes the Government had sufficient power, without this particular power of arbitrary search; and he was certain that this clause, as it stood, would create the maximum of discontent with the minimum of service to the country. If there was one clause in former Coercion Acts which more exasperated the people than any other, it was a clause similar to this. If his hon. Friend went to a division he should certainly vote with him, for they were only asking for a limitation of action which would be of no service, and might be a great detriment.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, that, from his knowledge of the Constabulary, it would be impossible to omit the word "sub-inspector." The object was to place on responsible officers the execution of these warrants, and, if he remembered rightly, in no former Bill of this character was the word "inspector" or "sub-inspector" omitted. These words were introduced as a safeguard to insure that the execution of these warrants would not be placed in the hands of the ordinary policeman. He held that when a warrant reached the hands of the County Inspector, he would choose the right man to carry out the delicate work; and he thought that if his hon. Friend the Member for Durham (Mr. T. C. Thompson) were acquainted with the circumstances of the police in Ireland, he would not now be found moving this Amendment.

MR. T. C. THOMPSON said; that, after what he had heard, he thought it would be only courteous to the Prime Minister if he withdrew the Amendment.

MR. LEAMY said, that the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson) had said that the words "sub-inspector" had been introduced into the Bill for the purpose of rendering it necessary that responsible officers of the peace should have the execution of the warrant. So far as that was the object of the Government, he was quite willing to admit it was deserving of some respect. He, however, wished it to be understood that he objected, and he certainly thought that the majority of his Colleagues would object, to the words "sub-inspector," and that they would support the Amendment to leave them out simply because they would limit the exercise of these general warrants. He admitted that the Prime Minister had spoken very fairly; but it must be remembered that this clause was one which restricted the liberties of the Irish people, and it was a clause which the Irish people were bound to resent and resist. The hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Joseph Cowen) had said that he believed that the power given under this clause would bring about the maximum of discontent with the minimum of service to the State. He (Mr. Leamy) believed that the only service which this clause in this Bill could be would be that it would produce ill-feeling against the ignorant brood of men who knew nothing about the Irish people, and cared very little about them, and who were incapable of understanding them. ["Oh, oh!"] An hon. and learned Member opposite said "Oh, oh!" They were accustomed to look upon those Benches for the Whigs—

THE CHAIRMAN: The question before the Committee is whether "and sub-inspectors" be left out of the clause?

MR. LEAMY said, he would endeavour to confine himself to the subject. The subject was a very small one indeed, as the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) had intimated by his interjection. It was an exceedingly small subject; in fact, it seemed to him that every Amendment which hon. Members on this side of the House moved to this Bill was something exceedingly small indeed, and scarcely worthy of the consideration of the Committee. He was quite aware of it. He was quite aware that they should allow this Bill to pass without opposition, even though it embraced within it provisions which the Whigs—

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that this is not a second reading. The question is simply whether "sub-inspectors" shall stand part of the clause?

MR. LEAMY said, he objected to "sub-inspectors," simply because, for one reason, he thought that if the power of executing warrants of general search was confined to County Inspectors, then, as everybody must admit, it would be confined to a much smaller class than if Sub-Inspectors were allowed to exercise it. He objected to the whole power of general search. He and his hon. Friends had endeavoured to defeat it. They had, however, failed, and the next best thing for them to do was to endeavour to limit its exercise as much as they possibly could.

MR. R. POWER appealed to his hon. Friend (Mr. Leamy) not to push this question to a division. He did so for this reason. He acknowledged that the Prime Minister had to-night made a concession to the Irish Party—a concession of the most valuable nature. They could not estimate the value of the concession that the police were not to invade the homes of the people of Ireland at any hour of the night. As the Amendment stood in the name of the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. T. C. Thompson), he thought that the hon. Member had some right to say whether this Amendment should be pressed to a division or not. He (Mr. R. Power) should be very sorry to interfere with his hon. Friend the Member for Durham in the matter; but he would ask his hon. Friend near him (Mr. Leamy) not to press the subject to a division, if the hon. Member for Durham did not wish it.

MR. M'COAN said, that the concession made by the Prime Minister had completely taken the wind out of the sail of the Amendment; and, although a warrant might be executed by even a Sub-Inspector, his power in the matter was very considerably limited. There was now no ground for objection left, and he should certainly vote against the Amendment.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he would not force his hon. Friend the Member for Durham (Mr. T. C. Thompson) to go to a division if he did not wish it; but, if he did, he would certainly be very glad to follow him in the Lobby. He must take this opportunity of protesting against the weak and washy language in reference to the concession of the Prime Minister. The concession had nothing to do with the clause they were now discussing. The clause they were now discussing remained, in spite of the concession, a most stringent and aggravating one. The hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson) had said that Sub-Inspectors were mentioned for the first time. The hon. Gentleman evidently had not taken the trouble to read the Arms Act of last year. If he had, he would have found that the Lord Lieutenant might commission Sub-Inspectors to issue these warrants.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, that he most heartily welcomed every concession that was made that went to limit or diminish the stringency of the measure; at the same time, he did not see how it was possible for Irish Members not to insist upon every Amendment that would go still further to limit the severity of the Bill. He was grateful to the Prime Minister for every concession in favour of the liberty of the subject in Ireland, and in favour of restricting the tyranny which it was possible to practice under this Bill. He and his hon. Friends stood there fighting, it might be, a losing battle; but, nevertheless, it was a battle they were bound to fight for the liberties of their fellow-countrymen; and every Amendment which went to limit the hardships and the tyranny of this measure, they, as a matter of absolute duty, were bound to support. This Amendment went to restrict the operation of the Bill. It was to the effect that Inspectors, and not Sub-Inspectors, should have liberty to make these searches. Inspectors were fewer in number than Sub-Inspectors; and, of course, if this Amendment were accepted, it must necessarily be expected that fewer searches—and searches upon less trivial grounds—would be made. Sub-Inspectors would, no doubt, make searches upon very slight suspicion; but Inspectors, being fewer in number, as he had said, would probably not go to work without some substantial evidence to work upon. That being so, it seemed to him that the duty of the Irish Members was as clear as the sun at noonday. That duty was to support the Amendment, and every Amendment which went to mitigate the severities of the measure. He welcomed the concession of the Prime Minister, and he welcomed the spirit in which it had been offered. He hoped that in the further progress of this measure the same spirit would be acted upon, not only by the Prime Minister himself, but by others who, in his absence, would have charge of the measure.

MR. SHEIL said, he would endeavour to confine himself strictly to the Amendment before the Committee, and that Amendment he understood to be that the word "sub-inspector" should be omitted. He hoped that his hon. Friend would go to a division upon this Amendment, because it was of very great importance, notwithstanding the alteration—he preferred to call it an alteration, and not a concession—which the Prime Minister had made in the clause. Notwithstanding the alteration, which he admitted was an important one, he still thought that the power which would be placed in the hands of Sub-Inspectors was greater than some of them were entitled to have intrusted to them. They were young men, and from the position they held in the country, they were naturally arrogant. They sometimes rode over the people where they ought not to do so, and, altogether, it was very unwise that Sub-Inspectors should be intrusted with the execution of warrants. While he was on his legs he wished to refer to some remarks which fell from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) towards the end of the Morning Sitting. The hon. Baronet suggested that whether it be an Inspector or a Sub-Inspector who was employed in the search, an accurate report should be made by the officer at head-quarters, giving the reasons for the search and its results. That was a suggestion made when the Prime Minister was absent, and it seemed to him of such importance that he now ventured to repeat it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. LEAMY moved to insert, after "in any," in line 14, "building or enclosure situated in any." If his Amendment was accepted, the clause would run thus—

"It shall be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant from time to time, by warrant, to direct the inspectors and sub-inspectors of constabulary for the time being acting in any constabulary district or any of them, to search for and seize in any building or enclosure situate in any proclaimed district, or in any part thereof, specified in the warrant."

The Amendment was in the spirit of the Arms Act of last year, which empowered the Lord Lieutenant to issue warrants empowering certain persons to search for arms; but it was provided that the warrant should specify the houses, buildings, or other places which were to be searched. He submitted that it was not at all an unfair thing that some requirement of this kind should be inserted in the clause before the Committee. He did not see on what ground the Government could object to such a reasonable Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 14, after the words "in any," insert "building or any enclosure situate in any."—(Mr. Leamy.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

MR. R. POWER moved to insert, after the word "ammunition," in line 15, the words "except a fowling piece, or ammunition for the same." His object in moving this Amendment was to protect small farmers in Ireland from being invaded in the day-time by the police who came to look for guns and ammunition. Under the Arms Act of last year there had been, of course, many searches for arms; but very few indeed had been found. He could not see why a farmer who had a licence for a gun, and who had also a licence to shoot over his own farm, should simply, because a person wrote to the Sub-Inspector and informed him that he had reason to believe that a certain farmer had arms in his house, should have his house invaded by the Constabulary at any hour of the day. He quite admitted that the Government had taken away from his argument a great deal of force by the concession which they had made in the previous Amendment, because his principal objection in this matter was that the farmer, simply because he had a gun in his house, should be liable to invasion at any hour of the night. They who lived in Ireland and knew how farmers carried on their farms, knew that it was necessary for them to have a gun for the protection of their crops—simply to frighten the crows out of their potatoes or wheat. The weapon used, however, was perfectly useless for any other purpose than that of frightening crows; and if they deprived the farmers of the use of it, they would inflict a great deal of injury upon them. If they were prepared to do that, they ought also to be prepared to grant compensation. He had another objection to this clause. Certain landlords in Ireland used the Peace Preservation Act for the preservation of their game; and, under the present Act, a landlord who wished to protect the game in his district, could exercise a large amount of power which certainly he had no right to possess. It was a monstrous thing that simply because a man had a gun in his house, and a person informed an Inspector that he had reason to believe that such was the case, that such Inspector should be able to go and take it away, although the man might have a perfect right to possess it to protect his crops from the depredations of birds and vermin.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 15, after the word "ammunition," to insert the words "except a fowling piece, or ammunition for the same."—(Mr. Richard Power.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. TREVELYAN said, he had the greatest respect and sympathy for the feeling of hon. Members with regard to fowling-pieces and ammunition; but he would point out that, perhaps, other hon. Members might have the same feeling with regard to rifles and revolvers. They had all of them some favourite weapon, but he was afraid that whatever arm a person had a fancy for, it must be as suspicious as any other, and this fact must not be forgotten—which anyone who had had any experience of sport in India must know perfectly well—that a fowling-piece would send a bullet a distance of 50 or 60 yards as accurately and with almost as much effect as a rifle. A fowling-piece would send a bullet a short distance as satisfactorily as a rifle for all practical purposes, and, therefore, for all purposes of outrage a fowling-piece was as formidable as any other weapon that could be manufactured. If a farmer wished to carry a fowling-piece to protect his crops, or for the legitimate purpose of sport, he could go to the licence officer and obtain a licence. If he did not take that step, then he ought not to be allowed to keep a fowling-piece. As to the fear expressed by an hon. Member that some people would make use of the Arms Act for the preservation of their game, it must be remembered that not the landlords, but the stipendiary magistrates, were the licensing officers.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he agreed that to the murderer, or to the person who wished to commit an outrage, a fowling-piece was quite sufficient, but as a weapon of war it was totally useless. He did not believe the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had lived long enough in Ireland to thoroughly appreciate the complaint of the Irish farmers. These people required the use of fowling-pieces to protect themselves from birds. His hon. Friends called them "crows," but he did not think the birds that were such a nuisance to the Irish farmers were accurately described in the House of Commons by calling them crows. In England the great crow was the only bird called a crow, but in Ireland the rooks were called crows. Now, the rook might be a very useful bird at certain times of the year—[Cries of "Divide!"]. Hon. Members cried "Divide!" but he wished to say a few words upon this question, as it was one in which he took a great deal of interest. He had taken the trouble, about a month ago, to question some of the farmers with regard to the depredations of these birds, and he had learned from them that they did damage in the country probably to the extent of £500,000 every year. He was told that each small farmer lost about £1 a-year through the depredations of the rooks. It would be seen, therefore, that the question was one of great importance to Irish agriculturists; and if the hands of these people were crippled, and they were not allowed to use the ordinary weapon for driving away or destroying the birds, they would be injured very much. The Amendment of his hon. Friend was a fair one, and he (Colonel Nolan) should give it his support. He did not desire to delay the clause, because he considered the Government had made ample concessions on it—indeed, if the Government made similar concessions he should be very willing to see the Bill pass through to-morrow or Thursday. He only wished to deal with this matter from an economical point of view, and he would suggest that if the Government did not allow the farmers to use fowling-pieces to protect themselves from the birds, the Poor Law Unions should be empowered to send officers on to the properties of the small farmers for the purpose of destroying the rooks and vermin. He would not enter fully into the desirability of adopting such a plan as this, but he would merely suggest that such a power might be given. Of course, the Poor Law Unions would not exercise it unless it were considered desirable to do so. On this matter there was great difference between England and Ireland. In England the rooks were shot every year, or every other year, in order to keep them down, and for the table, but in Ireland they were not shot for the latter purpose. The people would not eat them. It was necessary, however, that the farmers should have power to use fowling-pieces against them. They would not be able to drive them from their potatoes when the bulbs were beginning to form, and that was the time when most damage was done. If the Government prevented the farmers from doing that, they should take some other measures to protect them. Irish Members were bound to meet here in London, instead of Dublin, where all these things would be properly understood and properly considered, and that fact the Government ought to bear in mind. The Chief Secretary ought to take measures to ascertain the opinion of the country by requesting the evidence of competent men. He ought to take steps to find out whether, by refusing the farmers the use of fowling-pieces for the purpose of destroying rooks, he did not destroy the balance of nature, and allow the rooks to preponderate. As things were at present, he thought the Amendment of the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Richard Power) ought to be supported. This question was one in which his (Colonel Nolan's) constituents took great interest.

Mr. R. Power

MR. JONES PARRY said, he would not unduly occupy the time of the Committee. He should be very sorry to do so; but the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down, and who attached such importance to rooks, appeared to know nothing about them and their habits. He (Mr. Jones Parry), however, did know something about them. He would not delay the Committee by stating his opinions or his experiences as to the habits of these birds, as it was utterly beside the question before the Committee—and, incidentally, he would remark that it would be a most desirable thing if hon. Gentlemen in this House would confine themselves more closely than they did to the questions directly under consideration. He would simply remark—and he would be very happy to give the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Nolan) his reasons for saying so, in private, if he desired them—that in his opinion, rooks did a great deal more good than harm. He would also venture to inform the hon. and gallant Member that young rooks made a remarkably good pie. He (Mr. Jones Parry), believing that rooks were not the only things shot from behind loop-holed stone walls in Ireland, should support the Government clause in its entirety.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he had carefully guarded himself from expressing any opinion whatever as to whether rooks did harm or good. He had said that in Ireland they did not understand eating them—they had a prejudice, perhaps a bad one, against putting them in a pie. ["Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. and gallant Gentleman wish to address the Chair?

COLONEL NOLAN said, he did wish to address the Chair, because he thought this was a very important matter. If the Government insisted upon destroying the balance of nature by depriving farmers of their fowling-pieces, which were legitimate weapons for the purpose of destroying or frightening away the rooks, the Poor Law authorities should be enabled to take up the matter, As he had said, he did not pronounce an opinion as to whether rooks did good or harm. That was a question for the decision of scientific men; but the Committee was now proposing to interfere in Ireland with the system of preserving the ordinary balance of nature that they allowed to be practised in England. They allowed the farmers to frighten away the crows in England, but they would not permit it in Ireland. He merely wished to point out that a very large economic damage would be done by the passage of this clause, and the Arms Act, with which it was mixed up, and that the Chief Secretary ought to very carefully consider the matter before he came to a final resolve. He (Colonel Nolan) had some idea of introducing a clause on this subject on Report, but he was not sure at present whether or not such a course would be in Order. His clause would have the effect of giving the Poor Law authorities power to destroy the rooks where they thought it desirable.

Mr. REDMOND said, he did not rise to discuss the merits or demerits of rook-pie, but he would like to point out to the hon. Member who introduced this interesting subject that rook-pie was a dish the Irish farmers were scarcely likely to enjoy, unless they were allowed to use weapons for the purpose of shooting the birds. He should like to ask the Government whether this clause was to override the Act of last year on this subject? Under the Act of last year a man might have obtained a licence to use a fowling-piece. That licence might have been given to him upon the production of a certificate signed by two magistrates in his own locality; and was he (Mr. Redmond) to understand—and he respectfully asked the attention of the Home Secretary, or some Member of the Government, to this matter—that under this clause the mere suspicion of a policeman was to override that certificate? ["No, no!"] The hon. and learned Member for Wicklow (Mr. M'Coan) said "No, no!" but if the hon. and learned Member would read the clause, he would see that under it a person who had obtained a warrant from the Lord Lieutenant would be empowered, if he suspected that arms were in the possession of an individual, or were about to be used in connection with a secret society, to search the house or houses where he believed the arms to be, and might, if he found any, take possession of them, notwithstanding that they had been obtained under the Arms Act of last year.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that if a man had obtained a licence under the Arms Act of last year, the mere fact of his possessing such a document would show that the arms were not likely to be suspected of being required for an unlawful purpose.

Mr. REDMOND: That is ridiculous.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the hon. Member asked him a question, but would not allow him to answer it. If the hon. Member would allow him, he would attempt to give him an answer. What he wished to say was this, that a licence under the Arms Act of last year would not come within this clause. Arms carried by licence would not be arms—

"Suspected to be used or to be intended to be used for the purpose of, or in connection with, any secret society or secret association existing for criminal purposes."

Mr. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he would not detain the Committee two minutes; but he wished to ask whether, if farmers were not to be allowed to keep fowling-pieces for shooting these rooks which preyed upon their crops, would the police undertake to shoot the birds for them? The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) knew what he was talking about on this matter, and he said that the birds did damage to the extent of about £500,000 per annum in Ireland. It was pointed out that the farmers could obtain licences to use fowling-pieces; but to obtain these licences they would have to go before the local magistrates, and that, he could assure the Committee, was a thing that very many farmers in Ireland would be very reluctant to do. If they went before a magistrate for this purpose, it was very probable that their request would not be listened to, that it would be refused, and that they would be insulted into the bargain. That would be likely to occur in very many cases; and he, therefore, said that if the farmers were not to be allowed to keep fowling-pieces for the purpose of destroying or frightening away the rooks, would the Government instruct the police to shoot the birds for them?

MR. REDMOND said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary did not answer the question he had put to him as to whether the suspicions of a policeman were to override the Arms Act? The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that when a licence was granted, the arms carried under that licence were not likely to be used for illegal purposes. He (Mr. Redmond) should suggest that the clause should be amended by the insertion of the words "except in the case of persons who had received licences." As the clause stood at present, even where licences were granted, the arms might be seized if subsequently a police-officer chose to suspect that they were going to be used for an improper purpose.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 31; Noes 155: Majority 124.—(Div. List, No. 160.)

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 15, after the word "ammunition," to insert the words "except arms held under licence under 'The Peace Preservation Act, 1881.'"—(Mr. Redmond.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he could not accept the Amendment. If arms were used in connection with a secret association, no licence ought to protect them.

MR. REDMOND said, that if a licence was given to a man to carry arms by three magistrates, who believed him to be a proper person to have arms, such a man was not likely to have arms for felonious purposes. The clause without this Amendment would have this effect. That although a man might have a licence, in consequence of a certificate of three magistrates, that licence might be overridden simply by the suspicion of a police-officer. For this reason he urged the Amendment on the Committee, and hoped the Government would make some further statement, and not dismiss the proposal in a few words.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, it was true that if arms were employed for criminal purposes, a licence should not cover them; but the point of the hon. Member was that the fact of a licence granted by three magistrates ought to be stronger than the suspicion of a police-officer, and he did not think the Home Secretary had answered that objection. The right hon. and learned Gentleman's statement was, that if arms were to be used for criminal purposes, or secret associations, of course licences should not cover them; but the question was whether the mere suspicion of an Inspector that arms were to be used for criminal purposes should override the licence of three magistrates? He thought the Government, having made a concession last year in the Arms Act, should not now take away the value of a licence by a side-wind.

MR. PARNELL said, that it was not reasonable that where three magistrates had carefully investigated the application of a man to have a licence to carry arms, after hearing the Constabulary authorities and everybody else interested in the case, that a Sub-Inspector, under the authority of a general warrant, issued by the Lord Lieutenant in regard to a particular district, should be allowed to go and override the action of the magistrates upon mere suspicion, and should be allowed to enter a house and confiscate any arms that might be found. Such a course would be worse than an absurdity—it would be a hardship. In the first place, a licence was given to a man to carry arms; but the next day a Sub-Inspector, simply by having a general warrant, would search a district and seize and confiscate the arms for which the licence was granted on the suspicion that they were intended for the purpose of, or in connection with, some secret society. The authorities already had a remedy for such a case. If, at any time, in granting a licence, the police should consider, owing to circumstances that might have come to their notice, or information they might have received, that a person holding a licence ought not to continue to hold it, it was in the power of the Lord Lieutenant to revoke that licence and so deprive the man of his arms. Surely it was not too much to ask, having in view that the Government had itself power to revoke a licence, that the Amendment should be accepted. It was a most reasonable proposal, and he could not for a moment imagine why the Government objected to it. If there was any reasonable suspicion that a person licensed to carry arms was going to use them in connection with a secret association, that circumstance could be reported to the Castle, and the licence could be revoked.

[Fifteenth Night.]

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he quite admitted that this clause, like many other clauses in the Bill, inflicted some hardship; but suppose that, in a search of this kind, the Inspector found arms which he had good reason for suspecting were about to be used for criminal purposes, was he to leave those arms in the hands of the men with all the risks of what use might be made of them while an application was being made to the Lord Lieutenant? That would be an entirely intolerable course. This clause, more than any other clause in the Bill, was directed to the evil of secret associations and to the apparatus of crime. Were they to leave the apparatus of crime in the hands of persons by whom they might be used for the most grave offences until a roundabout application could be made to the Lord Lieutenant to revoke the licence? The hon. Member said the licence might have been granted in the belief that the person receiving it was fit to be trusted; but magistrates were not infallible, although, for this purpose only, hon. Members opposite were disposed to attach great value to the belief of magistrates that a man could be trusted with arms. A man might be perfectly well conducted when he received his licence, but he might be misled and betrayed into membership of a secret association, and so become totally unfit to be trusted with arms, and he might be found in possession of arms under circumstances leading to the conviction that he was going to use them for the worst purposes. Yet it was held that these arms were to be left in his hands until an application could be made to the Lord Lieutenant, and if that course were adopted the clause would be totally useless.

MR. SYNAN said, it appeared to him that the Home Secretary had entirely forgotten the substantial concession recently made by the Prime Minister with reference to secret associations—namely, that searches were only to be made upon proof, or strong suspicion founded upon proof, that meetings of a society were being held in a particular house. Under ordinary circumstances, this section would carry the law no further than the section of the Peace Preservation Act of 1871 which enabled searches to be made for arms. That was substantially as far as this clause went, and the only exception now to be engrafted on the Act of 1881 would be the exception of search by night upon proof, or upon suspicion founded upon proof, that a secret society was holding a meeting at that moment in a particular house. What answer was there to the Amendment? Under the Act of 1881 the licence would save the possessor of arms; under this clause the licence ought equally to save him, unless some secret meeting was being held at a particular moment in his house, and proof of that meeting was in the hands of the Inspector or Sub-Inspector. He was quite at a loss to understand upon what principle or argument the objection of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was founded after the concession made, and after the Amendment proposed by the Prime Minister. There had been no answer given to this Amendment, and, in his opinion, no answer could be given to it.

MR. SEXTON said, it was not necessary to say that this clause would work hardship, because in that particular it was the same as every other clause in the Bill. He was at a loss to understand what difficulty the Government saw in accepting this Amendment. The Home Secretary laid stress on the time consumed in applying for a revocation of a licence; but everyone knew the speed with which communications were now carried on between different districts and Dublin Castle, and if a person in any district was no longer fit to hold arms, the telegraph wire would take that fact in half-an-hour to Dublin, and the licence could be revoked the next morning. The possession of a licence ought to protect a man from a domiciliary visit. The licence meant that two district magistrates were of opinion that the holder was fit to carry arms, and, furthermore, it meant that the opinion of district magistrates was confirmed by the Resident Magistrate, who was the highest police authority in the matter. In what a strange position that would leave the Government? On the one hand, there would be the man holding the licence declaring him fit to hold arms in the opinion of two district magistrates and one Resident Magistrate; and, on the other hand, a Sub-Inspector overriding the opinion of his official superiors, which was an improper and irrational proceeding. But suppose that a Sub-Inspector made a search—and he could conceive circumstances under which a search might be made from the point of view of the Government—suppose a Sub-Inspector got information that a society was holding a meeting in a house, and that there was a large number of weapons in the house to be used for criminal purposes, then he could understand the Sub-Inspector making a search; but if he made the search and found only the weapons for which the licence was granted, then on what pretence could they be confiscated? He invited the Home Secretary seriously to consider this point. He would let the Sub-Inspector make a search; but if he found only the arms mentioned in the licence, which a Resident Magistrate and two district magistrates thought the man was entitled to have, then the arms ought not to be taken away.

MR. PARNELL said, the Home Secretary was going back on his old tack again. He had informed the Committee, with awe-stricken manner, that this clause was directed against secret societies; but experience showed that if there was one thing which domiciliary visits failed to do, it was to reach secret societies. He wished to ask the Home Secretary how many arms had been seized from secret societies by domiciliary visits since the Arms Act was passed in March of last year? Had he seized one? Had a single gun or weapon of any kind been seized under that Act which was suspected of being intended for the purposes of a secret association? Could the right hon. and learned Gentleman give a single instance; and, if not, why did he wish to retain this power? A clause of this kind was only useful for the purpose of irritating the population. He knew that many young men, shop-assistants and others, in Limerick had been turned into Fenians by the operation of a similar clause in the Act of 1870. They never intended to do anything against the Crown, but their boxes and private possessions had been turned out by the police, on the ground of searching for arms, and those men had since become Fenians, at least, in their hearts. It was in this way that revolution and sedition in Ireland were cultivated. He thought, as the Home Secretary was now asking for more stringent powers, he ought to show that the Act of last year had been in any single instance effectual in regard to secret and illegal societies.

MR. HEALY said, it seemed to him that the remarks of his hon. Friend called for an answer. He himself had shown earlier in the evening that, whereas, under a provision inserted in the Arms Act, £2,000 had been paid for arms legitimately delivered to the authorities, not a single gun or revolver had been seized under the right of search. He thought the Committee had a right to be informed what advantage the Government had obtained by the powers they already possessed, and if it was the case, as the Return showed, that a sum of over £2,000 had been paid for weapons honestly and legitimately delivered up by people who could not obtain licences to carry arms. The Chief Secretary, at least, ought to state how many guns, or revolvers, or cartridges, had been delivered under the existing Arms Act. He quite agreed that if the right hon. Gentleman had no information he could not give it; but, generally, if he had information he was very anxious to launch it upon the Committee. The hon. Member for the City of Cork had stated that not a single revolver, or gun, or a pinch of powder, or a percussion cap had been seized under the existing powers to search between sunrise and sunset; and, per contra, as the Government had, under what might be called the benevolent clause of the former Act, refunded £2,000 to persons for their arms and ammunition, it stood to reason, if the Government wished to get arms delivered back from those who held them, that they should still pursue the benevolent method, and not the reverse, as they now proposed. Was it desirable to pursue the discussion upon this clause after the statement made by the Prime Minister? After that statement, he thought they might come to a speedy conclusion upon it. If it were the fact, as the Prime Minister had said, that they only wished to use this power of night-search to discover the holding of illegal meetings, what was the good of the Government going on with the clause? They already had the power to search by day, and why should the Home Secretary be so obstinate as to this particular provision? Let the Home Secretary answer the question of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, and say whether the Government had found a single gun or pinch of powder under the Arms Act; and whether he supposed that during the night members of secret societies, who possessed guns or ammunition, would transfer those illegal articles from bog-holes and grave-yards and other places of illegal deposit to their homes for illegal purposes.

[Fifteenth Night.]

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he wished to draw the attention of the Committee to the manner in which this discussion was being conducted. He had already said what he had to say upon this clause, and now the hon. Member asked for details as to the seizure of arms. That was not his special department; he knew more about arms in England. But the hon. Member was entirely mistaken if he supposed that no arms were seized under the Act of last year.

MR. PARNELL said, that was not his question. He asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and by implication he made a statement, whether any arms had been seized by means of domiciliary visits, which were intended to be used, or were suspected of being intended to be used, by secret societies?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was answering the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), who said that not a single gun or pinch of powder had been taken under the Act of last year. That statement was not accurate. To say there were not as many arms as might have been seized, and, in his opinion, ought to have been seized, would be perfectly true, and that was why this clause was introduced. The clause in the last year's Act was unfortunate, on account of the limitations in the warrant, and that was why this clause was introduced without such limitations on the search-warrant, because these limitations defeated the Search Clause last year. Believing that there were in Ireland at this time—and, he might say, knowing that there were—large quantities of arms in the possession, or in connection with, secret societies, this clause was introduced in order that they might be found and seized.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the Committee that in the last two or three speeches there has been no relevancy to the Amendment. The Amendment is to except arms held under licences under the Peace Preservation Act of 1881; but the whole discussion has been upon the clause, and not on the Amendment. I must ask any hon. Gentleman who rises to speak to the Amendment alone.

MR. O'KELLY said, he must confess that he did not agree with some of his hon. Friends who had spoken on this Amendment, for he thought it would be a good thing if the police were to seize most of the arms held under permission from the magistrates. The object of this clause, as the Government proposed it, was to enable the Sub-Inspectors to deprive any farmer, who might happen to be objectionable to them, of the fowling-piece which was necessary for the protection of his field from birds and rabbits. There was not the slightest probability that this clause would enable the Government to seize any arms intended to be used for illegal purposes. The power under the present Act had never enabled the Government to seize those arms, and they never would be able to do so. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had told them that he was better informed in reference to arms in England than in Ireland. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman's knowledge of the number and condition of arms in England could be judged by the statement in the public Press, the right hon. and learned Gentleman's knowledge was very limited indeed. The danger of this clause, as it stood, in reference to Ireland, was that it might be used in a malicious way by the police to deprive farmers of the arms which were necessary to protect their crops, and thereby inflict on farmers, who might be regarded by the police as objectionable persons, serious loss from damage to their crops. The Amendment, as it stood, would diminish that danger. Speaking for his own county, he knew that injury had already been inflicted, practically in defiance of the law, by the police, upon every man who was suspected of being a person holding opinions not liked by the police authorities of the country. These men had been deprived of their arms. They had been robbed during the last year of a certain amount of their crops by being deprived of their arms, with which they were enabled to kill the game which was so destructive to their crops, and, therefore, he did not agree with some of his hon. Friends who had spoken upon this question. He was of opinion that it was a very good thing for every man to have a gun, and he should take the liberty of differing materially and strongly with the hon. Gentleman who had supported this Amendment.

Mr. Healy

MR. GRAY said, the object of the clause was simply vexatious and irritating to the well-disposed and law-abiding people, while it would not in any way interfere with the criminals. It appeared that, under this Act, constables would have power to confiscate arms and ammunition. He himself had had some experience of the inconvenience and annoyance which arose from confusing and conflicting Acts of Parliament with reference to the possession of arms in Ireland. In the year 1871, when the Act of 1870 was in force, he was in possession of a bijou rifle, and he went down to the sea-side, taking this rifle with him. The Wild Birds' Act was not then in force, and he wished to amuse himself by shooting sea-gulls and the like. It so turned out that he went into a proclaimed district, and a police-constable came up to him and asked him whether he had a licence to carry this toy-rifle. He produced an Excise licence, but he was told that that was not sufficient, and that he would have to be taken into custody. He told the constable who he was, and the constable was very civil. He was desirous not to take him (Mr. Gray) into custody, but he said the law was imperative, and he should have to arrest him. This was on the Saturday afternoon, and he was brought to the police-station. At the station he saw the Inspector, to whom he said, "This is a very irritating business;" to which the Inspector replied—"I do not wish to keep you, but I have no option; I must keep you. I have no means of liberating you now, as there happens to be no magistrate in the county, and the only thing that I can suggest is that you should remain in the cell until Monday morning." This was at Mallahide; and the Inspector said that the magistrate might probably return to his residence on Monday morning, when he (Mr. Gray) could be liberated. This was not a very pleasant prospect, and he asked the Inspector if there was no other way by which he could be liberated before Monday. The Inspector replied, "No; I am very sorry, but I must keep you." At last, he (Mr.

Gray) said—"Well, you had better send me in custody into Dublin, and there we will find a magistrate who is a magistrate of the county." He was sent to Dublin in charge of a constable bearing his own and his (Mr. Gray's) rifles. He was brought to Dublin Castle, and there he was introduced to the Inspector General of Constabulary, who said he was sorry for the inconvenience to which he (Mr. Gray) had been put, and, as he was a magistrate for the county as well as for the city, he would liberate him at once. He (Mr. Gray) heard no more about the matter. He was not disposed at that time to be of a very rebellious disposition, or to use his rifle for the purpose of committing any offence; but this just illustrated the way these Acts were worked. They irritated and annoyed the lawfully-disposed people, while they did nothing towards catching any member of criminal society. The clause, as modified by the Prime Minister, proposed that these night domiciliary visits should only be used for the purpose of arresting people who were actually meeting in a house for secret purposes. For what purpose did the Government ask power to seize arms? Surely, it merely led to confusion; it merely tended to irritate and cause discontent amongst the lawfully-disposed, and it never would touch a single criminal. It had not been shown that under the Act of last year a single arm was confiscated that the Government suggested as being used for the purpose of a secret society. Doubtless, by this clause, many persons as loyal as he was in 1870 would be greatly irritated. Though the occurrence which he had related did not turn him into a Fenian, it greatly annoyed him, and he had never forgotten it, and he had never had the same respect for English administered law since that date as he had before. They might occasionally seize arms by entering houses at night; but it was possible to be shown, subsequently, that those arms had been licensed under the Act of last year. He had no hesitation in saying that this clause would not affect secret societies in the slightest degree, but it would create discontent and disaffection.

MR. PARNELL said, the Government had not been able to mention a single instance in which, during the last year, any gun or ammunition had been seized as a result of domiciliary visits which was intended to be used for the purpose of a secret society, and he believed it might also be stated to be a fact that no weapon of any kind had been seized as the result of any domiciliary visit at all, thus clearly showing that such clauses were perfectly useless for the purposes they had in view. He wished to show, also, that this clause would supply an inducement to the persons who believed the police had any ill-will against them to conceal any valuable arms they might have. Suppose a farmer with a valuable fowling-piece worth, say, £20 or £30, for which he had got a licence, it would be in the power of a magistrate or Sub-Inspector to come in at random after that licence had been given, and, under a warrant of the Lord Lieutenant, absolutely confiscate that weapon. Consequently, any person who had a valuable arm of any kind would be very much inclined to conceal it, if he had reason to suppose that the police had any spite against him and intended to search his house for arms.

MR. REDMOND said, that what had happened with reference to this Amendment was a very fair instance of the way in which the Government, by their own obstinacy, prolonged the discussion upon the clauses of this Bill. The point for which the Irish Members were contending was a very small one. The Amendment, if the Government had assented to it, would not in the slightest degree have impaired the efficiency of the clause, but, by making a concession, the Government would have tended, to some extent, at any rate, to conciliate a large section of the Members in this House, and they would certainly have facilitated the progress of the Bill. But on every occasion of this kind, when matters like this were left to the discretion of the Home Secretary (Sir William Harcourt), they found the Government taking a most firm position, and refusing to make the slightest concession. Before they proceeded to a division, he would like to ask the Committee seriously to consider what the real point at issue was. Under the Act of last year, it was provided that farmers of respectable character, who were able to prove that they were of respectable character to two magistrates belonging to their own districts, should obtain from those two magistrates a certificate of good character, and a certificate that they were not about to use arms for illegal purposes. They thereupon could obtain from the licensing authority, which was composed of the Resident Magistrates, a licence to carry arms. It was, however, provided by this clause of the present Bill to override that licence at the mere suggestion of a police-officer. The contention of the Home Secretary was very plain and very unjust. The right hon. and learned Gentleman argued that the licence to the farmer might have been granted 12 months ago, but the suspicion that he was about to use his arms for illegal purposes might be of more recent date, and, if that were so, the suspicion must be acted upon at once and without the delay that would be consequent upon what the right hon. and learned Gentleman called a roundabout application to the Lord Lieutenant to revoke the licence. That was a fair statement of the objection which had been argued by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, who, by the way, added that the police authorities would not have power to search for those arms without, in the first place, making an application to the Lord Lieutenant. The answer of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was conclusive. If, in the first place, the police were able to give sufficient reason to the Lord Lieutenant to induce him to grant a warrant to enable them to search for arms, they, at the same time, would be able to give sufficient reason to the Lord Lieutenant why he should revoke the licence previously granted. There was not the slightest necessity for a second's delay. As soon as the police authorities believed there were in a particular district arms which might be used for illegal purposes, all they would have to do was this. In addition to applying to the Lord Lieutenant for power to search houses, they must represent to His Excellency the necessity of revoking the licence he had granted. Such a proceeding would not entail any delay, and he ventured to say that the request of the Irish Members in this matter was most reasonable. A second point was raised by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). Under the Act of last year, it was provided that if men possessing arms gave their arms up voluntarily to the Constabulary they should be paid compensation, and in case they had obtained a licence, they were allowed, of course, to retain their arms. What was proposed by this clause? In the case where men had not given up their arms because they had got licences to keep them, it was proposed, on the suspicion of a police officer, to take their arms from them without any compensation whatever. The least that might be done would be this—that in cases where arms were taken from persons who had previously held them under a licence, the Government should grant them compensation. If the Government acted upon the principle of the Bill of last year, they were bound to give the people compensation, because compensation was only refused in cases where they had refused licences, and where the people had refused to give up their arms. The Home Secretary, as another objection to the Amendment, said that the magistrates in granting the licences might not be infallible. It was well known the magistrates were not infallible; but did the right hon. and learned Gentleman mean to contend that police officers, on whose suspicion a seizure of arms would be made, were infallible? If he did not, what did he mean by talking about the fallibility of magistrates. He sincerely trusted that upon this matter he would have the support, not only of hon. Members from Ireland, but those hon. Members representing English constituencies who did not desire to see this Act more oppressive on the people of Ireland than was absolutely necessary, in their opinion, for the suppression of crime.

MR. HEALY said, it appeared to him that the Home Secretary must be quite unaware of the proposal which had been previously made. The fact was that the police should only enter a house for the purpose of search, and the Amendment proposed that arms which had been previously licensed should not be seized by means of a night's search, day search, or any search at all. If it be the case that nothing should be seized at night, except when an illegal meeting was discovered, it was evident, from the position which the Home Secretary had taken up, that he was quite unaware of the concession made by the Prime Minister. He would ask when the Government intended to bring in their Amendment as foreshadowed by the Prime Minister? Would they bring it up to-morrow, or upon Report?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: On Report.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 32; Noes 203: Majority 171.—(Div. List, No. 161.)

MR. LEAMY said, he rose to move an Amendment, the object of which was to take from Sub-Inspectors the power proposed in this clause of not only searching for and seizing arms and ammunition, but also papers and documents. This power, if exercised, would, he believed, lead to a vast amount of irritation and exasperation, and would scarcely be of any practical value to the Government. If the Government thought arms were concealed in Ireland, to be concealed for the purpose of treason or the commission of crime, there might, from their point of view, be very good ground for taking this power of search; but the Committee should bear in mind the way in which this power of seizing papers was exercised during what was called a conspiracy in Ireland. The police entered houses and ransacked every part; searched for papers, and took away not only papers which could by any possibility be connected with secret associations, but papers belonging to all the members of the family. He hardly understood how any Englishman could support such a power as was claimed under this clause. He could not expect, at that time of the night, when English Members had gone away, disgusted probably with the proceedings of the Committee, and with the fight which Irish Members thought it necessary to make for what they believed to be the rights of their people under the Constitution, to secure the sympathy of English Members; but he would ask any English Member who cared to listen whether he did not think that Ireland was a part of the Kingdom which ought to enjoy some of the benefits of the British Constitution; and whether he thought it right to seize papers which might be suspected by a policeman as absolutely necessary for preventing crime in Ireland; and whether he thought such a power could have any effect but to further irritate the people against the English Government, and convince them of the uselessness of expecting to have an equal share in the benefits of the Constitution? The searches under the Arms Act of last year had been very extensive, and sometimes the police entered 100 houses in one day in the same locality. These visits had been so carried on that floors had been broken up, and every part of the house which, in the opinion of the police, might conceal arms had been torn open in the search. He could understand that if the police were authorized to search for documents their search must be minute; but he could not understand the Home Secretary asking for this clause. He had heard the right hon. Gentleman describe himself as a Whig; but he thought the Home Secretary might have gone back to the time when Fox and the Duke of Bedford were standing up for the right of freedom of speech in the country, and have followed their example. How could the Chief Secretary for Ireland support this clause? He did not care whether it was exercised by day or by night; but he was not willing to be held as joining in the praises which had been expressed of the Treasury Bench for the so-called concessions they had made. The proposals of the Government were equally opposed to the Constitutional rights of the Irish people; and, therefore, he was equally opposed to this power of search. How could the Home Secretary justify this power—this searching which would go to the length of examining every portion of a house and carrying off every paper that could be found? It was stated the police might only search for documents which they suspected were connected with unlawful societies. How would this clause work? A search might be made in a country district on a particular day, when, perhaps, 40 or 50 houses would be examined; a number of manuscripts would be found in each house, and these loose papers could not be examined there and then in the house, to show whether they were or were not connected with secret societies, but they would be carried away altogether. That happened in 1866-7, when letters which had no connection with secret societies—and even girls' love-letters—were carried off. What could the Home Secretary expect to gain by this proposal? He knew how minute a search for arms could be; but if documents were to be searched for, even a man's clothes hanging on a door would be subject to examination, and every piece of paper upon which there was the least writing would be seized. Did the Home Secretary think that if such a power of search were given to the police, and was known throughout the country, that people were fools enough to keep compromising documents inside their house? Of course, they would not do anything of the kind, and when the police made searches the only people likely to be hurt would be the innocent people. Other people who desired to keep secret arms and papers would take good care to have them outside the house. He did not see how the Home Secretary could hope to gain by this power, and he hoped the Amendment would receive the support of English Members.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 15, to leave out from the word "ammunition," to the words "to be" in line 16.—(Mr. Leamy.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'papers, documents, instruments, or' stand part of the Clause."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT remarked that he had already pointed out that this clause was directed against secret societies, and unless the Government possessed these powers they could not attempt to grapple with secret societies. Did hon. Members mean to say that if the police found in the house these documents of incitement to assassination and intimidation, and murderous placards, they were not to seize them? Of course, they must seize them, and take into custody the people who were in charge of them. If anything was to be done for the prevention of crime it must be by actions of this character, and he must be permitted to say that when the Committee entered on the consideration of this Bill hon. Members opposite said they were very anxious to co-operate in a Bill for the prevention of crime. He should like to know what symptom there had been from them of that desire? What were the measures which hon. Members were disposed to take for the prevention of crime in Ireland? He should like to see any one hon. Gentleman on those Benches get up and say in what way they had assisted in any measure for the prevention of crime. There was no clause or suggestion for that purpose which had not met with the same extreme and unrelenting opposition. What were the measures hon. Members proposed to take? He should have thought that if there was any measure in passing which every right-minded man in that House, and out of the House, would have been disposed to take part, it would have been something that would have given power to the law to stop the circulation of such documents as that which had been read on the previous nights, inciting to the murder of innocent men, simply for lending cars to the police. The Government must and would take such powers as were necessary to seize such documents.

Mr. Leamy

MR. PARNELL said, he did not think the right hon. and learned Gentleman was entitled to ask Irish Members what measures they would recommend for the prevention of crime in Ireland, because they had repeatedly, during the last 12 months, informed the House of the measures they proposed; but the Government had rejected their recommendations. A short time ago they recommended an Arrears Bill, and they believed—and they ought to know—that if that Bill had been passed, and the Government had not gone back upon their brutal policy of coercion, which had proved to be a failure under the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. W. E. Forster), crime would have been prevented. During the fortnight or three weeks when it was supposed the Government were about to depart from this policy of coercion crime greatly diminished in Ireland—it diminished as much in one month, when it was supposed that the Government were going to trust to the honour and good feeling of the Irish people to repress crime, as it had increased during the four months of the coercion policy of the late Chief Secretary. The Irish Members had never ceased recommending such measures in order to prevent crime, and he failed to see what further proof could be given to the Home Secretary. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had been a consistent advocate of legal violence against the Irish people; and yet he now came forward with his last act of legal violence, which he was pressing through the House with the relentless determination to accept no Amendment except those of trivial importance. Irish Members did not lie under the reproach of having refrained from stating their recommendations. They believed Ireland would have been pacified if the counsels of the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland had not been followed. Those counsels had been followed, and the responsibility was not on the shoulders of the Irish Members; and he thought that his hon. Friend (Mr. Leamy) was entitled to some other reply than that he had received on the present occasion. Under this clause, as it stood, the police could take a man's clothes on the ground that they were to be used for the purpose of carrying out the objects of illegal associations. There was no definition in this Act from beginning to end, and that was what the hon. Member asked for. The Home Secretary had persistently followed up his policy upon this clause of refusing to define anything, and of leaving every person and every civil right in Ireland to the tender mercies of the police.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, the Home Secretary told the Committee that he was anxious to have the power of searching for treasonable and seditious documents. He begged to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary what he thought of the following document:—

"Think you Queen of England, you Prince of Wales, you Duke of Edinburgh, you Duke of Connaught, you Prince Leopold, you Princesses Royal, Helena, Louise and Beatrice; you lazy Royal louchers on the labours of the people——"

THE CHAIRMAN: Is the hon. Member reading some paper he has found in Ireland?

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN, said the extract was from an Irish paper—

"You lazy Royal louchers on the labours of a suffering people, and you haughty aristocrats, you bloated capitalists, you land and money thieves——"

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is reading an article which uses disrespectful words to the Queen. It is not allowed that disrespectful words to the Queen should be used in this House even in a quotation.

MR. HEALY rose to Order. This clause dealt with any arms, ammunition, papers, or documents, and with the power to seize papers and documents under this clause. He wished to ask whether the fact that the more reprehensible the language read by the hon. Member was the more desirable it was that it should be exposed in the Committee?

THE CHAIRMAN: The point of Order is a different matter. In any speech of any hon. Member, even by quotation, it is improper to use words disrespectful to the Sovereign.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he would not read another word of the extract which was disrespectful to the Royal Family; but he would go on with the other portion—

“Think, you haughty aristocrats, you bloated capitalists, the land and money-thieves of to-day—think, we say, before it is too late, and repent of your misdeeds; disgorge the wealth you have only got by murder, exaction, robbery, and rapine of the most vile form; tremble with the knowledge that the day of retribution is fast approaching when an oppressed nation will rise in the majesty and grandeur of their might, and sweep you, the blight and curse of every age, from the face of the earth like so many vermin as you are. Oh, yes! sweep you from the earth, for only your extinction can cure our misery. And now, what is the remedy for such a state of things? Why, a war to the knife against the governing classes of to-day—war against all these legalized thieves and murderers. Oh, yes! workers of to-day, there is nothing left for you to do but to steel your nerves, dry your powder, sharpen your weapons, tighten your grasp, and drive the bright flashing steel clean through the trembling heart of your bloodstained foe.”

The right hon. and learned Gentleman had said he wished to search for treasonable and seditious documents. Surely he ought to search for treason and documents wherever they were to be found; and this extract, though it appeared in an Irish paper, appeared there only for the purpose of denouncing it, while the paper in which it first appeared as serious advice and counsel to the people, was not an Irish paper, but an English paper. By this extract he would test the sincerity of the Home Secretary. Why was treason and sedition to be sought for and punished in Ireland, and allowed to go scot free in England? There was no Irish paper that would seriously publish this extract; and, although it appeared in an Irish paper, it was published in order to be held up to scorn and reprobation. But there was no reprobation of it, and no punishment of it, so far, by the right hon. and learned Gentleman who, in this clause, acknowledged a measure sought for the persecution of Irish journals who would be ashamed to publish such incitements to treason, assassination, and murder as this, which was published within the reach of his own hand in the City of London.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, it was well known he had little sympathy with the course which hon. Members below the Gangway were pursuing; but he had read the Oath of Allegiance, and it was the duty of every Member of that House, whenever he could procure evidence of treasonable intentions against Her Majesty, or against any member of the Royal Family, to denounce in that House all such publications as had been quoted by the hon. Member for the purpose of inducing its suppression. If the hon. Member for Westmeath (MR. T. D. SULLIVAN) had reason to believe that the words he had cited, utterly treasonable as they were, had appeared in an English newspaper, he had a perfect right, and, indeed, was bound by his Oath, to denounce that paper.

MR. O'DONNELL thought the hon. Member for Westmeath had done public service by calling attention to the tolerance which the Home Secretary extended to treason in England. The only argument of the Home Secretary in favour of the unamended condition of the clause which his hon. Friend sought to amend, was that he desired to have powers to seize such documents as he had read to the House on a previous night. The document which the Home Secretary read last night was an extract from an Irish Conservative newspaper; and the right hon. and learned Gentleman could very easily get at Irish Conservative newspapers without searching the homes of the Irish peasantry. He had, however, only interposed to express his regret that while the Committee was engaged in the calm discussion of this Amendment, and with a business-like desire to put forward objections and arguments against the clause, the Home Secretary had intervened to cast oil on the troubled waters in his own inimitable manner. He thought the absence of the right hon. and learned Gentleman might not interfere with the rapid progress of Business.

MR. SEXTON asked what more was wanted if the Government were able to seize arms, papers, and documents? If they could seize records and correspondence of secret societies, what could the wildest imagination conceive it was necessary to seize beyond them? Under this clause, they might seize even the furniture of a house, and, perhaps, set up as dealers in old furniture; but he supposed that was not the intention of the Government.

MR. PARNELL asked whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary would meet the suggestion to leave out "instruments or articles," in order to avoid a division?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, there were some articles which it was very necessary to seize, such, for instance, as crape masks.

MR. HEALY said, he should like to know whether the police would proceed to read all the murderous placards—all the documents and papers found on the premises; and would a responsible officer decide on the spot, before proceeding to arrest a person, whether or not the documents discovered were illegal? What he meant was this. Would the documents be read, and would a decision be come to by the search officer as to their legality or illegality before they were seized, and before the person in whose house they were found or their owner was arrested?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that under this clause it was not proposed to seize persons at all.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 175; Noes 30: Majority 145.—(Div. List, No. 162.)

MR. HEALY said, that as he thought it was desirable that they should come at once to the Amendments of the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Richard Power), which were of great importance, and as his (Mr. Healy's) Amendments had practically been decided by the vote that had been taken, he would not move those Amendments.

THE CHAIRMAN: The next Amendment is in the name of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton).

MR. SEXTON said, he hoped the Government would accept the Amendment he had to propose, which was to the effect that the search officer should communicate to the head of the force to which he belonged the reason why he made a search. He considered it to be desirable that at Dublin Castle there should be a record of the number of searches made. Some inconvenience had been experienced by the House through the want of such information in regard to the operation of a similar clause in the Act of 1870.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 19, after the word "Majesty," to insert the words "Provided, That the officer who conducts a search shall in every case forward a report to the Inspector General of the Royal Irish Constabulary, setting forth the cause of the search and its results."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, this was a provision that he had never heard of in any search clauses before. It was impossible, in an Act of this kind, that all the grounds of suspicion, and all the details of the search, should be set forth.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman stated that he had never heard of a Proviso of this kind; but if he would turn back to Sub-section 2 of Clause 9 he would find these words—

"The said justice may for good cause discharge a person so committed, and in any case shall forthwith transmit a report of the committal to the Lord Lieutenant stating the grounds of the committal, the security required, and any explanation given by the prisoner by way of defence. The Lord Lieutenant may order the prisoner to be discharged if it seems just to him so to do."

As he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) understood it—he had not seen the Amendment of his hon. Friend, and had only heard it read—it seemed similar to this sub-section. He took it for granted that the Government had very good reason for putting this Sub-section 2 in Clause 9—that they did not do it without sufficient ground. He supposed that the idea was that the necessity of supplying this report to the Lord Lieutenant would act in some way as a restraint upon the capricious arrest of strangers. His hon. Friend proposed what was practically the same as Sub-section 2 of Clause 9—namely, that a Police Inspector or Sub-Inspector should use the powers of the clause, and give a report in every case in which he used the powers to the Inspector General of Constabulary. Well, such a document would be confidential. It was not a document that would have to be laid before Parliament, and simply would provide that the power should not be used capriciously. It appeared to him (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) a very reasonable proposal.

[Fifteenth Night.]

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the reason the provision was inserted in Clause 9 was that the clause was a power against the person. It was provided in that clause that if persons arrested did not give security for good behaviour or to keep the peace he should be imprisoned for one month. In order that the Lord Lieutenant could discharge such a prisoner, if it was thought desirable, it was necessary that a sub-section of this kind requiring a report to be submitted should be inserted in the clause. A clause similar to the present with regard to search for firearms was inserted in the Bill of last year. When, under that Bill, a policeman entered a house and searched for and seized arms, no such report as was now referred to was thought of.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he did not think the right hon. and learned Gentleman had rightly read this sub-section. The words were—

"The said justice may for good cause discharge a person so committed, and in any case shall forthwith transmit a report of the committal to the Lord Lieutenant."

That was to say, whether the prisoner was committed or discharged. It was necessary that this report should be laid before the Lord Lieutenant, the right hon. and learned Gentleman said, because His Excellency might have to discharge the prisoner; but, under this clause, this might occur where a prisoner had been discharged, and, therefore, where he was not seeking any clemency. The precedent of last year could scarcely be quoted in favour of the stringent regulation of the present clause. The clause of the Act of last year was of a comparatively mild character compared with this, for the reason that the person against whom the warrant was to be issued had to be mentioned in the warrant. The right hon. and learned Gentleman would be entirely following out the sub-section of Clause 9 by agreeing to this Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, the hon. Member was not correct in saying that the report had to be furnished to the Lord Lieutenant under Clause 9, whether the prisoner was committed or discharged. The sub-section said—

"And in any case shall forthwith transmit a report of the committal to the Lord Lieutenant stating the grounds of the committal."

No report at all would be sent unless there was a committal, for the clause said the Lord Lieutenant "May order the prisoner to be discharged if it seems just to him so to do."

The words "in any case" only referred to the committal, not to the discharge. If a person was discharged there would be no report. In the Act of 1847 no such words as these were contained.

MR. SEXTON said, he must take exception to the way in which the hon. and learned Gentleman read the sub-section. A man might be committed and then discharged, and then a report would have to sent to the Lord Lieutenant.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he thought some provision of this kind would be very reasonable. He supported the clause generally, because it seemed to him it was necessary to have some check upon the police, to prevent the possibility of their making searches without sufficient grounds—it was desirable to have a record of the proceeding. He quite agreed that to make public the grounds upon which the search was made would have the effect of defeating the object of the clause; but he certainly thought that some Departmental and private report of the grounds and of the suspicion should be made. Such report would not interfere with the object of the clause, and he trusted that something of that kind would be agreed to.

MR. O'KELLY said, did the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary mean to say that he was going to supply a Sub-Inspector or an Inspector of police with what were practically blank warrants to search wherever he pleased, without requiring any record of those searches to be returned? Was he going to allow these policemen to travel over the country at their own goodwill, without the knowledge of the Government or their superiors, and to search the house of any individual in the town and district in which they might reign? Was that so? If it were, it would be well for the Government to say it plainly, and not to be wearing a Constitutional mask. Let them establish their benevolent despotism openly—let them confer openly on their subordinates all the privileges and powers of despotism; but if they meant, even colourably, to rest under the sanction of Constitutional government, the House had a right to ask that when an agent of the Executive performed such an act as to search a man's house at night, or even in the day, some record of that action should be kept. Such records would be found even in Russia, not to speak of England. At least, the Irish people had a right to demand that they should be granted the liberty that was allowed to the subjects of Russia. If this clause were passed in its present form, what would be the result? Why, to confer on every Sub-Inspector in Ireland—and many of these officers were mere boys, without any experience either of government or of the world—the right of entering the house of any man in Ireland, at any hour, and under any circumstances that might please him, and turn that house upside down, without making the slightest report or record of his action. Was that a state of things the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government would desire to see established in Russia or in Turkey? If he would not, at least they had a right to demand that he should not be a party establishing such a state of things in Ireland; they had a right to demand that the Government would, at least, afford them the protection that would be offered by a foreign army in occupation, in the carrying on of actual hostilities, for the security of persons living in the country—he would not say of subjects, but simply of human beings. At least, in the present age, it would be almost impossible to find in the records of contemporary history such a power conferred on a Military Governor, in an Act passed during a time of hostilities, as that which would be conferred on the Irish police under the present Bill. Well, this being so, he could not agree with his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). He maintained that this record ought not to be confidential. It ought to be a public document. It ought to be a document that they in that House would have a right to examine. It ought to be a document within the reach of the House; but it appeared that this Government—this Liberal Government—was not prepared even to compel its subordinate officers to make a report to their superiors. Such a thing was simply monstrous. What was the Government establishing but a system of legalized brigandage? What were they converting their police into? Why, into a body of legalized brigands—they could not call them the mere executive officers of a civilized government. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary smiled. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had little sympathy with civilized government. He would be more in his place as a Turkish Pasha than as an English Minister. He thought, on those conditions, the Government would do well to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sligo.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, this clause had been known for several years, and had not produced the terrible effects which were supposed to follow upon it. This clause had existed in Ireland in nearly the same form from the year 1847. Of course, the police performed the functions thrown upon them, and they reported to their superiors in the manner which their superiors directed, and not according to Act of Parliament. There was no Act of Parliament which directed what kind of reports the police should or should not make to their superiors. That matter was left entirely to the police authorities. Any policeman in London, upon suspicion of felony, could arrest any Member of that House, or anyone else, and would make such report to his superiors of the circumstances of the case as his superiors directed him to make. That would be precisely the same with regard to Ireland in cases of search.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, it was useless for the right hon. and learned Gentleman to say that the practice in England was the same as in Ireland. He might imagine that the similarity was sufficient for the purpose of launching that sophistry upon the House; but he ventured to say that no Member of the Government would agree with him in the statement he had made. His hon. Friend proposed to place a check on the officer making search; and in doing so he asked nothing more than, in his opinion, ought to be conceded, even although the right hon. and learned Gentleman might not see that it was absolutely necessary. The clause they were engaged in discussing was a very stringent one, and it would only be consistent with good policy and expediency that the right hon. and learned Gentleman should give way to Irish Members on points which did not interfere with the principle of the Bill. He could not see how such a Proviso as that proposed by his hon. Friend could interfere with the efficiency of the clause. If the Bill was to become law, he was anxious that it should work with the least possible amount of ill-feeling; and he ventured to say that the Proviso of the hon. Member for Sligo would tend in that direction.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that the Rules of Criminal Procedure in India were regulated by laws drawn up by an eminent body of jurists; but the regulations of the Indian police would require that a record should be made of the kind now asked for, and he trusted that the Government would issue proper orders with regard to police reports in cases of search in Ireland, there being a great deal of natural jealousy with regard to the way in which this power would be exercised. He thought the Government would do well to accept the Amendment, which would not interfere with the efficiency of those powers.

MR. PARNELL said, he wished to ask what were the regulations at the present time with regard to the reports of policemen in the case of searches for arms? But the Department of the Constabulary required the Inspectors to make reports with regard to those searches, and they showed what were the details required to be given in those reports.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had already stated that in these matters there could be no doubt whatever that the rules of the Irish police were exactly similar to those of the English police. Hon. Members seemed to suppose that this was a kind of special legislation for Ireland; but that was not the case, because there were already very stringent clauses relating to search in the English Statutes—in the Smuggling Acts, the Explosives Act, and others. It was entirely a matter of police discipline how or in what manner the police were to report to their superiors.

MR. PARNELL said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had told them that reports were made, and it was difficult to understand why he was unable to give the information he had asked with regard to the reports made at the present time by the police in Ireland. The right hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to have misunderstood his question. He had simply asked whether reports were made in cases of search under the Act of 1881. He asked whether the reports were made by Inspectors or Sub-Inspectors carrying out these searches to the Constabulary Department in Dublin; what was the nature of those reports; and what were the details they were supposed to give. He asked for this information, because it would be a guide to Irish Members as to whether or not they should press this Amendment upon the Government. If it were not the custom of the Inspector General in Ireland to insist upon these reports being given with regard to the right of search applied under the Act of 1881, that would be a reason for pressing the Amendment of his hon. Friend upon the attention of the Government.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he could not answer as to the particular form of the reports which the officer executing the warrant would make to his superior officers.

MR. SEXTON asked whether the officer reported why he made the search, and what he found on the premises? These were two essential points. It was desirable to know whether the suspicions of the police were justified or not by the result, and whether, in making the search, the police had conducted themselves properly. Irish Members were in possession of very little information upon this subject; and he was unwilling, for his own part, to allow the matter to rest on the will of the officer of Dublin Castle. He wanted it to depend not upon the will of a Dublin Castle official, but upon the will of the House of Commons. He wished it to be made clear that a person who neglected his duty by not furnishing a report would be guilty, not only of a breach of discipline, but guilty in law.

MR. O'KELLY said, if these matters were reported by the police to their immediate superiors, even if the communication were confidential so far as the police were concerned, he could not see what objection the Government could have to placing that information before the House. If the police proceeded to make their search upon reasonable ground, what objection could the Government have to laying the reports upon the Table? The object of the Amendment was that a report should be made to the Inspector General in such a manner that it should be available for Members of that House. He said that the view that these reports should be confidential was not a sound view. The report should be of a nature that hon. Members should be able to reach it, and be able to judge as to whether the conduct of a particular police officer in making a search was justified or not. That was the only protection they could have against the abuse of the power conferred on the police under this Act, and that was exactly the point which had been evaded by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that these reports were made by the police to their superiors. Then, were those reports of a nature which would afford any protection whatever to the liberty of the subject? It was not sufficient to say that a report was made by the police to their immediate superiors. They well knew in Ireland what was the value of these reports, and how little protection they afforded the innocent people. It was for that reason that Irish Members desired to import into this clause such a protection for the liberty of the subject that no subordinate officials should be able to use this Act for the purpose of tyranny, or as an engine of oppression against persons towards whom they had a personal spite. That was the object sought by this Amendment, but which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had not dealt with.

Mr. DAWSON said, he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had not met the case. Although he had stated that the regulations of the police force, with regard to the reports which they made to their superiors, were the same in the case of Ireland and England, he (Mr. Dawson) was obliged to point out that the two systems were entirely dissimilar.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Allow me to say that the Dublin police and the Metropolitan police are in this respect exactly upon the same footing.

Mr. DAWSON said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had just made use of the only exception which existed, and had thereby proved his rule.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the hon. Member for Roscommon (Mr. O'Kelly) had set forth the desirability of having some documents which would be within the knowledge of Parliament, and subject either to its approval or censure. If an Amendment were put forward for the purpose of securing that object, he should feel it his duty to give it his support. But that was not the ground taken up by his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). As the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department knew very well, the proposal was that the Inspector should send in a report of the Inspector General of the Royal Irish Constabulary setting forth the causes of search. His hon. Friend thought that these words would have the effect of putting a check upon the action of police officers; and he challenged the right hon. and learned Gentleman, or any of his Colleagues, to show in what way the adoption of the Amendment could possibly prejudice the operation of the clause. If, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman said, the rules of the Service already required a report to be made, what harm could there be in inserting the words proposed by his hon. Friend in the clause? It was hardly worth while, at that time of the morning, seeing that in the course of a few hours they should be again engaged in the weary work of discussing this Bill, to reject words which could neither be said to be necessary nor superfluous.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 34; Noes 127: Majority 93.—(Div. List, No. 163.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. P. Martin.)

Mr. PLUNKET said, he desired to make a few remarks with regard to what had occurred at the commencement of the evening. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had made a statement which, he said, he hoped and believed would greatly shorten the discussion on this clause. It was a most important statement, and a construction was at once put on it—a construction which he hoped and believed was erroneous—by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), who said that, after the concession that had been made, it was unnecessary to proceed with the Amendment. This happened at half-past

[Fifteenth Night.]

9 o'clock; and he (Mr. Plunket) wished to put it on record that from half-past 9 to half-past 1 in the morning they had been discussing this matter without any reference whatever to the concession made by the Prime Minister. This appeared to him to be an instructive illustration of the advantage of such concessions to hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House below the Gangway. Well, he (Mr. Plunket) wished to say just a word or two on the present aspect of the debate. The interpretation hon. Members below the Gangway, as he had said, had put on the words of the Prime Minister was that, under this clause, no search for arms or secret apparatus of murder was to be made at night, and that, therefore, if the Constabulary, under this clause, entered a house to discover an illegal meeting which they suspected was being held, if no illegal meeting was being held at that moment, although all these things, these secret apparatus of murder, and these documents were there, the officers could not seize them. Such a concession would render the clause useless, and would make the discussions which had taken place upon it nothing but a farce. He did not wish to undervalue the seriousness of a right of search, and it was a very important matter to give such a right at all. Unfortunately, it had often been necessary to give such powers in Ireland. In quiet times they had been relaxed; but, as hon. Members must be aware, times were no longer quiet in that country. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary himself, in serious, eloquent, and clear words, had referred to this clause in introducing the Bill. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had spoken under the shadow of a great crime, and at that time he perfectly remembered that it was said by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway on the Opposition side of the House that they would not do anything to interfere with the law enacted for the purpose of preventing such terrible atrocities as those which had just then taken place in Ireland. The Home Secretary had referred to this clause as most essential. He said—

“The first of these provisions is one, I think, that the House will see is most necessary. It is a power to search for the secret apparatus of murder, for the daggers, for the documents, for the threatening letters, for the craps masks, which are hidden, and which the police cannot reach; and unless the police have the power to enter houses and look for them, the persons who make use of these apparatus possess practical immunity. This clause of search—which will be pointed directly to these secret societies, these unlawful combinations—will be practically the clause of the Act of 1870. The search will take place by day or by night.”—[3 Hansard, cclxix. 468.]

Mr. Plunket

This was the meaning put deliberately upon this clause by the Minister in charge of the Bill. Let them, then, consider the consequences if this construction of the hon. Member for Wexford was to be put on the Prime Minister's words, and if the alteration suggested was to be made in the clause. At present there was, no doubt, a power to search houses for arms during the day time; and the only effect of this clause, when amended as proposed, would be to add to the power already existing the power of search for documents. [Mr. HEALY: During the night.] No, during the day. That was to say, that these persons—“Captain Moonlight” and his gang—could walk about all the day with these illegal documents, and could come home at night and sleep comfortably with these things scattered about their houses, the police having no power to search for them. It was absurd for the Committee to be spending a whole night in passing such a clause. And, with regard to illegal meetings, was it to be supposed that if the clause passed in the form suggested, they would ever be likely to discover any of these documents? If the interpretation which hon. Members had put upon the Prime Minister's words were correct, it would come to this—that a policeman would go into a place where he suspected an illegal meeting was taking place, but that if no meeting was at the time actually in session, although all these documents might be lying about, nothing could be done. He was sure whatever advice had been given by the Lord Lieutenant, who was responsible for the peace of Ireland, on these matters, it could not have been advice which would have supported such a construction as that being placed upon the clause.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he knew very well that at this time of night it was no use to resist such a Motion as that which had been made; and he very much concurred with the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr.

Plunket) in what he had said as to the practical lesson which was to be learned with regard to the value of concessions to the Irish Party below the Gangway opposite. During the progress of this Bill there had been no clause upon which the Opposition had been more obstinate, and, if he might be allowed to say so, more unjustifiable, and that in spite of the promises which had been made by those hon. Members. As to the construction which the right hon. and learned Gentlemen opposite said the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) and some others had placed on the statement of the Prime Minister, all he could say was that if they placed that construction upon it he could not agree in that construction, and he felt sure that his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister would not concur in it either. It had been said that it was quite plain that hon. Members below the Gangway on the opposite side had not placed that construction upon it, or else they would have followed the corollary to the declaration, and would not have continued to obstruct the clause. He thought, therefore, the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Plunket) need not alarm himself that any such construction as that referred to was the construction which it was intended should be placed upon it, if such, indeed, was really seriously entertained by anyone.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, he was in the House when the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) had put that construction upon the words of the Prime Minister to which reference had been made; and he had heard the Prime Minister, in reply to the hon. Member, get up and declare that the construction that had been put upon what he had said was correct. The Home Secretary might not have been in the House at the time; but whether he was or not he certainly did not correctly understand the meaning the Prime Minister put on his own words. As, however, there was a doubt in the matter, it seemed to him (Captain Aylmer) that it would be desirable that the Amendment which was to be introduced into the clause should be put on the Paper as early as possible, and that in the form of a Proviso which could be discussed in Committee, so that it would not be necessary to leave the matter over until Report. The Prime Minister agreed with the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), although the Home Secretary thought differently. At any rate, the Committee should be allowed to discuss the question.

MR. HEALY said, there was much force in what had fallen from the hon. and gallant Member for Maidstone (Captain Aylmer). He hoped they were not to see in the attitude taken up by the Home Secretary anything like a break up in the Cabinet. They had heard a deal that night as to the differences in the Cabinet. With regard to the construction to be placed upon the words of the Prime Minister, the hon. and gallant Member for Maidstone came forward as an impartial witness. It was a pity that the Home Secretary had not thought it his duty to come down to the House at 9 o'clock, when other hon. Members were in their places—at any rate, it might have been expected from him that he would have made himself acquainted with the opinion of his official Chief. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, however, did not seem to think it necessary to make himself acquainted with the views of his Leader. It was too much—far-reaching in their sweep as the powers of the right hon. Gentleman might be—it was too much that the Home Secretary should usurp the functions of the Prime Minister. He (Mr. Healy) did not think that even the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright) would be prepared to say that he would roll into one the functions of the Home Secretary and the Prime Minister. The Irish Members stood on the declaration of the Prime Minister, and they thought it of the utmost necessity that they should have the right hon. Gentleman's words in black and white—that they should have the independent reports of the newspapers, so that they might see what construction was to be placed upon the words which had been used, and what gloss had been put on them. Tomorrow they would see in black and white, in type as conceived by the newspaper reporters, what the right hon. Gentleman had said; and then they would know, in all probability, whether there really was, as had been alleged so often, a serious schism in the Cabinet with regard to this Bill. It was rumoured, in a hundred shapes and forms, that the Cabinet were divided on this Bill; and what had occurred to-night was an admirable illustration of the truth of those rumours. They found the Home Secretary coming here at 2 o'clock in the morning and endeavouring to eat the words uttered by the Prime Minister at 9 o'clock in the evening. The Prime Minister's words were interpreted not only by the Irish Members, but by the hon. and gallant Member for Maidstone (Captain Aylmer), and by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket), in a sense entirely opposite to the view taken of them by the Home Secretary. They had all these people backing up the Prime Minister, and then they had the Home Secretary, with his grandiloquent announcement, with his full-blown emphasis, declaring that the Prime Minister did not mean what he had said.

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL said, he fully concurred in the desirability of having those portentous words of the Prime Minister put into black and white. A great many hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House had made up their minds as to what action they would take with regard to them; and he should not be doing justice to his own strong conviction if he did not express, as clearly as he could, the astonishment and dismay with which, at an earlier hour, he had heard the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister as to the concession he proposed to make. It was, as he (Mr. G. Russell) was perfectly well aware, a matter of serious responsibility for a single Member of that House to separate himself, even for a moment, from a proposition made by the Head of the Government and recommended by the Viceroy of Ireland and the Chief Secretary. But much more weight was to be attached to the opinion of the right hon. and learned Home Secretary, who had charge of the conduct of this Bill; and, in spite of the consensus of authority recommending the concession which had been referred to, it was a matter of very serious regret to some of them that such concession should have been made. He was not, at that hour of the night, going to enter into any discussion as to the reasons which had led them to regard this clause with reference to the right of search as the very core and kernel of the Bill. They had evidence all around them of the sporadic character of the maladies which this measure was intended to grapple with, and of these maladies having developed in the profoundest secrecy. It seemed to many of them that the right of search contained in the Bill was the right and the power that would do more than any other provision of the measure to cope with these secret machinations of crime; and it was, therefore, a matter of astonishment and most profound regret to them to hear that any concession, however slight, was to be made on these clauses conferring the right of search. They had heard, however, that the Prime Minister's words were not to be interpreted as offering a concession. On the other hand, it was said—and he had taken down the hon. Member's words—that 80 or 90 per cent of the clause had been conceded. That was surely a very alarming announcement from an Irish Member, and if that opinion was universally entertained by the Irish Members—and those Gentlemen, no doubt, were most competent to form an opinion upon it—it seemed to him (Mr. G. Russell) that the concession already stood condemned. He would not enter into the reasons which had induced himself, and those who believed as he did, to give their most cordial support to this clause in its entirety; but he could not refrain from expressing a hope that the moment was not far distant when Her Majesty's Government, having regard to the transactions of this evening, would learn that every act of concession to Irish disloyalty—and he did not say that concession in the interests of justice and mercy were not necessary, but every unnecessary concession—was the signal for a fresh outbreak of systematic and insolent obstruction in the House, and, too often, of outrageous crime out-of-doors.

MR. H. SAMUELSON said, he should be glad when hon. Members would be able to see the actual words of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government in print. It was perfectly clear to his mind that the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) could not have placed the construction it was said he had placed upon the words of the Premier. [MR. HEALY: Yes; I did.] The hon. Member seemed to be positive, so positive that he could not believe his (Mr. Samuelson's) statement; but he would give his reason for what he had said. The hon. Member had stated, immediately after the Premier's speech, that if he was right in the construction he put upon the words which had fallen from the Prime Minister, he would not support a single Amendment to the clause; that he would urge his hon. Friends to withdraw their Amendments, and that he would go into the opposite Lobby to any hon. Member who opposed the section; and yet the hon. Member had voted for almost, if not quite, every Amendment, and he had been, perhaps, the most prominent opponent of the clause. The hon. Member had thus proved, by his own action, that he, at any rate, did not attach to the Prime Minister's words the important meaning which it was now sought to give them. If the hon. Member for Wexford thought that the Premier's words bore that meaning, what confidence could they, for the future, place in any promise of the hon. Member?

Mr. Healy

MR. PARNELL said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had repudiated the words which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had uttered in his absence.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had not repudiated what the Prime Minister had said at any time. It would be most unbecoming in him to do such a thing. What he did repudiate was the interpretation which the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) had put upon the words of the right hon. Gentleman, or the interpretation which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) had said the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) had placed upon the words of the Prime Minister.

MR. PARNELL said, it would be desirable for him to inform the Home Secretary what had taken place in his (Sir William Harcourt's) absence. When the Prime Minister, at the commencement of the proceedings this evening on the subject of this clause, took occasion to describe the effect of the sub-section which he proposed should be introduced into the clause on Report, in order that there should be no misapprehension or misunderstanding as to what that sub-section was, he (Mr. Parnell) had taken the precaution to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it would provide certain things, and the Prime Minister replied that it would. He would repeat to the Home Secretary the question he had put to the Prime Minister. He had asked whether they were to understand that the sub-section he proposed to produce on Report would provide that there should be no night search unless there was a suspicion that there was a secret society or a secret association actually sitting or carrying on its proceedings on the premises searched, and that when it was found that no such secret society, or secret association, was at the time carrying on its business, there should be no search? The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had said that the sub-section he proposed to introduce would be to that effect. And now, with regard to this Motion to report Progress, he (Mr. Parnell) wished to say he really thought the Home Secretary had been standing in the way of the progress of the Bill. There had been no Amendments proposed to-night except those which had been of a very reasonable character. The Amendment they had just divided upon was an Amendment of a most reasonable character; and to show the way in which the Home Secretary met them, he would remind the Committee that he had stated that under the English Acts—he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman had mentioned the Explosives Act—no provision was made for reports from policemen to their superior officers in cases of suspicion. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had said that the reports the police were to make were merely matters of discipline, and were regulated by the police authorities, and not by Act of Parliament. However, he (Mr. Parnell) found, under the Explosives Act, 28 Vict., c. 17—he believed at Section 73—that—

“Where a search is made without the authority of a warrant, if the entry be by an officer specially authorized by written authority other than a warrant, a report of such proceedings shall be forthwith sent to the Secretary of State.”

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: That is the case of a warrant.

MR. PARNELL said, it was the case of a warrant authorizing search, not in a particular instance, but in a whole district.

MR. O'KELLY: A general warrant.

MR. PARNELL said, it was a general statement. In the case of the Explosives Act it was left to the Constabulary authorities to say where a report should be made, and where it should not be made. In the Act he referred to there was a provision compelling a report not only to the Central Constabulary authority, which hon. Members asked for under this clause, but to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary himself.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

VAGRANCY (re-committed) BILL—[BILL 199.]
(Mr. Pell, Mr. John Talbot, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Cropper, Mr. John Holland.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 3, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Discharge of paupers).

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he had two Amendments to move, both framed with the same intention—namely, to strengthen the provisions which this Bill contained. In regard to both Amendments he might say that he regretted very much that, owing to the treatment which this Bill had received at the hands of the President of the Local Government Board, its original strength had been very much diminished. The Bill originally established something like a general principle upon which vagrancy could be treated, and, as he thought, established a great improvement on the present unsatisfactory system. To comment now upon that circumstance was like crying over spilt milk; but he thought he might yet try to make this clause more operative than it was in its present form. He therefore proposed, in his first Amendment, to declare that a casual should not be entitled to his discharge until the third day, his intention being to provide that a casual might be obliged to spend two whole days in the workhouse. He supposed one of the objects of the Bill was to deter vagrants from preying on the community, and if that was to be done thoroughly, it would be better to indicate that such men should remain for a substantial time in the workhouse; and he thought the way to administer a wholesome check to them was to say that they could not enter a workhouse, and simply stay at their own pleasure, on the way from one place to another, but should be detained for a substantial time. That was the object of his first Amendment, and he hoped the Government would accept it.

Mr. Parnell

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 16, leave out "second," and insert "third."—(Mr. J. G. Talbot.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'second' stand part of the Clause."

MR. DODSON said, he must object to the Amendment, because he did not think it desirable to give so wide a discretion to compulsorily detain a vagrant, and practically sentence him to hard labour, for the effect of that would be to deter vagrants from going into workhouses, and would give them an excuse for appealing to humanitarians for relief on the ground of the stringency with which they were treated in the Poor Law Unions. By the Bill, as it stood, a longer period of detention was secured by providing that vagrants might not discharge themselves until the second day, and that Sunday should not for this purpose be reckoned as a day. He could not accept the first Amendment of the hon. Member; but he should have no objection to accepting the second Amendment. He should be glad if the hon. Member could agree to that arrangement.

MR. WHITLEY said, the Guardians in his own neighbourhood had no objection to the Bill, if it was clear that they had the power to discharge casuals within the limit of the Bill at their discretion.

MR. DODSON said, the provision was that a casual should not be able to discharge himself.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, that after what had been stated he should not divide the Committee, but should be content with what he could get.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 19, to leave out "two occasions," and insert "one occasion."—(Mr. J. G. Talbot.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. BRINTON said, he begged to propose an Amendment, to leave out "fourth" and insert "fifth" in line 21 of the clause. He thought it desirable to provide that a persistent vagrant might be removed from the casual ward to the workhouse, and that there might be sufficient time given for such a vagrant to pass under the review of the Visiting Guardians; and that the master of a workhouse might be able to detain a persistent or professional vagrant, and oblige him to go to the workhouse and perform such work as other paupers did. Twenty-four hours, he thought, would be sufficient time to enable Guardians to make arrangements for a casual to be transferred. The object, after all, was to try to distinguish between persons who were going about the country as vagrants and merely poor people.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 21, leave out "fourth," and insert "fifth."—(Mr. Brinton.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'fourth' stand part of the Clause."

MR. DODSON said, he would not object to the Amendment proposed.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. J. HOLLOND said, he had an Amendment for the purpose of enabling the Governor of a workhouse to discharge paupers before 9 o'clock in the morning, but not before 6. The clause provided that a casual would not be entitled to discharge himself before 9 in the morning; and there were many cases in which, owing to the nature of the work in the neighbourhood, it was desirable that casuals should be discharged before 9 o'clock.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause add the following proviso:—"Nothing in this section shall prevent the Guardians of any parish or Union authorizing the discharge of any casual before 9 a.m., but not before 6 a.m., if in their discretion they think it advisable to do so."—(Mr. J. Hollond.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. DODSON said, he thought the hon. Member had failed to appreciate the character of the clause. The effect of the clause was that a pauper should not be entitled to discharge himself, but the Guardians could discharge him at any time they pleased; and the effect of the Amendment would be to restrict their authority instead of enlarging it.

MR. J. HOLLOND said, he admitted that that was the effect of the clause; but he imagined that, under an Order made by the Local Government Board in 1871, Guardians would not be able to discharge a pauper except within the time prescribed by the Act; but he would not press his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. PELL said, this clause materially altered the principle of the Bill; and although he was given to understand that, both in London and in several parts of the country, the Bill, as amended in Committee, was considered likely to effect some reform in the present system, there were many who regretted that the attempt made in the original clause to put these unhappy casuals more on the footing of ordinary paupers had failed. Still, as this clause promised to do some good, he had nothing more to say against its being inserted in the Bill.

MR. BRINTON said, he cordially agreed with the observations of the hon. Member, and deeply regretted that in the amended Bill the pith of the original Bill was left out—namely, that if casuals should be found travelling about from place to place, they should not discharge themselves until they had appeared before the Visiting Guardians.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clauses 5 and 6 agreed to.

MR. J. HOLLOND said, he begged to move the insertion of a new clause, with the object of facilitating the passage of casual paupers from the casual ward to the workhouse. He had been informed by the clerk to one of the Boards of Guardians that in one case he had remonstrated with a woman for travelling from ward to ward; and her answer was that she could not get into a workhouse, but was passed on from one casual ward to another. One reason for such cases as that was, he believed, that relieving officers were unwilling to admit casuals into workhouses because they had no power to detain them, for a casual admitted one night might leave the next morning of his own accord. According to his clause any casual, desiring to be admitted from the casual ward to the workhouse, would be enabled to be so admitted; but, in return, he would have to consent not to discharge himself till he had seen the Board of Guardians. He hoped the Committee would accept the clause.

Amendment proposed, after Clause 4, insert the following New Clause:—

(Admission from casual ward into workhouse.)

"Upon the application of any casual pauper to be admitted into the workhouse from the casual ward, the guardians may, except in cases of illness, require as a condition of such admission that the pauper shall not discharge himself without reasonable notice, and reasonable notice shall not be deemed to have been given until the pauper has appeared before the board of guardians or the visiting committee of the Board: Provided, That during the intervals between the meetings of the board or visiting committee, any officer of the workhouse duly authorized by the board of guardians for the purpose may exempt any pauper either wholly or partially from the operation of this section."—(Mr. J. Holland.)

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

MR. DODSON said, he was sorry that he could not agree to this clause. The argument of the hon. Member in favour of this clause had been in part met by the Amendments agreed to in Clause 4, which provided that when a casual came on a second occasion to the same ward he might be detained until a more distant day. If such arbitrary power as the Amendment proposed was placed in the hands of workhouse officials, it would lead to an objectionable diversity of treatment, and might practically mean 14 days' hard labour. He was sorry to find himself differing from his hon. Friend, who had studied this question so carefully; but he could not assent to the Amendment.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, if the hon. Member divided he should support him, and he thought the right hon. Gentleman had fallen into an error in thinking that this was an obligatory power; it was a permissive power; but he should say that, where the evils of vagrancy were felt, and an effort could be made to check it, the Guardians would bring this clause into operation. He thought the words "hard labour," used by the right hon. Gentleman, were rather exaggerated, for the work imposed on paupers would not be so hard as the work done every day by ordinary agricultural labourers, while they would receive the ordinary workhouse fare. Therefore, he did not think there would be a penal kind of treatment, and that the clause would be a very useful provision where vagrancy was on the increase.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 13; Noes 37: Majority 24.—(Div. List, No. 164.)

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

House adjourned at half after
Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 21st June, 1882.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Labourers' Cottages and Allotments (Ireland) * [212].
Second Reading—Baths and Washhouses Acts Amendment * [201].
Second Reading—Referred to Select Committee—Dublin City (Highways) * [88].
Select Committee—Report—Bills of Exchange [No. 244].
Committee—Prevention of Crime (Ireland) [167]—R.P. [Sixteenth Night].
Considered as amended—Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 5) * [160]; Vagrancy * [199].

ORDER OF THE DAY.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) BILL.—[Bill 167.]

(Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 20th June.]

[SIXTEENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART III.

GENERAL POWERS.

Clause 11 (Searches for arms and illegal documents).

MR. R. POWER, who had an Amendment on the Paper, in page 6, line 21, after "time," to insert "except between sunset and sunrise," said, that after the statement made by the Prime Minister on the previous night, he would not propose that Amendment; but would proceed to move the next which appeared in his name—namely, in page 6, line 21, leave out "three," and insert "one." The clause would then run—"Any inspector or sub-inspector so authorized by the warrant may, at any time within one month," at any place within the proclaimed district, seize, detain, and carry away arms, ammunition, papers, &c., which he might find; and enter any house, building, or place, by force, if necessary, in order to execute the warrant. He hoped the Government would see their way to be able to accept this very reasonable Amendment. It must be remembered that the Committee had already granted the right of a general warrant, and he found that by the Act of 1875 a general warrant was only granted and used in special cases. If the Chief Secretary said it was necessary for a policeman to arrest any particular individual, a special warrant could soon be obtained; but no policeman would be able to enter the houses of the people unless he had a warrant. If the Constabulary considered it necessary to enter a particular house, having received information that illegal property was concealed there, they would only have to telegraph to Dublin, and they would receive a warrant in 24 hours. What he maintained was that a policeman had no right to go about the country with a warrant in his pocket for three months. Under the Act of 1875 a warrant only lasted for three weeks; and, under another Act, only for 10 days. Under the present Bill it was to be three months, and he hoped the Government would accept this reasonable Amendment to curtail the period to one month, which, in his opinion, was quite sufficient.

Mr. J. Holland

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 21, to leave out the word "three," and insert the word "one."—(Mr. Richard Power.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'three' stand part of the Clause."

Mr. TREVELYAN said, he was very sorry on the part of the Government that he should be obliged to refuse an Amendment which had been moved by the hon. Member in such moderate tones. But, whatever view might be taken of the clause in general, the first two lines of the 1st sub-section and the whole of the 2nd sub-section were, in the opinion of the Government, absolutely essential and vital to the Bill. It was quite true that under the amended Peace Preservation Act of 1875 the period for warrants was reduced to three weeks; but by the Peace Preservation Act of 1870 the period was three months, and the warrant was, practically speaking, a general one. In those circumstances, the power to search for arms was extremely effective. Under the Act of 1875 it was less effective, and under the Act of 1881 the power had not been at all as practically useful as the Government could wish. It was absolutely necessary, in the present state of Ireland, that the Government should keep these provisions of the clause exactly as they were laid down in the Bill; and under no circumstance whatever could they think of altering them. He would mention one fact, which showed that no concession on this point could be made. It was of the utmost importance that the search should be made practicable immediately after the commission of an outrage. Every day and hour that were lost were of the greatest importance, and could never be recovered. Outrages took place in disturbed districts, which districts would be naturally proclaimed, and should be placed under this power of search-warrant; and if a warrant for search could only run for one month, and had to be continually renewed, pressure would be put upon the Central Government not to renew it. A district which was subjected to outrage and disturbance should be continually liable to search under a warrant as long as the state of disturbance and suspicion continued. On that point it was quite impossible for the Government to give way.

Mr. HEALY said, he thought his hon. Friend the Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power) had not done harm in eliciting from the Government the statement which the right hon. Gentleman had just made; but he must confess that, as far as his own opinions were concerned, he did not depart from what he had stated yesterday—namely, that in his view, under the limitations indicated by the Prime Minister, the clause would neither do much good nor much harm. He had said so yesterday; and, so far as he was concerned, he had moved no Amendment last night, and had taken very little part in the discussion. If the Government continued to maintain the position that was taken up by the Prime Minister yesterday, he would advise his hon. Friend not to press the Amendment. There were two or three other Amendments down upon the Paper of a very reasonable character, which he hoped would commend themselves to the serious attention of the Government; and, as far as the provision was concerned of making the warrant run for one month instead of three, he trusted the Government, on reconsideration, would see that really the matter did not amount to a very great deal. As soon as the Sub-Inspector got the warrant he would probably put it in force at once, because no man would be likely to keep suspected articles in his house; and, of course, nobody except the Government officials in Ireland would be so silly as to believe, when the searches were carried out, that they would find anything. As soon as the warrants were known to be issued, every man who might have had suspected articles in his possession would get rid of them; and the Government officials, on entering a house, would find nothing that would justify them in making a search. He would ask the Chief Secretary if the Government had any objection to inform Parliament periodically, by means of a Return, as to the number of searches carried out, and the amount of arms and ammunition seized when searches were made; and also, how many of these warrants had been issued? This was not, he thought, an unreasonable demand. He did not ask for details; but that at the close of the Session, or every three months, the Government should inform the House of Commons, by means of a Return, how many of these warrants had been issued, and with what result. He thought the three points of his demand were extremely reasonable. His objection to the clause had been grounded very much upon a night-search, which, he thought, could only be intended to harass and irritate the people. If the Prime Minister maintained the limitations he had indicated last night, although they had since been contradicted by one of his Colleagues, he (Mr. Healy) thought his hon. Friend the Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power) would do well not to press the Amendment. If Returns were given, it would be sufficient to say that on such and such a day a search had been made, and what the result had been.

Mr. Healy

MR. TREVELYAN said, the Government had no objection to consider the question of giving Parliament a Return of the number of warrants issued. Warrants were public instruments on so very large a scale that nothing could be said against the submitting a Return of them to Parliament. But the Government would not be prepared to give Parliament information as to the number of searches made, or of the result of those searches. All they could do was to place on the Table a Return of the warrants issued.

MR. HEALY said, he was not asking for a detailed Return of arms, ammunition, or papers discovered; but he thought there could be no objection on the part of the Government to say—"Result, nil;" or "result, fruitful."

MR. TREVELYAN: No; the Government could not supply a Return of that kind.

MR. HEALY said, he thought it was a point the Irish Members had a reasonable right to press, and for this reason—that when the subject came up for discussion, Parliament should have some information as to whether the provision had been effective or not. He scarcely knew at present whether the Government intended to retain the provision of the Act of last year, or whether they intended to issue warrants under both Acts—that of last year and the present one.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT remarked, that in reference to these Returns, it would always be in the power of any hon. Member to move for a Return to be laid before Parliament if he desired to do so. Therefore, it was not necessary to deal with that matter at present. With regard to the question of the hon. Member as to retaining the power to issue warrants under the Act of last Session, he might say that it was intended to retain the powers given both by the Act of last Session and of this.

MR. HEALY said, that was not exactly the point. Would warrants be issued under the Act of last Session?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he would tell the hon. Member why. The object of this clause was to deal with secret societies; whereas the Act of last Session was a general one. It was not intended in any way to supersede the Act of last Session by the present measure.

MR. HEALY said, his point was simply this—and it had not been answered by the right hon. and learned Gentleman at all—the Government had taken power to issue night and day-warrants. Would they issue both descriptions of warrant in future? Would they still continue to issue the warrants authorized to be issued under the Act of last year?

THE CHAIRMAN requested the hon. Member to confine himself to the Amendment before the Committee, which was simply whether the warrant should be for one month or for three.

MR. SEXTON said, the remarks of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, in reply to the reasonable request of his hon. Friend the Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), were not very consoling. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said it would be open for his hon. Friend to make a Motion for Returns. That was a mere quibble. Of course, it was open for any hon. Member to move for Returns. It was as much as to say that it was open to a child to cry for the Moon. Every one knew that such a Motion would only be voted down by the Government. He very much regretted the indisposition of the Government to give information in reference to the operation of the clause. With reference to the duration of the general warrants, he had hoped that the period of one month would be deemed by the Government quite sufficient for any purpose. As the Chief Secretary had informed them, there were in every county 10 or 12 Sub-Inspectors, under whose supervision the clause would be carried into operation. That was an exceedingly small area, and in the course of a month any Sub-Inspector would be able to sweep the district perfectly clean of concealed arms. The clause, therefore, could answer no useful purpose at all, and would merely enable the police to harass persons against whom they happened to have a dislike. Were the Sub-Inspectors to examine every house in a district, or only those which were suspected? When the right hon. and learned Gentleman was in a less belligerent frame of mind last year, he said he would split the difference and accept a fortnight or 10 days. If the general warrant authorized under the Act of last year was sufficiently operative by having 10 days for execution, why should the Government require three months, or even a month, now? Instead of being satisfied with 10 days, they were now asking for 30, or a period that was nine times as long. He hoped that his hon. Friend would press the Amendment, because he certainly felt that so grave a power should be limited as far as possible.

MR. O'KELLY wished to point out that in any special case, the warrant, even if limited in its duration for a month, could be renewed by the Executive at any moment they chose. There was nothing to prevent them from doing that, and he failed to see what necessity there was for conferring upon them any wider power than that proposed by the Amendment. If there was reason to believe that arms or papers were concealed, the Government could renew a warrant or issue a new one whenever they pleased in any proclaimed district. There was, consequently, no necessity whatever to take a power in this clause for extending the warrant over a period of three months, although he could easily imagine how the existence of the warrant for such a period might be injurious to the interests and reputation of the person against whom it was issued.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN presumed that the warrant would not be a general one, but that it would specify the distinct locality to which it applied.

MR. LEAMY said, the Chief Secretary had given as one of the reasons why he could not accept the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power), and why he thought the warrant should extend over three months, that he was afraid pressure might be brought to bear upon the Executive Government not to renew it. Were the Irish Members to understand that a Liberal Chief Secretary would object to the people of Ireland bringing pressure to bear upon the Government not to carry out a harsh and severe law with the most extreme rigour? Was the warrant to be given for three months, so that the people might absolutely despair of being able to influence the Government? If the Government objected to such pressure as that, he did not see what form of Constitutional agitation was left to the Irish Party. He was quite at a loss to understand upon what ground the Amendment should be so persistently refused. Suppose that in the last week of the month the authorities considered it desirable to renew the warrant for another month, what was there to prevent them from doing so? Surely, if such a case arose, the Castle officials in Dublin could renew it precisely on the same ground as that on which they had granted it in the first instance. He could understand the refusal of the Government, if, after a warrant had been running for one or three months in a proclaimed district, it was proposed that no other warrant should be granted; but it was distinctly provided in the clause that—

“It shall be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant from time to time by warrant to direct the inspectors and sub-inspectors of constabulary for the time being acting in any constabulary district, or any of them, to search for and seize in any proclaimed district, specified in the warrant,” and so on.

He could not understand, therefore, why the Amendment was not accepted.

MR. CALLAN said, he was not in the House when the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary made the statement that if the warrant were limited to a month, pressure might be brought to bear on the Executive Government in Ireland not to renew the warrant. He (Mr. Callan) was not aware of any part of the clause in which it was provided that there should be any notification or publicity given to the issue of the warrant. On the contrary, he was led to believe that when a warrant was issued by the Lord Lieutenant, the issue of that warrant was to be kept secret until it was actually executed. He presumed that the fact of a warrant having been granted was not to be made public, as such a step would simply defame a person's character, and it might be thrown in the face of a respectable farmer—“Oh, there is a warrant out for a search of your house. You had better take care.” If the Lord Lieutenant wished to have a warrant, he was bound, as a matter of common honesty, to keep the matter secret, for two motives—first, that he might not give a warning to the presumed delinquent; and next, that the warrant in the hands of the police should not be used as a means of defaming a man's character. What pressure, therefore, could be brought to bear upon the central authority not to renew the warrant, whether it was granted for one, two, or three months? He failed to see what right a warrant had to be in existence for three months. He presumed that the Lord Lieutenant would not issue a warrant except on representations actually made to him; and his own opinion was, that it should be on sworn information that the person making the representations had reasonable grounds for the belief that some of the articles referred to in the clause were concealed in the house of the individual against whom a warrant was applied for. Then, why should the warrant be for three months in the hands of the Inspector or Sub-Inspector? Was it likely that the suspected person would keep arms and ammunition in his house for three months after a search had been made? Were the warrants to be executed in suppositious cases, and not upon direct information? There was no part of Ireland which was more than two days away from the City of Dublin by return post, and a fresh warrant might at any time be telegraphed for and immediately obtained. Why, then, should it be asked for for three months? The fact was, that this was only one more instance of the intolerant, overbearing, and coercive policy of an unprincipled Administration.

MR. BIGGAR said, it seemed to him that the principal object of Her Majesty's Government was not the suppression of outrage and secret societies, but to oppress persons who were perfectly innocent. The power which it was proposed to put in the hands of the police was one of a most mischievous character, because, in point of fact, it meant that the Lord Lieutenant was to give authority to the Sub-Inspectors of police, for three full months, to do practically what they liked in regard to searching people's houses. He thought it was of the utmost importance that the Government should have some control over their subordinates, and that no renewal of the powers should be given to the Inspectors for a longer period than one month. As yet no one knew what would be the effect of passing such a clause, either in putting down outrage, or in detecting concealed arms that were intended to be used for any treasonable or malicious purpose. What had been the result of the operation of the Act passed last year? A number of useless arms which were in the possession of the people, but which had never been intended to be used, were given up. Those who wished to use arms for the purpose of outrage would take very good care that they were not discovered. There was an illustration of this in the case of the town of Ballina. In that town the Sub-Inspector, a very officious gentleman, obtained authority from the Lord Lieutenant to search for arms, and he searched the places of business of various tradespeople, with the result that might readily be expected—that no arms were found. The same thing would occur under the present clause. It would only give power to irresponsible persons to interfere with and annoy innocent people. The right hon. Gentleman had talked of crape masks and similar articles; but surely the right hon. Gentleman knew, as everyone else did, that such things were of a portable nature, and could readily be concealed without fear of detection, and, as no one would be found using them, no punishment could be inflicted. His own opinion was that the Government desired to occupy as much time as possible over the Bill when they protested against Amendments of so moderate and so reasonable a nature. If the Government would consent to accept reasonable Amendments, their Bill would be passed with much greater facility, and in the end it would be quite as effective for the detection and punishment of crime in Ireland in one way as the other. In point of fact, the Irish Members knew very well that that was not the object with which it had been introduced, but that it was simply to be used as an engine for carrying on Party warfare.

Mr. Leamy

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 98; Noes 31: Majority 67.—(Div. List, No. 165.)

MR. PARNELL said, he proposed to move the Amendment which stood on the Paper in the name of his hon. Friend the Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power)—namely, in line 21, after the word "warrant," to insert "at any hour within sunrise and sunset." The clause, as it stood, gave power to the Lord Lieutenant—

"From time to time by warrant to direct the inspectors and sub-inspectors of constabulary for the time being, acting in any constabulary district, or any of them, to search for and seize in any proclaimed district, or in any part thereof, specified in the warrant, all or any of the following articles; that is to say, any arms, ammunition, papers, documents, instruments, or articles suspected to be used or to be intended to be used for the purpose of or in connection with any secret society or secret association existing for criminal purposes."

The clause, as it stood, permitted this to be done at any hour of the day or night; but last evening the Prime Minister informed the Committee that he proposed to limit the right of search, as regarded arms, ammunition, papers, documents, &c., to the daytime, and stated that, on the Report, a sub-section would be brought up to provide that the Lord Lieutenant should have power to direct that the police might make searches at night for the limited purpose of ascertaining whether there were any illegal and secret meetings going on; that this extensive power of search was to be strictly limited to that purpose, and that a house having been searched, and it having been ascertained that no secret meeting was being held on the premises searched, the search should then cease. It was also stated by the Prime Minister that the operation of the clause, so far as regarded a search for "arms, ammunition, papers, documents, instruments, or articles," should be limited to the daytime. He wished to point out to the Committee that the clause, as it stood now, had reference only to searches for "arms, ammunition, papers, documents, instruments, or articles," and had no reference to the further requirement of searching in order to ascertain whether a secret or illegal meeting was being held on the premises, except so far as arms, ammunition, &c., might be used in connection with a secret society or a secret association. He thought, therefore, that this would be the proper time to insert the Amendment. A limitation was to be placed on the clause in the direction promised by the Prime Minister last night, and he thought the Committee would agree with him that this was the proper time to do it. It was quite true that there was a further object which the Prime Minister desired to effect—namely, to give authority to the Lord Lieutenant to search by night for illegal and secret meetings. This was proposed to be provided for by a sub-section which they had not yet on the Paper, and which they understood had not yet been drafted. All he asked, therefore, in view of what happened yesterday evening, was that the statement of the Prime Minister and the object of this clause should be made perfectly clear at that stage of the Committee.

[Sixteenth Night.]

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 21, after the word "warrant," to insert the words "at any hour within sunrise and sunset."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he quite understood the way in which the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) put the matter; but he (Sir William Harcourt) had had an opportunity of communicating with his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, who was obliged to be absent at that moment, owing to the pressure of Public Business, and the view taken by his right hon. Friend of the matter, and the one which his right hon. Friend had taken throughout, was that no alteration in this respect in regard to night-search was to be made at this stage of the Bill. Whatever modification of the clause that was to be made would be made upon an Amendment to be introduced on the Report. In his (Sir William Harcourt's) opinion, that would be the proper time on which to discuss the nature of the Amendment and its effect, and he therefore thought it would only be wasting the time of the Committee to enter into any discussion of the matter at the present stage of the Bill. That was not only his own view of the matter, but it was distinctly the view of the matter taken by the Prime Minister, and therefore he hoped that the Amendment would not be further pressed, but that the consideration of the question would be postponed until the Report.

MR. SEXTON remarked, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had very carefully confined himself to a literal view of the question raised by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). He (Mr. Sexton), therefore, arose for the purpose of putting a plain question to the right hon. and learned Gentleman. The Prime Minister had expressed himself so clearly upon the question that he had thought no further discussion necessary, and he had been disposed to look upon the Amendment of his hon. Friend as superfluous. But the circumstances showed that the precaution taken by his hon. Friend was by no means superfluous, because it now appeared that the Government were going to drop the question of that important Amendment for their own convenience, and leave it entirely till the Report. The assurance given by the Prime Minister yesterday was that searches by day might be made for arms, ammunition, and papers, but that the night-searches should be confined to secret and illegal meetings. They now found from other Members sitting on the Treasury Bench that the promise of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had been made disingenuously. The natural position of the Amendment was this. The Home Secretary thought last night, and led the Committee to believe, that the interpretation placed on the Prime Minister's words was not true. The right hon. and learned Gentleman did not condescend to say what the true interpretation was, and at the present moment it was a question depending between the Irish Representatives and the right hon. and learned Gentleman as to the meaning of the Prime Minister's words. Without conveying any assurance as to whether the clause would be used for carrying out searches for arms in the daytime, and for secret meetings at night, the right hon. and learned Gentleman now wished them to drop the discussion. In the absence of any statement as to what was to be done, he could not consent to take that course. There was a very important question depending upon the meaning to be attached to the words of the Prime Minister. There was clearly a contradiction between the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary, and hon. Members on that side of the House wanted to know what was the meaning that was now attached to the words of the Prime Minister, and whether the present clause was to be limited to day-searches for arms, ammunition, papers, documents, and other articles expressed in the first part of the clause, and not extended to searches in the night-time, or, as expressed in the 8th clause, "after sunset and before sunrise." He (Mr. Sexton) did not think it would be wise to give up the opportunity of discussing the question with the Chairman in the Chair. He (Mr. Sexton) and his Friends certainly could not walk into the trap so cunningly laid for them by the Home Secretary.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT wished to draw the attention of the Committee to the remarkable course which had been pursued in this matter. When the Committee commenced that day, the first Amendment on the Paper was an Amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power), who was supposed to occupy a responsible position on the Benches below the Gangway, in the very same words as that which was now moved by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). But the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power) got up and said that, after what had passed last night, he did not think it would be proper to proceed with that Amendment, but that the matter should be allowed to stand over until the Amendments of the Government were moved. But what happened? An hour elapsed, and an Amendment identically the same as that which had been withdrawn by the hon. Member for Waterford, in the presence of most hon. Members now present, was proposed by the hon. Member for the City of Cork. It would be absolutely impossible to make progress with the Bill if this course was to be pursued.

MR. HEALY said, the whole matter admitted of a simple explanation, and certainly what had occurred was scarcely creditable to Her Majesty's Government. His hon. Friend the Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power) got up, at the commencement of the Sitting, and said that, after the undertaking given last night by the Prime Minister, he would not proceed with his Amendment. But the Irish Members had not expected, after the Prime Minister withdrew last night, that the Home Secretary would have thrown his right hon. Colleague overboard altogether. They took the right hon. and learned Gentleman to mean that; but when his hon. Friend got up and asked whether the Government stood to their guns or not, no answer was returned at all, and they found that the Government desired that the whole thing should remain in a nebulous condition until the Report stage of the Bill. Therefore, the Government had only to thank themselves for all that had occurred since. The position they took up now was very different from that which they took up last night. As long as they had a clear understanding from the Government that they would maintain the meaning of the words of the Prime Minister, they were willing to let the clause pass. But what did they find now? After the statement of the Prime Minister had been made last night, he (Mr. Healy) left the Committee, and did not return for some hours. When he came in he found a wrangle going on as to the words which had been used by the Prime Minister, and, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had thrown his Chief overboard, what could they do but continue the discussion? He would read to the Committee the way in which the matter was reported in The Times, and it was similarly reported in The Standard :—

"Mr. Gladstone declined to accept the Amendment, but wished to take that opportunity of stating that the Government had, on consideration, decided to limit the operation of the clause. When the time came they should propose to give the police power to search by night only when there was a reasonable suspicion that a secret or illegal society was holding a meeting."

The Home Secretary got up from the Treasury Bench last night, and, in answer to a demand from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the senior Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket), said that he could by no means accept the statement of his right hon. Colleague.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I said nothing of the kind, nor anything like it.

MR. HEALY said, he was glad if that were so. That was the interpretation which the Irish Members put upon the statement of the Home Secretary, and it was borne out by the cheers which rang forth from the Tory Benches.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT remarked, that, as the matter was of some importance, he must be allowed to say exactly what it was that he did say. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) rose and stated that the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) had put a certain interpretation upon the words of the Prime Minister. He (Sir William Harcourt) at once said that he did not concur in that interpretation, if it had been accurately stated, and he was equally sure that the Prime Minister would not concur in it. Since then he had had an opportunity of speaking to the Prime Minister on the subject, and he had only to repeat that, if the representation given by the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin last night as to the interpretation placed by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) upon the words of the Prime Minister was correct, then he did not concur with it, nor did the Prime Minister concur with it either.

MR. HEALY said, that if that were really so, the whole thing was now put in a nutshell. He would read from The Times the statement which the right hon. and learned Gentleman was reported to have made—

“Sir W. Harcourt said. . . . As to the construction which the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite said the hon. Member for Wexford and others had placed on the statement of the Prime Minister, all he could say was that if they placed that construction upon it, he could not agree in that construction, and he felt sure that his right hon. Friend (the Prime Minister) would not concur in it either.”

[Ministerial cheers.] He was delighted to hear those cheers. He presumed that the right hon. and learned Gentleman concurred in the accuracy of that report. He took it that the right hon. and learned Gentleman did so by his silence. He would now go on to see whether the Prime Minister had accepted his interpretation, and he would again quote from The Times report—

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT here rose—but

MR. HEALY said, he was in possession of the Committee, and he was entitled to finish his statement. He had already been interrupted twice, and he had given way to the right hon. and learned Gentleman; but he now claimed the right of continuing his remarks. He would again read from The Times report—

“Mr. Healy thought that if the Prime Minister would bona fide carry out what he had said as to the way in which a search for arms or documents should be conducted, the clause on the whole, should be agreed to. All that the clause asked was that the police should have power to search for arms or documents. If it was to be understood that on the occasion of a search, chimney-pieces were not to be pulled down, nor clothing to be torn, nor decent women to be compelled to get out of their beds in the presence of police-constables, and that, if nothing was found, the searchers would immediately retire, he would vote for the Government against every Amendment that might be proposed against this clause.—Mr. Gladstone said, if he understood rightly the observations of the hon. Member who had just spoken, he had placed a correct interpretation upon the concession of the Government. The credit of the concession was due to his noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, who had examined the whole question with no infallible judgment, but with a sincere desire that Government should only ask from Parliament for that which was absolutely necessary. He understood the concession as it was understood by the hon. Member opposite.”

Now, that was only one portion of the report. He would take another to show exactly what transpired. They would see, again, in this portion of the report what really did occur. [Cries of “Order!”] Hon. Members opposite always called out “Order!” when the argument was going against themselves. Here they had another passage from the same debate, and it was made after the original statement of the Prime Minister—

“Mr. Healy agreed with the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Nolan) as to the importance of this concession. Would it be understood that the police, having made a search by night, and finding no illegal meeting, would withdraw from the premises?—Mr. Gladstone had no doubt that they would do so.”

He might ask what was the use of language? They were told that language was given to statesmen to conceal their thoughts, and it certainly appeared to be so, because he found the Prime Minister making a distinct statement and agreeing with the interpretation which had been placed upon it by Members like himself (Mr. Healy), and then they found the Home Secretary getting up in all his majesty and throwing over his Chief. That was exactly what it amounted to. Did the Home Secretary agree in the interpretation which had been placed on the Prime Minister's words? Either he did, or he did not. If he did, there was no difference between the right hon. and learned Gentlemen and himself (Mr. Healy) and his Colleagues, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman must withdraw from the position he had taken up. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was prepared, a few moments ago, to rise for the purpose of interrupting him. He hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman would get up now and give the Committee some reasonable explanation as to the extraordinary and two-fold position the Government were taking up on the matter.

Sir William Harcourt

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the Government took no two-fold position in the matter. But the hon. Gentleman would see that accuracy in the matter was essential. What he had said that he did not concur in, and what he had said his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister did not concur in, was the view taken by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) as to the interpretation placed by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) on the words of the Prime Minister. It was to that statement he (Sir William Harcourt) had directed his observations. He had not directed them to anything the Prime Minister had said at all. He again repeated that he still maintained that position, and it was far better that the Prime Minister should state what he had said than that they should go on wrangling about what the Prime Minister did or did not say. The whole matter would be much more properly brought before the House on an Amendment of this clause upon the Report. The Prime Minister could then state the view he took of the question. He need not say that the Government were in entire accord upon the matter; but it was impossible to go into it then. He would not attempt to embark upon a discussion now in regard to what took place when he was not present. He therefore asked the Committee to proceed with the consideration of the clause, and to postpone the present discussion until the Report.

MR. BORLASE said, the hon. Member for Wexford had stated that the whole question was comprised in a nutshell. It appeared to him (Mr. Borlase) that that was so, and therefore the best thing they could do was to go to a division on the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). Let that division be final, and let them hear no more of the question on the Report.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the Committee that, although it is sometimes convenient for the progress of Business to have explanations when a misunderstanding has arisen, an answer having now been given by the Minister in charge of the Bill, the Committee should now return to the Amendments before them. The Committee cannot discuss an Amendment which is not before them. The proposal of the Prime Minister to bring up an Amendment to the clause on the Report is not before us, and we cannot discuss it.

MR. PARNELL said, it was necessary for himself and his Colleagues to decide whether they were to press the Amendment or not, or to adopt the course recommended by the Home Secretary—namely, that the matter should be left over until the Report in order that a new sub-section might be introduced. The Committee had had several negative statements from the Home Secretary, and before they come to a conclusion upon a question of this sort it was very desirable to know what the mind of the Home Secretary was. What was his idea as to the shape in which the sub-section should stand? What was his idea of the nature of the limitation to be provided by a future sub-section? That was the difficulty at the present moment. He had heard the statement of the Prime Minister last night, and he had perfectly understood it; but the Home Secretary had steadily refused, up to the present moment, to tell them positively what his own mind was. He would be perfectly satisfied to leave the matter to the Report, if he could obtain from the Home Secretary, who was in charge of the Bill, a declaration that he adhered to the words of the Prime Minister last night. He thought that was a reasonable request for himself and his Colleagues to make. If the Home Secretary could see his way to state that he abided by the words of the Prime Minister, he (Mr. Parnell) would be quite willing to withdraw the Amendment and to leave the matter to be settled on the Report, otherwise he should feel compelled to ask the Committee to divide upon the Amendment.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that hon. Members on the Benches below the Gangway on the opposite side of the House had made repeated attempts, the object of which it was obvious to see, to distinguish between one Member of the Government and another. He would make no declaration on the matter at all. It ought to be understood, and it must be understood in that House, that the whole Government, and every Member of the Government, was responsible for the conduct of this Bill by the mouth of whomsoever they might speak, whether it was the Head of the Government or a subordinate Member of the Government, and these attempts to distinguish between one Member of the Government and another were, in his opinion, entirely unfair and unworthy of the hon. Members by whom they were made. He would, therefore, be no party to any declaration on the subject. Of course, whatever was said in that House by the Prime Minister, by his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, by his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, or by himself, bound the Government, and the Government were responsible for it.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he thought the fair and courteous manner in which the Home Secretary had conducted this Bill through the House up to the present moment entitled him to make the remark he had just made to the Committee. In regard to these clauses, he (Mr. Arthur Arnold) had been disposed to give Her Majesty's Government some support, at all events, because he felt they were clauses above all others in connection with the Bill which the Government had the best right to ask from Parliament under the present circumstances. But in regard to the Amendment, he had great difficulty in deciding how he should vote, and it was for this reason that, in connection with this clause, his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary told the Committee that the Lord Lieutenant attached great importance to the search by day, but not the same importance to the search for arms by night. Now, Lord Spencer was the highest authority they could have on the matter, and if that noble Lord was deliberately of opinion that the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) might be accepted, and that it was not necessary to retain the power of a night-search, he (Mr. Arnold) did not see why the Amendment could not be accepted. He had understood the declaration of the Chief Secretary to be positive upon that point. At the same time, nothing could be more positive than the declaration made by the Home Secretary just now, that he abided by those words. It would, therefore, seem that there was some slight want of agreement between various Members of the Government. He (Mr. Arnold), before he gave a vote upon the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, wished to know from the Chief Secretary what was the precise meaning of the words he had reported to the Committee from Lord Spencer?

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that he is not speaking to the question before the Committee—namely, the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, that was exactly the point to which he was speaking. He understood the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to say, and it was so reported, that Lord Spencer had virtually assented to the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork. All he desired was that the right hon. Gentleman should tell them what was to be understood precisely by the expression of Lord Spencer, so as to decide the Committee in coming to a vote.

MR. RYLANDS said, the matter appeared to him to have assumed a position which was not convenient to those Members of the House who did not happen to be Members of the Party below the Gangway opposite. When he and other Members were asked to vote upon the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), they were bound to know whether or not the Government intended, by an Amendment on the Report, to meet that Amendment. If his right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary would get up and say that he (Mr. Rylands) had understood correctly that the Prime Minister last night did undertake that in regard to the search for arms and for documents, it should not take place during the hours of the night, he, for one, would cheerfully vote with the Government against the Amendment; but if his right hon. and learned Friend declined to give that assurance, he (Mr. Rylands) would be placed in a very unfair position. He certainly could not undertake to vote on this Amendment without understanding what the intentions of the Government were on the Report. It seemed to him that there was a sort of mysterious action in the matter. He believed there had been complaints made in certain quarters that the Government had conceded too much. He rejoiced that the Government had made concessions in regard to many of these clauses, and he thought that those concessions ought to receive from the Irish Party their due recognition. He believed it would be a wise concession on the part of the Government to act as he understood it was their intention to act in reference to the provisions contained in this clause. But to say to the House of Commons, "You must act blindfold, and you must give a vote under the present circumstances with a sort of indefinite impression that there has been some mistake as to certain expressions used," that was not treating the independent Members of the House fairly, and they would be justified in voting for the Amendment, which, as far as he was able to judge, was in accord with the opinion expressed by the Prime Minister last night. Unless the Government gave more explicit information—unless the Home Secretary was prepared to give an assurance that the Government would deal with the matter in the way the Prime Minister had already undertaken that it should be dealt with—and he did not distinguish between one Member of the Government and another—he should have some difficulty in arriving at a conclusion as to the way in which he ought to vote. At the same time, he was prepared to say that he regarded the Prime Minister as his Chief, as well as the Chief of the Government, and he knew that whatever the right hon. Gentleman had said he would adhere to. But unless the Committee had a statement from the Home Secretary that he intended to act in the spirit of the declaration of the Prime Minister, and to restrict the right of search for arms and papers to the daytime, he (Mr. Rylands), for one, would go without hesitation into the Lobby against him.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD remarked, that his two hon. Friends who had just spoken (Mr. Arnold and Mr. Rylands) did not appear to him to have considered the statement of the Prime Minister and the Amendment now before the Committee, because he did not think for a moment anybody in the House understood the Prime Minister to promise to go as far as the Amendment went. Whatever the Prime Minister might have intended, it was perfectly certain that he did not intend that. What was the question now before the Committee? It was that the right of search should be confined to the day-time, between sunrise and sunset. That was the day-time as ordinarily understood; but the sun might go down while it was still daylight, and was a Sub-Inspector to be supposed to set his watch by the almanack, and discontinue a search the moment the sun went down? What the Prime Minister meant was, that a search might be permitted to take place between certain specified hours in the day-time, such as from 6 o'clock in the morning until 8 or 9 o'clock at night. He hoped the Committee would support the Government in resisting the Amendment, whatever might be done on the Report. For his own part, he preferred the clause as it stood without any amendment, and thought it unwise to have any restriction upon the right of search at night. Those who possessed arms intended to be used for illegal purposes ought to be made to feel that they were not safe from a visit by the police during any portion of the 24 hours; and if it was thought that the police would use their powers harshly, that could be guarded against by general instructions from head-quarters.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the speech which had just been delivered by the hon. and learned Member for Beaumaris (Mr. Morgan Lloyd) had really nothing whatever to do with the question the Committee were discussing at the present moment. The question they were discussing was not whether or not the right of search for arms should be confined to the day-time, because that matter had already been conceded by the Government. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had put the matter fairly and temperately before the Committee, and he did not see why they should discuss the question with any appearance of passion, either on one side or the other. The Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was that the right of search for arms, ammunition, and papers should be confined to the day-time, and the words of the Chief Secretary last night were, that the Lord Lieutenant had come to the conclusion that the power of search for arms and documents at night was unnecessary. Therefore, the Amendment of his hon. Friend only provided that a power which the Lord Lieutenant declared to be unnecessary should be given up, and the point at issue between the Government and the

[Sixteenth Night.]

Irish Members was a very simple and narrow one. It was this. The subsection extended to the seizure of arms and the articles mentioned, by night as well as by day. But the Government had declared that they did not want it to extend to the night as well as to the day. If that were the case, why did the right hon. and learned Gentleman not consent to admit the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork? The Home Secretary said it was a convenient course to postpone the question to the stage of Report; but, in saying that, he was asking the Committee to postpone a matter which arose on this very clause.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT begged pardon, but that was not his statement; it was the proposal of the Prime Minister. It was agreed that the matter should be dealt with on Report, and at that stage only.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman had misunderstood his point. He had stated that the Prime Minister and the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had given up the right of search for arms at night, unless there was proof that an illegal meeting was taking place. Clearly, that right of search at night had been given up by the Government. The clause had nothing to do with illegal meetings; it related solely to the search and seizure of arms, ammunition, and other articles named, and, therefore, the question limiting the right of search for arms clearly arose here, and should not be deferred to the stage of Report. The Government had said they did not want the power of search at night, except on the conditions stated, and they had clearly conceded the point of the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that words of his had been referred to frequently in the course of this discussion. He had not, however, in any instance felt ashamed of his words, nor did he regret having uttered them. The Irish Government were satisfied that they did not want the right to search for arms, ammunition, and documents at night-time. They were equally satisfied that when they should have reason to know that members of a secret society were gathered together—that men, in fact, had collected together to plan crime—the right of entry ought to be possessed by the Government, in order that the machinations of the evil-disposed might be defeated. That was the view he had expressed during the previous Sitting, and which the Government now maintained. Under these circumstances, as an important change was to be made in the clause on the Report, in order to bring it into conformity with the statement of the Prime Minister, the Government were quite determined not to be hampered by any material change made in the clause at the present stage of the proceedings on the Bill. The clause was important beyond the conception of Gentlemen who had not been engaged in the administration of Irish affairs. He did not speak from his own experience, for it would be ridiculous to do that; he spoke on the faith of conversations held with all the most important people concerned in Irish administration. The Government would not recede from the position that the question was of such importance that it must be considered as a whole, and, consequently, they could not accept any material Amendment at the present stage. The statement made on the previous evening seemed to him to have been as clear and straightforward as any statement could be. The Government asked that the question might be postponed to the stage of the Report, in the belief that they had a right to expect hon. Members would trust them. At any rate, the confidence of hon. Members on that side of the House ought certainly to be extended to the Government in this matter. He would beg hon. Members, once for all, to remember that while they might deem it to be their duty to criticize the Bill at, perhaps, great length, every day brought before him fresh reasons to show that the Irish Government, or that part of it which was behind the scenes, regarded the present situation, not with fear, but with the most deep and increasing anxiety. He was not using conventional words, but language founded on matters of the most serious importance, and he felt bound to say that every day by which the Bill was delayed added very seriously indeed to the responsibility of hon. Members who might unnecessarily prolong its discussion.

MR. PLUNKET said, after the serious appeal of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, he should not detain the Committee on that occasion by making any remarks as to the course which Her Majesty's Government might think fit to adopt with regard to the abandonment of the right of search for arms, ammunition, and documents at night, and the powers which they thought it incumbent on them to take for the purpose of defeating the machinations of secret societies. But there was a second issue raised by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, and also by the speeches of the hon. Members below the Gangway on that side of the House, on which he desired to say a few words. It was as to the time at which the alteration in question was to be made. On that subject he had the clearest possible recollection, and he could mention, in connection with it, a circumstance that would doubtless recall it to the memory of the Committee. The Prime Minister distinctly stated that the time when the clause was going through Committee was not that at which he would make the alteration, which he was willing to concede, but that it should be done on Report. Upon that he (Mr. Plunket) rose and said that, at that moment, he should make no comment; that he reserved his right of speaking upon the subject, and that he presumed an opportunity for doing so would be accorded when the whole clause was put to the Committee. He had availed himself of the Motion to report Progress later on in the evening to say something on the subject; but it was distinctly understood that the proper occasion for fully discussing it would be on Report. He repeated that the Prime Minister had distinctly stated that the alteration indicated was to be made at the stage of Report, and not at the stage of Committee.

MR. PARNELL said, this clause, as the side-title showed, provided for "searches for arms and illegal documents;" and, as the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant and the Government had given up the right of search by night, and only desired to retain the right of entry where they had reason to suspect that the meeting of an illegal association was going on, it necessarily followed that the clause would have to be amended, either on the present occasion or on the Report stage, in the direction which he had pointed out by his Amendment. The clause, as had been already shown, provided simply for searches for arms and illegal documents. Therefore, the right of entry, as regarded illegal meetings, did not come within [the scope of the clause at all, and it would be necessary for the Government to introduce practically a new clause, although they might call it a sub-section, in order to deal with that matter. He considered it was but a reasonable request to ask the Government to accept words with the view of making the clause now before the Committee what they desired it should be. But he had also asked the Home Secretary to make some statement as to what he considered the new clause would be, and he, in reply, said that the Government would be bound by any statement made on the Bill by the Prime Minister, the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, and by himself. Now, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had himself made no statement, and he, therefore, pinned him to the statement of the Chief Secretary, which they had just heard, and which, in the absence of any dissent on his part, embodied the view which it was to be presumed he entertained. In the full confidence that the Government would carry out what they had stated last night, and what the Chief Secretary had just repeated, he would ask leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he hoped the Government would be willing to accept the Amendment, of which he had given Notice, to the effect that the power of entry by force should be exercised only by policemen in uniform.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member, that detectives should go about their work in uniform, was suggestive of the idea of a gentleman going out deer-stalking in a conspicuous dress. Why, under such circumstances as that, he would never get near the game. The clause was directed against secret societies, and it was impossible that the Government could agree to an Amendment which proposed that the officers who carried it out should be in uniform.

MR. MARUM said, he proposed, by the Amendment he was about to move, that Parliament should show to the people of Ireland that some regard was paid to their religious feelings. As the unrestricted right of search in the case of churches, places of worship, and other houses connected with the religion of the country, would be regarded in Ireland as extremely objectionable, he begged to offer his Amendment to the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

[Sixteenth Night.]

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, at the end of the Clause, to add—
"Provided always, That no entry to search as aforesaid shall be made into any church or other place of worship, or any house of any clergyman of any denomination, or in any monastery, or convent, or nunnery, or school, except in the presence of a magistrate."—(Mr. Marum.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT trusted the hon. Member would not hesitate to withdraw his Amendment. He saw the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) about to take his seat, and, if his suggestion were adopted, it would doubtless facilitate the progress of the Bill. His objection to the exemptions proposed was that the principle had already been discussed and decided against on a former clause, when it was proposed to exempt, amongst other persons, the village doctor from its operation. It was not likely that the right of entry would be exercised in the case of the places mentioned, except for overwhelming reasons.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that he was the only Member who had succeeded in inducing a former House of Commons to appoint a Committee to inquire into the manner in which Conventual and Monastic establishments were conducted, and unless there had been some grounds for his Motion, he presumed that that House, which was certainly not inferior to the present House, would have rejected his Motion. He was quite as much impressed as was the Home Secretary with the necessity for expedition in passing the Bill now before the House. He had, however, risen in order to mention that during his researches he had found that the right of sanctuary was still claimed by these Institutions; and he would beg the Home Secretary to bear in mind that, previous to the suppression of Monastic and Conventual establishments in the reign of Henry VIII., and during the long subsequent suppressions of these Institutions in foreign countries, that right of sanctuary was found to be attended with the gravest abuses, and to be fraught with the gravest public dangers.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. HEALY said, the object of the next Amendment, which stood on the Paper in his name, was simply to insure that a copy of the warrant should be furnished when the search took place. He hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman would assent to this.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 30, after the word "shall," to insert the words "produce and exhibit same, and furnish a copy thereof to the person (if any) in occupation of the premises which have been searched, or to anyone authorized to demand, and who shall demand same on behalf of such person, or of the owner of such premises."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought it quite proper that the words in the Act of last year should be used in reference to the warrant, and that before the warrant was exercised it should be produced, if so desired. He should, therefore, be willing to insert, on Report, the words of the Act of last year, and he trusted the hon. Member would be satisfied with that assurance. The hon. Member would see that the production of the warrant was already provided for in the 3rd sub-section of the clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must point out to the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power), who had the next Amendment on the Paper, that the two first lines of the Amendment could not be put, inasmuch as they had, in substance, been negatived by the Committee on a division upon the Amendment of the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. T. C. Thompson). That being so, it would seem that the whole of the Amendment was inadmissible, because the latter portion of it covered the first.

MR. HEALY said, he desired to postpone, until the Report, the Amendment in his name, which was intended to provide compensation of some kind to persons whose property had been destroyed or injured by the police in the course of their search.

Mr. Marum

MR. SEXTON said, the object of the Amendment he was about to move was to enable a person, whose property had been seized, to go before a Petty Session Court and satisfy the Court that the articles found had not been used for the purposes of a secret society or a criminal association; it was, further, to enable him, if he were dissatisfied with the decision of the Court of Petty Sessions, to appeal to the Judge of the County Court. It would be obvious to the Committee that a Sub-Inspector and a body of police might come suddenly into the house of a person, who had not the slightest connection with any illegal society or any intention to commit any illegal act, and take away his property—arms and other things—without good grounds. The right hon. and learned Gentleman would not deny that the property of perfectly innocent persons might be seized under this clause by an Inspector who, perhaps, proceeded on the vaguest and most unreasonable evidence or suspicion; and he was simply asking that the person so aggrieved might be allowed to go before gentlemen invested by Her Majesty with the commission of the peace, to satisfy them that the articles seized were not intended to be used for any illegal purpose. This, and the right of appeal to the Judge of the County Court, appeared to him to be most reasonable propositions; and, as the Government could not wish to punish innocent persons, he trusted they would be acceded to by the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 31, at the end of the Clause, to add the words—"The person in whose possession any of the articles above mentioned may have been when seized, or any person claiming property in same, may within one month after the date of such seizure apply in the prescribed manner to a court of petty sessions sitting for the district in which such seizure took place, and which court shall consist of at least two justices of the peace, for an order that the articles seized should be delivered up to him; and if the court shall be of opinion that such articles have not been used, or intended to be used, in connection with any secret society or secret association existing for criminal purposes, the court may make an order that such articles be delivered up to the person claiming same. Any person finding himself aggrieved by any order of a court of petty sessions under this section may appeal from same to the county court judge for the county and division within which such order was made, subject to the provisions of, and in manner prescribed by, the twenty-fourth section of 'The Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851,' and the county court judge, on the hearing of any such appeal, shall have power to confirm, modify, or reverse such order, or to make any other order in the premises which may seem just."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, this was a search clause, and it was now proposed by the hon. Member for Sligo to make it subject to a double appeal. If that were done, the clause would be perfectly unworkable. The right of appeal had never been asked or conceded in connection with clauses of this kind which had been in operation in Ireland for many years. The Government could not possibly assent to this proposal. Although, perhaps, the hon. Member for Sligo would not share the good opinion he had of the Irish Government, he felt confident that, if it were discovered that a miscarriage of justice had taken place, in the sense indicated, every reasonable means would be taken to repair the error, and it would therefore be unnecessary, as well as inexpedient, to encumber the clause with the machinery suggested by the hon. Member.

MR. SEXTON said, if the right hon. and learned Gentleman admitted that an innocent person ought not to be punished, it was difficult to see why he objected to the Amendment. How was the innocence of the person to be discovered unless it was by the means he suggested? It was obvious, in the case of a person whose arms or other property had been seized, that no step taken by him would be sufficient to counteract the action of the local police, nor was it likely that the authorities at Dublin Castle would willingly reverse that action. His proposition was that the person aggrieved should have an opportunity of calling into play that just and benevolent disposition which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had ascribed to the Irish Government. He proposed no more than that cases of the kind indicated should go before the right hon. and learned Gentleman's own magistrates; and he contended that unless this right of appeal were given to the aggrieved person, there was no other possible or conceivable way in which the accused person could draw attention to the fact of his innocence.

[Sixteenth Night.]

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, he was quite unable to see why the Government could not agree to the proposal of his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo. If a man who was perfectly innocent of any illegal act or intention had his property taken away by the police, he had no right of appeal whatever. The Amendment asked nothing more than that a person so situated should be allowed to show that he was innocent, and that his property should not have been taken away. Such an addition to the clause as that could not possibly embarrass the working of the Act.

MR. LEAMY said, he thought that although the right hon. and learned Gentleman said the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sligo would make the clause unworkable, his own opinion was that its effect would be to make the police more careful. He asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether he believed that any man connected with an unlawful society in Ireland, whose arms had been seized, would go before the magistrates and subject himself to examination? The idea was not to be entertained for a moment; and the right hon. and learned Gentleman would see that the only object of the proposal was to allow an innocent man from whom arms had been taken to say that those arms were not in his possession for an illegal purpose.

MR. GILL said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman's argument, that the adoption of the Amendment would render the clause unworkable was clearly fallacious, because the appeal asked for could not be made until the clause had operated—that was to say, until the house had been broken into and the property taken away. It was most desirable that an innocent man should have the opportunity of proving his innocence in the manner suggested for other reasons than those which had already been given. The Committee would know that the power had already been taken under Clause 9 of the Bill to arrest strangers in a proclaimed district under suspicious circumstances. Now, it might very well happen that a perfectly innocent person, whose house had been entered and whose property had been seized, might find himself the object of suspicion to a policeman in a proclaimed district where his business or avocations called him. Suppose this person to be arrested. Would it not be strong evidence against him if the police brought forward proof that his house had been searched by the police of the district where he formerly lived? He contended that, under those circumstances, the individual would have no chance of escape from the operation of Clause 9 unless he could show that his house had been searched unnecessarily; and there would be no means of his doing this except he could refer to the record of the appeal with which the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sligo would furnish him.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he thought this Amendment might be described as one of the most simple and reasonable Amendments that had been proposed to the Bill. It asked nothing more than that after a man had been wronged he should have an opportunity of getting redress. Nothing could be more just than that a man, whose property had been injured and whose reputation had suffered by the wrongful action of the police in searching his house upon slight information or hasty suspicion, should be able to obtain reparation. He could not help thinking that the right hon. and learned Gentleman wanted to insure that the police should have the power of doing wrongs of this kind unchecked by the knowledge that the person whom they wronged would be able to get redress. If that were not so, what was it that the right hon. and learned Gentleman wanted? He presumed it would be admitted that the police might commit grievous mistakes in carrying out the provisions of the Act. Well, then, if the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not want to shelter the police, and insure that they should have no trouble after they made mistakes of the kind indicated, why did he not accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sligo? The right hon. and learned Gentleman had expressed his belief that if the Irish Government found that a wrong had been done under this clause, they would, of their own motion, make amends for that wrong. If, then, they were so well-disposed, no possible harm could result from the Government assenting to such a proposition as this. He appealed to the Committee not to regard the whole case as settled, because the Home Secretary said he could not accept the Amendment. In deciding a matter of this kind, they were not to be ruled by the opinion of any Member of the Committee; on the contrary, every Member of the Committee had the right to bring his own honest and independent judgment to bear upon the question at issue; and it was upon that ground that he invoked further consideration for his hon. Friend's proposal, which, for the reasons given, he held to be strictly conformable to the spirit of justice.

Mr. CALLAN said, the proposal of the hon. Member for Sligo was not a limitation of the clause, although it would, if adopted, exercise an influence over the police in making applications for search warrants without reasonable cause. As an illustration of the conduct of the police in matters of this kind, he would refer to a case in his own parish which occurred in 1848. At that time a Roman Catholic church was being built in the parish; his father and the son of a neighbouring magistrate acted respectively as treasurer and secretary, and, for the purpose of collecting subscriptions, a parish census was taken. Someone gave information that there was a secret organization in the parish; the police made a sudden raid, and carried away some articles. After it was discovered that the whole thing was a mistake, application was made for the return of the property; but it was never returned, because to have done that would have shown the absurd position in which the Government were placed.

Mr. O'KELLY said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, in refusing this Amendment, spoke of it as an Amendment calculated to interfere with the right of search, and as one which would render the powers conferred by the clause practically useless to the Government. He (Mr. O'Kelly) could not understand how the right hon. and learned Gentleman could reasonably take that view of the Amendment. It interfered with no power of the police to enter and search; but what it would do would be to compel the police to act with something like prudence and fairness, from a fear that their action would be subject to review. Who were the men by whom they asked the Government to allow the conduct of the police to be reviewed? They were men appointed by the Government themselves—men who were known to act in the interests of the Government constantly and continually—men who were, to a great extent, in the pay and under the power of the Government. It was to such a tribunal as that that they asked the Government to refer the action of the police. If the Government meant honestly to use this Bill simply against evil-doers, there could be no reasonable and logical objection to their affording the protection which was asked for in this Amendment—the protection that when a man's house was invaded, and his arms or other effects were seized by the police, upon one pretence or another, that man should have the right to go before a tribunal of the country and prove, or offer evidence to that tribunal to prove, that the weapons and articles seized had not been kept by him with a view of breaking any law. The protection afforded by this clause would not interfere with the power of the Government to deal with anyone connected with secret societies, or with anyone whose intention it was to break the law. There was nothing in the Amendment which would afford such people the slightest protection; but in it there were guarantees to the subject that this right of search should not be abused in the future in Ireland, as it had been so frequently abused in the past. Perhaps hon. Gentlemen, Members of the Committee, who were not so well acquainted with the history of Ireland as were the Irish Members, were unaware of the evils which had been brought on that country by abuses of this right of search. Hon. Gentlemen, perhaps, forgot that the origin of the Rebellion of 1798 was the abuse of a similar power conferred on the Yeomanry and the officials of the Government of that day. Through the use that was made of this power, the people were driven to desperation, and the result was that the Government had to deal with a very formidable rebellion. What was now feared was, that if this clause should be used in the same spirit in the future as it had been used so frequently in the past, it would become a means of promoting disorder, and provoking resistance to the Government; perhaps resistance of a very serious character; while they could achieve all that they required, or all that the Government had a right to demand, without conferring this extra and dangerous power on the police and local authorities. The Government could take powers sufficient under this Bill to search for arms, ammunition, papers, documents, or articles they might think it desirable should be seized, without conferring an absolutely unlimited power upon the police—a power not merely unlimited, but absolutely without check or revision. What the Irish Members wanted was, that when a police-officer, acting with information, or without information, went into a man's house to search, if that man was convinced that there was no reasonable ground for such action of the police, he should have the right to go to the magistrates and put before them the reasons why he contended that the police had no right to act as they had done. He (Mr. O'Kelly) would ask English Members, was that an unreasonable guarantee to ask for? He would ask them how, and in what way, would the right of review impede or interfere with the right of search? In what way could it interfere with the right of the police to seize any arms or documents that they might want to seize? The Government took up the position that this Amendment would impede their use of the Act; but, as a matter of fact, it would only impede them where they wished to use the Act dishonestly—where they wished to use it despotically. It would not hamper, in the slightest degree, the use of this Act in any case where it ought fairly to be used.

Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he hoped hon. Gentlemen opposite would allow them to take a division at once on this Amendment. The matter was extremely simple, he had been there the whole of the time it had been under discussion, he thought it had been exhausted, and that a result might very fairly be now arrived at.

Mr. BIGGAR said, he desired to make an appeal to the Government, and that was that they (the Government) should make, at least, a pretence of listening to the arguments advanced in favour of the Amendment by Members of the Committee. There was no Member of the Government present except the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland; and it, therefore, could not be said that they were paying due attention to the arguments advanced. He begged to move that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Biggar.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he did not think the hon. Member could be in earnest in this Motion. He was sure the hon. Member would not deliberately delay the Business of the House, especially considering the large amount of time which had been devoted, up to the present, to the consideration of this Bill. As to the statement that the Government were not listening to the arguments of hon. Members, personally he had been obliged, in the interests of Public Business—not in any way for his own purposes—to absent himself from the Committee; but he took it for granted that other Members of the Government had been present, and had attended to the arguments that were presented to the Committee by hon. Gentlemen who supported the Amendment. So far as he was able to form an opinion with regard to the Amendment—not having had the opportunity of conferring with his Colleagues—he did not think the Government would be able to accept the proposal. He wished to keep himself within the Rules of the House; but if he might be allowed to say so, he would observe that the hon. Member for Roscommon (Mr. O'Kelly) had put the case very strongly—to say the least of it—when he said the Government wished to use this Act dishonestly. If that were the case, and if the object of the Government were criminal, it would be idle to talk of introducing this Amendment. But that was not the object of the Government. Their object was to obtain from Parliament those measures which the Executive in Ireland considered necessary to restore peace, and to put down that disorder which everyone must admit had been for such a long time rampant throughout the country. The hon. Member said that an innocent man might be deprived of his arms and property—that was to say that the house of a man might be searched, and the police might seize arms and other articles which the man who owned them had in his possession for a perfectly proper purpose. In such a case a much shorter remedy than that suggested by hon. Members opposite was open to the persons who felt themselves aggrieved. They could apply to the Lord Lieutenant, who would, on being satisfied of their innocence, order the arms to be returned.

Mr. O'Kelly

MR. SEXTON: How is a person to prove his innocence?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, if he found a man in possession of a jemmy at night in the neighbourhood of a house it would take a very strong argument to prove that that man was innocent of any evil intent. Under ordinary circumstances, however, he would rather assume that a person's intentions were honest.

MR. SEXTON: But the clause says "articles."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, what were arms but articles? Surely the hon. Member did not suppose that the word "articles" in the Bill meant a pair of slippers or a dressing-gown. The Bill said—

"All or any of the following articles; that is to say, any arms, ammunition, papers, documents, instruments, or articles suspected to be used or to be intended to be used for the purpose of or in connexion with any secret society or secret association existing for criminal purposes."

That was the character of the articles—it was not an umbrella, or a pair of slippers that would be seized, but articles used for the purposes of secret crime. It might be difficult, to some extent, for an innocent man to prove his innocent intentions if found in possession of these articles—just as difficult as it might be for a man to prove his innocence who was found in possession of stolen property that had come to him from other persons; still a person could do it, and was not prevented from doing it. The short answer to the Amendment was this. If a man was innocent and required these articles mentioned in the clause for an innocent purpose, in the event of their being seized, he would have little or no difficulty in getting them back by means of a memorial to the Lord Lieutenant—he would be able to get them back in that way in as many minutes as it would take him days to get them back in the way suggested by the hon. Member. He, therefore, hoped the hon. Member for Cavan would withdraw the Motion for reporting Progress; and, seeing that they had discussed this question at very great length, he trusted that hon. Members would now submit it to the arbitrament of a division.

MR. BIGGAR said, he would withdraw the Motion. His only object in moving to report Progress was to get the right hon. and learned Gentleman to give some reason, or, at any rate, to undertake to give some reason, why the Government were so unreasonable as to object to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). Seeing that he had been successful, he did not wish to press the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

DR. COMMINS said, with regard to the arguments of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, they appeared to him (Dr. Commins) to be very short of the mark, in asking for power to seize—

"Arms, ammunition, papers, documents, instruments, or articles suspected to be used or to be intended to be used for the purpose of or in connexion with any secret society or secret association."

The right hon. and learned Gentleman's illustration with regard to the "jemmy" was the most unfortunate one he could have drawn, because he must not forget the fact that there were 1,000 different purposes for which these articles, mentioned in the Bill, could be used besides the purposes of secret societies. People who got up secret societies did not label the articles they kept for the use of such societies, and there might be nothing to show the purpose for which they were intended to be used. A gun that might be used for the purposes of a "Moonlighter," or a member of any other secret society, might be suspected of being required for an unlawful purpose; but, seeing that the evidence upon which the police were to be empowered to seize such an article would be altogether extrinsic from the article itself, there should be some means of rebutting the evidence of the policeman, and showing that the article was required for a lawful purpose. But the clause did not give such a power. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland seemed to forget that the Arms Act already gave ample power to the police to seize all these things, and that that Act would not expire until October. Under that Act the police were empowered to seize all unlicensed arms or ammunition, or even parts of unlicensed arms, such as a gun cap or the broken lock of a gun. The provisions of that Act were sufficient to enable everything in the nature of an arm or in the nature of ammunition to be seized, while the Amendment would not interfere with that Act at all; but if articles were seized under the present section of the Prevention of Crime Bill, any mortal thing could be seized on the assumption that it was to be used for some illegal purpose. Books might be seized, papers also; iron might be seized from a smith's forge on the plea that it was going to be manufactured into pike-heads. There was not an article in the world that might not be seized. Clothing might be seized, because the police might say, "Oh, this clothing is intended to be used for disguises." House furniture might be taken, horses too, for it might be said, "Oh, these horses are to be used for the purpose of riding off to an adjoining county to attend a 'Moonlight' meeting." He did not say the Government would abuse this Act intentionally; but there were policemen who were oftentimes over-zealous, particularly when large rewards were held out to them in order to tempt them on, or where it might be an object to them to show how extremely active they were in carrying out the views of the Government. The police might seize articles against which they could not bring a particle of direct evidence, but which it had been whispered here and there were intended for the purposes of a secret society—they might be guided by the hints and suggestions of informers. Under this section the police might, if they chose, go into a house without a warrant, search the place from top to bottom, and seize anything or everything. Surely, then, the power of questioning the propriety of a seizure should be given. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland said, "You can memorialize the Lord Lieutenant;" but what would be the use of doing that? An individual, in a communication to the Lord Lieutenant, might say, "They have taken away my horse under the pretence that I am going to attend a 'Moonlight' meeting. I am not a 'Moonlighter'; I am not going to any such meeting." The Lord Lieutenant would appeal to the police officials and would get a very different version of the story, and the Lord Lieutenant might prefer to place reliance upon their view of the case. He might say, "The police know more about it than this man would have it appear; I shall take their version—he cannot have his horse back." Let the evidence be adjudicated upon by the magistrates who sit in the district—that was all that the Amendment proposed. It proposed to give relief to persons who might be worried, harassed, placed in the most painful positions, and subjected to all the pains and penalties that the Act provided, up to six months' imprisonment, through no fault of their own, but merely on the suspicion of a policeman. It would give people an easy and summary way of reclaiming their property, and while it did that it would not in any way hamper the hands of the Government. What the Amendment would do would be to remedy the evil that must inevitably accrue from even the most guarded exercise of the despotic power of this clause.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, the Amendment was so reasonable that he could not see how the Government could think of opposing it. Its object was to enable the Government to return to a man what was strictly and properly his own. If a man had firearms for an innocent purpose, and they were seized under a mistake, they were strictly his property as much as anything could be a man's property; and why, therefore, should not a man have a legal way of obtaining back, through a legal tribunal, what he had been deprived of by mistake? Why should a person have to go hat in hand to the Lord Lieutenant, and say—"I want to get back what is mine?" There was a great deal in what had been said by his hon. and learned Friend (Dr. Commins) as to the extent to which seizures might be carried under this clause. Anything, for instance, that could be used for the purpose of disguise would obviously come under the clause. They knew that women's clothes might be seized, because female apparel was very frequently resorted to for the purpose of disguises by members of conspiracies. Men's clothes also might be seized, because cases were common at all times in which they had been used by women who went about disguised acting as the agents of secret societies. The Committee knew that the disguise of the Whiteboys was a shirt put on over a man's ordinary dress. Policemen might be over-zealous in their use of the powers committed to them, and he did not see how their zeal could be moderated, or the evil effects of over-zeal be remedied, unless in the manner proposed by the Amendment. The Government could have no object in wishing to keep the property of an innocent man, and they could have no motive in dragging such a person before the Viceroy unnecessarily.

MR. BIGGAR said, it seemed to him that the Government were particularly unreasonable in objecting to this Amendment; and he charged them with having wasted the whole day. What were the facts? Why, this Amendment, if carried, could not, possibly do more than give redress to an innocent person; it could not benefit anyone who was guilty, and surely the Government would not say their object was to punish a person whether he was guilty or not. The contention of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, as had been pointed out by the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy), was not a sound one, for he had said, supposing a person was unfairly treated under the provisions of this clause, he could obtain suitable redress by sending a Memorial to the Lord Lieutenant. But suppose an innocent person, whose property had been seized, did send a Memorial to the Lord Lieutenant, what redress would he be likely to receive? What would be likely to occur would be this. The Memorial would be sent by the officials to Dublin Castle, to the parties against whom complaint had been made; these people would give their own statement of the case, and the man against whom the illegal seizure had been effected would not be able to defend his action, as he would not know what the case against him was. If, however, the matter were allowed to come before the Petty Sessions, the applicant would have the right of reply; and, if the case of the police was unreasonable, he would be able to show it, and then, in all probability, justice would be done. There was another very important thing connected with this matter, and it was this—the desirability of having the appeal heard without delay. If a Memorial, however, were sent to the Lord Lieutenant, there was no certainty at all that an investigation would take place, and that a reply would be received for weeks, and, perhaps, for months. But, if the party aggrieved had the right of appeal to the Petty Sessions, he could go before the magistrates at once and have his case heard. It was argued by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary that the appeal was unreasonable, and would give rise to too much litigation; but he (Mr. Biggar) hardly thought that would be the case. The magistrates might, through prejudice, give a wrong decision. Such cases often occurred, and it would, therefore, be only just that the aggrieved person should have the right of appeal. His hon. Friends would agree that the appeal should only be to magistrates in Petty Sessions—at least, he thought they would agree to that. He did not think that would be unreasonable.

MR. SEXTON said, the Government had objected to a double appeal; and to meet their views, if necessary, he would forego the preliminary investigation, and allow the matter to be settled by the magistrates at Petty Sessions. If the Government would allow that limited appeal against the action of the police, he (Mr. Sexton) would be prepared to withdraw the present Amendment, and to substitute another to carry out his object. If the Government did not accept that compromise, he could only think that they feared their action under this clause would be discredited, and that they, therefore, did not dare to allow it to be investigated before a public tribunal.

Original Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 42; Noes 168: Majority 126.—(Div. List, No. 166.)

MR. PARNELL said, he begged to move as a sub-section at the end of the clause, the words—

“Monthly Returns shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament of all searches or entries made under the provisions of this section, giving the names and addresses of the persons whose premises have been searched or entered, with the result in each case.”

[Sixteenth Night.]

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "(4.) Monthly Returns shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament of all searches or entries made under the provisions of this section, giving the names and addresses of the persons whose premises have been searched or entered, with the result in each case."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he was afraid the Government could not accept the Amendment, for this reason. There were numberless instances in which persons managed to evade detection and punishment, though they happened to be criminals. A man, whose house had been entered, although the police might not be sufficiently astute or successful to find compromising matters in it, might, nevertheless, be criminal; and such a person, who, if he succeeded in concealing the fact that instruments were in his possession for the purposes of crime, would be held up as an innocent man.

MR. PARNELL said, this was a most reasonable Amendment, and he should not have thought that it would have been refused by the Government. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland said he did not consider a Return of these searches would at all answer the object he (Mr. Parnell) had in moving the Amendment, as the Return would be of a general character, the warrant being issued as regarded an entire district. The warrants would embrace the districts of a Sub-Inspector or Inspector of Police; but it was of the utmost importance that the Committee should have some information as to the action of the Government under this Bill. It was perfectly monstrous that every reasonable Amendment should be refused, and he must say that if the Government were to continue this system they must expect that the Bill would make but very slow progress. What was he (Mr. Parnell) asking for? Why, that Returns should be laid on the Table of the House, giving the names of persons whose houses were searched by night or by day. What could be more reasonable than that; and if the Government refused such a reasonable Amendment, what could they expect? They could only expect the Bill to be strongly opposed on Report, and Amendments to be brought forward and pressed against every section. The objection the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland made to the acceptance of this Amendment was of a most trivial character. He said that a man whose house had been searched, though nothing might have been found there, might still be a criminal, but would be held up as an innocent person. Nothing of the kind—he (Mr. Parnell) denied the right of the right hon. and learned Gentleman to suggest such a result. The name of such a man would figure in the Return as that of a person who had had a search made in his house. It would by no means follow that he was innocent if nothing of a suspicious character was found on his premises. The Amendment was a reasonable one, and he should press it upon the Committee.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, he could not understand the objection of the Government to this very reasonable request. What the hon. Member asked was simply to know how far this power had been effective. The Government had given Returns of the persons arrested under the Coercion Act; but they had raised the same objection to presenting those Returns that they were raising on the present occasion. The objection was peculiarly an official one. One reason why the Amendment should be pressed was this—because it was one of the main accusations against the Act that its objects would be difficult of accomplishment. But if, by presenting these Returns, the Government could show a number of cases where houses had been entered and arms or other suspicious articles had been found in them, it would be a strong argument in favour of these powers.

DR. COMMINS said, the objection of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland was a very amusing one, and it reminded him of a phrase in use among schoolboys when they were detected in mischief. There was in use amongst schoolboys an old proverb—"Any excuse is better than none"—and the Government now seemed to think that any reason was better than no reason at all. As a matter of fact, there was no reason that could be given, and it looked very much like trifling with the Committee to say that where a man's house was entered, and nothing was found there, although that man might have been guilty of crime, to record the fact that a search had been fruitless would be holding him up as a very good character. What was there in this that even looked like an argument? It could not be of the slightest consequence to a man whether his name appeared in a Return or not; it would not give him a good character either with the police or with his neighbours; indeed, the mere fact of a man's name appearing in a Return of this sort would make it look as though he was a person against whom there was a well-founded suspicion. The fact of appearing in a Report would, to his mind, be damaging to a man's character rather than a rehabilitation of it, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to think. But the Government resisted the Amendment, and did not condescend to give a reason for so doing; and strong spectacles were not required to see why it was they did not give a reason. Language, it was said, was given to people to conceal their thoughts; but to the Treasury Bench it was apparently given to conceal argument and to conceal reasons also. The Government did not wish this House and the people of England to know how they were using, or misusing, the powers of this Bill. The people of England were in the habit of looking on such warrants as an invasion of liberty and family privacy; and they should, therefore, be informed, from month to month, how many of these invasions of liberty, how many of these invasions of domestic privacy, how many outrages on individual rights had taken place under the authority of this Bill. The Committee had heard a great deal lately about law and order; in fact, that had got to be used as a slangy phrase. There was a great deal that was unlawful and disorderly committed in the name of law and order; and if the people of England, and this House of Commons, only knew how Acts of this description were used in Ireland, he believed there would be far less welcome for measures of Coercion in this Assembly, and that English Governments would not be so ready to demand them. Unless some better reason were given against the Amendment, he trusted that the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) would press it to a division.

MR. DAWSON said, there was another reason why the Government opposed this Amendment, and it was because they were afraid of having the failure of this clause exhibited. Under the clause as it stood they would publish the fact that, say, 500 searches had been made, and would leave the people of England to believe that the police had been zealous and active, and that they were effectually dealing with illegal practices; whereas, if the results of these searches were made known, it might be seen by everybody that 499 out of the 500 searches were vexatious and unnecessary. He was surprised to find such a reasonable Amendment as this refused, and if the Government persisted in their refusal he could only look upon it as for the reason that these searches would be carried out in a manner distasteful to the spirit of the House of Commons and the English nation. If that was not the reason, it must be because they were afraid of piling up hundred of cases of failure.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, that, as he understood the Amendment, its object was simply to provide that cases of search occurring under this clause should be reported to the House of Commons. Well, he could scarcely conceive a more reasonable request than that, and if it was refused it seemed to him that the desire of the Government was that the acts which took place in Ireland under this section should be kept secret. Nothing more abhorrent to the English people, or more unfair to the Irish people, he could not conceive; and he wished to say that if the Government refused such Amendments—such reasonable Amendments as this—against which a Representative of the Government had given a reason that was absolutely worthless and would not hold water for a moment—they would be responsible for the delay which would take place in passing the Bill through the House. Let English Members put themselves in the position of Irish Members opposite. Supposing it was proposed to put such clauses as these in force against Englishmen, Members on those Benches (the Ministerial Benches below the Gangway), at any rate, would resist the proposal most strenuously. There was nothing but the commonest English fairness in the demand that those who were to be subject to the provisions of this Act should, by some means or other, have their cases shown to the public and the English people. If these Returns were allowed and it were shown that people whose houses had been searched had suffered deservedly, well and good; but if cases were shown where the powers of the Act had been misused under the arbitrary action of the police, where but in that House were they likely to have such abuses rectified? He did hope that the Government, who were followed by Members below the Gangway on their own side like a flock of sheep in the carrying out of these miserable clauses, would—always with the permission of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), who seemed to be master of the situation, and the consistency of whose principles he admired, whilst he condemned the inconsistency of the principles of right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Ministerial Bench—yield to this very reasonable proposition, and not ask their followers to wade further into the mire of restrictive legislation. Do not let them punish persons who were innocent, and, by preventing publicity, prevent the application of a cure to any further possible abuse of the Act.

[Sixteenth Night.]

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, the hon. Gentleman seemed to suppose that it was not possible, by means of Questions or Motions in that House, to have any and every grievance thoroughly ventilated. He would ask the Committee, from their experience of the Notice Paper from the first day of the Session down to the present time, to say whether there had been a single matter in the most remote part of Ireland, and concerning the most obscure person in the country, which, if it implied personal grievance, had not been brought before the House, and information demanded, and that demand responded to in every single instance? He was only appealing to the experience of the House. Whenever an answer on one of these personal matters had not appeared satisfactory to hon. Members, had it not led to debate in which every single case alleged against the Government had been gone into? To say that because this information was not given in the method suggested, that therefore the course of the Government was to be secret, seemed to him to be begging the question. Every Member who spoke from the Bench from which he was now speaking spoke under official responsibility, and official publicity was given to every statement he made. To say, therefore, that every case of grievance would not be investigated was hardly consistent with the fact.

MR. DILLON said, he had failed to gather from the right hon. and learned Gentleman's observations what was the nature of his objection to this Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): You were not in the House when I stated them.

MR. DILLON said, it did not appear to him to be a reasonable objection to say that it would make a man who might be guilty of crime, but on whose premises none of the articles mentioned in the clause were, on search, discovered, appear an innocent person if Returns were to be furnished. The right hon. and learned Gentleman told them they were in a position to ask Questions, and that they could obtain all the redress that was necessary for aggrieved individuals by interrogating Ministers, and insisting upon having full information. Well, he admitted that Questions had been put in that House with regard to a great many individuals; but, as a rule, no information had been elicited, or, at any rate, no satisfactory information. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had gone on further to say that in every instance where they received no information a debate ensued. Did the right hon. and learned Gentleman desire to see that system more generally practised? How would the House like it, supposing at Question time, in consequence of insufficient or unsatisfactory information being elicited from the Government, five or six Motions for the adjournment of the House were made? What would the House think of it, supposing there was a Motion for Adjournment every time an Irish Member received the curt reply to a Question—the stereotyped reply—"It is the Lord Lieutenant's pleasure," with no other reason being given? No; the Government would not give these Returns, because they knew that if they were published to the House this infamous Search Clause would be condemned for ever in the eyes of the English people. The Government knew perfectly well that if now the Irish Members could only rake up the way these Search Clauses had worked in Ireland for years past, that House, even as at present constituted, would refuse to pass these provisions into law. They would see the futility of such powers—they would see that crimes had never been prevented—they would see that, while these powers had been used to harass and humiliate the people, no “Moonlighter” or any other criminal had been arrested under them. If the Irish Members could carry this Amendment, it would put them in possession of proof that this clause was not the weapon which it was represented to be by the Government, but that it was futile for the suppression of outrage, and a most fertile means for creating exasperation and rage in the minds of the Irish people. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had spoken of this clause as though it were a mere matter of course. He had said that a clause of this kind had been in force in Ireland almost continually since 1848. Well, he (Mr. Dillon) regretted to say that was so, and that was one of the reasons why the Irish peasantry detested English law, and why no British Government could ever get them to obey it. The right hon. and learned Gentleman spoke of this clause as though it were one that the Irish Members could not reasonably object to. They were not to object to a clause which allowed a rough and probably a bad policeman—and when he said that he did not speak of any of the men individually, because some of them he knew and respected, but there could be no doubt that large numbers of them were exceedingly rough and exceedingly bad men—to enter the home of any poor Irish peasant as it pleased him. They must remember that the houses of the poor in Ireland were of the humblest, often composed of a single room; and that fact ought to make it more sacred than the home of the rich man. Were they not to object to a clause which left the home of every peasant in Ireland open to be insulted by the police, who were often envenomed against these poor people, for reasons which he would not enter into? Were the Irish Members to be told that a law which would enable a policeman to go out in the night, break in the door of any poor peasant, take the inmates out of bed, and make the most outrageous searches, was not an extreme law? Surely that was a monstrous proposition. The Irish Members wished to be furnished with an assurance that evidence of these cases of search would be laid before the House—evidence that they hoped would influence the future action of Parliament when a proposition should be laid before them for the repeal of this legislation—evidence which would show whether this outrageous clause was justified by the success of its working, or proved—as the Irish Members believed it would—to be as great a failure as the Coercion Act of last year. If the Irish Members could prove next year there had been 500 or 600 searches and nothing found, would they not have a strong case for the repeal of this clause? That was what they believed would happen; and if the Government believed that that was going to be a powerful instrument to enable them to seize on the weapons of murder, and the books of secret societies, why did they not give Returns, in order that Parliament might know what was being done? If they used this clause effectually, they ought not to be ashamed to come forward in the House and defend its continuance. If, on the other hand, it turned out a failure, why should they refuse the Irish Members the evidence that would put them in a position to argue conclusively against its continuance?

MR. LABOUCHERE said, it was really a most remarkable thing that after the Prime Minister had told them how desirable it was that this Bill should pass speedily, the subordinates of the right hon. Gentleman hindered its passage by refusing the most reasonable requests of the Irish Members and those hon. Members on the Ministerial side who agreed with the Irish Members in their suggestions. It seemed to him that if this concession was made it would benefit rather than injure the Government. They had been told, reasonably enough, by the Home Secretary that it would be perfectly impossible to employ policemen in uniform to make these searches, but that detectives would be sent out for that purpose. If that were so, it seemed clear that all sorts of rumours and stories would get abroad that there had been many more searches than actually took place. In England an Englishman's house was his castle; but in Ireland that clearly was not the case. But it did seem to him reasonable that if a detective was to be allowed to knock at the doors of an Irishman's house, and to say, "I have a right of way here to see if you have any arms," and if that detective searched the house, and did not find arms or anything else that came under the clause, some official record should be kept of such a transaction. Surely the public had a right to know what houses were searched, and how the Executive in Ireland were carrying out the clause. He confessed he should like to hear the opinion of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant on this matter. He (Mr. Labouchere) had listened with great respect to the observations which the right hon. Gentleman had so far had occasion to make with regard to this Bill—he considered those observations a great deal more practical than those which had fallen from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, who seemed to have adopted the policy of "no surrender." He should like to hear the opinion of the Chief Secretary with regard to this clause, and as to whether he did not think it was absolutely necessary, and even desirable, in the interests of the government of Ireland, that this concession should be made. If the right hon. Gentleman considered it necessary that this concession should be made, the business of the Home Secretary would be to accept the view of his Colleague and adopt the Amendment. The Committee would then pass this clause. Yesterday the Prime Minister made a handsome statement with respect to the clause, and ever since that it had been the object of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite to proceed with the section in a conciliatory spirit. They desired to meet conciliation by conciliation, and to give the Home Secretary his clause. But for an hour they had been engaged in endeavouring to get from the Home Secretary whether or not he endorsed the action of the Prime Minister. It was not until they had exhausted an hour that the Chief Secretary got up and told them that the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary did intend to carry out the pledges that had been given, and specified what those pledges were. He (Mr. Labouchere) did not think that anyone could, with justice, say for a moment that either today or yesterday the Irish Members had been open to the charge of Obstruction.

Mr. Labouchere

[“Oh, oh!”] Hon. Gentlemen said “Oh, oh!” but when a Bill, which it was admitted was intended to do away with the liberties of Ireland, and which was to last for three years, was brought into the House, it could not be expected to proceed with railroad speed. It was necessary that it should be exhaustively discussed. He was ready to admit that there had been exhaustive discussion, and he hoped there would still be exhaustive discussion; but he absolutely denied that there had been any Obstruction. He challenged any hon. Member to say to the contrary.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, he had not, so far, opened his mouth on this question, though it was one which interested everybody in the country; but he could sit silent no longer and hear Representatives of English constituencies tell them that they were taking away from Ireland personal liberty, instead of endeavouring, as the Government had told them, over and over again, they were trying to do, to stop assassination and outrage. He should like to know how any of those Gentlemen who represented Northampton, Durham, or Sunderland, would like it if they could never go away from their places of business, or from wherever they might be, or from whatever they might be doing, without the protection of the police—without some officer to guard them from being murdered or assaulted—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman's observations are general with regard to the clause, and I would point out to him the Question before the Committee is simply an Amendment as to Returns.

MR. DAWSON said, he had to point out that the last refuge of the right hon. and learned Gentleman in refusing this Amendment was really a very peculiar one. When asked to give his sanction to these Returns, so that hon. Members might have the whole action of the Government under this clause before them in a succinct manner, the right hon. and learned Gentleman said it was not necessary, that they could get all the information they wanted by putting Questions in the House. Well, he (Mr. Dawson) was sorry the Master of the Rules of the House was not present to hear that statement. Why, instead of having 60 Questions on the Notice Paper, as there were one day not very long ago, they would be having 120. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was determined not to agree to the Amendment. According to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, it was determined to leave the clause a powerful instrument for the detection of crime; but, as a matter of fact, the effect of the policy he was adopting would be to render it an efficient instrument for the creation of crime. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had had only very scanty experience of Ireland; and, so far, the Irish people had no very particular reason to be enamoured of his administration; but—

MR. WARTON: Order, order!

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not speaking to the question of Returns.

MR. DAWSON said, in view of the position he (Mr. Dawson) held as Lord Mayor of Dublin—representing, as he did, 200,000 people in the Irish Metropolis—he would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to deign to give them some information of the searches that were being made, so that the vast police machinery that existed in the country might not be the means of causing new outrages by the arbitrary and outrageous manner by which they carried out the powers entrusted to them.

MR. LEAMY said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would answer the question just put to him. Perhaps the reason they had received no answer, or the reason the Home Secretary did not take part in the discussion, was that he felt that on this clause, at least, he was unable to come forward. It was said that if this Amendment was accepted it would render the clause unworkable; but were they to understand that the Government and the Attorney General for Ireland desired that in every case where a man's house was searched, whether arms were found or not, that man was to be considered guilty? He would ask the Chief Secretary—who would be the person who would have the carrying out of this Act—to give them the information they required. They asked for some solid reason for the passing of this clause and the rejection of the Amendment. He did not care what the object of this Act might be in the mind of the Government. They said it was for the prevention of crime—they asked these extraordinary powers for that purpose; and was it, then, too much for the House, who gave them these powers, to ask that they should be told how those powers were being carried out? He knew very well that the Government would be ashamed to give them the information, and that they wanted to be able to work in the dark. Hon. Members from Ireland were told that they could put Questions on the Notice Paper. Yes; he knew they could—Questions that would elicit little or no information. How were they to find out how the clause was worked? They were told that they could make Motions. So they could; but they knew that Motions were of no value whatever in that House. What they desired was that hon. Members should be able to find out whether the powers of the Bill had been carried out vexatiously, or whether they had been carried out properly and successfully.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he heartily concurred with his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland in the course he had taken in this matter. With regard to this Amendment, there ought to be no doubt in the minds of the Committee. The Government were prepared to give the number of warrants, and to specify the districts; but they were not willing to give any further particulars. This clause was directed against political organizations. Crime was a secret thing that worked in an unexpected manner; and in some respects it ought to be met with its own weapons. The police were responsible to their superiors, and their superiors were responsible to the Executive Government, and the Executive Government would do their best to suppress this crime. On no other occasion in Ireland—or, so far as he was aware, in England—had details of such procedure been required, and one great reason for not assenting to the proposal consisted in the speeches of hon. Members. What were the speeches that had been delivered? The hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings) said there was nothing more abhorrent to the English people than this right of search, and the hon. Member spoke of this as a miserable clause. This was not the second reading of the Bill, or he should be disposed to say a few words as to his own view as to the opinions of the English and the Scotch people; but he might say, without the evidence of hon. Members opposite, that he should have been glad to argue that that feeling was as strong in those parts of Ireland which had returned Liberal Members. If this strong language was used with regard to a right of search, and hon. Members talked of inquisitorial police pulling women out of their beds, and then asked for the details of those searches to be laid before the House, that would leave on the minds of the police the idea that the House of Commons wished them to restrict their searches which were under a clause, which was, perhaps, no less important than any other provision in the Bill for detecting and putting down crime, against which this Bill was a declaration—and he believed a very effective declaration—of war.

[Sixteenth Night.]

Mr. SHEIL said, he did not see that when these Returns were made there would be no secrecy. All that was asked for was that the searches should be set out in the Return; they would be well known in the district, and, therefore, there would be no secrecy. He and his hon. Friends wished to have, in that form, the number of searches made, and the only argument against that proposal was that by the Attorney General for Ireland, and he was very much astonished to hear that the Chief Secretary cordially agreed with the right hon. and learned Gentleman. The argument of the Attorney General for Ireland was that these matters could always be raised by Motions and Questions; but the right hon. and learned Member ought to have remembered that before Parliament met in February next the right of raising such questions would be taken away by the Rules of Procedure.

Mr. MACFARLANE said, he could not understand why the Government resisted this proposal. The Return would be little more than a Criminal Return, such as was laid before Parliament from year to year; and he should have supposed that the Government, having asked for these extraordinary powers, would only have been too glad to present Returns which would justify this clause. The Government was in a very invidious position in asking for the clause, and he should have thought they would have desired to produce Returns which would show that their demand for this clause was justified. He had the utmost respect for the Chief Secretary, but he could not understand that right hon. Gentleman's contention, because its effect would be to leave the police absolutely free. The Return would only show that there had been so many thousands of domiciliary visits with such and such results; and, if the anticipations of the Government were correct, the Return would fully justify their demand; and upon that ground the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had suggested that there had been a waste of an hour because the Home Secretary refused to answer a plain question. The Chief Secretary, in consequence of that suggestion, had intervened somewhat early in this discussion and given his opinion; but that opinion was not fortified by a single argument. He had no desire that any criminal should escape from this or any other Act; but he had a strong desire that innocent people should escape unnecessary annoyance, and he appealed once more from the Chief Secretary to the Home Secretary.

Mr. GRAY said, the Chief Secretary seemed to thoroughly sympathize with the Home Secretary, and in that he had undergone a very material change since he had assumed his present Office, or else the anticipations of the Irish people, with reference to his advent to Office, were grievously wrong. The right hon. Gentleman said he was willing to give information as to the number of warrants; but did he really consider that such a Return would contain any information at all? What was the warrant which was to be issued? It was not to search a particular house; if it was, the number of such warrants would give some kind of information, but it was a general warrant for searching an entire district; and in that way one man might search one house, but another might search a great number of houses in the same district. The Return would give no information as to the manner in which the warrant had been used, or as to whether the powers of the Bill had been abused. The Irish Government were exceedingly ready, when it suited them, to lay voluminous Returns upon the Table; they presented large Blue Books, containing the fullest possible details of outrages or alleged outrages, even down to attempts to break windows or pull down walls. This they did not object to, nor did they object to the large totals of such cases which were to be used to the detriment of Ireland on the pretence that they were serious outrages; but when they were asked for information as to how exceptional powers under an exceptional Act had been used, they refused to give such information. The attitude of the Government in regard to this particular proposition made him more hopeless than ever with regard to any other portion of the Bill. They seemed to be determined to give no real consideration or concession to any arguments, no matter how well founded they might be. That was an extraordinary attitude for the Government to take up in regard to the only means by which the exercise of these extraordinary powers could be judged.

MR. SEXTON said, he had thought nothing could be more grotesque than the attitude of the Attorney General for Ireland, until he heard the speech of the Chief Secretary, whose argument appeared to resolve itself into this. One of the reasons why he could not accede to this Amendment was that speeches had been made in favour of it. A few nights ago the right hon. Gentleman gave as a reason for shortening the debates that when a Government had made up their minds it was no use talking, because they would maintain their position. That statement was intended to apply to Irish Members, and when he compared that speech with the right hon. Gentleman's speech to-day, he could only infer that the Chief Secretary desired to stifle debate upon this Bill. The Government would do whatever they had decided to do without hearing Irish Members. He referred to this matter for the purpose of protesting against that course, because the only inference he could draw from the right hon. Gentleman's speech was that he wished to stifle Irish Members by showing that it was no use for them to address the House. There was nothing more remarkable than the strong determination with which the Chief Secretary refused to give any facts in this case, although, on the night-arrests question, he voluntarily produced Returns to show that in 1870 a certain number of such arrests were made. On that occasion he (Mr. Sexton) had shown that the figures produced proved the opposite of the Chief Secretary's contention, and that of eight cases, seven were frivolous. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to have reconsidered the propriety of giving information; because, upon the clause relating to strangers, he forbore to give any information in regard to arrests; and now, on the Search Clause, although there were records in the Castle, he would not state whether this clause had been effective in past times. Why did he not refer to figures relating to any particular year to show how many searches the police made and how many were effective? If he had been able to show that this clause had been effective in the past, that would have been an argument for passing it now; but the inference, from his attitude, was that there was no evidence that this clause had been effective. What answer had the Attorney General for Ireland given to the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell)? He said, if records were made with regard to searches under which nothing was found, the men concerned would be held by the public to be innocent. If that was not importing a tone of low comedy into the serious Business of the House, he did not know what it was. If the police had a continual power of search, and could go as often as they liked and make searches, and never found any arms, would there be any presumptive evidence? There was a great difference between "not guilty" and "not proven;" and, although "not guilty" meant innocence, yet the Attorney General for Ireland said the Scotch "not proven" system was not equivalent to "not guilty." And, although the Attorney General for Ireland would not consent to give these Returns, he said hon. Members could ask Questions and make Motions. Irish Members were sick and weary of asking Questions—"Hear, hear!"—but if hon. Members thought that because they were weary of asking Questions they would cease to ask Questions, they were counting without their host, and making a great mistake. It was an intellectual comfort to ask Questions, even though no satisfactory answers were received. With regard to the Attorney General for Ireland, he should say that the utterances of a Sphinx were easier to understand than his answers. No doubt, hon. Members could make Motions; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman now opposed a general Motion, and the majority would follow him; so that to refer hon. Members to Motions was simply to refer them from one difficulty to another. The object of this Amendment was that Parliament should be able to take cognizance of the powers they granted; but the silence of the Home Secretary on the past effect of this clause convinced him that the object of refusing this Amendment was to put into the mind of every policeman a feeling of complete impunity—a feeling that he was safe from investigation and punishment, whatever he might do under the clause; and that whether or not he found arms, or ammunition, or documents, or instruments, yet, if he worked diligently and intruded into the houses of a great many people, and so created the feeling which the Government desired to create, he was quite free from investigation. If these Returns were granted the House would be able to see, first, whether any officer in Ireland exercised his power wantonly and without discretion, and then they would be able to see, by comparing the searches with the results, whether such an officer had acted on private pique, or anonymous letters, or without a due examination of the information given to him. The knowledge that this House would be able to criticize the action of such an officer would have a salutary effect. In the first place, by these Returns, Parliament would be able to do what it did with regard to every other Act. When the House passed an Act of Parliament the Government presented Returns from time to time, showing the operation of the Act, so that the House might judge whether the Act should be continued, repealed, or amended; but this Act was intended to be exercised in the dark, and it was intended to give complete impunity to the police; and, therefore, the Government did not wish any such information to be laid before the House. The House was entitled to know how many searches had been made, and to see whether the number had risen or fallen each year, and whether successful results had risen or fallen; and so to test whether the situation had become more acute or not. The Government were acting in this matter in a way which showed that they were making a dupe of the House of Commons.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member has no right to make imputations upon Members of the Government.

Mr. Sexton

MR. SEXTON said, he was not referring to individual Members of the Government, but to the Government as a whole; and he submitted that he was entitled to criticize the Government as a whole. By refusing to lay on the Table from year to year evidence of the manner in which this Act was worked they were treating the House with contempt.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he wished to know why the Government desired to keep the Committee in the dark with regard to this Act, as they evidently did wish. The Committee had a right to claim from the Government the fullest information upon every subject with which the Government had to deal, both at home and abroad. With regard to affairs in Egypt, the Government would give full information at the earliest possible moment to the House; and with regard to affairs in Africa, they were ready to give all the information they could, at the earliest possible time. Upon those matters, Blue Books and despatches were presented; but with regard to this most serious matter, as to the operation of this terrible Act in Ireland, the House was to be kept in the dark? He wished to know whether the House would submit to that. Did any hon. Member suppose that under this oppressive Act the most extreme and hurtful measures would not be resorted to against the people? Did anybody suppose the Act would be allowed to become a dead letter? Did not everyone know that the police would go to work, immediately the Queen's consent was given to the Act, to make raids upon the people, ravage their homes, and turn their places upside down? It might be very amusing to English Members that the homes of Irish peasants should be invaded morning, noon, and night, by the police, but it would not be amusing to the victims; and the feelings that would arise in their minds, through being subjected to such outrages, would, in one form or another, some day inevitably find expression. With regard to the Coercion Act, very minute Returns were laid before the House showing the names of the persons arrested, and other particulars, together, to some extent, with the reasons for the arrests. Why should not the same good example be adopted in this case? Why should not Returns be made giving the names of the persons whose houses were searched, and the results of the searches? Was that too much enlightenment to give to the House of Commons? Was it too much for the House of Commons to expect? Would the House be satisfied to leave all this work to be carried on in the dark? There was to be secrecy from first to last; there was to be impunity to the police to make searches and seizures, and to commit what might be in some cases outrages without any right of appeal against them, either for justice or compensation, for wrong and harm done to the people. That had been already decided. The police were to be free to make such raids as they chose, and do as much damage as they pleased to the people, and the people were to have no right of appeal against such treatment. Not only were the policemen to have their impunity, but the Executive in Ireland were not to be compelled to give any statement as to their conduct. What would happen under this state of things? If the Government wished to get up a rebellion in Ireland they were going the right way about it, by passing such measures as this under existing circumstances. Why should not light be let in on the conduct of the Government, so that the House of Commons, and England, and Europe, and America might see how they were dealing with the people of Ireland? If they were able to say that their acts would bear the light of day in Ireland, and that they were acting as a Government ought to act, why should they refuse this demand to present periodical Returns showing that they had done good under cover of this Act? It was said that Irish Members could challenge these results by Questions. He remembered that when the Coercion Bill of last year was being passed it was said they could challenge its operation upon the floor of the House, and he, being a young Member then, was foolish enough to suppose that meant something; but after further experience in the House, he found that it meant absolutely nothing, except that it was open to them to move a Vote of Want of Confidence in the Government. What was the value of a Question? The Question was placed on the Paper, and the Clerk at the Table revised it, and in many cases—he supposed quite properly—struck out what was supposed to be outside the Question. The Member might put his Question, but would receive a brief and curt answer from some Member of the Government, and upon that answer no discussion could be raised. So the matter ended, and that Irish Members were asked to consider as the means of challenging the action of the Government. When the Prime Minister was asked about this matter one evening, he said the Government were acting upon their responsibility, and hon. Members might bring them to account, if they chose, by moving a Vote of Want of Confidence; but that was a very safe challenge for the right hon. Gentleman to make. He urged the Committee to agree to this proposal, in order that they might know what was being done in regard to searching houses under this Act, and that they might know the names of the occupants of the houses and the results. What harm would accrue to the cause of good government in Ireland from having such information before the House? Would not every hon. Member feel himself better able to judge of the condition of Ireland if he had such Returns before him? And would not everyone be so much the wiser, and so much the more competent to judge of the right or the wrong action of the Government? It was undeniable that such information would be useful to Irish Members, and to Members on all sides of the House. Withholding such information was suspicious in the House, and dangerous in regard to Ireland. In every district in Ireland where searches were made the people would know very well what had been done. They would know where wrong had been committed—if wrong had been committed—and the feeling of exasperation resulting from that wrong would spread among the people, and the country would seeth with excitement. If wrong was done, and improper and cruel searches were made by the police, the knowledge of those searches would spread among the people, and the feeling created by those acts would be intensified by the fact that while such acts would be notorious in Ireland the House of Commons would be kept in ignorance of them. Was it desirable that the House should be kept in ignorance of the working of this Act? Such a course would be a serious mistake.

MR. MAC IVER said, he regarded this proposal as perfectly reasonable from any point of view. The House ought to be informed as to how little and how much the Government were likely to accomplish by this Act. He entirely distrusted Her Majesty's Government. The powers they asked for might be right and proper to place in the hands of an Executive which could be trusted; but to give this Government these powers was like placing firearms in the hands of children. The present Government had no policy.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must not speak in general terms of the Government, but only upon the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. MAC IVER said, he thought the Government ought to tell the House periodically what they were doing, because he believed that one day they might be too lax, and another day too severe. He really believed that Her Majesty's Government had no policy and could not be trusted; and for these reasons he cordially supported the Amendment.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he regretted some of the observations made by the Chief Secretary, because they seemed to be wanting in the Liberal spirit which would have enabled him to meet the case of the Irish Members. He had been eager to hear what the right hon. Gentleman's opinion was, because, hitherto, he had been unable to gather any reasonable excuse for the refusal by the Government to give the Returns asked for as to the searches for, and seizures of, arms; and the observations of the right hon. Gentleman had convinced him of the reasonableness of the demand. What did the Chief Secretary say? He said what ought to be done was to put down crime, and that criminals were to be met with their own weapons. He (Mr. Taylor) should have thought that the mode in which they ought to treat criminals, however much it might be tempered with severity, would, at least, be one of justice, impartiality, and great care, in order that the wrong persons should not be struck at. The right hon. Gentleman, however, said criminals would have to be struck at with their own weapons, and that meant brutally, carelessly, and indiscriminately. The right hon. Gentleman also said that if this provision was not given as it stood, the police would not feel that they had the Government behind them. The restriction proposed, however, he thought a most desirable one, because, in extraordinary circumstances, such as those existing in Ireland, the far greater part of the injury was done by brutal and ignorant subordinates; and it was necessary that anything done by those subordinates should be made known to the public. Therefore, he thought the present demand most reasonable.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 57; Noes 242: Majority 185.—(Div. List, No. 167.)

On Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill?"

MR. REDMOND said, he most earnestly objected to the clause. He had a full sense of the value of the concession made by the Prime Minister; but that concession did not sensibly diminish his objection to the principle of this clause. The concession made by the Home Secretary had been frankly accepted by his hon. Friends, and, so far as it went, they gave credit to the Government for making that concession; but it was preposterous to suppose that because a concession was made upon one part of the clause they were not to strive to amend the clause upon every other portion which they thought objectionable. Their objection to this clause was twofold. In the first place, they believed it was absolutely useless for the purposes for which it was intended, and upon that point they challenged the Government. This clause was similar to a power long possessed by the Government in Ireland; and before the Government could justify a claim for a renewal of that power they were bound to show that the power previously possessed had been efficient for the prevention of crime. Of that, however, they had had no actual demonstration; they had had no figures adduced to show that, in the past, this power had been of the slightest value in Ireland. Every man who desired to commit assassination would obtain the weapons for his fell purpose, no matter what powers the Government might obtain; and it was ridiculous to suppose that, by a clause of this kind, the Government would be able to disarm assassins in Ireland. Under the Arms Act of last year searches were extensively made in Ireland, and he did not know any portion of the coercive policy of the Government which had produced a worse effect in Ireland than the powers exercised under the Arms Act. Large bodies of police had gone over whole districts and searched every house within those districts, and yet there was no information to show that they had been able to lay their hands on any arms. The Home Secretary seemed to object to an Amendment that had recently been proposed for the purpose of having the names of men whose houses had been searched, together with the result of those searches, presented to Parliament, on the ground that if the names of such men were submitted to the House it might be held that because the searches had been made without any result, therefore the men were innocent. Surely, if a search was made and no arms were found, the man whose house was searched was innocent, at all events, of the suspicion which the police entertained. The police, in such a case, would have acted on the suspicion that the man possessed arms; but if no arms were found, surely it was right to regard such a man as innocent. Every safeguard of the right of search, which the Irish Members had endeavoured to get inserted in the clause, had been refused. He could see no more reasonable demand than was made by them in the recent Amendment. As the matter now stood, this clause might be used by the Government entirely in the dark; they might search houses all over the country, and the House of Commons was to be kept in absolute ignorance of the manner in which the searches were carried out and of the results which ensued. It was intolerable that police officers in Ireland were to be armed with power to make searches wherever and whenever they chose, and they were not to be called to account by the Representatives of the people in that House. No doubt the police would be accountable, as the Committee had been told, to the Executive Government, and the Executive Government were responsible to that House. But, as had been pointed out by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), what was the use of the Executive Government being responsible to that House when that House, could not have information in its possession as to how the Executive Government carried out its powers? He and his hon. Friends objected to this clause, firstly, because similar clauses in the past had proved to be inefficient, and because they were justified by the history of the past in prophesying that the clause would be absolutely useless. But they had a second objection to the clause, and it was to be found in the irritating influence which its existence must have on the minds of the peaceable people of Ireland. The Irish Members were reproached the other night for opposing this Bill, and for not making some suggestions as to how crime could be suppressed in Ireland. There were no men who desired more than they did that disturbance in Ireland should be put down; there were no men more anxious than they to see the Government take a course of action which would tend in that direction; but it was because they knew that the exercise of the arbitrary power contained in this clause was one of the very things which would tend to create the state of feeling which produced crime that they opposed the clause, and found it their duty to endeavour in every way to amend it. The whole effect of a coercive policy in Ireland had, generation after generation, been proved to be in the direction of crime. Crime and outrage in Ireland this time last year was not half as terrible as it was to-day. What was the reason? The country was in a comparatively peaceable condition before the Government exercised the power of search and other arbitrary powers which were entrusted to them under the Coercion Act; the Government insisted upon obtaining their Coercion Act last year; they insisted upon depriving the people of the restraining influence of the action of their leaders; and the result was seen in the condition of Ireland for the last few months. He was very deeply impressed with the uselessness of Irish Members speaking at all in the House of Commons. ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Gentlemen cheered that remark; but could hon. Gentlemen know what the effect of that cheer must be on the minds of the people of Ireland? He and his hon. Friends were sent by the people of Ireland to represent them, and to endeavour, according to their lights, to get justice done for Ireland in that House; and when hon. Members cheered him when he said it was useless for Irish Representatives to speak in the House of Commons, did hon. Members not know that the effect of that cheer must be to convince the Irish people of the truth of the statement that Irish Members had no influence here, that the people of Ireland were, so far as the decision on any Bill was concerned, practically unrepresented, and that Parliamentary representative government in respect to Ireland was nothing but a sham. The voices of Irish Representatives were unheeded; their endeavours to amend clauses like the present were voted down by English and Scotch Members; and when they expressed the belief that it was useless for them to advance their opinions in the House, they were met with the encouraging cheers of hon. Gentlemen representing English and Scotch constituencies. He warned the Government and their supporters that they were traversing the road at the end of which they would find anarchy, and murder, and assassination of a worse type than any they had yet met with. He was convinced that the operation of this clause would excite in the minds of the ignorant people of Ireland feelings more bitter towards England, and towards the Government of England which ruled their land, and over which they had no influence, than any they had yet entertained. He would say, in conclusion, that if he were a man who desired to bring about interminable discord between England and Ireland, if he were a man who desired by desperate courses to prevent the possibility of ever bringing about conciliation between the people of the two countries, he would support the Government in this Bill; he would support them in endeavouring to get the powers they sought under this clause. It was because he was anxious for the peace of his country, it was because he was ashamed of the excesses into which the Government had been able to drive his fellow-countrymen, it was because he felt keenly the present condition of Ireland, that on this occasion he spoke strongly. The Government were taking the worst action they possibly could, and he felt it his duty to oppose this clause. He wished his voice could be effective; he wished there were some means whereby he could make his opinions felt by the English and Scotch Members who were supporting the Government. He despaired of making any impression upon those Members; he felt that the opinions and arguments of the Irish Members had no weight with them; he felt they were determined to follow, once again, the Government along the path of coercion, and he could only say that a day would come—and it was not very distant—when those Members would find that the course they were now pursuing would not result in occasional assassinations in Ireland, but would result in a state of public feeling in that country which would make government a thing quite impossible. Although he did not desire to see the independence of his country obtained in that way, still the result might be one which would not make him regret the mad and infatuated course which he believed the English Government were now adopting.

Mr. Mac Iver

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, the subject had been thrashed out during the prolonged discussions, and he had no wish to detain the Committee by any elaborate argument against the clause. He, however, wished, as an English Member, to record his protest against its irritating provisions. There was no clause in the Bill calculated to produce more bitter feelings against this country, and none less calculated to produce what the Government wished. English Members did not realize the effect of the operation of the clause. He was satisfied, if they only thought the matter over seriously, they would not support the clause in the manner they now did. The clause would be made the means of the greatest oppression by the police in the distant parts of the country, where there was no control over them; it would unquestionably be used vindictively and capriciously. He believed that persons acquainted with Ireland would admit there was no one thing the people protested against more determinedly and consistently in the coercive policy adopted towards their country than these powers of arbitrary interference in domestic arrangements by the police. A man could easily forgive an injury, and, if he was a generous man, he would soon forget it; but no man was ready either to forgive or forget an insult. And the police used the power that this clause conferred to insult worthy, well-meaning, inoffensive people. Like little Jacks-in-office, they strained their powers to magnify themselves and to punish those against whom they had, or supposed they had, a cause of grievance. The Irish peasantry, like every other class, had their faults; but they were the most virtuous people in the world; and it was an outrage upon their domestic life to have policemen breaking into their houses at midnight and subjecting their women and children to wanton indignities. The Prime Minister had made a concession on this clause. He recognized it fully; but he feared that when the concession came to be put into words it would be found that what the Irish Members meant and what the Prime Minister meant was somewhat different. But it was unnecessary to debate that now, as it would come up afterwards. While admitting the concession, he still resisted the clause, even with it. It did not strike at its worst features. The hon. Member for New Ross (Mr. Redmond) had complained of the blind manner in which English Liberals were supporting the Government on this Bill. He sorrowfully admitted the justice of the criticisms. It was to him, as an English Radical, a source of humiliation and astonishment to see professing Liberals trampling underfoot every semblance of the principles through which they had passed to power. But he knew it was useless remonstrating. They were hopelessly bound to the Government, and they would vote as they were told. They might as well sing Psalms to the parish pump as to apply arguments to the ruck of the Party that sat behind the Ministry. They had passed the region of reason and argument. They did not listen to what was said, and they did not take the trouble to understand either the Bill or the Amendments. They left the House nearly empty while the discussion was going on, and only crowded into the doors when the division bell was rung. The Whips told them whether they were "Ayes" or whether they were "Noes;" and, like a flock of sheep, they followed their Leaders either into one Lobby or into the other. It was a waste of time to try to convince them of the justice of the cause he was pleading; but, nevertheless, it was the duty of those who conscientiously believed that the Bill would make matters in Ireland worse instead of better, that it would promote crime instead of preventing it, to fight every section, and, if necessary, every line, to the last—to fight it honourably according to the Rules of the House and the regulations of gentlemanly debate; and to do that he, for one, was determined, come what might.

Mr. Redmond

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 259; Noes 45: Majority 214.

AYES.

Acland, C. T. D.
Acland, Sir T. D.
Alexander, Colonel
Allen, H. G.
Allsopp, C.
Anderson, G.
Armitage, B.
Aylmer, J. E. F.
Bailey, Sir J. R.
Balfour, J. B.
Baring, T. C.
Baring, Viscount
Barnes, A.
Barran, J.
Barttelot, Sir W. B.
Bass, Sir A.
Bass, H.
Baxter, rt. hon. W. E.
Biddulph, M.
Blackburne, Col. J. I.
Bolton, J. O.
Borlase, W. C.
Bourke, rt. hon. R.
Brand, H. R.
Brassey, H. A.
Brassey, Sir T.
Bright, rt. hon. J.
Brinton, J.
Broadhurst, H.
Broadley, W. H. H.
Brodrick, hon. W. St. J. F.
Brooks, W. C.
Brown, A. H.
Bruce, Sir H. H.
Buchanan, T. R.
Caine, W. S.
Cameron, D.
Campbell, J. A.
Campbell, Lord C.
Campbell, Sir G.
Campbell, R. F. F.
Campbell-Bannerman, H.
Carington, hon. Col. W. H. P.
Cartwright, W. C.
Causton, R. K.
Cecil, Lord E. H. B. G.
Chamberlain, rt. hn. J.
Cheetham, J. F.
Childers, rt. hn. H. C. E.
Clarke, J. C.
Clifford, C. C.
Clive, Col. hon. G. W.
Close, M. C.
Coddington, W.
Colebrooke, Sir T. E.
Collins, T.
Compton, F.
Coope, O. E.
Corbett, J.
Cotes, C. O.
Courtauld, G.
Courtney, L. H.
Crichton, Viscount
Cropper, J.
Dalrymple, C.
Davenport, H. T.
Davenport, W. B.
Davies, R.
De Ferrieres, Baron
Dilke, Sir C. W.
Dixon-Hartland, F. D.
Dodds, J.
Dodson, rt. hon. J. G.
Douglas, A. Akers-Duckham, T.
Duff, R. W.
Ebrington, Viscount
Egerton, Adm. hon. F.
Elliot, hon. A. R. D.
Elliot, G. W.
Emlyn, Viscount
Evans, T. W.
Ewart, W.
Ewing, A. O.
Fawcett, rt. hon. H.
Ffolkes, Sir W. H. B.
Filmer, Sir E.
Finch, G. H.
Fitzwilliam, hn. H. W.
Foljambe, C. G. S.
Forster, rt. hon. W. E.
Foster, W. H.
Fowler, R. N.
Fry, L.
Fry, T.
Garnier, J. C.
Gibson, rt. hon. E.
Gladstone, rt. hn. W. E.
Gladstone, H. J.
Gladstone, W. H.
Glyn, hon. S. C.
Goldney, Sir G.
Gordon, Sir A.
Gore-Langton, W. S.
Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.
Gower, hon. E. F. L.
Grant, A.
Greene, E.
Gregory, G. B.
Grey, A. H. G.
Halsey, T. F.
Hamilton, right hon. Lord G.
Hamilton, J. G. C.
Harcourt, rt. hon. Sir W. G. V. V.
Hastings, G. W.
Hayter, Sir A. D.
Henderson, F.
Heneage, E.
Herbert, hon. S.
Herschell, Sir F.
Hibbert, J. T.

[Sixteenth Night.]

Hill, T. R.
Holden, I.
Holland, Sir H. T.
Holland, S.
Holms, J.
Hope, rt. hn. A. J. B. B.
Howard, E. S.
Illingworth, A.
James, C.
James, Sir H.
Jardine, R.
Jenkins, Sir J. J.
Jerningham, H. E. H.
Johnson, rt. hon. W. M.
Kennard, Col. E. H.
Kennaway, Sir J. H.
Kingscote, Col. R. N. F.
Kinnear, J.
Knightley, Sir R.
Laing, S.
Lawrence, Sir J. C.
Lawrence, W.
Lea, T.
Leake, R.
Leatham, E. A.
Leatham, W. H.
Lechmere, Sir E. A. H.
Lefevre, rt. hn. G. J. S.
Leigh, R.
Levet, T. J.
Lloyd, M.
Loder, R.
Lubbock, Sir J.
Lusk, Sir A.
M'Arthur, A.
M'Clure, Sir T.
M'Garrel-Hogg, Sir J.
Mackintosh, C. F.
MacLiver, P. S.
Makins, Colonel W. T.
Mappin, F. T.
Maskelyne, M. H. Story-
Mason, H.
Master, T. W. C.
Matheson, Sir A.
Maxwell-Heron, J.
Mellor, J. W.
Milbank, Sir F. A.
Miles, Sir P. J. W.
Mills, Sir C. H.
Monk, C. J.
Moreton, Lord
Morgan, hon. F.
Morgan, rt. hn. G. O.
Morley, A.
Mowbray, rt. hon. Sir
J. R.
Mundella, rt. hon. A. J.
Muntz, P. H.
Nicholson, W.
Noel, E.
Noel, rt. hon. G. J.
Northcote, rt. hn. Sir
S. H.
O'Donoghue, The
Onslow, D.
Paget, T. T.
Palmer, J. H.
Parker, C. S.
Patrick, R. W. Cochran-
Pease, Sir J. W.
Peddle, J. D.

Peel, A. W.
Percy, Lord A.
Phillips, R. N.
Plunket, rt. hon. D. R.
Porter, A. M.
Portman, hn. W. H. B.
Potter, T. B.
Powell, W. R. H.
Price, Captain G. E.
Pugh, L. P.
Pulley, J.
Ralli, P.
Ramsay, J.
Ramden, Sir J.
Rankin, J.
Rathbone, W.
Rendel, S.
Rendlesham, Lord
Repton, G. W.
Richard, H.
Richardson, T.
Ridley, Sir M. W.
Roberts, J.
Robertson, H.
Rogers, J. E. T.
Ross, A. H.
Roundell, C. S.
Russell, G. W. E.
Russell, Lord A.
Rylands, P.
St. Aubyn, W. M.
Salt, T.
Samuelson, H.
Schreiber, C.
Scott, M. D.
Seely, C. (Lincoln)
Severne, J. E.
Shield, H.
Simon, Serjeant J.
Stanley, rt. hn. Col. F.
Stanley, E. J.
Summers, W.
Tavistock, Marquess of
Taylor, rt. hn. Col. T. E.
Tennant, C.
Thornhill, T.
Tillett, J. H.
Tollemache, hon. W. F.
Torrens, W. T. M. C.
Trevelyan, rt. hn. G. O.
Villiers, rt. hon. C. P.
Vivian, A. P.
Vivian, Sir H. H.
Warton, C. N.
Watkin, Sir E. W.
Waugh, E.
Wedderburn, Sir D.
Whitley, E.
Wiggin, H.
Williams, S. C. E.
Williamson, S.
Wills, W. H.
Wilmot, Sir J. E.
Wilson, I.
Wilson, Sir M.
Wodehouse, E. R.
Wolf, Sir H. D.
Wroughton, P.

TELLERS.

Grosvenor, Lord R.
Kensington, Lord

NOES.

Biggar, J. G.
Blake, J. A.
Byrne, G. M.
Callan, P.
Collings, J.
Commings, A.
Corbet, W. J.
Cowen, J.
Dawson, C.
Dillon, J.
Errington, G.
Findlater, W.
Gill, H. J.
Gray, E. D.
Healy, T. M.
Labouchere, H.
Lalor, R.
Lawson, Sir W.
Leamy, E.
M'Carthy, J.
M'Coan, J. O.
Macfarlane, D. H.
Martin, P.
Marum, E. M.
Metge, R. H.

Molloy, B. C.
Nolan, Colonel J. P.
O'Brien, Sir P.
O'Connor, A.
O'Connor, T. P.
O'Donnell, F. H.
O'Gorman Mahon, Col.
The O'Kelly, J.
O'Shea, W. H.
O'Sullivan, W. H.
Parnell, C. S.
Sexton, T.
Sheil, E.
Slagg, J.
Smithwick, J. F.
Storey, S.
Sullivan, T. D.
Synan, E. J.
Taylor, P. A.
Thompson, T. C.

TELLERS.

Power, R.
Redmond, J. E.

Clause 12 (Application of Alien Act to aliens in Ireland).

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 35, after the word "realm," to insert the words "and which said Act is set out in Schedule 2 hereto."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. HEALY said, the object of the next Amendment, which stood in his name, was to limit the operation of the Act from three years to one year. It was only fair that when the Committee were asked to consent to the revival of so old and rusty a weapon of coercion they should have some opportunity how it would be applied before they sanctioned its use for so long a period as three years. If at the end of a year the Government found it was necessary that they should still have the power to cause the expulsion of foreigners from the country, it would be the simplest thing in the world to include the Alien Act in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill. The Government were well aware that the Alien Act was passed at a time of great public commotion. It was passed not in the partial manner proposed in this clause, but it was applied in 1848 to England as well as to Ireland. After the Home Secretary had made his speech on the second reading of the Bill, he (Mr. Healy) stated that he would not have any very strong objection to the revival of the Alien Act, provided the renewal were extended to England as well as to Ireland; and if the Government would now consent to extend the operation of the Alien Act to England as well as to Ireland he would withdraw his Amendment. In London, under the very nose of the Home Secretary, Socialistic and Nihilistic secret societies existed; but, instead of taking any notice of them, the right hon. and learned Gentleman crossed over to Ireland, where there was no evidence at all of the incursion of these objectionable foreigners, to put the Alien Act in operation, leaving England completely out in the cold. No harm could possibly be done by the application of the Alien Act to England as well as to Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] He was very glad to find the opinion of the Committee so strongly favourable to such a proposition. He did not know whether it would be in Order to propose an Amendment with that object—perhaps some English Member would take the task in hand, if such Amendment were within the scope of the Bill. Upon the statement of the Government that they were willing to extend this clause to England as well as to Ireland the Committee might fairly get rid of this discussion.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 36, to leave out from the word "for," to the word "Act," in line 37, and insert the words "one year."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'the same period as this Act' stand part of the Clause."

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, he did not rise to speak on this Amendment, but simply to inform the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Healy) that an Amendment providing for the extension of the Alien Act to England was the next in order, and would be moved by him (Mr. Morgan Lloyd) in due course.

MR. DILLON said, this clause proposed to re-enact an exceedingly odious Statute which was passed in 1848. Now, the Alien Act consisted of eight clauses, some of which were very long. When the Government complained of the Irish Members discussing this Bill at considerable length, they seemed to forget that some of the clauses of this Bill were, in fact, Acts in themselves, and Acts of a very stringent character. The first point to which he wished to direct attention was that the Alien Act, which was a measure thoroughly odious to the Members of the then English Government, and opposed to the general traditions of the English people, was passed at a time when a large number of people in Ireland—

MR. HENEAGE rose to Order. Had the hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Dillon's) remarks any bearing upon the Amendment, which had reference to the length of time during which the clause was to operate?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) is aware that he cannot discuss the whole clause upon an Amendment; but I think he was only making a reference.

MR. DILLON said, if the hon. Member (Mr. Heneage) had been a little more patient he would have seen he (Mr. Dillon) was strictly in Order. When he was interrupted by the hon. Gentleman, he was proceeding to point out that the Act, which they were now asked to re-enact for the space of three years, was proposed in 1848, under circumstances of even greater public danger than Parliament was now confronted by. In 1848, when an attempt had been made to levy war in Ireland against Her Majesty, when it was notoriously known, and made public, that a large association of men in America had collected a large sum of money, with the avowed purpose of equipping an expedition and sending troops to invade Ireland, and when agents were being sent from revolutionary societies abroad to assist the insurgents at home, the Alien Act, designed to meet that extraordinary state of things, was passed for one year. Now, when there was no evidence laid before the Committee of any attempt to levy war against Her Majesty, when there was no attempt to equip a force to invade Ireland, when there was no talk of rebellion, and no fear of it, except in the minds of a few alarmists, they were asked to re-enact the Alien Act for three years. The Government were bound to show their reasons for such a proposal before they could expect the opposition to the clause to be withdrawn. He must, of course, submit to the Chairman's ruling; but he must confess he was somewhat surprised to hear the Chairman state that he was not entitled, on the question of the re-enactment of the Alien Act, to allude to the provisions of that Act. He heard the statement with surprise, because it seemed to him that, in considering whether the Alien Act should be renewed for one year or for three years, it was right and proper they should consider what the provisions of that Act were. One of the strong objections he had to the clause was that it would practically make Ireland similar to a Continental country when, some years ago, no man could enter or leave a country on the Continent without a passport. This clause would operate against travellers; and, therefore, it was important to consider whether so stringent a measure should be passed for so long a time as three years. There was another consideration which might influence the Committee in deciding whether they were going to put Ireland under the provisions of the Alien Act for three years, and that was the extraordinary way in which the Lord Lieutenant was called upon to act under the clause. If the Lord Lieutenant should have reason to believe, from information given to him in writing by any person subscribing his or her name, that for the preservation of the peace and tranquillity of the country it was expedient certain aliens should be removed, he could order their removal. Such an arrangement reminded him of that which was in force in Venice some time ago, for there a man had only to subscribe his name to a strip of paper, on which it was shown that a certain person was dangerous to the public safety, and thereupon that certain person was deported. So, in the case of Ireland, an individual had only to write to the Lord Lieutenant, stating that he believed so-and-so was an alien dangerous to the public safety, and upon such insufficient grounds the Lord Lieutenant could put the Alien Act in operation. The Lord Lieutenant could require a man to leave the country within a limited time; but there was no statement in the Act as to what that limit of time might be. An alien might be required to leave the country within 24 hours; and if he did not do so, he was to be held guilty of a misdemeanour and subject to one month's imprisonment for the first offence, and 12 months' imprisonment for the second and subsequent offences. The Alien Act was an exceedingly odious and stringent Statute, and the Government were bound to inform the Committee on what ground they asked its re-enactment for three years, remembering as they must that when, in 1848, there was actually an attempted rising in Ireland, the Government of the day only asked that it should be enacted for one year.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he differed from the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dillon), because he considered that this enactment would be of no use at all unless it was to operate for three years. Last year, on the third reading of the Protection of Person and Property Bill, he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) ventured to make the remark that if any American citizens were arrested under the Act, no doubt the United States would insist upon a public trial; and he then appealed to the Government to introduce with respect to foreigners an Act like the Alien Act. He conceived that Foreign Governments would allow their subjects to be dealt with by the Common Law, but that they would not let them be dealt with by any law which mixed up the Executive with the administration of justice. Under the Protection Act, the Executive were mixed up to a certain extent with the administration of justice, inasmuch as the Lord Lieutenant might decide by what kind of tribunal the accused person was to be tried. What he wished to show was this—that the Government had considerable difficulty lately—at least so he understood—as to the American subjects who had been imprisoned under the Coercion Bill, and who had declined to be liberated on the condition that they should leave the country. Now, under the circumstances, and under the great public emergency of the time being, he conceived the Coercion Acts, though they might be harsh, were absolutely necessary to maintain the peace of Ireland; and he could not conceive, by any process of reasoning, how the Alien Act could be re-enacted for a shorter period than was now proposed in the Bill under discussion. He therefore trusted the Government would be firm on this subject, because the clause was one which was likely to protect them from very disagreeable misunderstandings, both with the United States and other countries. Later, when the time came, he should be prepared to support the proposal that the provisions of the Alien Act be extended to this country. As the case now stood, he must differ with the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon), because the provision would be utterly useless unless it were made co-existent with the duration of the Bill.

Mr. Dillon

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he hoped they might now decide this point, whether it was necessary that the provision with respect to aliens should be co-extensive with the other provisions of the Bill. No doubt, this clause was a very unusual one; but the Government believed that a great part, he might almost say the greater part, of the mischief done in Ireland was due to foreign agencies. It was as desirable that these foreign agencies should be dealt with during the period the Government thought it right to recommend that this Act should remain in force, as that any of the other provisions of the Act should be proposed. The hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) had said that, in 1848, the Alien Act was passed for one year. That was true; but at that time an Act of Parliament did not take a whole Session to pass. At that time the House of Commons were in the habit of dealing reasonably with the questions brought before them; but now a time had been reached when the arts—he would not say of Obstruction, he would rather use some less obnoxious term—when the arts of procrastination had been carried to such a point, that if it were desired to renew an Act, it must be reckoned that the renewal would occupy the whole Session of Parliament. That seemed a conclusive reason for extending the operation of the Alien Act to three years.

MR. SEXTON said, the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary was interesting, for it had brought a new term—namely, “procrastination”—within the region of political phraseology. A few days ago the right hon. and learned Gentleman professed great admiration for Earl Grey, who, speaking of coercive powers, had said that the Representatives of the people ought to have the earliest opportunity of revising and considering the exercise of such extreme powers. The Government of the Whig statesman whom the right hon. and learned Gentleman so much admired laid down the cardinal principle that, with reference to restrictions of individual liberty, the Representatives of the people assembled in the House of Commons should have the earliest possible opportunity of re-examining the whole subject, and of considering whether the extreme powers in the Executive had been wisely used. Would the Committee observe that this clause differed fundamentally from many of the other proposals in the Bill? Because, whereas many of the other proposals were for the enactment of powers which were, unfortunately, too familiar to the Irish people, this clause was proposed in order to revive an enactment which was never resorted to except on one occasion, and that an occasion of extraordinary danger. The Alien Act was passed in 1848. Many parts of Ireland were then in a state of practical insurrection, and the Executive were confronted by an armed rebellion—the movement then was political and not social. Notwithstanding the extreme gravity of the occasion, the Government of the day simply proposed that the Act authorizing the removal of aliens should remain in force for one year, and to the end of the then Session of Parliament. That was following the maxim of Earl Grey; it was following the maxim which had governed English statesmen from all time. What was the proposal now before the Committee? Why, that Parliament, when it had once placed these extraordinary powers in the hands of the Executive, should not be able to say a word on the subject for three years to come. At this moment three distinct functions were possessed by the Government—namely, Executive, Legislative, and Judicial; and, surely, if it was only necessary to enact the Alien Act for one year in the presence of an open rebellion, why was it necessary to re-enact it now for three years, when the movement against which the Act was aimed was but a social one? He could not conclude his remarks without referring to the suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), that because there was a law about to be passed against aliens in Ireland, it would be well to extend the law to England. He (Mr. Sexton) was not of that opinion. Two wrongs could never make one right. It was a pity that aliens in Ireland should, because of the unfortunate dispositions of the English Government towards that country, be driven away; but he could never put that forward as a reason why aliens—peaceable and industrious men—in other countries should be subjected to the same treatment. He should, upon the broad principles of liberty, protest against the application of this clause to England, though it might be applied to Ireland.

MR. DAWSON said, that an Industrial Exhibition was now being got up in Ireland. That Exhibition had been "Boycotted" in the most severe manner by the landlord class; and the deliberative effect of this clause would be to chase from Ireland, on mere information given to the Lord Lieutenant, anyone who sympathized with the present industrial movement. He had no hesitation in saying that one of the objects of the clause was to stop the Industrial Exhibition, on which the Irish people set such store; that this Act was one to stop the industries and enterprise of Ireland he was convinced. In the name of the industrial classes he must enter his protest against this clause and against this Bill. From an Imperial point of view this was a dangerous clause. He hoped that the aliens who were in Ireland would remain there, and he hoped that strangers would come from foreign countries to Ireland to support the people in their industrial enterprise, which many people calling themselves Irish had refused to support. It would, indeed, be a perilous thing if the Government attempted the deportation of any such strangers.

DR. COMMINS said, this clause proposed an experiment of a very dangerous kind. He would like to know how many Members opposite who blindly followed the Government had gone to the trouble of reading the Alien Act? He ventured to say, if a Return were laid on the Table of the House, it would be found that not five hon. Gentlemen had ever read that Act. Of course, it was not necessary that hon. Gentlemen should be acquainted with every expired Act; but surely it was requisite they should know something of an Act it was proposed to re-enact by a sort of side-wind, as in this instance. He would not say anything as to the extraordinary manner in which the Act could be put into operation by the Lord Lieutenant; but he would say that he doubted whether, in the present state of affairs, it was desirable, from an Imperial point of view, to open the door for further complications with foreign countries. If Parliament re-enacted this Act, it was just possible that America and France and other countries might take it into their heads to pass an Alien Act in order to expel from their countries any English residents they might consider troublesome. The arrest of three or four aliens in Ireland under the Coercion Act of last year had led to complications, the gravity of which they, in the House of Commons, had no conception. There was no doubt that complications of a very serious character arose between the Government of Her Majesty and the Government of Washington in consequence of the arrest of American citizens; and it was very probable that if the powers of this clause were exercised in regard to Americans, the complications under the Act of last year might be mere trifles in comparison with the complications which might arise hereafter.

It being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to report Progress; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

MOTION.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES AND ALLOTMENTS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. VILLIERS STUART, Bill to amend and extend the provisions of "The Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881," relating to Labourers' Cottages and Allotments, ordered to be brought in by Mr. VILLIERS STUART, Sir PATRICK O'BRIEN, Sir HERVEY BRUCE, Colonel COLHURST, Mr. BLAKE, and Mr. O'SULLIVAN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 212.]

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

[INDEX.]

INDEX

TO

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

VOLUME CCLXX.

FIFTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1882.

EXPLANATION OF THE ABBREVIATIONS.

In Bills, Read 1^o, 2^o, 3^o, or 1^a, 2^a, 3^a, Read the First, Second, or Third Time.—In Speeches, 1R., 2R., 3R., Speech delivered on the First, Second, or Third Reading.—Amendt., Amendment.—Res., Resolution.—Comm., Committee.—Re-Comm., Re-Committal.—Rep., Report.—Consid., Consideration.—Adj., Adjournment or Adjourned.—cl., Clause.—add. cl., Additional Clause.—neg., Negated.—M. Q., Main Question.—O. Q., Original Question.—O. M., Original Motion.—P. Q., Previous Question.—R. P., Report Progress.—A., Ayes.—N., Noes.—M., Majority.—1st. Div., 2nd. Div., First or Second Division.—L., Lords.—C., Commons.

When in this Index a * is added to the Reading of a Bill, it indicates that no Debate took place upon that stage of the measure.

When in the Text or in the Index a Speech is marked thus *, it indicates that the Speech is reprinted from a Pamphlet or some authorized Report.

When in the Index a † is prefixed to a Name or an Office (the Member having accepted or vacated office during the Session) and to Subjects of Debate thereunder, it indicates that the Speeches on those Subjects were delivered in the speaker's private or official character, as the case may be.

Some subjects of debate have been classified under the following "General Headings:"—
ARMY—NAVY—INDIA—IRELAND—SCOTLAND—PARLIAMENT—POOR LAW—POST OFFICE—METROPOLIS—CHURCH OF ENGLAND—EDUCATION—CRIMINAL LAW—LAW AND JUSTICE—TAXATION, under WAYS AND MEANS.

A BERDARE, Lord

Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, 1881—Release of Mr. Parnell and others confined under the Act, Motion for Papers, 41

Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway (Extensions and Dock), Motion for Resoln. 11

Adulteration of Foods and Drugs Acts—Lard Cheese

Questions, Mr. R. H. Paget, Mr. Wilbraham Egerton; Answers, Mr. Chamberlain June 12, 826; Question, Mr. Wilbraham Egerton; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain June 15, 1275

Africa (East Coast)—Suppression of the Slave Trade

Question, Mr. Gourley; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman June 5, 73

Africa (South)

Cetewayo, Ex-King of Zululand—Restrictions as to Correspondence, Questions, Mr. Dillwyn, Mr. R. N. Fowler; Answers, Mr. Evelyn Ashley June 9, 655;—Letter from the Transvaal Government urging his Restoration, Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answer, Mr. Evelyn Ashley June 12, 824;—John Dunn and the Zulu Chiefs, Question, Mr. Richard; Answer, Mr. Evelyn Ashley June 15, 1237
The Transvaal—Attacks by the Boers on Native Tribes, Question, Mr. Gorst; Answer, Mr. Evelyn Ashley June 5, 71
Zululand—John Dunn's Territory, Questions, Mr. Richard, Mr. Gorst; Answers, Mr. Evelyn Ashley June 8, 474

ALEXANDER, Colonel C., Ayrshire, S.

Army—Appointments in the Royal Engineers, 56
 Police, Leave, 620
 Settled Land, Comm. 355

Allotments Bill

(Mr. Jesse Collings,

Mr. Burt, Mr. Brand, Mr. Bryce)c. Committee—n.s. June 7 [Bill 90]Ancient Monuments Bill

(Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Mr. Courtney)

c. Ordered; read 1^o * June 15 [Bill 207]ANDERSON, Mr. G., Glasgow

Army—Instruction in Military Tactics, 1603

Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill—Irish Church Fund, 1264

Customs Re-organization—Outdoor Clerks, 1235

Malta, Affairs of, Notice of Motion, 665

Regent's Canal, City, and Docks Railway, 3R. 644

Scotland—Local Taxation and Expenditure, 843

Arklow Harbour Bill

(The Lord Thurlow)

l. Read 2^o * June 6 (No. 98)

Report * June 8

Committee*; Report June 9

Read 3^o * June 12

Royal Assent June 19 [45 Vict. c. 13]

ARMITAGE, Mr. B., Salford

Manchester Corporation, Consid. Amendt. 1575

ARMYMISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONSAppointments in the Royal Engineers*, Questions, Mr. Stewart MacIver, Colonel Alexander; Answers, Mr. Childers June 5, 55*Committee on Dress of the Army*, Question, Colonel Barne; Answer, Mr. Childers June 8, 842*Competitive Examinations—West Indian Regiments*, Question, Major Master; Answer, Mr. Childers June 5, 64*Cost of Salutes*, Question, Colonel Nolan; Answer, Sir Arthur Hayter June 9, 654*Drunkenness*, Question, Mr. Caine; Answer, The Judge Advocate General June 19, 1582*Field Days in Hot Weather*, Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Childers June 8, 476*Instruction in Military Tactics*, Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Childers June 19, 1603*Senior Majors*, Question, Sir Henry Fletcher; Answer, Mr. Childers June 5, 64*Lieutenants of Artillery*, Question, Mr. Stanley Leighton; Answer, Mr. Childers June 19, 1594*Officers of the Reserve*, Question, Sir John Kennaway; Answer, Mr. Childers June 15, 1246*Ordnance Artificers Corps*, Question, Mr. Board; Answer, Mr. Childers June 19, 1595*Organisation of the Cavalry*, Question, Colonel O'Beirne; Answer, Sir Arthur Hayter June 9, 652ARMY—cont.Pay Department*, Question, Colonel O'Beirne; Answer, Mr. Childers June 12, 832*Royal Military Academy, Woolwich*, Question, Observations, Lord Truro; Reply, The Earl of Morley June 9, 628*Shooting and Driving Prizes*, 1861, Question, Colonel Nolan; Answer, Mr. Childers June 19, 1595*Soldiers as Caretakers (Ireland)*, Question, General Sir George Balfour; Answer, Mr. Childers June 12, 824*The British Troops in Natal*, Question, Sir David Wedderburn; Answer, Mr. Childers June 12, 810Auxiliary ForcesAdjutants*, Question, Mr. Mac Iver; Answer, Mr. Childers June 16, 1405*Militia Surgeons Pensions*, Question, Mr. O'Shaughnessy; Answer, Mr. Childers June 15, 1228*Volunteer Corps*, Question, Mr. Rankin; Answer, Mr. Childers June 5, 75Army (India)—Captain J. B. Chatterton, Bengal Staff Corps

Motion for an Address, The Earl of Galloway June 16, 1394; after debate, Motion withdrawn

ARNOLD, Mr. A., Salford*Egypt (Political Affairs)*, 364; — English Policy, 1244; — Political Crisis, 1763

Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial Statement, 1785

Parliament—Rules and Orders—Standing Order 167, 664

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 857, 908; cl. 7, 1281; cl. 8, 1500; cl. 11, 1907, 1908, 1923

Settled Land, Comm. Amendt. 349, 351, 352, 353, 357

Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill

Questions, Mr. Biddell, Mr. Gregory; Answers, Mr. Gladstone June 5, 76

Lord Rossmore's Estate, Question, Mr. Dillon; Answer, Mr. Gladstone June 16, 1422*The Estimates*, Questions, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Brand; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 12, 836*The Irish Church Fund*, Question, Sir Henry Holland; Answer, Mr. Courtney June 15, 1228; Questions, Mr. Anderson, Mr. W. H. Smith; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, 1264Artillery Ranges Bill(Mr. Secretary Childers, The Judge Advocate General, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, Mr. Trevelyan)c. Read 3^o * June 5 [Bill 183]l. Read 1^o * (Earl of Morley) June 6 (No. 119)Read 2^o * June 16

ASHLEY, Hon. E. M. (Under Secretary of State for the Colonies), Isle of Wight

Africa (South)—Miscellaneous Questions
Cetewayo, Ex-King of Zululand—Restrictions as to Correspondence, 655;—Letter from the Transvaal Government urging his Restoration, 824

The Transvaal—Attacks by the Boers on Native Tribes, 72, 73

Zululand—John Dunn's Territory, 474, 475, 1237

New Zealand—Te Whiti, the Maori Chief, 1585

Railway Rates, Select Committee on—Draft Report, 1761

ASHMEAD-BARTLETT, Mr. E., Egypt

(Political Affairs)—Miscellaneous Questions

233, 499, 1421

Political Crisis, 980, 981, 1131, 1140, 1147, 1148, 1609, 1610

Proposed Conference, 660, 661

Riots at Alexandria—Papers, 821

Parliament—Business of the House—"Questions," 1426

ATTORNEY GENERAL, The (Sir H. JAMES) Taunton

Parliamentary Oath (Mr. Bradlaugh)—"Gurney v. Bradlaugh," Res. 1117, 1120, 1121, 1122

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 99, 104, 119, 120, 121; Amendt. 127, 128, 130, 131, 145; cl. 2, 206; cl. 3, 239, 240, 282; cl. 4, 314, 503, 507, 508, 518, 528, 532, 533, 536, 538, 726, 740, 751, 761, 869, 879, 906; cl. 5, 939, 1087, 1125; cl. 7, 1360, 1430, 1432, 1434, 1440, 1443, 1457; cl. 8, 1490, 1491, 1499, 1500, 1524, 1536, 1537, 1540, 1542, 1543; cl. 9, 1849, 1651, 1652, 1653, 1654, 1659, 1660, 1664; cl. 11, 1808, 1867

Settled Land, Comm. 353

Supreme Court of Judicature Acts Amendment, Comm. cl. 1, 960, 962

AYLMER, Captain J. E. F., Maidstone

Ireland—Advances to Irish Landlords on Irish Estates, 1760

State-Aided Emigration, 228

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 11, 1877

BAILEY, Sir J. R., Herefordshire

Regent's Canal, City, and Docks Railway, 3R, 635

BALFOUR, Lord

Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister, 2R, Amendt. 786, 790

BALFOUR, Right Hon. J. B. (Lord Advocate for Scotland), Clackmannan, &c.

Law and Justice—Magistracy—Licensing Magistrates at Peterhead, 58, 59

BALFOUR, Right Hon. J. B.—cont.

Scotland—Miscellaneous Questions

Debtors' Act, 1880—Illegal Pawning, 59,—

Kenneth Mackenzie, a Bankrupt, 1227

Evictions—Lochcarran, Co. Ross, 806

Local Taxation and Expenditure, 843

Settled Land, Comm. 358

BALFOUR, General Sir G., Kincardineshire

Army (Ireland)—Soldiers as Caretakers, 824

Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial Statement, 1784

Public Works (India)—Return 259 of 1859—Construction of Railways, 61

BALFOUR, Mr. A. J., Hertford

Egypt (Political Affairs)—Miscellaneous Questions

Conference, 836

Political Crisis, 1761, 1762

Riots at Alexandria—Papers, 822

France—The Bi-Metallic Conference at Paris, 75

Ireland—Mr. O'Shea's Visit to Kilmalnam Gaol, 1252

Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Mr. Parnell, 75;—Release of Persons detained under the Act, 1244

Parliament—Rules of Debate—Questions—Release of Persons detained under the Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, 1881, 1592

BARING, Mr. T. C., Essex, S.

Partnerships, Comm. 212, 214

BARNE, Colonel F. St. J. N., Suffolk, E.

Army—Committee on Dress of the Army, 482

Corn Returns (No. 2), 2R, 613

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 5,

1027

BARRY, Mr. J., Wexford Co.

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 558, 690, 915

BARTELOT, Colonel Sir W. B., Sussex, W.

Egypt (Political Affairs), 1420, 1422;—Italian Government, 1276, 1277

Ireland, State of—Murders of Mr. Bourke and Corporal Wallace, 1231

"Treaty of Kilmalnam," 986, 987

Baths and Washhouses Acts Amendment Bill

(Mr. Stanhope, Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Gorst)

a. Ordered; read 1^o June 14

[Bill 201]

Read 2^o June 21

BENTINCK, Right Hon. G. A. F. Cavendish, Whitehaven

Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 1768

BIDDELL, Mr. W., Suffolk, W.

Arrears of Rent (Ireland), 76

BIGGAR, Mr. J. G., Cavan Co.

Ireland—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Prisoners detained under the Act, 1403

State of—Alleged Riot by Soldiers at Bel-turbet, 1408

Judgments (Inferior Courts), Consid. cl. 4, 217

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 153; cl. 3, 279, 280, 283, 284, 287, 296; cl. 4, 378, 447, 448, 450, 452, 679, 729, 855, 861, 917; cl. 5, 1009, 1047; cl. 7, Motion for reporting Progress, 1216, 1305, 1311, 1459; cl. 8, 1480; cl. 9, 1644; Amendt. 1653, 1654; cl. 11, 1896; Motion for reporting Progress, 1923, 1926, 1929

Public Schools (Scotland) Teachers, Comm. 209; cl. 3, Amendt. 950, 951

Bills of Exchange Bill

(Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Cohen, Mr. Lewis Fry, Sir Hardinge Giffard, Mr. Monk)

c. Report of Select Comm. * June 21 [No. 244]

Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Bill

(The Lord Coleridge)

l. Read 2^a, and referred to a Select Comm., after short debate June 19, 1845

BIRKBECK, Mr. E., Norfolk, N.

Inspectors of Fisheries, 488

North Sea Fisheries Convention—Ratification, 1756

Blackburn Improvement Bill (by Order)

c. Moved, "That the Bill, as amended, be now considered" (Sir Charles Forster) June 19, 1559

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add "it is inexpedient to proceed with the consideration of the Improvement Bills, or any of them, included in the Reference to the Committee on Sanitary and Police Clauses of March 13th 1882, unless such portions thereof as create local Sanitary or Police Law exceptional to the Law of the Realm be omitted therefrom" (Mr. Hopwood) v.; Question proposed, "That the words, &c.;" Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Pugh); after short debate, Motion withdrawn; Amendt. withdrawn

Original Question put, and agreed to: Bill considered

BLAKE, Mr. J. A., Waterford Co.

Irish Fisheries—The Report, 1881, 1252

Boiler Explosions Bill

(The Earl of Derby)

l. Committee * June 12 (Nos. 85-129)

Report * June 13

Read 3^a * June 15

BOORD, Mr. T. W., Greenwich

Army—Ordnance Artificers Corps, 1505

BORLASE, Mr. W. C., Cornwall, E.

Evictions (Ireland), 1189

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 591, 592; cl. 5, 1066; cl. 11, 1905

BOURKE, Right Hon. R., Lynn Regis

Egypt (Political Affairs)—Miscellaneous Questions

67, 68, 69, 70, 490, 1418, 1421

Anglo-French Fleet at Alexandria—Earthworks, 224

Arming of the Forts at Alexandria, 478

Political Crisis, 983, 1127, 1128, 1152,

1154, 1226, 1255, 1257, 1608, 1765

Riots at Alexandria—The Papers, 818, 819, 820

Egypt and Italy—Cession of Assab Bay, 1271, 1272

BRABOURNE, Lord

Justices' Jurisdiction, 2R. 454

BRAMWELL, Lord

Justices' Jurisdiction, 1R. 1; 2R. 458

BRAND, Right Hon. Sir H. B. W.,

(see SPEAKER, The)

BRAND, Mr. H. R., Stroud

Ireland—Arrears of Rent Bill—The Estimates, 838

BRIGGS, Mr. W. E., Blackburn

Blackburn Improvement, Consid. 1570

Currency—Monetary Conference at Paris, 829

BRIGHT, Mr. J., Manchester

Blackburn Improvement, Consid. 1572

Egypt—Political Crisis, 1168

Manchester Corporation, Consid. 1579

BRINTON, Mr. J., Kidderminster

Vagrancy, Comm. cl. 4, Amendt. 1884, 1886

BROADHURST, Mr. H., Stoke-on-Trent

Metropolis—The Parks—Gardens of the Royal Botanic Society, Regent's Park—

Admission of the Public, 805

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 887

BRODRICK, Hon. W. St. J. F., Surrey, W.

Ireland—Protection of Person and Property

Act, 1881—Persons detained under the

Act—The Island of Arran, 659

Release of Persons detained under the Act, 1244

BROGDEN, Mr. A., Wodnesbury

New Zealand—Te Whiti, The Maori Chief, 1585

BRUCE, Sir H. H., Coleraine

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 11, 1940

BRYCE, Mr. J., Tower Hamlets
Commonable Rights, Lords' Amendts. Consid.
361
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4,
417, 418, 421, 423; Amendt. 595, 604, 607
Vagrancy, 2R. 360

BUCCLEUCH, Duke of
Entail (Scotland), 2R. 1222

BUCHANAN, Mr. T. R., Edinburgh
Public Schools (Scotland) Teachers, Comm.
209

BULWER, Mr. J. R., Cambridgeshire
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4,
315, 319, 520, 609; cl. 5, 944
Protection of Person and Property (Ireland)
Act, 1881—Release of Persons detained under the Act, 485

BURT, Mr. T., Morpeth
Factory Acts—Lead Poisoning, 1407

BURY, Viscount
Channel Tunnel Scheme, 1722, 1723

BUTT, Mr. C. P., Southampton
Supreme Court of Judicature Acts Amendment, Comm. cl. 1, 961

BUXTON, Mr. F. W., Andover
Ireland—Agrarian Outrages—The Returns,
832

BYRNE, Mr. G. M., Wexford Co.
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4,
582, 585, 924, 926; cl. 7, 1344

CAINE, Mr. W. S., Scarborough
Army—Drunkenness, 1582
Regent's Canal, City, and Docks Railway, 3R.
649

CAIRNS, Earl
Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment, 2R.
1548
Entail (Scotland), 2R. 1221

CALLAN, Mr. P., Louth
Ireland—Magistracy—Derry City Bench, 654;
—Mr. H. Blake, lt. M. 60
Prevention of Crime Bill—Protest of the Judges, 838, 839
Parliament—Order in Debate—Mr. O'Kelly,
M.P. for Roscommon, 366
Privilege — Unparliamentary Language, 1278 Parliamentary Oath (Mr. Bradlaugh)—“Gurney v. Bradlaugh,” Res. 1126
Poor Law—Burnley Board of Guardians—Roman Catholic Children, 486

CALLAN, Mr. P.—cont.

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1,
119, 120, 121; cl. 3, 263; cl. 4, 330, 685,
889; cl. 5, 948, 1048, 1081, 1082; cl. 7,
1201, 1292, 1386; Amendt. 1446, 1457,
1460; cl. 9, 1622; Amendt. 1627, 1629;
cl. 11, 1895, 1921

CAMERON, Dr. C., Glasgow

Debtors' (Scotland) Act, 1880—Illegal Pawn-ing, 69;—Kenneth Mackenzie, a Bankrupt, 1227 Elementary Education (Scotland)—Island of Lewis, 1402
Law and Justice — Magistracy — Licensing
Magistrates at Peterhead, 58, 59
Licensing Acts (Scotland)—Joint Licensing
Committee, Peterhead, 976
Spirits Act, 1880—Evasion of the Provisions of the Act at Peterhead, 1246
Vaccination Act—Calf Lymph, 1402

CAMPBELL, Sir G., Kirkcaldy, &c.

Egypt (Political Affairs)—Miscellaneous Questions
Italian Government, 1276
Political Crisis, 1139
Riots at Alexandria—Papers, 820
Married Women's Property, 2R. Motion for Adjournment, 615
Parliament—Scotch Business, 1272
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1,
117; cl. 4, 319; cl. 5, 945, 947; cl. 8, 1520;
cl. 11, 1811, 1868, 1871
Public Schools (Scotland) Teachers, Comm.
cl. 3, 951

CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Mr. H. (Secretary to the Admiralty), *Stirling, &c.

Egypt (Political Affairs)—Miscellaneous Questions
Anglo-French Fleet at Suda Bay, 476, 826
British Squadron, 73, 74
Fleet at Alexandria, 1758
Political Crisis, 1169, 1170, 1765;—
British Refugees, 1601
Riots at Alexandria, 1410, 1411
Navy—Miscellaneous Questions
Dockyards, Riggers in the, 227;—Memorial of Established Shipwrights, 1246 Engineer Students — H.M.S. “Marlborough,” 1593
Explosion on Board H.M.S. “Swiftsure,”
80, 493, 815
Inspector of Machinery in the Channel
Squadron, 1408
Liability of Officers—Retired Pay, 1264
Mediterranean Squadron, 1593
Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill—Recent Division, 82

CAMPERDOWN, Earl of Entails (Scotland), Motion for a Return, 974, 976

Parliament—Public Business—House of Lords
—Local Government Bill, 1719

CANTERBURY, Archbishop of Imprisonment for Contumacy, Report of Amendts. 223

CARBUTT, Mr. E. H., Monmouth, &c.
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 523

CARLINGFORD, Lord (Lord Privy Seal)
Education Department—Willesden District
School Board, 628, 973
Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
Crime and Outrage—Murder of Mr. W.
Bourke and Escort—Three Farmers Shot and Maimed, 622
Evictions—Landlords, 1732, 1743
Peace Preservation Act—Search for Arms, 1399
Royal Irish Constabulary, 627
Ireland—Protection of Person and Property
Act, 1881—Release of Mr. Parnell and others confined under the Act, Motion for Papers, 29, 30, 34

CARNARVON, Earl of Education Department—Willesden District
School Board, 627, 971
Egypt (Political Affairs), 4
Riots at Alexandria—Reparation to British Subjects, 1727

CARRINGTON, Lord
Parliament—Public Business—House of Lords
—Local Government Bill, 1721
Poor Rates, 2R. 1393

CARTWRIGHT, Mr. W. C., Oxfordshire
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4,
566; cl. 5, 1034

CAUSTON, Mr. R. K., Colchester
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 7, 1376

CECIL, Lord E. H. B. G., Essex, W.
Egypt (Political Affairs)—Miscellaneous Questions
1413, 1419
Riots at Alexandria—Papers, 818
The Khedive, 664
Ireland, State of—Murders of Mr. Bourke and Corporal Wallace, 1231
Law and Police—Seizure of Arms in Clerken-
well, 1612
Navy—Explosion on Board H.M.S. "Swift-sure," 80

CHAMBERLAIN, Right Hon. J. (President of the Board of Trade), Birmingham
Adulteration Acts—Lard Cheese, 826, 1275
Channel Tunnel Scheme, 834
Corn Returns (No. 2), 2R. 610, 614, 615
Emigration—Miscellaneous Questions
Passenger Traffic from Scandinavian Ports, 980
The "Nemesis," 473
United States of America—Passenger Acts,
934

CHAMBERLAIN, Right Hon. J.—cont.
England—East Coast—Harbours of Refuge—
Filey, 63
Partnerships, Comm. 213

CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER—See
GLADSTONE, Right Hon. W. E.

CHANCELLOR, The LORD (LORD SELBORNE)
Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment, 2R.
1548
Entail (Scotland), 1R. 54
Imprisonment for Contumacy, Report of
Amendts. 222
Justices' Jurisdiction, 2R. 454
Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway
(Extensions and Dock), Motion for Re-comm.
17

Channel Tunnel Scheme

Question, Mr. Monk; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain June 12, 834; Question, Observations, Viscount Bury; Reply, The Earl of Morley
June 20, 1722

CHAPLIN, Mr. H., Lincolnshire, Mid
Egypt—Sir Edward Malet, Consul General,
1614
Egypt (Political Affairs)—Miscellaneous Questions
Italian Government, 1277
Political Crisis, 1130, 1159, 1160, 1161, 1607
Riots at Alexandria, 1412
Parliament—Business of the House, 491, 493
Public Business, 1274
Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial Statement, 1782, 1804, 1805

CHILDERS, Right Hon. H. C. E. (Secretary of State for War), Pontefract
Army—Miscellaneous Questions
Appointments in the Royal Engineers, 56
British Troops in Natal, 810
Committee on Dress of the Army, 482
Competitive Examinations—West Indian
Regiments, 64
Field Days in Hot Weather, 476
Instruction in Military Tactics, 1603
Ireland—Soldiers as Caretakers, 824
Lieutenants of Artillery, 1594
Officers of the Reserve, 1246
Ordnance Artificers Corps, 1595
Pay Department, 832
Senior Majors, 64
Shooting and Driving Prizes, 1881, 1595
Army (Auxiliary Forces)—Miscellaneous
Questions
Adjutants, 1406
Militia Surgeons Pensions, 1229
Volunteer Corps, 76
Ireland, State of—Alleged Riots by Soldiers at Belturbet, 1408
Murders of Mr. Bourke and Corporal
Wallace, 1231
Law and Police—Seizure of Arms in Clerken-
well, 1612
Navy—Breech-loading Guns, 236
Explosion on Board H.M.S. "Swiftsure," 81

Civil Service—Superannuation

Question, Mr. W. H. Smith; Answer, Mr. Courtney June 8, 465

COHEN, Mr. A., Southwark

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, Amendt. 746, 747

COLERIDGE, Lord

Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment, 2R. 1545, 1550

Justices' Jurisdiction, 2R. 455

COLLINGS, Mr. J., Ipswich

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 524, 561, 565; cl. 11, 1934

COLTHURST, Col. D. La Zouche, Cork Co.

Ireland—Evictions, 1182

Land Law Act, 1881—Loans to Occupiers, 1266

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 677, 679

COMMINS, Dr. A., Roscommon

Evictions (Ireland), 1187

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 125, 129, 135, 159; cl. 2, 201; cl. 3, 274, 276; cl. 4, 328, 411, 416, 551, 598, 608; Amendt. 630, 736, 737, 759, 881, 921; cl. 5, 936, 942, 1019, 1070, 1083, 1095, 1096, 1100; cl. 7, 1192, 1301, 1302, 1458; cl. 8, Amendt. 1488, 1490, 1491, 1493, 1495, 1506, 1523, 1526, 1536; cl. 9, Amendt. 1615, 1623, 1626, 1629, 1633, 1636, 1639, 1671, 1673, 1685; cl. 11, 1926, 1932; cl. 12, 1967

Commonable Rights Bill

(Mr. Chestham, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Buxton)

c. Moved, "That the Lords Amendts. be now considered" June 6, 361; Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Warton); after short debate, Question put, A. 16, N. 38; M. 22 (D. L. 115)

Original Question put, and agreed to

l. Royal Assent June 19 [45 Vict. c. 15]

Commons Regulation Provisional Orders Bill

(The Lord Rosebery)

l. Royal Assent June 19 [45 Vict. c. xxvii]

Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts—Prosecution at Sleaford

Question, Mr. Heneage; Answer, Mr. Muddella June 12, 803

Conveyancing and Settled Land Bills

c. Committee nominated June 8; List of the Committee, 621

Coolies (Indian)—Emigration to La Réunion

Question, Mr. R. N. Fowler; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington June 19, 1603

COOPE, Mr. O. E., Middlesex

Science and Art—National Gallery, 1262;—Hamilton Palace Collection, 1274

Copyright (Musical Compositions) Bill

(Mr. Gorst, Mr. Arthur Balfour, Mr. Beresford Hope, Viscount Folkestone)

c. Read 2° June 14

[Bill 161]

Committee; Report June 19, 1715

Considered; read 3° June 20

Copyright (Works of Fine Art, &c.) Bill

Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer Mr. Hastings June 5, 71

CORBET, Mr. W. J., Wicklow Co.

Ireland—Poor Law—Election of Guardians for the Killenkey Division—Rathdrum Union, 1238

Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Police Protection for Caretakers, Co. Wicklow, 817

Corn Returns (No. 2) Bill

(Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. John Holms)

c. Ordered; read 1° June 6 [Bill 193]

Read 2°, after short debate June 8, 610

Moved, "That this House will, upon Monday next, resolve itself into the Committee on the Bill"

Amendt. to leave out all the words after "That," and add "the Bill be referred to a Select Committee" (Mr. John Talbot); Question, "That the words, &c." put, and agreed to Main Question put, and agreed to; Bill committed for Monday next Committee*—a.p. June 18

CORRY, Mr. J. P., Belfast

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 5, 1076

Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, 1881—Stewart, Edmund, 1602

County Courts (Advocates' Costs) Bill

(Mr. Hastings, Sir Bardley Wilmot, Mr. Staveley Hill, Mr. Rowley Hill)

c. Read 2°, after debate June 5, 217 [Bill 188]

County Courts (Ireland) Bill

(The Lord O'Hagan)

l. Read 2°, after short debate June 19, 1556

County Courts [Salaries and Expenses of Examiners of Accounts]

c. Resolution considered in Committee June 9, 772

Resolution reported, and agreed to June 12

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the County Courts (Advocates' Costs) Bill, That they have power to make provision therein, pursuant to the said Resolution

COURTNEY, Mr. L. H. (Financial Secretary to the Treasury), Liskeard
Civil Service—Superannuation, 465
Customs Department—Miscellaneous Questions

Re-organization—Out-door Clerks, 1236
Salaries, 67

Salaries of Collectors, 75

Inland Revenue Department—Pay of Surveying Officers, 67

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Advances to Irish Landlords on Irish Estates, 1761

Arrears of Rent Bill—Irish Church Fund, 1228

Commissioners of Public Works—Annual Report, 1426

Irish Church Fund—Estimated Assets, 830, 1245

Irish Church Temporalities Commission—National School Teachers Act, 979

Killaloe Drainage Works, 486, 831

Public Works Commissioners—Land Improvement Loans, 1602

Licensing Acts (Scotland)—The Joint Licensing Committee, Peterhead, 977

Metropolis—Parks—Gardens of the Royal Botanic Society, Regent's Park—Admission of the Public, 806

Metropolitan Board of Works (Money), 2R. 1389, 1391

Post Office—Auxiliary Letter Carriers, 481
Letter Carriers, 1614

Spitirs Act, 1880—Evasion of the Provisions of the Act at Peterhead, 1247

COWEN, Mr. J., Newcastle-on-Tyne

Blackburn Improvement, Consid. 1574

Egypt (Political Affairs), 231, 982, 1156

Palace of Westminster—House of Commons—Strangers' Gallery, 71

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 130, 164; cl. 4, 304, 312, 388, 406, 497, 530, 687, 886; cl. 7, 1470; cl. 8, 1507, 1508; cl. 10, 1691; cl. 11, 1833, 1894, 1932, 1956

COWPER, Earl

Evictions (Ireland)—Landlords, 1737, 1743

Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, 1881—Release of Mr. Parnell and others confined under the Act, Motion for Papers, 27

CRANBROOK, Viscount

Education Department—Willesden District School Board, 974

Evictions (Ireland)—Landlords, 1747

Criminal Law—Release of Crawshaw
Crawshaw, a Convict

Question, Lord George Hamilton; Answer, Sir William Harcourt June 15, 1229

Criminal Lunatics Bill

(Mr. Findlater, Mr. Dillwyn)

c. Ordered; read 1^o June 5 [Bill 102]

CROPPER, Mr. J., Kendal

Egypt—Soudan—Consulate at Khartoum, 1237
New Zealand—Te Whiti, the Maori Chief, 1685

Vagrancy, 2R. 359

CROSS, Right Hon. Sir R. A., Lancashire, S.W.

Evictions (Ireland), 1184

Law and Police—Seizure of Arms at Clerkenwell, 1613

Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial Statement, 1782

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 117, 118; cl. 4, 311, 742; cl. 10, 1701

Settled Land, Comm. 349, 356, 357, 358

Cruelty to Animals Bill

(Mr. Anderson, Mr. Samuel Morley, Mr. Jacob Bright, Mr. Passmore Edwards, Mr. Buchanan)
c. Ordered; read 1^o June 15 [Bill 206]

Currency—The Bimetallic Conference at Paris

Question, Mr. A. J. Balfour; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington June 5, 75; Question, Mr. Briggs; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington June 12, 829

CURRIE, Sir D., Perthshire

Public Schools (Scotland) Teachers, Comm. 209

Customs and Inland Revenue Buildings
(Ireland) Bill [Bill 156]

(Mr. John Holms, Lord Richard Grosvenor)

c. Committee^o; Report; read 3^o June 13

l. Read 1^o (Lord Thurlow) June 15 (No. 142)
Read 2^o June 20

Customs Department

Salaries (Port of London), Question, Baron Henry De Worms; Answer, Mr. Courtney June 5, 67

Salaries of Collectors, Question, Mr. Jackson; Answer, Mr. Courtney June 5, 74

Customs Re-Organization—Outdoor Clerks
Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Courtney June 15, 1235

DALHOUSIE, Earl of

Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister, 2R. 774, 790

DARTMOUTH, Earl of

Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway (Extensions and Dock), Motion for Resomm. 10

DAVEY, Mr. H., Christchurch

Partnerships, Comm. Motion for Adjournment, 211, 214

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 438, 605, 750; Amendt. 759, 766

Settled Land, Comm. 354

DAWNAY, Colonel Hon. L. P., Thirsk
Protection of Person and Property (Ireland)
Act, 1881 — Release of Persons detained
under the Act, 1750

DAWSON, Mr. C., Carlrow
Parliament—Prevention of Crime (Ireland)
Bill—Dublin Petition, 1748, 1749
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 11,
1873, 1934, 1940, 1941; cl. 12, 1967

Debtors' (Scotland) Act, 1880
Illegal Pawning (John Herald), Question, Dr.
Cameron; Answer, The Lord Advocate
June 5, 59
Kenneth Mackenzie, a Bankrupt, Question,
Dr. Cameron; Answer, The Lord Advocate
June 15, 1227

DE FERRIERES, Baron, Cheltenham
Parliament—Business of the House—Police
Superannuation Bill, 1752
Regent's Canal, City, and Docks Railway, 3R.
644

DE LA WARR, Earl
Egypt (Political Affairs)—Riots at Alexandria,
774
Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway
(Extensions and Dock), Motion for Re-
comm. 12

DE WORMS, Baron H., Greenwich
Customs Department—Salaries, 67
Egypt (Political Affairs), 78, 232;—Conference,
834;—Political Crisis, 981, 1134, 1136,
1257
Egypt and Italy—Cession of Assab Bay, 1268, 1269, 1270, 1271, 1810, 1611;—Personal
Explanation, 1424, 1425
Metropolis—Thames River (Human Corpses),
809, 810
Parliament—Business of the House—Government Annuities Bill, 1598
Post Office—Letter Carriers (Blackheath and Greenwich), 483

DICKSON, Mr. T. A., Tyrone
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 7,
1339, 1357; cl. 8, 1450, 1481; cl. 9, 1652;
cl. 11, 1833

DILKE, Sir C. W. (Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs), Chelsea,
&c.

Diplomatic Service—Foreign Languages—
Examination Papers, 1232
Egypt—Sir Edward Malet, Consul General,
1614
Egypt (Political Affairs)—Miscellaneous Questions
68, 69, 70, 230, 231, 232, 233, 364, 365,
489, 490, 1421
Anglo-French Fleet at Alexandria—Earthworks, 224
Arming of the Forts at Alexandria, 478
Conference, 661
English Policy, 1245

DILKE, Sir C. W.—cont.

Italian Government, 1276, 1277
Khedive, The 664
Political Crisis, 980, 981, 982, 983, 1128,
1129, 1130, 1131, 1134, 1152, 1153,
1154, 1155, 1160, 1161, 1163, 1168,
1170, 1171, 1172, 1226, 1256, 1257,
1258, 1259, 1260, 1606, 1607, 1608,
1609, 1610, 1762, 1763, 1764, 1765
Riots at Alexandria—Papers, 818, 819,
820, 821, 822, 1410, 1411, 1412, 1413
Soudan, The—Consulate at Khartoum, 1237
Egypt and Italy—Cession of Assab Bay, 1269,
1270, 1271, 1611;—Personal Explanation,
1423, 1424, 1425
North Sea Fisheries Convention—Ratification,
1756
Parliament—Rules of Debate, 1582
Trade and Commerce—Treaty of Commerce with Spain, 1230
Turkey and Greece—Murder of Mr. Ogle,
1227

DILLON, Mr. J., Tipperary

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
Arrears of Rent—Lord Rossmore's Estate,
1422;—Evictions, 1706
Assassinations in Phoenix Park, Dublin—
Withdrawal of Police Patrols, 1604
Ireland—Protection of Person and Property
Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions
Houlihan, Mr. J., 984
Kelleher, Walsh, and Gleeson, Messrs., 1250
O'Brien, Mr. J., 1249
Persons detained under the Act—Island of Arran, 657, 658, 660
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 172, 189; cl. 2, Motion for reporting Progress, 195; cl. 3, 272; cl. 4, 303; Amendt.
336, 338, 345, 346, 367, 378, 379, 380, 381,
387, 393, 394, 537, 538, 540, 543, 545, 546,
556, 666, 675, 723, 734, 752, 754, 756, 861,
862, 903, 904, 912; cl. 5, Amendt. 940;
Motion for reporting Progress, 944, 945,
1001, 1063; cl. 7, Amendt. 1202, 1204,
1207, 1214, 1373, 1374; Motion for reporting Progress, 1387; cl. 8, 1480, 1483, 1484,
1493, 1495, 1498; Amendt. 1501, 1512,
1528, 1530, 1536, 1543; cl. 9, 1653, 1656,
1670, 1680; cl. 11, 1936; cl. 12, 1961, 1962

DILLWYN, Mr. L. L., Swansea

Africa (South)—Cetewayo, Ex-King of Zululand —Restrictions as to Correspondence, 655
Parliament—Business of the House—Morning
Sitting, 843
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 7,
1286, 1310, 1324; Amendt. 1347, 1349;
cl. 8, Amendt. 1516, 1517; cl. 9, 1645;
cl. 10, Amendt. 1688, 1690, 1705
Supreme Court of Judicature Acts Amendment, Comm. cl. 1, Motion for reporting
Progress, 962, 963

Diplomatic Service—Foreign Languages—
The Examination Papers
Question, Mr. Jerningham; Answer, Sir
Charles W. Dilke June 15, 1232

Documentary Evidence Bill*(The Lord Thurlow)I. Royal Assent June 19 [45 Vict. c. 9]DODSON, Right Hon. J. G. (President of the Local Government Board), Scarborough

Emigration Acts—Emigrants in Hull, 1235

Highway Rates—Small Tenements, 816, 1229

Poor Law—Burnley Board of Guardians—Roman Catholic Children, 487

Public Health (Metropolis)—Robin Hood Court, Shoe Lane, 816

Vaccination—Miscellaneous Questions

Calf Lymph, 1402

Official Method, 678

Transmission of Disease through Inoculation of Soldiers in the French Army, 467

Vagrancy, 2R. 358; Comm. cl. 4, 1884, 1885; add. cl. 1887

DONALDSON-HUDSON, Mr. C., Newcastle-under-Lyne

Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, 1881—Residences of Released Prisoners, 1757

DONOUGHMORE, Earl of Evictions (Ireland)—Landlords, 1742, 1743Dublin City (Highways) Bill(Dr. Lyons, Mr. Maurice Brooks)*c. Read 2^o, and referred to a Select Comm. June 21 [Bill 88]DUCKHAM, Mr. T., Herefordshire
Corn Returns (No. 2), 2R. 614DUNRAVEN, Earl of

Evictions (Ireland)—Landlords, 1735

Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, 1881—Release of Mr. Parnell and others confined under the Act, Motion for Papers, 37

DUNSANY, Lord

Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, 1881—Release of Mr. Parnell and others confined under the Act, Motion for Papers, 42

DYKE, Right Hon. Sir W. H., Kent, Mid
Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, 1881—Release of Persons detained under the Act, 827EBBRINGTON, Viscount, Tiverton

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 5, 989

ECROYD, Mr. W. F., Preston
Egypt—Political Crisis, 1170Education DepartmentRoman Catholic Schools, Oldham*, Question, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answer, Mr. Mundella June 19, 1886*Science and Art Department—Hall of Science, Old Street*, Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor; Answer, Mr. Mundella June 8, 472;—Mrs. Besant and the Misses Bradburn, Question, Mr. Onslow; Answer, Mr. Mundella; Observations, Lord George Hamilton June 15, 1280*Spelling Reform—The Phonic System*, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Mundella June 13, 977*Willesden District School Board*, Observations, The Earl of Carnarvon; Reply, Lord Carlisle; Question, The Marquess of Salisbury; Answer, Earl Granville June 9, 637; Observations, The Earl of Carnarvon; Reply, Lord Carlisle; Observations, Viscount Cranbrook June 13, 971EGERTON, Hon. W., Cheshire, Mid

Adulteration Acts—Lard Cheese, 826, 1275

Egypt (Political Affairs)LORDS

Questions, The Marquess of Salisbury, The Earl of Carnarvon; Answers, Earl Granville June 5, 3

The British Fleet at Alexandria, Question, Observations, The Earl of Ravensworth; Reply, The Earl of Northbrook June 8, 460; Question, The Marquess of Salisbury; Answer, Earl Granville June 9, 622*Riots at Alexandria*, Questions, The Marquess of Salisbury, Earl De La Warr; Answers, Earl Granville June 12, 773; Question, Observations, The Marquess of Salisbury; Reply, Earl Granville June 15, 1217;—Reparation to British Subjects, Question, Observations, The Earl of Faversham; Reply, Earl Granville; short debate thereon June 20, 1724*Latest Telegrams*, Observations, Earl Granville; Question, The Marquess of Salisbury; Answer, Earl Granville June 13, 964*The Suez Canal*, Observations, Question, Lord Lamington; Reply, Earl Granville June 19, 1550Egypt (Political Affairs)*COMMONS

Questions, Mr. Bourke, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke June 6, 67; Question, Baron Henry De Worms; Answer, Mr. Gladstone, 78; Questions, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Joseph Cowen, Mr. O'Donnell, Mr. McCoan, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Baron Henry De Worms, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke June 6, 329; Questions, Mr. McCoan, Mr. Arthur Arnold, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke June 7, 364; Questions, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, Mr. Bourke; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke June 8, 489; Questions, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. J.

[cont.]

Egypt (Political Affairs)—Commons—cont.

Lowther, Mr. G. W. Elliot, Mr. Raikes, Baron Henry De Worms, Mr. Norwood, Mr. Joseph Cowen, Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Macartney, Mr. Bourke; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke June 13, 980; Notice of Question, Mr. Bourke; Questions, Mr. Bourke, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Onslow, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke June 14, 1127; Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Sir H. Drummond Wolff); debate thereon; Notices of Questions, Mr. McCoan, Mr. Bourke, Mr. Onslow June 15, 1225; Questions, Mr. Bourke, Mr. Slagg, Sir John Hay, Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, Baron Henry De Worms, Mr. Onslow, Mr. O'Kelly, Mr. J. Lowther, Mr. Labouchere, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke June 15, 1255; Questions, Mr. Bourke, Lord Eustace Cecil, Sir Walter B. Barttelot, Mr. O'Kelly, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answers, Mr. Gladstone, Sir Charles W. Dilke; Question, Mr. Onslow; [No answer] June 16, 1418; Questions, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, Mr. Mac Iver, Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Salt, Mr. Bourke, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Onslow, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, Mr. Goschen; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Gladstone June 19, 1606; Questions, Mr. McCoan, Mr. A. J. Balfour, Mr. Arthur Arnold, Mr. J. Lowther, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, Mr. Bourke, Mr. Onslow; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman June 20, 1761;—British Refugees, Questions, Mr. Onslow; Answers, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman June 19, 1601

Military Affairs

The British Fleet at Alexandria, Question, Mr. Gourley; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman June 6, 73;—The Earthworks, Question, Mr. Bourke; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke June 6, 224; Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman June 20, 1758

The Anglo-French Fleet at Suda Bay, Question, Mr. Tottenham; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman June 8, 476; Questions, Sir John Hay; Answers, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman June 12, 825

Arming of the Forts at Alexandria, Question, Mr. Bourke; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke June 8, 478

The Conference

Notices, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, Mr. Puleston June 8, 494; Questions, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke June 9, 660; Questions, Baron Henry De Worms, Mr. Puleston, Mr. A. J. Balfour; Answers, Mr. Gladstone June 12, 834

The Khedive, Question, Lord Eustace Cecil; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke June 9, 664

The Riots at Alexandria

The Papers, Questions, Mr. Bourke, Lord Eustace Cecil, Mr. Onslow, Sir George Campbell, Mr. O'Donnell, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, Sir Henry Tyler, Mr. Northcote, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answers, Sir Charles Egypt (Political Affairs)—The Riots at Alexandria—Commons—cont.

W. Dilke June 12, 818; Questions, Mr. Onslow, Mr. Newdegate, Mr. Healy, Mr. W. H. Smith, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Labouchere, Mr. O'Kelly, Mr. McCoan; Answers, Mr. Speaker, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman June 16, 1409

Policy of Her Majesty's Government, Question, Mr. Arthur Arnold; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke June 15, 1244

The Italian Government, Notice of Question, Mr. G. W. Elliot; Questions, Sir Walter B. Barttelot, Sir George Campbell, Mr. Chaplin, Sir John Hay; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke June 15, 1275

Sir Edward Malet, Consul General, Question, Mr. Chaplin; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke June 19, 1614

The Soudan—Consulate at Khartoum, Question, Mr. Cropper; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke June 15, 1237

Egypt and Italy—Cession of Assab Bay

Questions, Baron Henry De Worms, Mr. Bourke; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Speaker June 15, 1268; Personal Explanation, Sir Charles W. Dilke; Observations, Baron Henry De Worms June 16, 1423; Questions, Baron Henry De Worms; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke June 19, 1610

Ejectments Suspension (Ireland) Bill

(Colonel Nolan, Mr. O'Shea, Mr. Justin M'Carthy, Mr. Lalor, Mr. Martin, Mr. Dickson, Mr. Findlater, Mr. Lea, Mr. Moore, Mr. Biggar, Mr. Richard Power, Mr. Whitworth)

c. Motion for Leave (Colonel Nolan) objected to; Motion postponed June 13, 1111
Question, Colonel Nolan; Answer, Mr. War-ton June 14, 1127
Ordered: read 1^o June 14 [Bill 202]

Election of Representative Peers (Ireland) Bill [H.L.]

(The Earl of Belmore)

l. Presented; read 1^o June 13 (No. 137)
Read 2^a June 19
Committee*; Report June 20

Electric Lighting Bill

(Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Ashley)

c. Report of Select Comm. * June 12 [No. 227]

Elementary Education Provisional Orders Confirmation (Finchley, &c.) Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord President)

l. Committee*; Report June 19 (No. 63)
Read 3^a June 20

Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (London) Bill

c. Read 1^o June 6 [Bill 195]
Read 2^o June 12

Elementary Education Provisional Orders Confirmation (West Ham, &c.) Bill

c. Read 1^o June 6 [Bill 196]
Read 2^o June 12

ELLENBOROUGH, Lord

Army (India)—Captain J. B. Chatterton,
Bengal Staff Corps, Motion for an Address,
1397

ELLIOT, Hon. A. R. D., Roxburgh

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 9, 1669

ELLIOT, Mr. G. W., Northallerton

Egypt—Political Crisis, 981, 983, 1763 ;—
Italian Government, 1275
Ireland—"Treaty of Kilmainham," 988 ;—
Mr. Yates Thompson, 1596
Mr. O'Shea's Visit to Kilmainham Gaol, 1251

Emigration

The "Nemesis," Questions, Mr. Moore ; Answers, Mr. Chamberlain June 8, 472
Passenger Traffic from Scandinavian Ports, Question, Mr. Moore ; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain June 13, 979
Emigrants in Hull, Question, Mr. Moore ;
Answer, Mr. Dodson June 15, 1235
The United States of America—Passenger Acts —Legislation, Question, Mr. Moore ; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain June 13, 983

ENFIELD, Viscount (Under Secretary of State for India)

Army (India)—Captain J. B. Chatterton,
Bengal Staff Corps, Motion for an Address,
1396

Entail (Scotland) Bill

(The Lord Rosebery)

l. Presented ; read 1^a, after short debate June 5, 51 (No. 115)
Read 2^a, after short debate June 15, 1221

EWART, Mr. W., Belfast

Local Bankruptcy (Ireland) Act—Case of Joseph Magill, Belfast, 1239

Factory Acts—Lead Poisoning

Question, Mr. Burt ; Answer, Sir William
Harcourt June 16, 1407

FAWCETT, Right Hon. H. (Postmaster General), Hackney

Parliament—Business of the House—Government Annuities Bill, 1598

Post Office—Miscellaneous Questions

Adhesive Stamps on Postcards, 465
Auxiliary Letter Carriers, 823
Insurance of Registered Letters, 469
Ireland—The Postmaster at Milford, Co.
Cork—Case of Matthew Murphy, 1249
Irish Mails, 478

FAWCETT, Right Hon. H.—cont.

Letter Carriers (Blackheath and Greenwich), 483
Telegraph Department—Sixpenny Rate for Telegrams, 1236
Telephone Licences, 1233
Uxbridge Post Office, 830

FEVERSHAM, Earl of

Egypt—Riots at Alexandria—Reparation to British Subjects, 1724

FIRTH, Mr. J. F. B., Chelsea

Metropolitan Board of Works (Money), 2R.
1393
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 3, 244, 263 ; Amendt. 264, 269 ; cl. 4, 335 ;
cl. 8, 1608

Fisheries, Inspectors of

Question, Mr. Birkbeck ; Answer, Sir William
Harcourt June 8, 488

FITZMAURICE, Lord E., Calne

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 3,
284 ; cl. 4, 518, 543, 546 ; cl. 5, 1002, 1032

FLETCHER, Sir H., Horsham

Army—Senior Majors, 64
Ireland—Protection of Person and Property
Act, 1881—Persons detained under the
Act—The Island of Arran, 658
State of—Intimidation, 1752

FOLKESTONE, Viscount, Wilts, S.

Copyright (Musical Compositions), Comm. cl. 1,
Amendt. 1715 ; cl. 2, Amendt. 1716, 1717
Protection of Person and Property (Ireland)
Act, 1881—Michael M'Queeney, 1596

Food Supply—Import of Frozen Sheep

Question, Observations, Lord Lamington ;
Reply, Lord Sudeley June 13, 969

FORBES, Lord

Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1881—
Search for Arms, 1398

FORSTER, Right Hon. W. E., Bradford

Ireland—Protection of Person and Property
Act, 1881—Persons detained under the Act
—The Island of Arran, 658
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4,
309, 310, 313, 528, 529

FORTESCUE, Earl

Imprisonment for Contumacy, 3R. 965
Interments (telo de se), 2R. 1719

FOWLER, Mr. H. H., Wolverhampton

Parliament—Business of the House—Government Annuities Bill, 1599
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 7, 1463
Settled Land, Comm. 355

FOWLER, Mr. R. N., London

Africa (South)—Cetewayo, Ex-King of Zululand—Restrictions as to Correspondence, 655

Coolies (Indian)—Emigration to La Réunion, 1803

Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial Statement, 1800

Prisons (England) Act—Prison Discipline, 1262

Prison Warders, 78

Ways and Means—Inland Revenue—Duties on Gold and Silver Plate, 1273

France—The Bimetallic Conference at Paris

Question, Mr. A. J. Balfour; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington June 5, 75; Question, Mr. Briggs; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington June 12, 829

FRY, Mr. T., Darlington

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 7, 1368

GALLOWAY, Earl of

Army (India)—Captain J. B. Chatterton, Bengal Staff Corps, Motion for an Address, 1394, 1397

GIBSON, Right Hon. E., Dublin University

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

High Court of Justice—Vacancies on the Irish Bench, 467, 468, 814

Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Release of Persons detained under the Act, 483, 484;—Rev. T. Feehan, 228

Public Works Commissioners—Land Improvements Loans, 1602, 1603

Royal Irish Constabulary—Pay and Promotion, 651

Ireland—Evictions—Miscellaneous Questions 1179, 1180

Lord Cloncurry's Tenants—Erection of Huts, 1415

Special and Resident Magistrates and the Police, 1753, 1755, 1756

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 3, 243, 244, 256, 266; cl. 4, 326, 497, 509, 510, 525, 527, 533, 542, 543, 747, 874, 904; cl. 5, 948, 995, 997, 1002; Amendt. 1004, 1006, 1053, 1062; cl. 7, 1299, 1302; cl. 8, 1512, 1527, 1539; cl. 9, 1676; cl. 10, 1706, 1707

GIFFARD, Sir H. S., Launceston

Parliamentary Oath (Mr. Bradlaugh)—"Gurney v. Bradlaugh," Res. 1121, 1122

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 201

Supreme Court of Judicature Acts Amendment, Comm. cl. 1, 958, 960

GILL, Mr. H. J., Westmeath

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 6, 1107; cl. 7, 1327, 1368, 1456; cl. 8, 1540; cl. 9, 1645; cl. 11, 1816, 1919

GIVAN, Mr. J., Monaghan

Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial Statement, 1799

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 7, 1322, 1452, 1454; cl. 9, 1630, 1643, 1647, 1657

GLADSTONE, Right Hon. W. E. (First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer), Edinburghshire

Egypt (Political Affairs)—Miscellaneous Questions

78, 1419, 1420, 1422

Conference, The, 835, 836

Political Crisis, 1137, 1143, 1148, 1158, 1164, 1165, 1608, 1609, 1610, 1762, 1766

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Evictions, 1266, 1268;—Lord Rossmore's Estate, 1767

Irish Church Fund—Estimated Assets, 839

Land Law Act, 1881—Sec. 21—"Sullivan v. Bowen," 1589;—Sec. 31—Advances to Tenants, 662, 1266

State-Aided Emigration, 228, 229

"Treaty of Kilmainham," 986

Ireland—Arrears of Rent Bill—Miscellaneous Questions

76

Irish Church Fund, 1265

Lord Rossmore's Estate, 1422, 1423

The Estimates, 837, 838

Ireland—Prevention of Crime—Miscellaneous Questions

Clause 5—Deasy's Act, 490, 491

Condition of Ireland, 841, 843

Memorial of Irish Judges, 77, 78

Protest of the Judges, 838, 839

Recent Division, 81

Parliament—Miscellaneous Questions

Business of the House, 236, 492, 843;—

Ministerial Statement, 1769, 1776, 1781,

1787, 1789, 1790, 1791, 1792, 1801;—

New Rules of Procedure, 1768

Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices), 1769

Public Business, 82, 235, 1274, 1613, 1614

Scotch Business, 1272, 1273

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2,

196; cl. 4, 313, 391, 393, 394, 396, 447,

448, 514, 515, 516, 519, 606, 610, 871, 900;

cl. 5, 999, 1073; cl. 6, 1110; cl. 11, 1821,

1822, 1826, 1831

Royal Mint—Profit on the Coinage of Silver, 1611

Science and Art—National Gallery—Hamilton Palace Collection, 1274

Ways and Means—Inland Revenue—Carriage Duties, 77

Duties on Gold and Silver Plate, 1273

GORST, Mr. J. E., Chatham

Africa (South)—Transvaal—Attacks by the Boers on Native Tribes, 71, 73

Zululand—John Dunn's Territory, 475

Copyright (Musical Compositions), Comm. cl. 2, 1717

Navy—Engineer Students—H.M.S. "Marlborough," 1693

GORST, Mr. J. E.—cont.

Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial Statement, 1785;—New Rules of Procedure, 1767

Rules and Orders—Order of Business, 665

GOSCHEN, Right Hon. G. J., Ripon

Egypt—Political Crisis, 1165, 1609

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 767

GOUBLEY, Mr. E. T., Sunderland

Africa (East Coast)—Suppression of the Slave Trade, 73, 74

Egypt (Political Affairs)—British Squadron, 73

GRANT, Mr. A., Leith, &c.

Public Schools (Scotland) Teachers, Comm. Motion for Adjournment, 208, 210; cl. 2, Amendt. 949, 950

GRANT, Mr. D., Marylebone

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 3, 278

GRANTHAM, Mr. W., Surrey, E.

Parliamentary Oath (Mr. Bradlaugh)—“Gurney v. Bradlaugh,” Res. 1126

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 198, 200

GRANVILLE, Earl (Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs)

Crime and Outrage (Ireland)—Murders of Mr. W. Bourke and Escort—Three Farmers Shot and Maimed, 622

Education Department—Willesden District School Board, 628

Egypt (Political Affairs)—Miscellaneous Questions

3, 4

Anglo-French Fleet at Alexandria, 623

Latest Telegrams, 964, 965

Riots at Alexandria, 773, 774, 1218, 1220, 1221;—Reparation to British Subjects, 1726

Egypt—Suez Canal, 1553

Parliament—Public Business—House of Lords—Local Government Bill, 1722

Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, 1881—Release of Mr. Parnell and others Confined under the Act, Motion for Papers, 48, 49, 51

Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway (Extensions and Dock), Motion for Rescomm. 13

GRAY, Mr. E. D., Carlisle Co.

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 11, 1853, 1944

GREER, Mr. T., Carrickfergus

Evictions (Ireland), 1174

Post Office—Insurance of Registered Letters, 469

GREGORY, Mr. G. B., Sussex, E.

Arrears of Rent (Ireland), 76

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, Amendt. 197

HAMILTON, Right Hon. Lord G. F., Middlesex

Criminal Law—Release of Crawshay Crawshay, a Convict, 1229

Education Department—Hall of Science, Old Street, 1261

Inland Revenue Department—Pay of Surveying Officers, 66, 67

Irish Church Fund—Estimated Assets, 839

Parliament—Privilege—Unparliamentary Language, 1278

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 5, Amendt. 1020

HAMILTON, Lord C. J., Liverpool

Parliamentary Oath (Mr. Bradlaugh)—“Gurney v. Bradlaugh,” Res. Motion for Adjournment, 1125, 1126

Harbours of Refuge (East Coast)—Filey

Question, Sir Harry Verney; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain June 5, 62

HARCOURT, Right Hon. Sir W. G. V. (Secretary of State for the Home Department), Derby

Criminal Law—Release of Crawshay Crawshay, a Convict, 1230

Egypt—Political Crisis, 1161

Factory Acts—Lead Poisoning, 1407

Inspectors of Fisheries, 488

Ireland—Evictions, 1186

Law and Police—Miscellaneous Questions

Case of Charles Frost, wrongfully Convicted, 1756, 1757

Processions of the Salvation Army, 1413

Seizure of Arms at Clerkenwell, 1613

Metropolis—Epping Forest, 486

Thames River—Human Corpses, 810

Newspapers—Inciting Language—“Glasgow Herald,” 1416

Parliament—Business of the House—Police Superannuation Bill, 1752

Penal Servitude Commission, 1879—Spike Island, 1263

Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill—Clause 5—Deasy's Act, 490

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1,

84, 93, 101, 102, 107, 109, 111, 112, 114,

115; Amendt. cl. 116, 118, 119, 120, 122,

123, 124, 133, 137, 140, 145, 146, 147, 150,

151, 156; cl. 2, 195, 197, 199, 200, 201,

205; cl. 3, 206, 207, 208, 241, 247, 257,

264, 265, 267, 268, 293, 296; cl. 4, 298,

301, 305, 317, 338, 376, 378, 379, 381, 397,

398, 401, 403, 418, 421, 452, 494; Amendt.

497, 500, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 529, 530,

532, 549, 555, 557, 581, 599, 674, 675, 682,

738, 742, 745, 747, 749, 751, 753, 756, 758,

764, 765, 771, 852, 857, 858, 861, 864, 867,

884, 889, 897, 910; cl. 5, 931, 932, 943,

944, 1025, 1026; Amendt. 1028, 1035, 1041,

1045, 1046, 1051, 1084; cl. 6, 1089, 1091,

1092, 1095, 1099, 1102, 1104; Amendt.

1105, 1106, 1107, 1108, 1109; Motion for reporting Progress, 1110; cl. 7, 1191, 1192,

1193, 1194, 1195, 1201, 1204, 1208, 1290,

1291, 1292, 1308, 1311, 1316, 1321; Amendt.

1346, 1348, 1350, 1352, 1363, 1364, 1369,

HANCOCK, Right Hon. Sir W. G. V.—cont.

1871, 1873, 1874, 1875, 1878, 1882, 1883, 1887, 1888, 1447, 1466, 1469; cl. 8, 1479, 1491, 1494, 1495, 1497, 1503, 1507, 1515, 1517, 1518, 1522, 1523, 1525, 1526, 1528, 1529, 1531, 1539; cl. 9, 1616, 1620, 1621, 1624, 1625, 1629, 1632, 1633, 1637, 1639, 1642, 1643, 1645, 1662, 1663, 1665, 1666, 1672, 1673, 1674; cl. 10, 1689, 1690, 1695, 1696, 1697, 1700, 1701, 1706, 1707, 1709, 1712; Amendt. 1713, 1714; Motion for reporting Progress, 1715; cl. 11, 1844, 1845, 1847, 1851, 1858, 1860, 1865, 1866, 1867, 1870, 1871, 1872, 1873, 1876, 1881, 1882, 1892, 1893, 1899, 1901, 1902, 1903, 1905, 1906, 1911, 1914, 1915, 1916, 1918; cl. 12, 1965

Prisons (England) Act—Prison Warders, 79, 1263

Public Health—Unqualified Medical Practitioners, 823

Sunday Labour—Employment of Workmen on Sunday, 1233

Thames Navigation—Thames below Bridge, 840

HARTINGTON, Right Hon. Marquess of (Secretary of State for India), Lancashire, N.E.

Coolies (Indian)—Emigration to La Réunion, 1603

France—Bimetallic Conference at Paris, 75

Monetary Conference at Paris, 829

India—Miscellaneous Questions

Appointments in the Civil Service, 830

Assam, Forced Labour in, 833

Bengal—Mortality in Gaols, 478, 479;—

Durbhunga Raj, 1241, 1600

Native Estates—Appointment of Managers, 834

Petroleum Act, 1881—Importation of Explosive Oils from America, 226, 482, 1242;—Standard of Flashing Point, 1897

Public Works—Return 259 of 1859—

Construction of Railways, 61

Sima Army Commission, 471

HASTINGS, Mr. G. W., Worcestershire, E.

Copyright (Works of Fine Art, &c.), 71

County Courts (Advocates' Costs), 2R. 217, 218

HAY, Admiral Right Hon. Sir J. C. D., Wigtown, &c.

Egypt (Political Affairs)—Miscellaneous Questions

Anglo-French Fleet at Suda Bay, 825, 826

Italian Government, 1277

Political Crisis, 1167, 1169, 1170, 1257

Navy—Explosion on Board H.M.S. "Swiftsure," 80, 493, 815

Mediterranean Squadron, 1693

Parliament—Scotch Business, 1272

HAYTER, Colonel Sir A. D. (Financial Secretary to the War Office), Bath

Army—Cost of Salutes, 654

Organization of the Cavalry, 653

HEALY, Mr. T. M., Wexford

Education Department—Spelling Reform—The Phonic System, 977

Egypt (Political Affairs)—Miscellaneous Questions

Italian Government, 1276

Political Crisis, 1259

Riots at Alexandria, 1410

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Assassinations in Phoenix Park, Dublin—

Withdrawal of Police Patrols, 1603, 1604

Crime—John Lyne, Case of, 59, 60

Land Law Act, 1881—Sec. 21—"Sullivan

v. Bowen," 1588;—Sec. 31—Advances to Irish Tenants, 661, 662

Law and Police—Miss McCormack, 656

Magistracy—Mr. H. Blake, R.M., 61, 1583, 1584

Peace Preservation Act, 1881—Proclamation of the City of Limerick, 1234

Ireland—Evictions—Miscellaneous Questions

1266, 1268

Applications of Persons Evicted to the Land Courts, 1244

Special and Resident Magistrates and the Police, 1755

Ireland—Prevention of Crime Bill—Miscellaneous Questions

Condition of Ireland, 842

Memorial of Irish Judges, 77, 78

Protest of the Judges, 838, 839

Ireland—Royal Irish Constabulary—Miscellaneous Questions

Captain Talbot, 61, 62

Distribution of the Vote of Compensation, 811

Extra Pay—Ex-Constable Walsh, 1250

Ireland—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions

Barrett, Messrs. E. J. and M. J., 476

Crosbie, Mr., and Mrs. Quinn, 488, 489

Detention of Persons arrested under the Act, 225, 657, 660, 1405

Dr. O'Brien and Mr. Doyle, 812

Mulleague, Martin, 477

Prison Warders, 1751, 1752

Quinn, Mr. P. J., 225, 1254

Release of Persons detained under the Act, 484, 1244, 1750

Ireland, State of—Miscellaneous Questions

Illegal Notices—"Boycotting," 828

Police Protection at Amagarra, Co. Cork, 1583

Police Surveillance, 1584

Law and Police—Processions of the Salvation Army, 1414

Newspapers—Inciting Language—"Glasgow Herald," 1416

Parliament—Miscellaneous Questions

Business of the House, 236;—"Questions," 1426

Order in Debate—Mr. O'Kelly, M.P. for Roscommon, 365, 366

Public Business, 1614

Rules of Debate—Amendments—Precedence in Committee, 82

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1,

85, 87, 99, 104, 109, 113, 114, 115, 116, 126,

127, 128, 130, 131, 132, 136; Amendt. 137,

138, 155, 157; cl. 2, Amendt. 201, 202,

[cont.

HEALY, Mr. T. M.—cont.

206; cl. 3, Amendt. 207, 208, 240, 265, 289, 294, 295, 296; cl. 4, Amendt. 297, 298, 299, 302; Motion for reporting Progress, 313, 332, 336, 338, 345, 347, 383, 396, 397, 398, 401, 497, 503, 524, 525; Amendt. 533, 537, 595, 712, 714, 715, 718, 724, 737, 738, 743, 745, 747, 748, 749, 750, 754, 763; Motion for reporting Progress, 764; Amendt. 767, 769, 844, 860, 862, 895, 898, 900; cl. 5, 932, 934, 938, 939, 947, 948, 949, 991, 1002, 1003, 1013, 1052, 1064, 1065, 1066, 1078; cl. 6, 1107; Amendt. 1108, 1110; cl. 7, 1207, 1211, 1314, 1339; Amendt. 1345, 1346, 1347, 1379, 1428, 1429, 1431, 1432, 1436, 1443, 1445; cl. 8, 1479, 1486, 1488, 1491, 1500, 1501, 1505, 1518, 1519, 1538, 1541, 1543; cl. 9, 1610, 1625, 1630, 1632, 1636, 1637, 1639, 1640, 1652, 1653; Amendt. 1654, 1655, 1657, 1659, 1660, 1662, 1663, 1664, 1666, 1673; cl. 10, 1705, 1715; cl. 11, 1811, 1813, 1815, 1820, 1822, 1830, 1850, 1857, 1862, 1865, 1876, 1878, 1880, 1890, 1892, 1893, 1901, 1902, 1903; Amendt. 1916; cl. 12, Amendt. 1960

HENEAGE, Mr. E., Great Grimsby

Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts—Prosecution at Sleaford, 808
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 594; cl. 12, 1962

HENRY, Mr. Mitchell, Galway Co.

Ireland—Evictions, Connemara, 652;—Special and Resident Magistrates and the Police, 1755

Magistracy—Mr. H. A. Blake, R.M., 1584
Law and Police—Seizure of Arms at Clerkenwell, 1612

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 528, 573, 575, 579, 576; cl. 5, 1013, 1015, 1027, 1036; cl. 7, 1457; cl. 8, 1508; cl. 9, 1615

HERSCHELL, Sir F. (see SOLICITOR GENERAL, The)

HIBBERT, Mr. J. T. (Parliamentary Secretary to the Local Government Board), Oldham
Police, Leave, 617

HICKS, Mr. E., Cambridgeshire

Regent's Canal, City, and Docks Railway Bill, 3R. 650

Small Tenements and Highway Rates, 1229
Sunday Labour—Employment of Workmen on Sunday, 1237, 1238

Highway Rate and Expenditure Bill

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Hibbert)

a. Ordered; read 1^o June 19 [Bill 209]

Highway Rates—Small Tenements—Legislation

Question, Mr. Onslow; Answer, Mr. Dodson June 12, 816; Question, Mr. Hicks; Answer, Mr. Dodson June 15, 1229

HILL, Lord A. W., Downshire

Ireland, State of—Outrage at Rathcoole, 481
Irish Land Commission—Messrs. Wylie and Cuninghame, Sub-Commissioners, 807

HOLLAND, Sir H. T., Midhurst

Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill—Irish Church Fund, 1228

HOLLOND, Mr. J. B., Brighton

Vagrancy, Comm. cl. 4, Amendt. 1885; add. cl. 1886

HOLMS, Mr. W., Paisley

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 7, 1328, 1332

HOPWOOD, Mr. C. H., Stockport

Blackburn Improvement, Consid. Amendt. 1559, 1560, 1565, 1570, 1575

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 133, 170; cl. 4, 308, 310; cl. 9, 1627

Vaccination—Transmission of Disease through Inoculation of Soldiers in the French Army, 467

HOWARD, Mr. J., Bedfordshire

Parliament—Business of the House, 491;—Ministerial Statement, 1804

HUBBARD, Right Hon. J. G., London

Parliament—Business of the House, 235
Post Office—Auxiliary Letter Carriers, 823

Imprisonment for Contumacy Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury)

l. Report June 6, 220 (No. 103)

Read 3^o, after short debate June 13, 965

c. Read 1^o (Mr. J. G. Talbot) June 16 [Bill 208]

INOCHQUIN, Lord

Evictions (Ireland)—Landlords, 1739

Inclosure (Arkleside) Provisional Order Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord Rosebery)

l. Committee *; Report June 5 (No. 92)

Read 3^o June 6

Royal Assent June 19 [45 Vict. c. xxviii]

Inclosure (Bettws Disserth) Provisional Order Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord Rosebery)

l. Committee *; Report June 5 (No. 93)

Read 3^o June 6

Royal Assent June 19 [45 Vict. c. xxix]

Inclosure (Cefn Drawen) Provisional Order Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord Rosebery)

l. Committee *; Report June 5 (No. 94)

Read 3^o June 6

Royal Assent June 19 [45 Vict. c. xxx]

INDERWICK, Mr. A. F., Rye
Supreme Court of Judicature Acts Amendment, Comm. cl. 1, 953

INDIA

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

- Appointments in the Civil Service*, Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington June 12, 830
- Bengal—Mortality in Gaols*, Questions, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington June 8, 478
- The Durbhunga Raj*, Questions, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington June 15, 1241; June 19, 1600
- Forced Labour in Assam*, Questions, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington June 12, 833
- Native Estates—Appointments of Managers*, Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington June 12, 833
- Petroleum Act, 1881—Importation of Explosive Oils from America*, Question, Mr. Macfarlane; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington June 6, 226; Questions, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington June 8, 481;—Relaxation of Precautionary Legislation, Questions, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington June 15, 1241;—Standard of Flashing Point, Question, Mr. Macfarlane; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington June 19, 1597
- Public Works—Return 259 of 1859—Construction of Railways*, Question, General Sir George Balfour; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington June 5, 61
- Sima Army Commission*, Question, Mr. E. Stanhope; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington June 8, 471

Intermediate Education (Ireland) Bill

[H.L.] (The Lord O'Hagan)

- i. Presented; read 1st June 13 (No. 138)
Read 2nd June 19, 1554
Committee*; Report June 20

Interments (felo de se) Bill

(Viscount Ebrington, Sir John Amory, Sir John Kennaway)

- c. Committee*—R.P. June 7 [Bill 98]
Committee*; Report June 8
Read 3rd June 9
- i. Read 1st (Earl Fortescue) June 12 (No. 130)
Read 2nd June 20, 1719

IRELAND

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

- Advances to Irish Landlords on Irish Estates*, Question, Captain Aylmer; Answer, Mr. Courtney June 20, 1760
- Commissioners of Public Works—The Annual Report*, Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Courtney June 16, 1426;—Land Improvement Loans, Question, Mr. Gibson; Answer, Mr. Courtney; Question, Mr. T. P. O'Connor [no answer] June 19, 1602

IRELAND—cont.

- Inland Navigation—Killaloe Drainage Works*, Questions, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answers, Mr. Courtney June 8, 486; June 12, 831
- Licensing Acts—Case of Mrs. Kelly*, Questions, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan June 5, 65;—Cork Races, Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 5, 79
- Local Bankruptcy—Case of Joseph Magill, Belfast*, Question, Mr. Ewart; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland June 15, 1239
- State-aided Emigration*, Questions, Captain Aylmer, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 6, 228
- The Irish Church Fund—Estimated Assets*, Questions, Lord George Hamilton, Mr. Mulholland; Answers, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Courtney June 12, 839;—Amount of the Surplus, Question, Mr. Villiers Stuart; Answer, Mr. Courtney June 15, 1245
- Irish Church Temporalities Commission—National School Teachers Act*, Question, Mr. Macartney; Answer, Mr. Courtney June 13, 979
- Library of the Four Courts, Dublin*, Question, Mr. Marum; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland June 8, 466
- The "Treaty of Kilmainham,"* Questions, Sir Walter B. Barttelot, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answers, Mr. Gladstone; Question, Mr. Sexton [no answer] June 13, 986
- Mr. O'Shea's Visit to Kilmainham Gaol*, Questions, Mr. G. W. Elliot, Mr. A. J. Balfour; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan June 15, 1251
- The "Kilmainham Compact"—Mr. Yates Thompson*, Question, Mr. G. W. Elliot; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 19, 1596

Fisheries

- Sea and Coast Fisheries*, Question, Mr. Leamy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 15, 1240
- The Irish Fisheries—The Report, 1881*, Question, Mr. Blake; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 15, 1252

National Education

- Grants to National Schools*, Question, Mr. Synan; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 12, 813

Poor Law

- Election of Guardian for the Killenkey Division, Rathdrum Union*, Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 15, 1238
- Kildysart Union—Election of Chairman of Board of Guardians*, Question, Mr. O'Shea; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 16, 1407

Post Office

- The Postmaster at Milford, Co. Cork—Case of Matthew Murphy*, Question, Mr. Leamy; Answer, Mr. Fawcett June 15, 1248

Prisons

- Captain Hill*, Question, Mr. Leamy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 5, 63

IRELAND—cont.

Law and Justice

High Court of Justice—Vacancies on the Irish Bench, Question, Mr. Gibson; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 8, 467; Question, Mr. Gibson; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan; Question, Mr. T. P. O'Connor [no answer] June 12, 814

The Coroner of the Queen's County, Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 16, 1425

Law and Police

Detective Police Force—Colonel Brackenbury, Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 15, 1240

Interference of the Police—Edenderry, Question, Mr. Molloy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 13, 985

Miss McCormack, Questions, Mr. O'Sullivan, Mr. Healy, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland June 9, 656

Police Protection for Caretakers in County Wicklow, Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 12, 817

Removal of Placards, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 9, 654

The Royal Irish Constabulary

Observations, Question, Viscount Midleton; Reply, Lord Carlingford June 9, 623

Captain Talbot, Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan June 5, 61

Constable Byrne, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 19, 1598

Distribution of the Vote of Compensation, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 12, 811; Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 19, 1590

Pay and Promotion, Question, Mr. Gibson; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 9, 651

Extra Pay—Ex-Constable Walsh, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 15, 1250

Tearing Down Notices, Question, Mr. T. D. Sullivan; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 12, 825

Crime and Outrage

Agrarian Outrages—The Returns, Question, Mr. Buxton; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 12, 832

Alleged Riots by Soldiers in Beltrubet, Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Mr. Childers June 16, 1408

Case of John Lyne, Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan, The Attorney General for Ireland June 5, 59

Illegal Notices—"Boycotting," Questions, Sir Baldwin Leighton; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan; Question, Mr. Healy; [No answer] June 12, 828

Intimidation, Question, Sir Henry Fletcher; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 20, 1752

Murder of Mr. W. Bourke and Escort—Three Farmers shot and maimed, Questions, Lord Oranmore and Browne; Replies, Earl Granville, Lord Carlingford June 9, 621; Question, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan, 662; Questions, Lord Eustace

IRELAND—Crime and Outrage—cont.

Cecil, Sir Walter B. Barttelot; Answer, Mr. Childers June 15, 1231

Outrage at Rathcoole, Question, Lord Arthur Hill; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 8, 491

Police Protection at Amagarra (Co. Cork), Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 19, 1583

Police Surveillance, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 19, 1584

The Affray at Ballina, Question, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan, The Attorney General for Ireland June 15, 1248

The Assassinations in the Phoenix Park, Dublin—Withdrawal of the Police Patrols, Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. O'Kelly, Mr. Dillon, Mr. Parnell; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan June 19, 1603

Criminal Law

Case of J. M. Johnson, Ex-Suspect, Questions, Mr. Charles Russell; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan June 8, 469

The Magistracy

Mr. H. A. Blake, R.M., Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. Callan; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan June 6, 60; Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan June 19, 1583

The Derry City Bench, Questions, Mr. Redmond, Mr. Macartney; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan; Question, Mr. Callan; [No answer] June 9, 653

State of IrelandEvictions

Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 8, 475; Observations, Colonel Nolan June 14, 1173; Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. Parnell; Answers, Mr. Gladstone June 15, 1266

Evictions at Drumlish, Co. Longford, Questions, Mr. Justin M'Carthy; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan June 8, 468

Evictions in Connemara, Questions, Viscount Lymington, Mr. Mitchell Henry; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan June 9, 651

Evictions at Rynnmount, Co. Longford, Question, Mr. Justin M'Carthy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 19, 810

County Wexford, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 15, 1251

Death from Exposure after Eviction at Rhode, King's Co., Questions, Mr. Molloy; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan June 16, 1418; Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 19, 1589; Questions, Mr. Molloy, Mr. Sexton; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan June 20, 1758

Mr. James Sheridan, Drumhaltry, Granard, Co. Longford, Question, Mr. Justin M'Carthy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 15, 1233

Applications of Persons evicted to the Land Courts, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 16, 1244

Lord Cloncurry's Tenants—Erection of Huts, Questions, Mr. Parnell, Mr. Gibson, Mr. J. Lowther; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan; Question, Mr. O'Donnell; [No answer] June 16, 1414

Captain G. Hely, Question, Mr. Marum; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 19, 1605

IRELAND—State of Ireland—Evictions—cont.

The Landlords, Question, Observations, The Marquess of Waterford; Reply, Lord Carlingford; short debate thereon June 20, 1730
The Special and Resident Magistrates and the Police, Questions, Mr. Gibson, Mr. J. Lowther, Mr. Healy, Mr. Mitchell Henry; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan; Question, Mr. O'Sullivan; [No answer] June 20, 1753
Lord Rossmore's Estates, Question, Mr. Dillon; Answer, Mr. Gladstone June 20, 1766

Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881

Arrests under the Act, Question, Mr. Leamy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 19, 1596

Detention of Persons arrested under the Act, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 6, 225;—The Island of Arran, Questions, Mr. Dillon, Sir Henry Fletcher, Mr. Healy, Mr. Brodrick, Sir Herbert Maxwell; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan, Mr. W. E. Forster, Mr. Speaker June 9, 657; Questions, Mr. Biggar, Mr. O'Shea, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan June 16, 1403; Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 19, 1599

Release of Persons detained under the Act, Questions, Mr. Gibson, Mr. Healy, Mr. T. D. Sullivan, Mr. Bulwer; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan June 8, 483; Question, Sir William Hart-Dyke; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 12, 827; Questions, Sir Herbert Maxwell, Mr. A. J. Balfour, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan; Question, Mr. Brodrick; [No answer] June 15, 1242; Questions, Mr. Sexton; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan, 1250; June 16, 1416; Questions, Mr. Healy, Colonel Dawnay; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan June 20, 1750

Cases of

W. Fitzsimons and T. Twiss, Question, Mr. Justin McCarthy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 5, 62

Messrs. Dolan and Hanly, Question, Mr. O'Kelly; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 5, 63

Joseph Huban and others, Question, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 5, 64

Edward Barrett, Question, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 5, 66

Mr. Parnell, Question, Mr. A. J. Balfour; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland June 5, 75

Mr. P. J. Quinn, Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan June 6, 225; June 15, 1254

The Rev. Thomas Feehan, Questions, Mr. Marum, Mr. Leamy, Mr. Gibson; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan June 6, 227

Mr. Thomas Brennan, Questions, Mr. Tottenham, Mr. Labouchere; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan June 6, 233

Mr. Thomas Egan, Question, Mr. O'Kelly; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 8, 470

Mr. Denis Kelly, Question, Mr. O'Kelly; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 8, 471

Mr. John Kelly, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 8, 474

Coleman Naughton, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 8, 474

[cont.]

IRELAND—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—cont.

Messrs. E. J. and M. J. Barrett, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 8, 476

Martin Mulleague, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 8, 477

Mr. Denis Crosbie, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 8, 480

Miss Gleeson, Question, Mr. J. C. Lawrance; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 8, 487

Mr. Crosbie and Mrs. Quinn, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 8, 488

Mr. Thomas Dunleavy, Question, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 8, 493

Messrs. A. and P. Gallaher, Question, Mr. Lalor; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 9, 655

Mr. John Gannon, Question, Mr. O'Kelly; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 12, 811

Dr. O'Brien and Mr. Doyle, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 12, 812

Mr. Bernard M'Hugh, Question, Mr. O'Kelly; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 12, 814

Mr. M. J. Lyons, Question, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 12, 815

Mr. James Monaghan, Question, Mr. T. D. Sullivan; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 12, 825

Patrick and John Curley, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 13, 984

Mr. M. P. Kenny, Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 13, 984

Mr. J. Houlihan, Question, Mr. Dillon; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 13, 984

James Banon, Question, Mr. Marum; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 15, 1247

Mr. John O'Brien, Question, Mr. Dillon; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 15, 1249

Messrs. John and Cornelius Kelleher, William Walsh, and Maurice Gleeson, Question, Mr. Dillon; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 15, 1250

Mr. William Keogh, Question, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 15, 1253

Messrs. T. and P. Morrissey, Question, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 15, 1253

Mr. John Darcey, Question, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 15, 1253

Mr. Arthur Moloney, Question, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 15, 1254

Mr. Thomas Cunningham, Question, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 15, 1254

Patrick Slattery, Questions, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan June 19, 1586

Michael M'Queny, Questions, Viscount Folkestone; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan, The Attorney General for Ireland June 19, 1596

John Ryan, Question, Mr. Tottenham; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 19, 1597

Edmund Stewart, Question, Mr. Corry; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan, The Attorney General for Ireland June 19, 1602

Michael M'Sweeney and John Ryan, Question, Sir Herbert Maxwell; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 20, 1757

3 T 2

[cont.]

IRELAND—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—cont.

Intimidation at Milltown Malbay, Question, Mr. O'Shea; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 16, 1406

Prison Warders, Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan June 20, 1751

Residences of Released Prisoners, Question, Mr. Donaldson-Hudson; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 20, 1757

Peace Preservation Act, 1881

Proclamation of the City of Limerick, Questions, Mr. O'Shaughnessy, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan June 16, 1234

Search for Arms, Question, Observations, Lord Forbes; Reply, Lord Carlingford June 16, 1398

Ireland—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Release of Mr. Parnell and others confined under the Act

Moved, "For correspondence respecting the release of certain persons imprisoned under the Act" (The Marquess of Waterford) June 5, 19; after debate, Motion withdrawn

Irish Land Commission

Labourers' Cottages, Question, Lord John Manners; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 8, 492

Mr. Comyn, Sub-Commissioner, Question, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 12, 807

Messrs. Wylie and Cunningham, Sub-Commissioners, Question, Lord Arthur Hill; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan June 12, 807

Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Act (1874) Amendment Bill

(Mr. Blake, Colonel Colthurst, Colonel Nolan, Mr. O'Shea, Mr. O'Connor Power, Mr. Collins)

c. Read 3^o * June 5 [Bill 133]

l. Read 1^a * (Viscount Monck) June 6 (No. 120)

Read 2^a June 13, 966

Committee *; Report June 15

Read 3^a * June 16

Royal Assent June 19 [45 Vict. c. 16]

JACKSON, Mr. W. L., Leeds

Customs Department—Salaries of Collectors, 74

JAMES, Sir H. (see ATTORNEY GENERAL, The)

JENKINS, Mr. D. J., Penryn, &c.

Regent's Canal, City, and Docks Railway, SR. 642

JERNINGHAM, Mr. H. E. H., Berwick-on-Tweed

Diplomatic Service—Foreign Languages—Examination Papers, 1232

JOHNSON, Right Hon. W. M. (Attorney General for Ireland), Mallow

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Crime—John Lyne, Case of, 60

Evictions, 1187, 1190

Land Law Act, 1881—Judicial Rents, 1264

Law and Police—Miss M'Cormack, 656, 657

Library of the Four Courts, Dublin, 466

Local Bankruptcy Act—Case of Joseph Magill, Belfast, 1239

Ireland—Protection of Person and Property

Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions

M'Queeny, Michael, 1596

Parnell, Mr., 75

Stewart, Edmund, 1602

Ireland, State of—Affray at Ballina, 1248

Judgments (Inferior Courts), Consid. 215;

add. cl. ib.; cl. 2, Amendt. 216; cl. 4, Amendt. ib., 217

Petty Sessions (Ireland), 2R. 1717

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1.

86, 87, 88, 91, 97, 106, 123, 129, 130; cl. 5.

990, 991, 992, 1002, 1003, 1006, 1007, 1008,

1009; Amendt. 1010, 1012, 1013, 1018,

1019, 1021, 1022, 1030, 1038, 1071, 1083;

cl. 8, 1527, 1528; cl. 9, 1647, 1649, 1659;

cl. 11, 1924, 1925, 1931, 1935, 1936

Judgments (Inferior Courts) Bill

(Mr. Monk, Mr. Norwood, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Corry, Mr. Reid, Mr. Serjeant Simon)

c. Considered June 5, 215

[Bill 44]

Read 3^o * June 8

l. Read 1^a * (Viscount Monck) June 9 (No. 110)

Justices' Jurisdiction Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord Bramwell)

l. Presented; read 1^a * June 5 (No. 112)

Read 2^a, after short debate June 8, 454

KENNAWAY, Sir J. H., Devon, E.

Army—Officers of the Reserve, 1246

KIMBERLEY, Earl of (Secretary of State for the Colonies)

Egypt—Riots at Alexandria—Reparation to British Subjects, 1729

Evictions (Ireland)—Landlords, 1746

LABOUCHERE, Mr. H., Northampton

Egypt—Political Crisis, 982, 1168, 1268

Riots at Alexandria, 1412

Metropolis—Epping Forest, 485, 486

Parliamentary Oath (Mr. Bradlaugh)—"Gurney v. Bradlaugh," 805; Res. 963, 1110

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1,

125, 144, 145, 146, 147; cl. 4, 324, 403,

403, 512, 514, 515, 556, 768, 857, 867, 877,

899; cl. 5, Amendt. 930, 1034; cl. 6, 1100;

cl. 7, Amendt. 1207, 1210, 1280, 1382; cl. 8,

1498, 1505, 1516; Amendt. 1538; cl. 9,

1644; cl. 10, 1692; cl. 11, 1938

Protection of Person and Property (Ireland)

Act, 1881—Mr. T. Brennan, 234, 235

Settled Land, Comm. 357

Labourers' Cottages and Allotments (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Villiers Stuart, Sir Patrick O'Brien, Sir Hervey Bruce, Colonel Colthurst, Mr. Blake, Mr. O'Sullivan)

c. Ordered; read 1^o June 21 [Bill 212]

LALOR, Mr. R., Queen's Co.

Ireland—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Messrs. A. and P. Gallaher, 656
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 152; cl. 5, 1006, 1018; cl. 7, 1327
Regent's Canal, City, and Docks Railway, 3R. 649

LAMINGTON, Lord

Egypt—Suez Canal, 1550
Food Supply—Import of Frozen Sheep, 969

Land Drainage Provisional Order Bill

(Mr. Hibbert, Secretary Sir William Harcourt)

c. Report June 9 [Bill 164]

Read 3^o June 12

l. Read 1^o (Lord Rosebery) June 12 (No. 131)

Read 2^o June 20

Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Judicial Rents, Question, Mr. Tottenham;
Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland
June 15, 1263

Loans to Occupiers, Question, Colonel Colthurst;
Answer, Mr. Gladstone June 15, 1266

Section 21 (Leases)—"Sullivan v. Bowen," Questions, Mr. Healy, Lord John Manners;
Answers, Mr. Trevelyan, Mr. Gladstone
June 19, 1588

Section 31—Advances to Irish Tenants, Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Gladstone
June 9, 661

Law and Justice—Penal Servitude Commission, 1879—Spiki Island

Question, Mr. Mulholland; Answer, Sir William Harcourt June 15, 1263

Law and Police

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Case of Charles Frost, wrongfully Convicted,
Questions, Mr. Macfarlane; Answers, Sir William Harcourt June 20, 1756

Processions of the Salvation Army, Questions, Mr. M'Laren, Mr. Healy; Answers, Sir William Harcourt; Question, Mr. R. H. Paget; [No answer] June 16, 1413

Seizure of Arms in Clerkenwell, Questions, Lord Eustace Cecil, Mr. Mitchell Henry, Sir R. Assheton Cross; Answers, Mr. Childers, Sir William Harcourt June 19, 1612

LAWRENCE, Mr. J. C., Lincolnshire S.

Ireland—Prisoners under Statute 34 Edward III. c. 1—Miss Gleeson, 487

LAWRENCE, Mr. Alderman W., London
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 514; cl. 8, 1519

LAWSON, Sir W., Carlisle

Africa (South)—Cetewayo, Ex-King of Zululand—Letter from the Transvaal Government urging his Restoration, 824
Egypt (Political Affairs), 232, 364
Licensing Acts (Ireland)—Cork Races, 79

LEA, Mr. T., Donegal

Evictions (Ireland), 1187

LEAMY, Mr. E., Waterford

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
Post Office—Irish Mails, 477;—Post Office at Milford, Co. Cork—Case of Matthew Murphy, 1248
Prisons—Captain Hill, 63
Sea and Coast Fisheries, 1240
Ireland—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Arrests under the Act, 1595
Rev. T. Feehan, 228
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 118, 123, 124, 128, 155, 156; cl. 2, 202; cl. 3, 239, 240, 278; cl. 4, 550, 600, 703; Motion for reporting Progress, 759, 885; cl. 5, 940, 1006, 1007, 1081; cl. 6, 1106; cl. 7, 1296, 1328, 1329, 1444, 1453; cl. 8, 1494, 1495, 1543; cl. 9, 1648; cl. 11, 1817, 1822, 1832, 1834, 1835; Amendt. 1838, 1858, 1894, 1919, 1941

LEE, Mr. H., Southampton

Trade and Commerce—Treaty of Commerce with Spain, 1230

LEFEVRE, Right Hon. G. J. Shaw (Chief Commissioner of Works), Reading

Palace of Westminster—House of Commons—Strangers' Gallery, 71
Science and Art—National Gallery, 1262

LEIGHTON, Sir B., Shropshire, S.

Ireland, State of—Ilegal Notices—"Boycotting," 828

LEIGHTON, Mr. S., Shropshire, N.

Army—Lieutenants of Artillery, 1594
Corn Returns (No. 2), 2R. 614
Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial Statement, 1781

LIMERICK, Earl of

Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway (Extensions and Dock), Motion for Re-comm. 14

LLOYD, Mr. M., Beaumaris

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 105, 107, 117; cl. 9, 1660, 1663; cl. 11, 1909; cl. 12, 1961

Local Government Provisional Order
(Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings)
Bill (Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Dodson)

- c. Report * June 5 [Bill 162]
Read 3^d * June 6
l. Read 1st * (Lord Carrington) June 8 (No. 121)
Read 2^d * June 19
Committee *; Report June 20

Local Government Provisional Orders
(No. 1) Bill (Lord Carrington)

- l. Read 2^d * June 12 (No. 106)
Committee *; Report June 13
Read 3^d * June 15
Royal Assent June 19 [45 Vict. c. xxxiii]

Local Government Provisional Orders
(No. 2) Bill

(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Dodson)

- c. Report * June 9 [Bill 145]
Read 3^d * June 12
l. Read 1st * (Lord Carrington) June 12 (No. 134)
Read 2^d * June 20

Local Government Provisional Orders
(No. 3) Bill

(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Dodson)

- c. Report * June 5 [Bill 152]
Considered * June 6
Read 3^d * June 7
l. Read 1st * (Lord Carrington) June 8 (No. 122)
Read 2^d * June 19

Local Government Provisional Orders
(No. 4) Bill

(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Dodson)

- c. Report * June 9 [Bill 159]
Considered * June 12
Read 3^d * June 14
l. Read 1st * (Lord Carrington) June 15 (No. 150)
Read 2^d * June 20

Local Government Provisional Orders
(No. 5) Bill

(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Dodson)

- c. Report of Select Comm. * June 20
Considered * June 21 [Bill 160]

Local Government Provisional Orders
(No. 6) Bill

(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Dodson)

- c. Report * June 9 [Bill 166]
Read 3^d * June 12
l. Read 1st * (Lord Carrington) June 12 (No. 135)
Read 2^d * June 20

Local Government Provisional Orders
(No. 7) Bill

(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Dodson)

- c. Report * June 9 [Bill 167]
Considered * June 12
Read 3^d * June 13
l. Read 1st * (Lord Carrington) June 15 (No. 145)
Read 2^d * June 20

Local Government Provisional Orders
(No. 8) Bill

(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Dodson)

- c. Report * June 9 [Bill 168]
Considered * June 12
Read 3^d * June 13
l. Read 1st * (Lord Carrington) June 15 (No. 146)
Read 2^d * June 20

Local Government Provisional Orders
(No. 9) Bill

(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Dodson)

- c. Report * June 9 [Bill 174]
Considered * June 12
Read 3^d * June 13
l. Read 1st * (Lord Carrington) June 15 (No. 147)
Read 2^d * June 20

Local Government Provisional Orders
(No. 10) Bill

(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Dodson)

- c. Report * June 9 [Bill 181]
Read 3^d * June 12
l. Read 1st * (Lord Carrington) June 12 (No. 136)
Read 2^d * June 20

Local Government Provisional Orders
(No. 11) Bill

(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Dodson)

- c. Report * June 15 [Bill 186]
Considered * June 16
Read 3^d * June 19
l. Read 1st * (Lord Carrington) June 19 (No. 132)
Read 2^d * June 20

Local Government (Gas) Provisional Order Bill

(Mr. Hibbert, Mr. Dodson)

- c. Report * June 9 [Bill 144]
Considered * June 12
Read 3^d * June 13
l. Read 1st * (Lord Carrington) June 15 (No. 144)
Read 2^d * June 20

Local Government Provisional Order (Highways) Bill

(The Lord Rosebery)

- l. Royal Assent June 19 [45 Vict. c. xxvi]

Local Government Provisional Orders
(Poor Law) Bill

(The Lord Carrington)

- l. Read 2^d * June 12 (No. 107)
Committee *; Report June 13
Read 3^d * June 15
Royal Assent June 19 [45 Vict. c. xxxiv]

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Order Bill

(The Lord Rosebery)

- l. Committee *; Report June 5 (No. 95)
Read 3^d * June 6
Royal Assent June 19 [45 Vict. c. xxxi]

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Ballymena, &c.) Bill [H.L.]

c. Report * June 5 [Bill 165]
Read 3* * June 6
l. Royal Assent June 19 [45 Vict. c. xxxii]

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (No. 2) Bill

(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)
c. Report * June 9 [Bill 165]
Read 3* * June 12
l. Read 1* * (Lord Carlingford) June 12 (No. 132)
Read 2* * June 20

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (No. 3) Bill

(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)
c. Report * June 9 [Bill 172]
Read 3* * June 12
l. Read 1* * (Lord Carlingford) June 12 (No. 133)
Read 2* * June 20

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Order (No. 4) Bill

(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)
c. Read 2* * June 6 [Bill 173]

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (No. 5) Bill

(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)
c. Read 2* * June 6 [Bill 175]
Report * June 16
Read 3* * June 19
l. Read 1* * (Lord Carlingford) June 19 (No. 153)
Read 2* * June 20

LONDON, Bishop of

Union of Benefices (London), Report of Amendts. 219, 220

LOTHIAN, Marquess of

Entail (Scotland), 2R. 1223

LOWTHER, Right Hon. J., Lincoln, N.

Egypt—Political Crisis, 981, 1162, 1163, 1164, 1165, 1258, 1260, 1763
Ireland—Evictions—Lord Cloncurry's Estate—Erection of Fluts, 1415 ;—Special and Resident Magistrates and the Police, 1755
Law and Police—Seizure of Arms at Clerkenwell, 1613
Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial Statement, 1790, 1791, 1792, 1793, 1794
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 5, 1021, 1038 ; cl. 7, 1287, 1430, 1431, 1432, 1433, 1437, 1438, 1468, 1469 ; cl. 9, 1620

Lunacy Districts (Scotland) Bill [H.L.]

(The Earl of Dalhousie)

l. Presented ; read 1* * June 6 (No. 117)
Read 2* * June 20

LYMINGTON, Viscount, Barnstaple
Ireland—Evictions in Connemara, 651

MACARTNEY, Mr. J. W. E., Tyrone

Egypt—Political Crisis, 983
Ireland—Irish Church Temporalities Commission—National School Teachers Act, 979
Magistracy—Derry City Bench, 653
Parliament—Privilege—Unparliamentary Language, 1277, 1278
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 322 ; cl. 5, 1036

M'CARTHY, Mr. Justin, Longford

Ireland—Evictions—Miscellaneous Questions
Drumlish, Co. Longford, 468
Rynmount, Co. Longford, 810
Sheridan, Mr. J., Drumhalry, Granard, Co. Longford, 1233
Ireland—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Fitzsimons, W., and T. Tuite, 62
Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial Statement, 1783
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 151, 154 ; cl. 3, Amendt. 264, 271 ; cl. 4, 323, 532, 586, 729, 918 ; cl. 5, 1075 ; cl. 7, 1300, 1354 ; cl. 9, 1668 ; cl. 11, 1928

M'COAN, Mr. J. C., Wicklow

Egypt (Political Affairs)—Miscellaneous Questions
232, 364
Political Crisis, 1225, 1761
Riots at Alexandria, 1413
Parliament—Rules of Debate, 1581
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 102, 113 ; cl. 5, Amendt. 1028, 1038, 1066 ; cl. 9, 1646, 1648, 1650, 1666 ; cl. 11, 1827, 1836

MACFARLANE, Mr. D. H., Carlow Co.

Evictions (Ireland), 1184
Law and Police—Case of Charles Frost, wrongfully Convicted, 1756, 1757
Parliament—Public Business, Arrangement of, 82
Petroleum Act (India), 1881—Importation of Explosive Oils from America, 226 ;—Standard of Flashing Point, 1597
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 115, 120 ; cl. 3, 270 ; cl. 5, 1001 ; cl. 7, 1364 ; cl. 9, 1668 ; cl. 11, 1943

MCGABRIEL-HOGG, Sir J. M., Truro

Metropolitan Board of Works (Money), 2R. 1392

MAC IVER, Mr. D., Birkenhead

Army (Auxiliary Forces)—Adjutants, 1405
Egypt—Political Crisis, 1606, 1607
Malta, Affairs of—Notice of Motion, 685
Parliament—Business of the House, 1769 ;—Ministerial Statement, 1800, 1805
Prevention of Crime (Ireland)—Recent Division, 81, 82
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 11, 1950, 1951

McKENNA, Sir J. N., Youghal

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1,
112; cl. 3, 248; cl. 4, 582, 583; cl. 7, 1355,
1445; cl. 11, 1870

MACKINTOSH, Mr. C. FRASER-, Inverness,
*&c.

Evictions (Scotland)—Lochcarron, Co. Ross, 806

McLAREN, Mr. C. B. B., Stafford

Law and Police—Processions of the Salvation
Army, 1413, 1414
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 9, 1645

MAOLIVER, Mr. P. S., Plymouth

Army—Appointments in the Royal Engineers,
85
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4,
590, 593; cl. 7, 1335

Malta, Affairs of

Question, Mr. Mac Iver; Answer, Mr. Anderson June 9, 665

Manchester Corporation Bill (by Order)

c. Considered June 19, 1575

MANNERS, Right Hon. Lord J. J. R., *Leicestershire, N.

Egypt and Italy—Cession of Assab Bay, 1270
Irish Land Commission—Labourers' Cottages, 492

Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881—Sec. 21—
"Sullivan v. Bowen," 1589

Protection of Person and Property (Ireland)
Act, 1881—Mr. T. Brennan, 234

Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill [H.L.] (The Earl of Dalhousie)

l. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a"
June 12, 774

Amendt. to leave out ("now") and add ("this day six months") (The Lord Balfour): after debate, on question, that ("now.") &c.:
Cont. 128, Not-Cont. 131; M. 3; resolved
in the negative (No. 75)

Div. List, Cont. and Not-Cont. 801

Married Women's Property Bill [H.L.]

(Mr. Osborne Morgan)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a" June 8, 615; Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Sir George Campbell);
Question put, and negatived

Original Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2^o [Bill 191]

MARTIN, Mr. P., Kilkenny Co.

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1,
103, 108, 124, 128; cl. 4, 731; cl. 5, 1009,
1010, 1016; Amendt. 1085; cl. 7, Amendt.
1191, 1215, 1283, 1285, 1286, 1352, 1375;
Amendt. 1427; cl. 11, Motion for reporting
Progress, 1874

MARUM, Mr. E. P. M., Kilkenny Co.

Ireland—Evictions—Captain G. Healy, 1605
Library of the Four Courts, Dublin, 466

Ireland—Protection of Person and Property
Act, 1881—Bannon, James, 1247
Rev. T. Feehan, 227

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1,
83, 102, 103; Amendt. 110, 112, 118,
119, 131; cl. 3, Amendt. 207; Motion for reporting Progress, 208; Amendt. 237,
255, 262; cl. 4, 404, 748, 755, 762, 889;
cl. 5, 943, 945, 1002, 1005, 1008; Amendt.
1010, 1013, 1071, 1072; cl. 7, 1281;
Amendt. 1307, 1361, 1454; cl. 8, 1482,
1520; Amendt. 1537, 1540; cl. 9, 1624,
1635, 1636, 1657; cl. 11, 1824; Amendt.
1914

MASTER, Mr. T. W. O., Cirencester

Army—Competitive Examinations—West
Indian Regiments, 64

MAXWELL, Sir H. E., Wigton

Parliament—Rules of Debate—Questions—
Release of Persons detained under the Protection of Person and Property (Ireland)
Act, 1881, 1591, 1592

Protection of Person and Property (Ireland)
Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions

M'Sweeney, Michael, and John Ryan, 1757
Persons detained under the Act—Island of Arran, 659

Release of Persons detained under the Act, 1242, 1244

MELLOR, Mr. J. W., Grantham

Settled Land, Comm. 356

METGE, Mr. R. H., Meath

Ireland—Evictions, 1185

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 3,
242, 284; cl. 4, 557, 687; cl. 5, 930, 1080;
cl. 7, 1367, 1386, 1441, 1442, 1456; cl. 8,
1520; Amendt. 1540, 1542; cl. 9, 1878

METHUEN, Lord

Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway
(Extensions and Dock), Motion for Re-
comm. 9, 19

METROPOLISMISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Epping Forest, Question, Mr. Labouchere;
Answer, Sir William Harcourt June 8, 485

Public Health (Metropolis)—Robin Hood Court,
Shoe Lane, Question, Mr. J. G. Talbot;
Answer, Mr. Dodson June 12, 816

Thames River (Human Corpses), Questions,
Baron Henry De Worms; Answers, Sir
William Harcourt June 12, 809

The Parks—Gardens of the Royal Botanic Society, Regent's Park—Admission of the Public, Question, Mr. Broadhurst; Answer,
Mr. Courtney June 12, 805

Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment Bill

(The Lord Thurlow)

- l. Read 2^a June 8 (No. 104)
Committee; Report June 13, 1887
Read 3^a June 15
Royal Assent June 19 [45 Vict. c. 14]

Metropolitan Board of Works (Money) Bill

(Mr. Courtney, Lord Richard Grosvenor)

- c. Read 2^a, after short debate June 15, 1889
[Bill 176]

MIDDLETON, Viscount
Royal Irish Constabulary, 623

Military Manœuvres Bill

(The Earl of Morley)

- l. Royal Assent June 19 [45 Vict. c. 10]

Militia Storehouses Bill

(Earl Beauchamp)

- l. Royal Assent June 19 [45 Vict. c. 12]

MILLTOWN, Earl of

County Courts (Ireland), 2R. 1557
Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment, Comm. cl. 6, Amendt. 987, 988

MINTO, Earl of Entails (Scotland), 1400

Mint, The Royal—Profit on the Coinage of Silver

Question, Mr. Williamson; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 19, 1811

MOLLOY, Mr. B. C., King's Co.

Ireland—Evictions—Death from Exposure after Eviction at Rhode, King's Co., 1418, 1758
Interference of Police, Edenderry, 985
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 5, 1009; Amendt. 1045; cl. 6, 1105

MONCK, Viscount

Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Act (1874) Amendment, 2R. 986

MONK, Mr. C. J., Gloucester City

Channel Tunnel Scheme, 834
Metropolitan Board of Works (Money), 2R. 1391, 1392
Partnerships, Comm. Motion for Adjournment, 210; Motion for reporting Progress, 214
Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill—Condition of Ireland, 840
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 7, 1384
Regent's Canal, City, and Docks Railway, 3R. Amendt. 631
Settled Land, Comm. 350

MOORE, Mr. A. J., Clonmel

Emigration—Miscellaneous Questions
Emigration Acts—Emigrants in Hull, 1235
Passenger Traffic from Scandinavian Ports, 979
The "Nemesis," 472, 473
United States of America—Passenger Acts, 983
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 125, 127, 168

MORGAN, Right Hon. G. Osborne (Judge Advocate General), Denbighshire

Army—Drunkennes, 1582
Married Women's Property, 2R. 615, 617

MORLEY, Earl of (Under Secretary of State for War)

Channel Tunnel Scheme, 1723
Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, 629

MOWBRAY, Right Hon. Sir J. R., Oxford University

Regent's Canal, City, and Docks Railway, 3R. 646

MULHOLLAND, Mr. J., Downpatrick

Irish Church Fund—Estimated Assets, 839
Penal Servitude Commission, 1879—Spike Island, 1263

MUNDELLA, Right Hon. A. J. (Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education), Sheffield

Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts—Prosecution at Sleaford, 809
Education Department—Miscellaneous Questions
Roman Catholic Schools, Oldham, 1586
Science and Art Department—Hall of Science, Old Street, 472, 1260, 1261
Spelling Reform—The Phonic System, 978
Elementary Education (Scotland)—Island of Lewis, 1408
Public Schools (Scotland) Teachers, Comm. 208, 210; cl. 3, 950, 951; cl. 4, Amendt. 952

Municipal Corporations (Unreformed)

Bill [H.L.] (The Lord Rossbery)

- l. Committee * June 13 (Nos. 79-140)
Report * June 15
Read 3^a * June 16

NAVY

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Breech-Loading Guns, Question, Colonel Nolan; Answer, Mr. Childers June 6, 236
Dockyards—Memorial of Established Shipwrights, Question, Mr. Puleston; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman June 15, 1246
The Riggers in the Dockyards, Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman June 6, 227
Engineer Students—H.M.S. "Marlborough," Question, Mr. Gorst; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman June 19, 1593
H.M.S. "Inconstant," Question, Viscount Sidmouth; Answer, The Earl of Northbrook June 13, 971

NAVY—cont.

H.M.S. "Swiftsure," Accident on Board, Questions, Sir John Hay, Lord Eustace Cecil, Colonel Nolan; Answers, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, Mr. Childers June 5, 80; Question, Sir John Hay; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman June 8, 493; June 12, 815

Inspector of Machinery in the Channel Squadron, Question, Captain Price; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman June 16, 1408

Liability of Officers—Retired Pay, Question, Mr. St. Aubyn; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman June 15, 1264

The Mediterranean Squadron, Question, Sir John Hay; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman June 19, 1593

NELSON, Earl

Union of Benefices (London), Report of Amendments, 219

NEWDEGATE, Mr. C. N., Warwickshire, N.

Egypt (Political Affairs)—Riots at Alexandria, 1410

Parliament—Business of the House, 236;—Ministerial Statement, 1781

Parliamentary Oath (Mr. Bradlaugh)—"Gurney v. Bradlaugh," 805; Res. 963, 1112, 1120, 1121, 1125

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 126, 127; cl. 3, 245; cl. 4, 442, 526, 591, 592, 593; cl. 6, 1107; cl. 7, 1431; cl. 10, 1692; cl. 11, 1864, 1915

Newspapers—Inciting Language—The "Glasgow Herald"

Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Sir William Harcourt June 16, 1416

New Zealand—To Whiti, the Maori Chief

Questions, Mr. Cropper, Mr. Brogden; Answers, Mr. Evelyn Ashley June 19, 1586

NOLAN, Colonel J. P., Galway Co.

Army—Cost of Salutes, 654

Shooting and Driving Prizes, 1881, 1595

Ejectments Suspension (Ireland), 1110, 1127

Evictions (Ireland), 1173, 1174

Navy—Breech-Loading Guns, 236

Explosion on Board H.M.S. "Swiftsure," 80, 81

Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial Statement, 1805

Parliamentary Oath (Mr. Bradlaugh)—"Gurney v. Bradlaugh," Res. 1025, 1026

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 197, 200, 206; cl. 3, 282, 283; cl. 6, 1099; cl. 8, Amendt. 1478, 1481, 1485, 1487, 1498, 1500, 1501; cl. 10, 1696, 1698; cl. 11, 1816, 1822, 1833, 1840, 1842, 1914

NORTHBROOK, Earl of (First Lord of the Admiralty)

Egypt (Political Affairs)—Combined Fleet at Alexandria, 461, 463

Navy—H.M.S. "Inconstant," 671

NORTHCOTE, Right Hon. Sir S. H., Devon, N.

Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill—The Estimates, 836

Crime and Outrage (Ireland)—Murder of Mr. Bourke and Escort—Three Farmers Shot and Maimed, 662

Egypt—Miscellaneous Questions

Political Affairs, 70, 231

Political Crisis, 980, 1129, 1150, 1152, 1257, 1608

Riots at Alexandria, 1411

Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial Statement, 1776, 1777, 1789

Parliament—Public Business, 1274, 1613

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 571; cl. 7, 1381; cl. 10, 1700, 1709, 1713

NORTHCOTE, Mr. H. S., Exeter

Egypt (Political Affairs)—Riots at Alexandria—Papers, 822

North Sea Fisheries Convention—Ratification

Question, Mr. Birkbeck; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke June 20, 1756

NORWOOD, Mr. C. M., Kingston-upon-Hull

Egypt—Political Crisis, 982

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 155

O'BEIRNE, Colonel F., Leitrim

Army—Organization of the Cavalry, 652

Pay Department, 832

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 5, 1077

O'BRIEN, Sir P., King's Co.

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 7, 1353; cl. 11, 1815

O'CONNOR, Mr. A., Queen's Co.

Army—Field Days in Hot Weather, 476

India—Appointments in the Civil Service, 830

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Commissioners of Public Works—Annual Report, 1426

Evictions, 475

Killaloe Drainage Works, 486, 831

Law and Justice—Coroner of the Queen's Co., 1425

Parliament—Miscellaneous Questions

Order of Debate—Mr. O'Kelly, M.P. for Roscommon, 367

Privilege—Un-Parliamentary Language, 1275, 1279

Rules of Debate—Questions—Release of Persons detained under the Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, 1891, 1592

Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial Statement, 1793

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 158; cl. 4, 331, 568, 575, 720; cl. 5, 938; cl. 7, 1388

O'CONNOR, Mr. T. P., Galway

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
 High Court of Justice—Judicial Vacancies, 814
 Law and Police—Miss M'Cormack, 657
 Licensing Acts, 65, 66
 Prevention of Crime Bill—Condition of Ireland, 842;—Recent Division, 81
 Public Works Commissioners—Land Improvement Loans, 1603
 State-Aided Emigration, 229
 "Treaty of Kilmainham," 930
 Ireland—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions
 Barrett, Edward, 66
 Brennan, Mr. Thomas, 235
 Cunningham, Mr. T., 1254
 Darcey, Mr. John, 1253
 Huban, J., and others, 64, 65
 Keogh, Mr. W. 1253
 Muloney, Mr. A. 1254
 Morrissey, Messrs. T. and P., 1253
 Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 134, 147, 150; cl. 2, 195; cl. 3, 206, 207, 267, 268, 269; cl. 4, 312, 318, 319, 382, 521, 522, 559, 593, 594, 607, 678, 679, 744, 745, 764, 765, 854, 858, 882, 907, 910; cl. 5, 932, 935, 1003, 1007, 1061, 1062, 1069; cl. 6, 1098; cl. 7, 1191, 1206; Amendt. 1314, 1323, 1354, 1362, 1386; cl. 8, 1514; Motion for reporting Progress, 1515, 1516, 1530, 1532; cl. 9, 1644; Amendt. 1651, 1652; cl. 10, 1690; cl. 11, Amendt. 1819, 1821, 1827, 1830, 1836, 1845, 1866, 1867, 1878, 1910, 1911

O'DONNELL, Mr. F. H., Dungarvan

Egypt (Political Affairs)—Miscellaneous Questions
 231, 233, 1421
 Political Crisis, 1260
 Riots at Alexandria—Papers, 821
 India—Miscellaneous Questions
 Assam, Forced Labour in, 833
 Bengal—Durbhunga Raj, 1241, 1600, 1601;—Mortality in Gaols, 478, 479
 Native Estates—Appointments of Managers, 833, 834
 Petroleum Act, 1881—Importation of Explosive Oils from America, 481, 482, 1241, 1242
 Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
 Crime and Police—Detective Police Force—Colonel Brackenbury, 1240
 Evictions, 1189, 1190;—Lord Cloncurry's Tenants—Erection of Huts, 1416
 Prevention of Crime Bill—Condition of Ireland, 840
 Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Detention of Prisoners under the Act, 1599;—Slattery, Patrick, 1586, 1587
 Royal Irish Constabulary—Vote of Compensation, 1590
 Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial Statement, 1795, 1796;—Rules of Debate, 1581
 Scotch Business, 1273
 Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 141, 154; cl. 3, 259, 280, 287; cl. 4, 426, 435, 546, 555, 578, 604, 609, 749; Amendt. 751, 756, 766, 891; cl. 5, 1038; cl. 7, 1198, O'DONNELL, Mr. F. H.—cont.

1200, 1901, 1392, 1365, 1374, 1376, 1388, 1450; cl. 8, 1487, 1495; Amendt. 1496, 1498, 1525; cl. 9, 1671, 1676, 1680; cl. 11, Motion for reporting Progress, 1820, 1821, 1825, 1864

O'DONOGHUE, The, Tralee

Post Office—Telephone Licences, 1232

O'HAGAN, Lord

County Courts (Ireland), 2R. 1556
 Intermediate Education (Ireland), 2R. 1554, 1556

O'KELLY, Mr. J., Roscommon

Egypt (Political Affairs)—Political Crisis, 1258, 1420
 Riots at Alexandria, 1412
 Ireland—Assassinations in Phoenix Park, Dublin—Withdrawal of Police Patrols, 1604
 Ireland—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions
 Dolan and Hanly, Messrs. 63
 Egan, Mr. Thomas, 470
 Gannon, Mr. John, 811
 Kelly, Mr. Denis, 471
 M'Hugh, Mr. Bernard, 814
 Parliament—Privilege—Un-Parliamentary Language, 1279
 Rules of Debate, 1581
 Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 96, 97, 102; cl. 4, 310, 313, 526, 579; Motion for reporting Progress, 606, 707; cl. 5, 1007, 1077; cl. 7, 1313; cl. 9, 1638; Amendt. 1642, 1644, 1651; cl. 10, 1710; cl. 11, 1809, 1852, 1868, 1872, 1882, 1894, 1921

ONSLOW, Mr. D. R., Guildford

Education Department—Hall of Science, Old Street, 1260
 Egypt—Miscellaneous Questions
 Political Affairs, 1422
 Political Crisis, 1131, 1154, 1155, 1226, 1258, 1260, 1608, 1609, 1706;—British Refugees, 1601
 Riots at Alexandria—Papers, 820, 1409, 1410, 1412
 Highway Rates—Small Tenements, 816
 Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial Statement, 1781, 1794

ORANMORE AND BROWNE, Lord

Crime and Outrage (Ireland)—Murder of Mr. W. Bourke and Escort—Three Farmers Shot and Maimed, 621, 622
 Evictions (Ireland)—Landlords, 1740
 Imprisonment for Contumacy, Report of Amendments, Amendt. 220

O'SHAUGHNESSY, Mr. R., Limerick

Army (Auxiliary Forces)—Militia Surgeons Pensions, 1228
 Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1881—Proclamation of the County of Limerick, 1234
 Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 3, 254; cl. 4, 321, 530, 742, 888

O'SHEA, Mr. W. H., Clare

Ireland—Kilmainham Gaol—Mr. O'Shea's Visit, 1262

Poor Law—Kildysart Union—Election of Chairman of Board of Guardians, 1407

Ireland—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Intimidation at Miltown Malbay, 1406

Persons detained under the Act, 1404, 1405
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 335; cl. 10, 1696

O'SULLIVAN, Mr. W. H., Limerick Co.

Ireland—Evictions—Special and Resident Magistrates and the Police, 1756

Law and Police—Miss M'Cormack, 856

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 335, 705; cl. 7, 1453; cl. 9, 1631; cl. 11, 1919

PAGET, Mr. R. H., Somersetshire, Mid

Adulteration Acts—Lard Cheese, 826

Law and Police—Processions of the Salvation Army, 1414

Post Office—Adhesive Stamps on Post Cards, 465, 466

PALMER, Mr. J. H., Lincoln

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, Amendt. 113; cl. 4, 322

ParliamentLORDS—

Public Business—The House of Lords—The Local Government Bill, Question, Observations, The Earl of Camperdown, Earl Stanhope; Replies, Lord Carrington, Earl Granville June 20, 1719

COMMONS—

Order in Debate—Mr. O'Kelly, M.P. for Roscommon, Observations, Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answers, Mr. Speaker June 7, 365

Rules of Debate

Amendments—Precedence in Committees, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Speaker June 5, 82

Questions, Notices, Mr. M'Coan, Mr. O'Donnell; Question, Mr. O'Kelly; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke June 19, 1531;—Release of Persons detained under the Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, 1881, Questions, Sir Herbert Maxwell, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. A. J. Balfour; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan, Mr. Speaker, 1501

Rules and Orders

Standing Order 167, Question, Mr. Arthur Arnold; Answer, Mr. Lyon Playfair June 9, 664

Order of Business, Question, Mr. Gorst; Answer, Mr. Speaker June 9, 665

PARLIAMENT—COMMONS—cont.Standing Orders—Private Bills

Standing Order 129 amended, in lines 9 and 10, by leaving out the words "the Report of the Examiner on such Bill," and inserting the words "the Examiner shall have given notice of the day on which the Bill will be examined" instead thereof (The Chairman of Ways and Means) June 5

Privilege

Un-Parliamentary Language, Observations, Mr. Macartney; short debate thereon June 15, 1277

Business of the House

Arrangement of Public Business, Question, Mr. Macfarlane; Answer, Mr. Gladstone June 5, 82; Questions, Mr. J. G. Hubbard, Mr. Newdegate, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Gladstone June 6, 235; Question, Mr. Storey; Answer, Mr. Gladstone June 15, 1274;—English and Scotch Agricultural Measures, Questions, Mr. James Howard, Mr. Chaplin; Answers, Mr. Gladstone June 8, 491;—Morning Sitting, Question, Mr. Dillwyn; Answer, Mr. Gladstone June 12, 843;—Scotch Business, Questions, Sir John Hay, Sir George Campbell, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, Mr. Gladstone June 15, 1272;—"Questions," Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett [no answers] June 16, 1426; Question, Mr. Mac Iver; Answer, Mr. Speaker June 20, 1769;—The Government Annuities Bill, Question, Baron Henry De Worms; Answer, Mr. Fawcett June 19, 1598;—Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill, Questions, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Gladstone June 19, 1613;—Police Superannuation Bill, Question, Baron De Ferrieres; Answer, Sir William Ilarcourt June 20, 1752;—The New Rules of Procedure, Question, Mr. Gorst; Answer, Mr. Gladstone June 20, 1767

Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill, Question, Mr. Cavendish Bentinck; Answer, Mr. Gladstone June 20, 1768

Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill—Dublin Petition, Petition presented, The Lord Mayor of Dublin (Mr. Dawson) June 20, 1743

Palace of Westminster—The House of Commons—The Strangers' Gallery, Question, Mr. Joseph Cowen; Answer, Mr. Shaw Lefevre June 5, 71

Parliament—Business of the House

Ministerial Statement, Mr. Gladstone June 20, 1769

Moved, "That the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill have precedence, on every day for which it is set down, of all other Orders of the Day and Notices of Motions, except the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill" (Mr. Gladstone); after long debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. R. N. Fowler); after further short debate, Motion withdrawn

Original Question put: A. 253, N. 97; M. 156 (D. L. 153)

Parliament — Parliamentary Oath (Mr. Bradlaugh) — "Gurney v. Bradlaugh"

Moved, "That leave be given to the proper Officer to attend the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice with the said paper writing and copy of the New Testament" (Mr. Labouchere) June 12, 805; Motion postponed

Moved, "That leave be given to the proper Officer to attend the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice with the said paper writing and copy of the New Testament" (Mr. Labouchere) June 12, 963; Motion being opposed, not proceeded with

Moved, "That leave be given to the proper Officer of this House to attend the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, with the paper writing subscribed by Mr. Charles Bradlaugh at the Table of the House on the 21st February last, and the copy of the New Testament named in the Journals of the House of the same date" (Mr. Labouchere) June 13, 1111; after debate, Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. E. Stanhope); Question put; A. 65, N. 85; M. 20 (D. L. 137)

Original Question again proposed, 1125; Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Lord Claud Hamilton); after short debate, Motion withdrawn; original Question put, and agreed to

PARLIAMENT—HOUSE OF LORDS

Sat First

June 5 — The Lord Barrogill (the Earl of Caithness) after the death of his father

June 19 — The Lord Erskine, after the death of his father

PARLIAMENT—HOUSE OF COMMONS

New Writ Issued

June 12 — For the County of Banff, v. Robert William Duff, esquire, Commissioner of the Treasury

New Member Sworn

June 19 — Robert William Duff, esquire, County of Ban

Parliamentary Oaths Act (1866) Amendment Bill [H.L.]

(The Duke of Argyll)

L. Presented; read 1st June 5 (No. 111)

PARNELL, Mr. C. S., Cork City

Ireland — Assassinations in Phoenix Park, Dublin — Withdrawal of Police Patrols, 1604

Evictions, 1175, 1180, 1268; — Lord Cloncurry's Tenants — Erection of Huts, 1414, 1415

Parliament — Business of the House, Ministerial Statement 1787

PARNELL, Mr. C. S.—cont.

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 88, 92, 101, 104, 106, 108; Amendt. 110, 117, 118, 123, 126, 127, 186, 188, 189; cl. 2, 195, 196; cl. 4, 305, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 316, 334; Motion for reporting Progress, 452, 497, 500, 503, 507, 508, 510, 516, 519, 522; Amendt. ib., 523, 527, 588, 590; Motion for Adjournment, 610, 732, 739, 865, 868, 870, 873; Amendt. 908; cl. 5, 943, 946, 949, 1007, 1008, 1010, 1014, 1015, 1016, 1019, 1025, 1026, 1028, 1051, 1056, 1059, 1060; Amendt. 1083; cl. 6, Amendt. 1088, 1089, 1092, 1093, 1097, 1101, 1102, 1105, 1110; cl. 7, 1192, 1194, 1195; Amendt. 1358, 1360, 1364, 1371, 1373, 1375, 1383; Motion for Adjournment, 1387, 1433; Amendt. 1434, 1438, 1440, 1441; cl. 8, 1511, 1524; Amendt. 1525, 1529, 1535; cl. 9, Amendt. 1665, 1669, 1673, 1674; cl. 10, 1703; Amendt. 1706, 1710, 1712, 1713; cl. 11, 1823, 1824, 1826, 1846, 1849, 1851, 1854, 1861, 1865, 1871, 1881, 1882; Amendt. 1897, 1906, 1913, 1930, 1931

PARRY, Mr. T. L. Jones, Carnarvon, &c.

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 11, 1842

Partnerships Bill

(Mr. Monk, Mr.

Gregory, Mr. Barran, Mr. Lewis Fry)

c. Order for Committee (on re-comm.) read; Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" June 5, 210; Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Horace Davey); after short debate, Motion withdrawn

Original Question put, and agreed to; Committee—A.F. [Bill 179]

PATRICK, Mr. R. W. COCHRAN-, Ayrshire, N.

Ways and Means—Inland Revenue—Carriage Duties, 77

PEDDIE, Mr. J. DICK-, Kilmarnock, &c.

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 7, 1461

PEEL, Mr. A. W., Warwick Bo.

Regent's Canal, City, and Docks Railway, 3R. 6 9

PELL, Mr. A., Leicestershire, S.

Vagrancy, 2R. 358; Comm. cl. 4, 1886

PERCY, Right Hon. Earl, Northumberland, N.

Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial Statement, 1803

PETERBOROUGH, Bishop of

Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister, 2R. 795

Petty Sessions (Ireland) Bill [H.L.]

o. Read 1^o June 14 [Bill 203]
Read 2^o June 19, 1717

Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders Bill

(Mr. Ashley, Mr. Chamberlain)

c. Report * June 8 [Bill 142]
Considered * June 12
Read 3^o * June 13
l. Read 1^o * (Lord Sudeley) June 15 (No. 148)
Read 2^o * June 20

Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders (No. 2 Bill

(Mr. Ashley, Mr. Chamberlain)

c. Report * June 5 [Bill 150]
Considered * June 6
Read 3^o * June 7
l. Read 1^o * (Lord Sudeley) June 8 (No. 123)
Read 2^o * June 16
Committee *; Report June 19

Places of Public Worship Sites Amendment Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord Aberdare)

l. Committee * June 13 (Nos. 77-141)
Report * June 16
Read 3^o * June 19

PLAYFAIR, Right Hon. Mr. Lyon
(Chairman of Committees of Ways and Means and Deputy Speaker), Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities

Blackburn Improvement, Consid. 1573

Parliament—Order of Debate—Mr. O'Kelly,
M.P. for Roscommon, 366

Rules and Orders—Standing Order 167, 664

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 102, 103, 104, 107, 108, 127, 136, 155, 156;
cl. 3, 262, 263, 264, 265, 274, 276, 277, 279,
280, 281, 282, 283, 286; cl. 4, 297, 298, 299,
308, 310, 311, 312, 313, 321, 416, 436, 450,
451, 514, 515, 516, 522, 523, 533, 538, 540,
557, 565, 575, 583, 584, 590, 591, 592, 593,
594, 609, 718, 759, 763, 764, 766, 858, 862,
926, 930; cl. 5, 933, 938, 1001, 1002, 1009,
1016, 1043, 1055, 1056, 1059, 1060, 1065,
1066, 1067, 1068, 1070, 1078, 1081, 1082;
cl. 6, 1096, 1100, 1105, 1110; cl. 7, 1200,
1201, 1206, 1255, 1294, 1296, 1331, 1338,
1424, 1430, 1431, 1438, 1438, 1440, 1442,
1443; cl. 8, 1484, 1487, 1490, 1493, 1508,
1531, 1538; cl. 9, 1622, 1626, 1632, 1636,
1636, 1639, 1654, 1673, 1678; cl. 10, 1693,
1701, 1706; cl. 11, 1810, 1813, 1815, 1819,
1820, 1821, 1826, 1827, 1828, 1835, 1842,
1851, 1862, 1863, 1865, 1893, 1905, 1908,
1916, 1940, 1941, 1947, 1951; cl. 12, 1962

Public Schools (Scotland) Teachers, Comm.
cl. 2, 950; cl. 3, 951

PLUNKET, Right Hon. D. R., Dublin University

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1,
121, 183; cl. 2, Amendt. 198, 201; cl. 4,
422, 423, 771; cl. 5, 1043, 1067, 1068;
cl. 10, 1710; cl. 11, 1827, 1874, 1912

Pluralities Acts Amendment Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord Bishop of Exeter)

l. Report June 13, 965 (Nos. 74-102)
Read 3^o * June 19 (No. 139)

Police Bill

(Mr. Hibbert, Secretary Sir William Harcourt, The Lord Advocate)

c. Motion for Leave (Mr. Hibbert) June 8, 617; after short debate, Motion agreed to; Bill ordered; read 1^o * [Bill 197]

Poor Law—The Burnley Board of Guardians—Roman Catholic Children

Question, Mr. Callan; Answer, Mr. Dodson
June 8, 486

Poor Rates Bill

l. Read 1^o * (Lord Carrington) June 5 (No. 113)
Read 2^o June 16, 1398

PORTER, Mr. A. M. (Solicitor General for Ireland), Londonderry Co.

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1,
132; cl. 4, 755; cl. 7, 1324, 1329, 1353,
1370

POST OFFICEMISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Adhesive Stamps on Post Cards, Question, Mr. R. H. Paget; Answer, Mr. Fawcett June 8, 465

Letter Carriers (Blackheath and Greenwich), Question, Baron Henry De Worms; Answer, Mr. Fawcett June 8, 483

Auxiliary Letter Carriers, Question, Mr. Schreiber; Answer, Mr. Courtney June 8, 480; Question, Mr. J. G. Hubbard; Answer, Mr. Fawcett June 12, 828

The Letter Carriers—Increase of Pay, Question, Mr. Schreiber; Answer, Mr. Courtney June 19, 1614

Insurance of Registered Letters, Question, Mr. Greer; Answer, Mr. Fawcett June 8, 469

Telephone Licences, Question, The O'Donoghue; Answer, Mr. Fawcett June 15, 1232

The Uxbridge Post Office, Question, Mr. Schreiber; Answer, Mr. Fawcett June 12, 829

The Irish Mails, Question, Mr. Leamy; Answer, Mr. Fawcett June 8, 477

Telegraph Department—A Sixpenny Rate for Telegrams, Question, Mr. E. Stanhope; Answer, Mr. Fawcett June 15, 1236

POWER, Mr. J. O'Connor, Mayo

Education Department—Roman Catholic Schools, Oldham, 1586

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Evictions, 1187

Irish Land Commission—Mr. Comyn, Sub-Commissioner, 807

Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Dunleavy, Mr. Thomas, 493;—Lyons, Mr. M. J., 815

State of—Affray at Ballina, 1248

POWER, Mr. J. O'Connor—cont.

Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial Statement, 1802
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 107; cl. 4, 520, 529; cl. 5, 1069; cl. 6, 1098; cl. 10, 1701

POWER, Mr. R., Waterford

Married Women's Property, 2R. 616
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 5, 1080; cl. 6, 1101; cl. 7, 1388; cl. 8, 1487, 1521; cl. 9, 1633; cl. 11, 1835; Amendt. 1838, 1889

POWIS, Earl of

Somersham Rectory, 2R. 1558
Union of Benefices (London), Report of Amendts. Amendt. 220

Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill

Clause 5—Deasy's Act, Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Gladstone June 8, 490
Memorial of Irish Judges, Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Gladstone June 5, 77
The Protest of the Judges, Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. Callan; Answers, Mr. Gladstone June 12, 838
The Condition of Ireland, Questions, Mr. Monk, Mr. O'Donnell, Sir Henry Tyler, Mr. Healy, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answers, Mr. Gladstone June 12, 840

Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill

(Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland)

c. The Recent Division, Questions, Mr. Mac Iver, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answers, Mr. Gladstone June 5, 81

Committee—R.P. [Fourth Night] June 5, 83

[Bill 157]

Committee—R.P. [Fifth Night] June 6, 237

Chairman—R.P. [Sixth Night] June 7, 367

Committee—R.P. [Seventh Night] June 8, 494

Committee—R.P. [Eighth Night] June 9, 666

Committee—R.P. [Ninth Night] June 12, 844

Committee—R.P. [Tenth Night] June 13, 988

Committee—R.P. [Eleventh Night] June 14, 1191

Committee—R.P. [Twelfth Night] June 15, 1279

Committee—R.P. [Thirteenth Night] June 16, 1426

Committee—R.P. [Fourteenth Night] June 19, 1615

Committee—R.P. [Fifteenth Night] June 20, 1806

Chairman—R.P. [Sixteenth Night] June 21, 1888

PRICE, Captain G. E., Devonport

Navy—Inspector of Machinery in the Channel Squadron, 1408

Prisons (England) Act

Prison Discipline, Question, Mr. R. N. Fowler;

Answer, Sir William Harcourt June 15, 1262

Prison Warders, Question, Mr. R. N. Fowler;

Answer, Sir William Harcourt June 5, 78

Public Health (Fruit-Pickers Lodgings)

Bill [H.L.] (The Earl Stanhope)

l. Presented; read 1st June 12 (No. 127)

Read 2nd June 19

Committee*; Report June 20

Public Health (Scotland) Act Amendment

Bill (The Earl of Fife)

l. Royal Assent June 19 [45 Vict. c. 11]

Public Health—Unqualified Medical Practitioners

Question, Mr. H. Samuelson; Answer, Sir William Harcourt June 12, 822

Public Offices Site Bill Select Committee

Ordered, That the Report and Minutes of Evidence of the Select Committee on Public Offices and Buildings (Metropolis) 1877, be referred to the Select Committee on the Public Offices Site Bill (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) June 9

Public Schools (Scotland) Teachers Bill

(Mr. Mundella, The Lord Advocate, Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland)

c. Order for Committee read; Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" June 5, 208; Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. A. Grant); after short debate, Motion withdrawn

Original Question put, and agreed to; Committee—R.P. [Bill 153]

Committee; Report June 12, 949

Considered*; read 3rd June 13

l. Read 1st (Lord Carlingford) June 15 (No. 143)

PUGH, Mr. L. P., Cardiganshire

Blackburn Improvement, Consid. Motion for Adjournment, 1573, 1575

Egypt—Political Crisis, 1136

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 602; cl. 8, 1533

Supreme Court of Judicature Acts Amendment, Comm. cl. 1, Amendt. 952

PULESTON, Mr. J. H., Devonport

Egypt (Political Affairs)—Conference, 494, 836

Navy—Dockyards—Memorial of Established Shipwrights, 1246

RAIKES, Right Hon. H. C., Preston

Egypt—The Political Crisis, 981

Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial Statement, 1797

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 10, 1702

Railway Rates, Select Committee on—Draft Report

Question, Mr. E. Stanhope; Answer, Mr. Evelyn Ashley June 20, 1761

RANKIN, Mr. J., Leominster

Army (Auxiliary Forces)—Volunteer Corps, 75

Rating of Places of Religious Worship Bill

(Mr. Arnold Morley, Mr. George Russell)

c. Bill withdrawn * June 5 [Bill 32]

RAVENSWORTH, Earl of

Egypt (Political Affairs)—Combined Fleet at Alexandria, 460, 461

Real and Personal Estate (Accumulation of Income) Bill (Mr. Davey, Mr. Arthur Arnold, Mr. Henry H. Fowler)

c. Ordered; read 1^o * June 15 [Bill 205]REDESDALE, Earl of (Chairman of Committees)

Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway (Extensions and Dock), Motion for Re-comm. 15

REDMOND, Mr. J. E., New Ross

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Evictions, 1176;—Co. Wexford, 1261

Law and Police—Removal of Placards, 654

Magistracy—Derry City Bench, 653, 654

Royal Irish Constabulary—Constable Byrne, 1598

Ireland—Protection of Person and Property

Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions

Coleman Naughton, 474

Crosbie, Mr. Denis, 480

Curley, Patrick and John, 984

Kelly, Mr. John, 474

Kenny, Mr. M. P., 984

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 3,

243, 244; Amendt. 265; cl. 4, 584, 608;

Amendt. 740, 926, 930; cl. 5, 1079; cl. 6,

Amendt. 1105, 1107; cl. 7, 1335, 1338, 1361,

1455, 1456; cl. 11, 1843, 1844; Amendt.

1845, 1855, 1952

Regent's Canal, City, and Docks Railway Bill (by Order)c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^o" June 9; 631

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Monk); Question proposed, "That 'now' &c.;" after debate, Question put; A. 220, N. 74; M. 146 (D. L. 120)

Main Question put, and agreed to (Queen's Consent signified); Bill read 3^oREID, Mr. R. T., Hereford

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1,

Amendt. 109, 117; cl. 3, 246; cl. 4, 567

RICHARD, Mr. H., Merthyr Tydfil

Africa (South)—Zululand—John Dunn's Territory, 474, 1237

RITCHIE, Captain C. T., Tower Hamlets

Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial Statement, 1784

Roads Provisional Order (Edinburgh) Bill
(The Lord Rosebery)

l. Report of Select Comm. * June 20

ROBERTSON, Mr. H., Shrewsbury

Regent's Canal, City, and Docks Railway, 3R. 645

ROGERS, Mr. J. E. Thorold, Southwark

Thames Navigation—Thames below Bridge, 840

ROSEBERY, Earl of (Under Secretary of State for the Home Department)

Entail (Scotland), 1R. 51, 54; 2R. 1223

Entails (Scotland), Motion for a Return, 975, 1401

RUSSELL, Mr. C., Dundalk

Criminal Law (Ireland)—Case of J. M. Johnson, ex-Suspect, 469, 470

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 3,

250; cl. 4, Amendt. 339, 442, 453, 531, 680;

cl. 5, Amendt. 988, 1002; cl. 7, 1319, 1430,

1441, 1449, 1455; Amendt. 1461

RUSSELL, Mr. G. W. E., Aylesbury

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 11, 1879

RUTLAND, Duke of

Food Supply—Import of Frozen Sheep, 970

RYLANDS, Mr. P., Burnley

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 5, 993; cl. 7, 1365; cl. 11, 1908

ST. AUBYN, Sir J., Cornwall, W.

Navy—Liability of Officers—Retired Pay, 1264

SALISBURY, Marquess of

Education Department—Willesden District School Board, 628

Egypt (Political Affairs)—Miscellaneous Questions, 3

Anglo-French Fleet at Alexandria, 629

Latest Telegrams, 965

Riots at Alexandria, 773, 1217, 1218, 1221;

—Reparation to British Subjects, 1730

Entail (Scotland), 1R. 54

Entails (Scotland), Motion for a Return, 975

Evictions (Ireland)—Landlords, 1743, 1744, 1746

Justices' Jurisdiction, 457

Protection of Person and Property (Ireland)

Act, 1881—Release of Mr. Parnell and others confined under the Act, Motion for Papers, 43, 49, 51

SALT, Mr. T., Stafford

Egypt—Political Crisis, 1607

SAMUELSON, Mr. H. B., Frome

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 945; cl. 7, 1200; cl. 8, 1519; Amendt. 1522, 1524; cl. 11, 1880
Public Health—Unqualified Medical Practitioners, 822
Turkey and Greece—Murder of Mr. Ogle, 1226

SCHREIBER, Mr. C., Pools

Post Office—Miscellaneous Questions
Auxiliary Letter Carriers, 480
Letter Carriers, 1614
Uxbridge Post Office, 829

Science and Art—The National Gallery

Question, Mr. Coope; Answer, Mr. Shaw
Lefevre June 15, 1262
The Hamilton Palace Collection, Question, Mr. Coope; Answer, Mr. Gladstone June 15, 1274

SOLATER-BOOTH, Right Hon. G., Hants, N.

Blackburn Improvement, Consid. 1564, 1571
Corn Returns (No. 2), 2R. 613
Manchester Corporation, Consid. 1580

Scotland

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Elementary Education—The Island of Lewis, Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, Mr. Muddella June 16, 1402
Evictions—Lochcarron, Co. Ross, Question, Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh; Answer, The Lord Advocate June 12, 806
Licensing Acts—The Joint Licensing Committee, Peterhead, Questions, Dr. Cameron; Answers, The Lord Advocate June 5, 58; Questions, Dr. Cameron; Answers, Mr. Courtney June 13, 976; June 15, 1246
Local Taxation and Expenditure, Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, The Lord Advocate June 12, 843

Scotland—Entails

Moved for Return of—

- "I. Entails executed in Scotland prior to 1st August 1848;
(a.) The number cut off since that date;
(b.) The number now in existence;
"II. Entails executed in Scotland on and subsequent to 1st August 1848;
(a.) The number registered;
(b.) The number which have since been cut off;
(c.) The number now in existence (The Earl of Camperdown) June 13, 974; after short debate, Motion agreed to Question, Observations, The Earl of Minto; Reply, The Earl of Rosebery June 16, 1400

SELWIN-IBBETSON, Sir H. J., Essex, W.

Police, Leave, 620
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 311

Settled Land Bill [H.L.]

(Sir R. Assheton Cross)

- c.* Order for Committee read; Moved, "That the Order for going into Committee be discharged, and that the Bill be committed to a Select Committee" June 6, 349; Question put, and agreed to Moved, "That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee;" after short debate, Motion withdrawn Moved, "That the Bill be committed to the Select Committee on the Conveyancing Bill;" Question put, and agreed to

Settlement and Removal Law Amendment Bill

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Hibbert)

- c.* Ordered; read 1^o June 6 [Bill 194]

SEXTON, Mr. T., Sligo

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Evictions, 1182, 1183;—Death from Exposure after Eviction at Rhode, King's Co., 1418, 1589, 1590, 1759
Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Release of Persons detained under the Act, 1250, 1416, 1417
"Treaty of Kilmainham," 987

Parliament—Prevention of Crime (Ireland)—Dublin Petition, 1749

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 5, 991, 992, 997, 1016, 1022, 1023, 1027, 1032; Amendt. 1047, 1048, 1082, 1084; cl. 6, 1090, 1104, 1107, 1109; cl. 7, 1192, 1196, 1291, 1303, 1317, 1348; Amendt. 1358, 1362, 1366; Motion for reporting Progress, 1376, 1435, 1442, 1448, 1472; cl. 9, 1481, 1486, 1487, 1491, 1493, 1510, 1522, 1525; Amendt. 1527, 1529, 1540, 1542, 1543, 1621, 1628, 1632, 1637, 1640, 1642, 1649, 1655, 1661, 1673, 1677, 1683; cl. 10, 1694, 1706; cl. 11, 1809, 1810; Amendt. 1820, 1831, 1848, 1864, 1865, 1868, 1872, 1893, 1899, 1917, 1918, 1925, 1930, 1945, 1948; cl. 12, 1965

SHAFTESBURY, Earl of

Imprisonment for Contumacy, 3R. 965

SHAW, Mr. W., Cork Co.

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 98

SHEIL, Mr. E., Meath Co.

Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial Statement, 1805

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 684; cl. 7, 1355, 1369; cl. 11, 1837, 1943

SIDMOUTH, Viscount

Navy—H.M.S. "Inconstant," 971

SIMON, Mr. Serjeant J., Dowbury

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 3, 252; cl. 4, 561

SLAGG, Mr. J., Manchester

Egypt—Political Crisis, 1255

SMITH, Right Hon. W. H., Westminster
 Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill—Irish Church Fund, 1265
 Civil Service—Superannuation, 465
 Egypt (Political Affairs)—Riots at Alexandria, 1411
 Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial Statement, 1781

SMITH, Mr. T. E., Tynemouth, &c.
 Partnerships, Comm. 211
 Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 7, 1384

SOLICITOR GENERAL, The (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL), Durham
 Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 712, 737; cl. 6, 1102
 Supreme Court of Judicature Acts Amendment, Comm. cl. 1, 956

Somersham Rectory Bill [H.L.]
(The Earl of Powis)

l. Presented; read 1st, and referred to the Examiners June 6 (No. 116)
 Read 2^d June 10, 1858

SPEAKER, The (Right Hon. Sir H. B. W. BRAND), Cambridgeshire
 Blackburn Improvement, Consid. 1565, 1570, 1575
 Commonable Rights, Lords Amendts. Consid. 362
 Egypt (Political Affairs)—Miscellaneous Questions
 Political Crisis, 1132, 1136, 1258
 Proposed Conference, 661
 Riots at Alexandria, 1409, 1410
 Egypt and Italy—Cession of Assab Bay, 1269, 1270, 1272
 Ejectments Suspension (Ireland), 1110
 Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions
 Evictions, 1174
 Mr. O'Shea's Visit to Kilmainham Gaol, 1252
 Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Persons detained under the Act—Island of Arran, 658
 Metropolitan Board of Works (Money), 2R. 1391
 Parliament—Miscellaneous Questions
 Business of the House, 1769;—Ministerial Statement, 1781, 1793, 1796, 1805
 Business of the House—Government Annuities Bill, 1599
 Order in Debate—Mr. O'Kelly, M.P. for Roscommon, 365, 366, 367
 Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill—Dublin Petition, 1749
 Privilege—Un-Parliamentary Language, 1278, 1279
 Rules and Orders—Order of Business, 603
 Rules of Debate—Amendments—Precedence in Committee, 82;—Questions—Release of Persons detained under the Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, 1881, 1591, 1592
 Parliamentary Oath (Mr. Bradlaugh)—"Gurney v. Bradlaugh," 805; Res. 964, 1020
 Settled Land, Comm. 351, 352

STANHOPE, Earl
 Parliament—Public Business—House of Lords—Local Government Bill, 1792

STANHOPE, Hon. E., Lincolnshire, Mid India—Simla Army Commission, 471
 Parliamentary Oath (Mr. Bradlaugh)—"Gurney v. Bradlaugh," Res. Motion for Adjournment, 1124
 Post Office—Telegraph Department—Sixpenny Rate for Telegrams, 1236
 Railway Rates, Select Committee on—Draft Report, 1761

STANLEY, Hon. E. L., Oldham
 Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 8, 1481

STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, Lord
 Bills of Sale Act (1873) Amendment, 2R. 1548

STOREY, Mr. S., Sunderland
 Parliament—Public Business, 1774
 Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 879; cl. 6, 1094, 1102, 1103; cl. 7, 1263

STUART, Mr. H. VILLIERS-, Waterford Co.
 Irish Church Fund—Amount of the Surplus, 1245

SUDELEY, Lord
 Food Supply—Import of Frozen Sheep, 970

SULLIVAN, Mr. T. D., Westmeath
 Ireland—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Monaghan, Mr. James, 825;—Release of Persons detained under the Act, 484
 Royal Irish Constabulary—Tearing down Notices, 825
 Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 127; cl. 4, 320, 321, 408, 529, 530; Amendt. 533, 689, 728, 741, 747, 771, 920; cl. 5, 935, 1030, 1042, 1043, 1055, 1056, 1060, 1067, 1068, 1072, 1084; cl. 6, 1110; cl. 7, 1293, 1294, 1296, 1320, 1357; cl. 8, 1639; cl. 9, 1617, 1631, 1667; cl. 10, 1697, 1708, 1715; cl. 11, 1820, 1836, 1844, 1862, 1863, 1920, 1948

Sunday Labour—Employment of Workmen on Sunday
 Questions, Mr. Hicks; Answers, Sir William Harcourt June 15, 1287

Supreme Court of Judicature Acts Amendment Bill

(Sir Hardinge Giffard, Mr. Butt, Mr. M'Intyre, Mr. Charles Russell, Mr. Inderwick, Mr. " " " " Buchanan, Mr. Gregory) rt June 12, 953 [Bill 154]

Surrey (Trial of Causes) Bill

(Mr. Warton, Mr. Henry H. Fowler)

c. Ordered; read 1^o * June 15 [Bill 204]

SYNAN, Mr. E. J., Limerick Co.

Ireland—National Education—Grants to National Schools, 813, 814

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 95, 108; cl. 3, 242, 262; Amendt. 263, 276, 277; cl. 4, 443, 604, 676, 742, 878; Amendt. 901, 908; cl. 5, 1022; cl. 6, 1093; cl. 8, 1487, 1492, 1504, 1540; cl. 9, 1619, 1670; cl. 11, 1847

TALBOT, Mr. J. G., Oxford University

Corn Returns (No. 2), 2R. 612

Public Health (Metropolis)—Robin Hood Court, Shoe Lane, 816

Vagrancy, 2R. 360; Comm. cl. 4, Amendt. 1883, 1884; add. cl. 1887

TAYLOR, Mr. P. A., Leicester

Education Department—Science and Art Department—Hall of Science, Old Street, 472

Evictions (Ireland), 1190

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 11, 1951

Vaccination—The Official Method, 978

Thames Navigation—The Thames below Bridge

Question, Mr. Thorold Rogers; Answer, Sir William Harcourt June 12, 840

THOMPSON, Mr. T. C., Durham

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 87; Amendt. 122; cl. 4, 406, 526, 744, 806; cl. 5, 1027, 1072; cl. 6, 1097; cl. 11, Amendt. 1806, 1827, 1828, 1834

THURLOW, Lord

Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment, Comm. cl. 6, 968

TORRENS, Mr. W. T. M'C., Finsbury

Regent's Canal, City, and Docks Railway, 3R. 648

TOTTENHAM, Mr. A. L., Leitrim

Egypt (Political Affairs)—Anglo-French Fleet at Suda Bay, 476

Ireland—Land Law Act—Judicial Rents, 1263

Ireland—Protection of Person and Property Act, 1881—Brennan, Mr. Thomas, 233
Ryan, John, 1697

Trade and Commerce—Treaty of Commerce with Spain

Question, Mr. Henry Lee; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke June 15, 1230

Tramways Provisional Orders Bill

(Mr. Ashley, Mr. Chamberlain)

c. Report * June 6 [Bill 141]

Considered * June 7

Read 3^o * June 8

l. Read 1^o * (Lord Sudeley) June 9 (No. 125)

Read 2^o * June 19

Tramways Provisional Orders (No. 2)

Bill (Mr. Ashley, Mr. Chamberlain)

c. Report * June 6 [Bill 140]

Considered * June 7

Read 3^o * June 8

l. Read 1^o * (Lord Sudeley) June 9 (No. 126)

Read 2^o * June 19

Committee * June 20

Tramways Provisional Orders (No. 3)

Bill (Mr. Ashley, Mr. Chamberlain)

c. Report * June 8 [Bill 151]

Considered * June 12

Read 3^o * June 13

l. Read 1^o * (Lord Sudeley) June 15 (No. 149)

Read 2^o * June 20

TREVELYAN, Right Hon. G. O. (Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland), Hawick, &c.

Ireland—Miscellaneous Questions

Agrarian Outrages—The Returns, 832

Assassinations in the Phoenix Park, Dublin

—Withdrawal of Police Patrols, 1603, 1604, 1605

Crime—John Lyne, Case of, 60

Crime and Outrage—Murder of Mr. Bourke and Escort—Three Farmers Shot and Maimed, 662

Crime and Police—Detective Police Force

—Colonel Brackenbury, 1240

Criminal Law—Johnson, J.M., ex-Suspect, 470

High Court of Justice—Vacancies on the Irish Bench, 468, 814

Irish Fisheries—The Report, 1233

Killaloe Drainage Works, 486

Kilmainham Compact—Mr. Yates Thompson, 1596

Kilmainham Gaol—Mr. O'Shea's Visit, 1252

Land Law Act, 1881—Sec. 21—"Sullivan v. Bowen," 1588

Law and Justice—Coroner of the Queen's County, 1426

Law and Police—Removal of Placards, 654

Library of the Four Courts, Dublin, 466

Licensing Acts—Cork Races, 79;—Mrs. Kelly, 65

Magistracy—Blake, Mr. H., R.M., 60, 61, 1584;—Derry City Bench, 653, 654

National Education—Grants to National Schools, 813

Peace Preservation Act, 1881—Proclamation of the City of Limerick, 1234

Police, Interference of—Edenderry, 985

Poor Law—Election of Chairman of Board of Guardians for Kildysart Union, 1407;

—Election of Guardians for the Killenkey Division, Rathdrum Union, 1238

Prisoners under the Statute 34 Edward III. c. 1—Miss Gleeson, 488

Prisons—Captain Hill, 63

Sea and Coast Fisheries, 1240

Ireland—Evictions—Miscellaneous Questions

476, 1177, 1183

Applications of Persons Evicted to the Land Courts, 1244

Captain G. Hely, 1605

TRAVELTYAN, Right Hon. G. O.—cont.

Connemara, 652
 Death from Exposure after Eviction at Rhode, King's Co., 1418, 1500, 1759
 Drumlish, Co. Longford, 408
 Lord Cloncurry's Tenants—Erection of Huts, 1415
 Rynmount, Co. Longford, 811
 Sheridan, Mr. J., Drumhalry, Granard,
 Co. Longford, 1233
 Special and Resident Magistrates and the Police, 1753, 1755
 Wexford County, 1251
 Ireland—Irish Land Commission—Miscellaneous Questions
 Labourers' Cottages, 492
 Messrs. Wylie and Cuninghame, Sub-Commissioners, 808
 Mr. Comyn, Sub-Commissioner, 807
 Ireland—Protection of Person and Property
 Act, 1881—Miscellaneous Questions
 Arrests under the Act, 1595
 Banon, James, 1248
 Barrett, Mr. Edward, 66, 477
 Brennan, Mr. Thomas, 235
 Crosbie, Mr. Denis, 460, 488
 Cunningham, Mr. Thomas, 1254
 Curley, Patrick and John, 984
 Darcey, Mr. J., 1253
 Detention of Persons arrested under the Act, 225, 1600
 Dolan and Hanley, Messrs., 64
 Dr. O'Brien and Mr. Doyle, 812
 Dunleavy, Mr. T., 493
 Egan, Mr. T., 471
 Feehan, Rev. T. 228
 Fitzsimons, W., and T. Tuite, 63
 Gallaher, Messrs. A. and P., 655
 Gannon, Mr. J., 811
 Houlihan, Mr. J., 984
 Huban, J., and others, 65
 Intimidation at Miltown Malbay, 1406
 Kelleher, Walsh, and Gleeson, Messrs., 1250
 Kelly, Mr. Denis, 471
 Kelly, Mr. John, 474
 Kenny, Mr. M. P., 985
 Keogh, Mr. W., 1254
 Lyons, Mr. M. J., 815
 McHugh, Mr. Bernard, 814
 McQueeney, Michael, 1596
 McSweney, Michael, 1757
 Moloney, Mr. A., 1254
 Monaghan, Mr. James, 825
 Morrissey, Messrs. J. and P., 1253
 Mulleaghy, Mr. Martin, 477
 Naughton, Mr. Coleman, 474
 O'Brien, Mr. J., 1249
 Persons detained under the Act, 1403,
 1404, 1405;—Island of Arran, 657, 658,
 659, 660
 Police Protection for Caretakers, Co. Wicklow, 817
 Prison Warders, 1751, 1752
 Quinn, Mr. P. J., 225, 1255
 Release of Persons detained under the Act,
 484, 485, 828, 1242, 1244, 1251, 1417,
 1750
 Residences of Released Prisoners, 1758
 Ryan, Mr. John, 1597, 1757
 Slatterley, Patrick, 1587
 Stewart, Edmund, 1602

TRAVELTYAN, Right Hon. G. O.—cont.

Ireland—Royal Irish Constabulary—Miscellaneous Questions
 Captain Talbot, 61, 62
 Constable Byrne, 1598
 Distribution of the Vote of Compensation,
 812, 1590
 Extra Pay—Ex-Constable Walsh, 1250
 Pay and Promotion, 651
 Tearing down Notices, 325
 Ireland, State of—Miscellaneous Questions
 Ballina, Affray at, 1248
 Illegal Notices—"Boycotting," 828
 Intimidation, 1753
 Police Protection at Amagarra, Co. Cork, 1583
 Police Surveillance, 1585
 Rathcoole, Outrage at, 481
 Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial
 Statement, 1794
 Parliament—Rules of Debate—Questions—
 Release of Persons detained under the Protection of Person and Property (Ireland)
 Act, 1881, 1591, 1592
 Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1,
 114, 117, 126, 178, 188; cl. 4, 333, 338, 343,
 345, 347, 738, 739, 901; cl. 5, 934, 946,
 948, 1060; cl. 7, 1209, 1359, 1362; Amendt.
 1423, 1432, 1436, 1442, 1444, 1445; cl. 8,
 1481, 1509; cl. 9, 1652, 1653; cl. 10,
 1693, 1702, 1711; cl. 11, 1820, 1824, 1829,
 1839, 1889, 1892, 1911, 1942

TRURO, Lord

Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, 628

Trusts (Scotland) Bill (Mr. James Stewart, Mr. Mackintosh, Mr. Crum)

c. Ordered; read 1^o June 8 [Bill 198]

Turkey and Greece—Murder of Mr. Ogle

Question, Mr. H. Samuelson; Answer, Sir
 Charles W. Dilke June 15, 1226

TYLER, Sir H. W., Harwich

Egypt (Political Affairs)—Riots at Alexandria
 —Papers, 822
 Prevention of Crime (Ireland)—Condition of Ireland, 841

Union of Benefices (London) Bill [R.L.]
(The Lord Bishop of London)

l. Report June 6, 219 (No. 101)
 Read 3^o June 13 (No. 118)

Vaccination

Transmission of Disease through Inoculation of Soldiers in the French Army, Question,
 Mr. Hopwood; Answer, Mr. Dodson June 8, 467
 The Official Method, Question, Mr. P. A.,
 Taylor; Answer, Mr. Dodson June 13, 978
 Vaccination Act—Calf Lymph, Question, Dr.
 Cameron; Answer, Mr. Dodson June 16, 1402

Vagrancy Bill

(Mr. Pell, Mr. John

Talbot, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Cropper, Mr. John Holland)

- c. Read 2^d, after short debate June 6, 358
- Committee * : Report June 9 [Bill 62]
- Committee * (on re-comm.)—R.F. June 15
- Committee (on re-comm.) : Report June 20, 1883
- Considered * June 21 [Bill 199]

VENTRY, Lord

Evictions (Ireland)—Landlords, 1741

VERNEY, Sir H., Buckingham

England (East Coast)—Harbours of Refuge—
Filey, 62
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 7, 1331, 1332

WARTON, Mr. C. N., Bridport

Commonable Rights, Lords Amends. Consid.
Motion for Adjournment, 361, 362, 363
County Courts (Advocates' Costs), 2R. 218
Egypt—Political Crisis, 1136
Ejectments Suspension (Ireland), 1110, 1127
Evictions (Ireland), 1174
Judgments (Inferior Courts), Consid. cl. 4, 216
Metropolitan Board of Works (Money), 1390
Parliament—Business of the House, Ministerial
Statement, 1804
Parliamentary Oath (Mr. Bradlaugh)—“Gurney v. Bradlaugh,” Res. 1124
Partnerships, Comm. 212, 214
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1,
Amendt. 103, 104, 106, 114 ; cl. 2, Amendt.
202, 205 ; cl. 3, 251 ; cl. 4, 435, 528, 532 ;
cl. 6, 1016 ; cl. 7, 1389, 1456 ; cl. 9, 1627, 1662
Public Schools (Scotland) Teachers, Comm.
209
Settled Land, Comm. 352
Supreme Court of Judicature Acts Amendment,
Comm. cl. 1, 956

WATERFORD, Marquess of

Evictions (Ireland)—Landlords, 1730, 1735
Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister, 2R.
793
Protection of Person and Property (Ireland)
Act, 1881—Release of Mr. Parnell and others confined under the Act, Motion for Papers, 19, 30, 34, 61

WATERLOW, Sir S. H., Gravesend

Regent's Canal, City, and Docks Railway, 3R.
641

WATNEY, Mr. J., Surrey, E.

Regent's Canal, City, and Docks Railway, 3R.
643

WAYS AND MEANS

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS

Inland Revenue

Carriage Duties, Question, Mr. Cochran-Patrick ; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 5, 77

WAYS AND MEANS—cont.

Duties on Gold and Silver Plate, Question,
Mr. R. N. Fowler ; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer June 15, 1273
Inland Revenue Department—Pay of Surveying
Officers, Question, Lord George Hamilton ;
Answer, Mr. Courtney June 5, 66

WEDDERBURN, Sir D., Haddington Burghs

Army—British Troops in Natal, 810
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 858

WENLOCK, Lord

Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway
(Extensions and Dock), Motion for Re-comm.
14

WESTMINSTER, Duke of

Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway
(Extensions and Dock), Motion for Re-
comm. 4

WHITLEY, Mr. E., Liverpool

Copyright (Musical Compositions), Comm. cl. 2, 1717
County Courts (Advocates' Costs), 2R. 218
Judgments (Inferior Courts), Consid. cl. 8,
Amendt. 217
Partnerships, Comm. 212
Vagrancy, Comm. cl. 4, 1884

WILLIAMSON, Mr. S., St. Andrews, &c.

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 4, 917
Royal Mint—Profit on the Coinage of Silver, 1611

WILLIS, Mr. W., Colchester

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 9, 1646

WILMOT, Sir J. E., Warwickshire, S.

Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 122 ; cl. 3, 246, 262, 281 ; Motion for Adjournment, 282, 284 ; cl. 4, 718 ; cl. 7, 1455

WOLFF, Sir H. D., Portsmouth

Copyright (Works of Fine Art, &c.), 71
Egypt—Miscellaneous Questions
Conference, 494
Fleet at Alexandria, 1758
Political Affairs, 229, 230, 231, 232, 490, 1421
Political Crisis, Motion for Adjournment,
1132, 1171, 1172, 1257, 1606, 1609, 1763,
1764, 1765
Navy—Riggers in the Dockyards, 227
Prevention of Crime (Ireland), Comm. cl. 10,
Motion for reporting Progress, 1699, 1700,
1701 ; cl. 12, 1964

Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway (Extensions and Dock) Bill

i. Bill re-comm. to another Select Committee ;
the Committee to be proposed by the Committee of Selection June 5, 4

END OF VOLUME CCLXX., AND FIFTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1882.